DOMINUM

Jeſum Chriſtum

SERVATOREM CLEMENTISSIMUM,

Euchariſticon

JOHANNIS FOXI.

CONfecto nunc opere, quod tuis primùm auſpiciis ac voluntate aggreſſus (ſumme & adorande Jeſu, idemque Servator clementiſſime) inchoavi, quodq; demum beneficio ac favore exegi atque abſolvi, præter omnem certam opinionem & vires meas: ſupereſt itaque pro officio meo, ut animula hæc, ceu pro votiva tabula, gratias, ſi non quantas debeat (utinam enim id poſſit) at quantas queat maxime, munificentiſſimæ tuæ perſolvat Majeſtati; quæ tam miſerum homuncionem, vel ſyphar potius hominis, in laboribus tot tantiſque iſtis, qui vel aſellum quemvis ἀχθοφόρον poſſent conficere, tumultuantem, benigno ſucceſſu ac ſolatio tam clementer ſuffulſerit. Quanquam autem de operis difficultate nihil hic cauſari attinet, quæ vix æſtimari à multis poterit; tua tamen non ignorat omnipotens Majeſtas, hujus, qualecunque ſit, negotii confectio, quibus quamque non ferendis curis, vigiliis, moleſtiis conſtitit; quibus nullo modo pares futuri eſſemus, niſi faventis gratiæ tuæ numen affulſiſſet, ac ſeſe quodam modo admiſcuiſſet operi. Quid ni enim fatear ac teſter ingenuè, quod re ipſa experti ſumus? Perſenſimus enim, peneque oculis ipſis conſpeximus, ſingularem excelſæ dextræ tuæ ἐνεργείαν non modo in ſucceſſu negotii provehendo, ſed in vita etiam ſpiritúque inter labores conſervando. Tui igitur muneris eſt (clementiſſime Jeſu) quòd opus tuis ſuſceptum auſpiciis huc uſque provectum ſit. Nos viciſſim, quod noſtri ſit officii, gratias clementiæ tuæ, cum noſtro privatim, tum publico quodammodo Eccleſiæ tuæ nomine, agimus. Vel hinc enim cernimus quanti cauſam Martyrum tuorum æſtimes, quando eorum illuſtrando nomini tantâ faveas propenſione. Quanquam verò ſi nunc ex extaret eorum recordatio, non poſſent non omnibus modis eſſe illuſtriſſimi, quorum ſint nomina vitæ tuæ libro inſcripta. Et tamen voluit hoc modo tua declarare Majeſtas, nobiſque innoteſcere hominibus, quàm honorificum ſit pro tui nominis gloria fortiter dimicantes occumbere, quorum tu vitam à cinere ac rogo ſic vindicas, ſic cauſam tueris, ſic dignitatem illuſtras, ut eandem cum gloriæ fœnore abs te recipiant clariorem, quàm ſi ipſi nunquam alioqui perdidiſſent. Habet ſiquidem peculiare hoc ſibi militiæ tuæ ratio, longè à mundo hoc diverſum, quod in caſtris tuis militantes ſive vivant, ſive moriantur, multò clareſcant à funere fœlicius, quam ſi vixiſſent maximé.

Auxilium Chriſtum in concinnando hoc opere.

Sic Crannerum videmus, Ridleum, Latimerum, Johannem Hooperum, Bradfordum, cæteróſque ejuſdem decuriæ pugiles, quanto majore occubuiſſe cum gloria in acie tua depugnantes, quam ſi, relicta ſtatione in qua erant collocati, ſaluti ipſi ſuæ cauſam tuam poſtpoſuiſſent. Quæ enim gens, quæ natio, quæ temporum vetuſtàs, quæ hominum poſteritas eorum non cantabit laudes, non virtutem agnoſcet, non magnitudinem admirabitur? Quis Wiclevum unquam, aut Cobhamum natum fuiſſe exiſtimaſſet, niſi tua in cauſa tam egiſſent ſtrenuè? Quanto honori illud Huſſio Bokemenſi, noſtróque Tindalo fuit, quòd vitam in Evangelii tui cauſa perditam, magis abs te recipere, quàm ipſi retinere maluerint? Spectemus è diverſa parte adverſarios tuos, quorum tam multas eſſe conſtat cædes, injurias, crudelitates adverſus tuos, multaq; item occultè & ſceleſtè ab iiſdem perpetrata, quæ nunquam ſperabant fore palam: & tamen quid unquam in angulis & tenebris ab illis eſt deſignatum tam occultè adverſus Eccleſiam, quod non in apricum produxit tua producétque providentia? Atq; ita produxit, ut unde ipſi laudis ſibi conceperunt animo opinionem, inde ſummum ſibiipſis dedecus peperierint & contumeliam, quam nec vita effugere, nec morte unquam finire poterint. Quis Guiſos, Bonneros, Storios, Gardineros, tanquam execranda hominum nomina nunc non novit? non exhorret? quis eorum facinora obliterebit dies, aut ſepeliet memoria? Etquid hos in tanta multitudine hoſtium tuorum recenſeo? Cui unquam proſperè ceſſit tuo rebellare numini, aut hoſtium ſe Eccleſiæ tuæ profiteri? Papæ nomen quàm erat aliquando in his terris celèbre & glorioſum? Nunc quid putidius, quid probroſius? Cardinalitium faſtigium cœperunt primò admirari homines, multáq; proſequi reverentia: Sic Monachorum & Nonnarum Collegia ſuum quondam habebant plauſum apud plebem ſimplicem & credulam. At poſtquam ſpreta veritate tua cœperunt grafſari contra te, tuorúmque homicidæ fieri, eò tandem ſunt prolapſi (exceptis paucis lucis quos tua exemit gratia) ut reliqua fex nihil aliud jam eſſe præter vocabula quædam ad ignominia relicta videatur.

Hæc nimirum (ſanctiſſime Domine ac Deus noſter) juſtiſſimi judicii tui ſunt præludia, ex quo haud difficile æſtimare ſit, quidnam in altero illo expectaturi ſint, quos in hoc ipſo ſeculo, hoc eſt, in ſuo ipſorum Regno, tanta accumules infamia & dedecore. Sed omiſſis his, ad ſanctos tuos redeamus Martyres, quorum nomine meritò à nobis perenne velut ſacrificium laudis & gratiarum tuæ debetur, ſimul & habetur, bonitati. Primùm, quòd in Eccleſiæ tuæ cauſa dimicantibus tam fortem & alacrem ſpiritum omnibúſque tormentis majorem adverſus parricidas Papiſtas ſubminiſtraſti. Deinde quòd & nobis in illorum deſudantibus hiſtoria propitius adeò clementiæ tuæ favor affuerit. Debetur & hoc privatim meo quoque nomine ſingulari tuæ pietati, quòd vitam toties alioqui nutantem, in hac tanta, quantum tu ſolus noviſti, laboris immenſitate conſervatam tuo volueris beneficio. Verum illud imprimis omnes debemus pariter effuſiſſimo tuo in nos amori, quòd beatorum Martyrum tuorum, quos mundi hujus ad flammas & cineres adegerit perverſitas, cauſam & innocentiam, velut è cinere recollectam, in lucem denuò notitiámque Eccleſiæ tuæ revocare ac patefacere dignatus ſit. Etſi enim dubium non eſt, quin in ſupremo illo judicio tuo, quum virtutes cœlorum movebuntur, omnis eorum ad amuſſim excutietur cauſa ante tribunal tuum, eſt tamen aliquid hîc quoque in Eccleſia tua, cauſam ipſorum, facta, vitæque virtutes cæteras non ignorari. Tunc autem ad illos uberior gloria, ad nos interea major redundabit fructus, quando ex ipſorum rectè factis, integritate, innocentia, fide ac patientia conſtare poterit, non quid ipſi ſolum fecerint, ſed quid & nobis eorum ſit exemplo faciendum.

Deploratio noſtrorum tum & ſuorum.

Sed hîc rurſus (dulciſſime Jeſu) opus eſt benigno favoris tui præſidio. Nos enim qui filii Martyrum tuorum ſumus, quoſque maximè majores noſtros imitari conveniebat, nunc nihil ferè parentum tenemus, præter vitæ ſolam hanc, quam ſuo partam ſanguine relinquerunt, libertatem: Qua etiam ipſa nimiùm abutimur intemperanter, ut jam periculum ſit, ne non filii modò Martyrum, ſed ne fratres quidem ipſorum haberi mereamur. Quantum enim interſit diſcriminis, quamque prorſus diſconvenit ordine toto noſtra Conſuetudo ab illorum veſtigiis & Diſciplina, pudet profectò referre. Sed quid ego tibi referam, cujus nihil non perſpicit Majeſtas ac intuetur? Quanto illis ſtudio ac curæ fuit amore tui cætera quæque, adeoque ſeipſos ad vitæ etiam contemptum abdicare, mundum cum omnibus deſideriis flocci facere, voluptates tanquam nugas ſpernere? Nec ſinebant pericula undique imminentia opibus congerendis, multoque minus honoribus cumulandis vacare. Contrà verò, noſtra nunc vita, ſtudium, omníſque adeo contentio, quid niſi mundum ſpirat, quid aliud quàm perpetuum quoddam fluxarum rerum, opum, ac honorum aucupium videtur & ambitus? Ac illi quam præclarè ſecum actum putaſſent, ſi vel vivere modò licuiſſet. Ideoque multi fuere eorum, qui Mariæ Reginæ facultates & poſſeſſiones omnes aduſque extremum aſſem obtulerunt, dummodo ſolam ipſis remitteret conſcientiam. Et quæ nos tanta hæc habendi intemperies exagitat, quibus nec unus nec mediocris victus poſſit eſſe ſatis? Sine modo, ſine fine, opibus, Sacerdotis, cenſuique dilatando inhiamus. Quanto ambitu amicos fatigamus & inimicos, non ut vivamus ſolùm, verùm ut ſublimes vivamus & honorati? De fide, de manſuetudine eorum, tolerantia, ſimplicitate, ac patentia incredibili, quid dici ſatis poteſt? Quanta conſtantia, qua animi alacritate perpeſſi ſunt quicquid infligebatur, vindictam, omnem Deo remittentes, cui & cauſam commendabant? Nulla vis eos adverſariorum dejicere, nec minæ frangere, non ludibria movere, non pericula, non tormenta ulla conſternere, nec delinire blanditiæ potuerunt.

Componamus nunc noſtram cum his mollitiem. Sed pudor prohibet. Nam quæ tam levis nos tentationis aura afflare poſſit, quæ non illico præcipitates ac tranſverſos rapiat in avaritiam, in faſtum, voluptates, turpitudinem, vindictam, & in quid non malorum? Quæ tam levis objici poterit injuriola, pro qua non cœlum terræ miſcemus, mariáque turbamus ab imo? ex quo in promptu eſt colligere, quantum ab eo abſumus, ut mortem ſimus unquam tua cauſa ſubituri? ſi quando res Martyrum flagitet, quum nec affectus quidem iſtos tuo amputare juſſu velimus. Quapropter ut Martyrum quidem illorum cauſa gratias agimus nomini tuo ſancto; ita noſtra viciſſim cauſa deprecamur, ut qui largitus ſit ipſis vincendi facultatem, nobis itidem pia eorundem exempla imitandi felicitatem aſpires; ſicque Eccleſiæ tuæ affulgeat tua gratia, nec ubi ſeducti hujus mundi illecebris, ſocordiores ipſi in retinenda Evangelii tui victoria, quàm illi in comparanda ſtrenui, videamur. Poſtremò, quoniam hiſtoriam hanc tuo nutu ac voluntate aggreſſi, in ea re operam ſtudiúmque poſuimus, quo facta geſtáque ſanctorum tuorum (ſanctiſſime Jeſu) ad nominis tui gloriam, & in commodum Eccleſiæ publicum emergerent, adde nunc labori fructum, ſimulque hiſtoriæ tutelam in te recipias magnopere petimus; cui & opus ipſum totumque me ipſum, quem tot modis tuæ miſericordiæ debeo, toto corpore & anima totiſq; viribus commendo, dedico, conſecroq; cui omne cadat genu, omníſque vox & lingua confeſſionis gloriam per omnes Eccleſias tribuat perſonetque. Amen.

TO THE

RIGHT VERTUOUS,

Moſt Excellent and Noble Princeſs,

Queen ELIZABETH,

OUR

Dread Lady, By the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of Chriſts Faith and Goſpel, and Principal Governor both of the Realm, and alſo over the ſaid Church of England and Ireland, under Chriſt the Supream Head of the ſame, &c. JOHN FOX, Her humble Subject, wiſheth daily increaſe of GODS Holy Spirit and Grace, with long Reign, perfect Health, and joyful Peace to Govern His Flock committed to Her Charge; To the Example of all good Princes, The Comfort of his Church, And Glory of his bleſſed Name.

CHRIST the Prince of all Princes, who hath placed you in your Throne of Majeſty, under Him to Govern the Church and Realm of England, give your Royal Highneſs long to ſit, and many years to Reign over Us, in all flouriſhing Felicity, to his gracious Pleaſure, and long laſting joy of all your Subjects. Amen.

When I firſt preſented theſe Acts and Monuments unto your Majeſty (moſt dear Sovereign, Queen ELIZABETH our peaceable Salome) which your Majeſties rare Clemency received in ſuch gentle part; I well hoped that theſe my Travels in this kind of writing had been well at an end, whereby I might have returned my Studies again to other purpoſes after mine own deſire, more fit than to write Hiſtories, eſpecially in the Engliſh-Tongue. But certain evil diſpoſed Perſons, of intemperate Tongues, Adverſaries to good proceedings, would not ſuffer me ſo to reſt, fuming and fretting, and raiſing up ſuch miſerable Exclamations at the firſt appearing of the Book, as was wonderful to hear. A man would have thought Chriſt to have been new-born again, and that Herod, with all the City of Jeruſalem had been in an uproar. Such bluſtring and ſtriving was then againſt that poor Book through all Quarters of England, even to the Gates of Lovain, ſo that no Engliſh Papiſt almoſt in all the Realm thought himſelf a perfect Catholick, unleſs he had caſt out ſome word or other to give that Book a blow.

Whereupon, conſidering with my ſelf what ſhould move them thus to rage, firſt I began with more circumſpect diligence to overlook again that I had done. In ſearching whereof I found the fault, both what it was, and where it lay; which was indeed not ſo much in the Book it ſelf (to ſay the truth) as in another certain privy myſtery and working of ſome; of whom Joan. Avent. ſhall tell us in his own words, and ſhew us who they be, Quibus (inquit) audiendi quæ fecerint pudor eſt; nullus faciendi, quæ audire erubeſcunt. Illic, ubi opus, nihil verentur; hic, ubi nihil opus eſt, ibi verentur, &c. Who, being aſhamed belike to hear their worthy ſtratagems like to come to light, ſought by what means they might the ſtopping of the ſame. And becauſe they could not work it per brachium ſeculare, by publick Authority (the Lord of Heaven long preſerve your Noble Majeſty) they renewed again an old wonted practiſe of theirs; doing in like ſort herein, as they did ſometimes with the holy Bible in the days of your renowned Father of famous Memory, King Henry the Eighth; who when they neither by manifeſt reaſon could gain-ſay the matter contained in the Book, nor yet abide the coming out thereof, then ſought they by a ſubtil deviſed train to deprave the Tranſlation, Notes, and Prologues thereof, bearing the King in hand, and all the people, that there were in it a thouſand lyes, and I cannot tell how many more. Not that there were in it ſuch lyes in very deed; but that the coming of that Book ſhould not bewray their lying falſhood, therefore they thought beſt to begin firſt to make Exceptions themſelves againſt it; playing in their ſtage like as Phormio did in the old Comedy, who, being in all the fault himſelf, began firſt to quarrel with Demipho, when Demipho rather had good right to lay Phormio by the heels.

With like facing brags theſe Catholick Phormiones think now to daſh out all good Books, and amongſt others alſo theſe Monuments of Martyrs. Which godly Martyrs as they could not abide being alive, ſo neither can they now ſuffer their memories to live after their death, leſt the Acts of them being known might bring perhaps their wicked Acts and cruel Murthers to deteſtation; and therefore ſpurn they ſo vehemently againſt this Book of Hiſtories, with all kind of Contumelies and Uproars, railing and wondering upon it; much like as I have heard of a Company of Thieves, who in robbing a certain true man by the highways-ſide, when they had found a piece of Gold or two about him more than he would be known of, they cried out of the falſehood of the world, marveling and complaining what little truth was to be found in men.

Even ſo theſe men deal alſo with me; for when they themſelves altogether delight in untruths, and have repleniſhed the whole Church of Chriſt with feigned Fables, lying Miracles, falſe Viſions, and miſerable Errors contained in their Miſſals, Portuſes, Breviars, and Summaries, and almoſt no true tale in all their Saints Lives and Feſtivals, as now alſo no great truths in our Lovanian Books, &c. Yet notwithſtanding, as though they were a people of much truth, and that the world did not perceive them, they pretend a face and zeal of great Verity; and as though there were no Hiſtories elſe in all the world corrupted, but only this Hiſtory of Acts and Monuments, with Tragical Voices they exclaim and wonder upon it, ſparing no coſt of hyperbolical phraſes to make it appear as full of lyes as lines, &c. Much after the like ſort of impudency as Sophiſters uſe ſometimes in their Sophiſms to do (and ſometimes is uſed alſo in Rhetorick) that when an argument cometh againſt them which they cannot well reſolve indeed, they have a rule to ſhift off the matter with ſtout words and tragical admiration, whereby to daſh the Opponent out of countenance, bearing the hearers in hand the ſame to be the weakeſt and ſlendereſt argument that ever was heard, not worthy to be anſwered, but utterly to be hiſſed out of the Schools.

With like ſophiſtication theſe alſo fare with me, who when they neither can abide to hear their own doings declared, nor yet deny the ſame, which they hear, to be true, for three or four eſcapes in the Book committed (and yet ſome of them in the Book amended) they neither reading the whole, nor rightly underſtanding that they read, inveigh and malign ſo perverſly the ſetting out thereof, as though neither any word in all that ſtory were true, nor any other ſtory falſe in all the world beſides. And yet in accuſing theſe my Accuſers I do not ſo excuſe my ſelf, nor defend my Book, as though nothing in it were to be ſponged or amended. Therefore I have taken theſe pains, and reiterated my Labours in traveling but this ſtory again; doing herein as Penelope did with her web, untwiſting that ſhe had done before: Or as Builders do ſometimes, which build and take down again, either to tranſpoſe the faſhion, or to make the foundation larger. So in recogniſing this Hiſtory I have employed a little more labour, partly to enlarge the argument which I took in hand, partly alſo to aſſay, whether by any pains taking I might pacifie the ſtomachs, or to ſatisfie the judgments of theſe importune Quarrelers: which nevertheleſs I fear I ſhall not do, when I have done all I can. For well I know, that all the heads of this hiſſing Hydra will never be cut off, though I were as ſtrong as Hercules. And if Apelles the skilful Painter, when he had beſtowed all his cunning upon a piece of work, which no good Artificer would or could greatly reprove, yet was not without ſome controuling Sutor, which took upon him ultra crepidam, much more may I look for the like in theſe controuling days.

Ne ſutor ultra crepidam.

Nevertheleſs committing the ſucceſs thereof unto the Lord, I have adventured again upon this ſtory of the Church, and have ſpent not only my pains, but alſo almoſt my health therein, to bring it to this. Which now being finiſhed, like as before I did, ſo again I exhibit and preſent the ſame unto your Princely Majeſty, bleſſing my Lord my God with all my heart; firſt for this liberty of peace and time which through your peaceable Government he hath lent unto us for the gathering both of this and other like Books, Tractations and Monuments requiſite to the behoof of his Church, which hitherto by iniquity of time could not be contrived in any Kings Reign ſince the Conqueſt, before theſe Halcyon dayes of yours.

Secondly, As we are all bound with publick Voices to magnifie our God for this happy preſervation of your Royal Eſtate; ſo privately for my own part, I alſo acknowledge my ſelf bound to my God and to my Saviour, who ſo graciouſly in ſuch weak health hath let me time, both to finiſh this Work, and alſo to offer the ſecond Dedication thereof to your Majeſty; deſiring the ſame to accept in good worth the donation thereof, if not for the worthineſs of the thing given, yet as a teſtification of the bounden ſervice and good will of one, which by this he here preſenteth, declareth what he would, if he had better to give.

And though the ſtory being written in the Popular-Tongue ſerveth not ſo greatly for your own peculiar reading, nor for ſuch as be learned; yet I ſhall deſire both you and them to conſider in it the neceſſity of the ignorant Flock of Chriſt committed to your Government in this Realm of England. How as they have been long led in ignorance, and wrapt in blindneſs for lack eſpecially of Gods Word, and partly alſo for wanting the light of Hiſtory, I thought pity but that ſuch ſhould be helped, their ignorance relieved, and ſimplicity inſtructed. I conſidered they were the Flock of Chriſt, and your Subjects, belonging to your account and charge, bought with the ſame price, and having as dear Souls to the Lord as other. And though they be but ſimple and unlearned, yet not unapt to be taught if they were applied. Furthermore, what inconvenience groweth of ignorance where knowledge lacketh, both I conſidered and experience daily teacheth.

And therefore hearing of the vertuous Inclination of your Majeſty, what a provident zeal full of ſolicitude you have, minding (ſpeedily I truſt) to furniſh all Quarters and Countries of this your Realm with the Voice of Chriſts Goſpel, and faithful preaching of his Word, I thought it alſo not unprofitable to adjoyn unto this your godly proceedings, and to the Office of the Miniſtry, the knowledge alſo of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which in my mind ought not to be ſeparate from the ſame; that like as by the one the people may learn the Rules and Precepts of Doctrine, ſo by the other they may have Examples of Gods mighty working in his Church, to the confirmation of their Faith, and the edification of Chriſtian life. For as we ſee what light and profit cometh to the Church by Hiſtories in old times ſet forth of the Judges, Kings, Macchabees, and the Acts of the Apoſtles after Chriſts time; ſo likewiſe may it redound to no ſmall uſe in the Church, to know the Acts of Chriſts Martyrs now ſince the time of the Apoſtles.

Profit to be taken by Examples of Chriſtian Martyrs.

Gods Works to be obſerved in Hiſtories.

Beſides other manifold Examples and Experiments of Gods great Mercies and Judgments in preſerving his Church, in overthrowing Tyrants, in confounding Pride, in altering States and Kingdoms, in conſerving Religion againſt Errors and Diſſenſions, in relieving the Godly, in brideling the Wicked, looſing and tying up again of Satan the Diſturber of Common-weals, in puniſhing Tranſgreſſions, as well againſt the firſt Table as the ſecond; wherein is to be ſeen Idolatry puniſhed, Blaſphemy plagued, Contempt of Gods holy Name and Religion revenged, Murther with Murther rewarded, Adulterers and Wedlock-breakers deſtroyed, Perjuries, Extortions, covetous Oppreſſion, and fraudulent Counſels come to nought, with other excellent Works of the Lord: the obſerving and noting whereof in Hiſtories miniſter to the Readers thereof wholſome admonitions of life, with experience and wiſdom both to know God in his Works, and to work the thing that is godly; eſpecially to ſeek unto the Son of God for their Salvation, and in his Faith only to find that they ſeek for, and in no other means. The continuance and conſtancy of which Faith the Lord of his Grace and goodneſs grant to your Noble Majeſty, and to his whole beloved Church, and all the Members of the ſame to everlaſting life. Amen.

What uſe cometh by reading of Hiſtories.

JOHANNES FOXUS.

COgitanti mihi, verſantique mecum in animo, quàm periculoſæ res aleæ ſit, emittere nunc aliquid in publicum, quod in manus oculóſque multorum ſubeat, his præſertim tam exulceratis moribus temporibuſque, ubi tot hominum diſſidiis, tot ſtudiis partium, tot moroſis capitibus, tam rigidis cenſuris, & Criticorum ſannis fervent fere omnia, ut difficillimum ſit quicquam tam circumſpectè ſcribere, quod non in aliquam calumniandi materiam rapiatur; perbeati profectò fœlicéſque videntur ii, quibus eum vitæ curſum tenere liceat, ut in otio viventes cum dignitate, ſic alienis frui queant laboribus, velut in Theatro otioſi ſedentes ſpectatores, ut nullum interim ipſis vel ex actione tædium, vel ex labore periculum metuendum ſit. Me verò neſcio quo pacto, longè diverſa quidem hactenus exercuit vitæ ratio; quippe cui nec fortunæ illam fœlicitatem, in cujus complexibus tam multos ſuaviter foveri video, nec otii amœnitatem experiri, vix etiam per omnem vitam deguſtare in continuo laborum ac negotiorum fervore ac contentione contigerit. Quanquam de fortuna parum queror quam ſemper contempſi, quin neque de laboribus multum dicturus, ſi modò labores ii tantum vel prodeſſe vel placere cæteris poſſent hominibus, quantum me privatim arterunt incommodántque. Nunc ad meæ infœlicitatis cumulum accedit inſuper, quòd in eo argumenti genere laborandum fuit, quod præter lugubrem rerum ipſarum materiam, præter linguæ inamœnitatem, præter tractandi difficultatem, quæ vix nitorem recipiat orationis, eò porro Autorem ipſum redigit Anguſtiæ, ut neque falſa narrare ſine injuria Hiſtoriæ, nec verum dicere ſine magna ſua invidia odióque multorum liceat. Nam cum in eo Hiſtoriæ argumento mihi verſandum fuit, quod non ad ſuperiorum modò temporum res geſtas altéque repetitas pertineat, ſed hanc ipſam ætatem noſtram, noſtræque gentis nunc homines etiamnum præſentes, vivóſque ſic attingat, ſic perfricet, ſic deſignet, quemadmodum in hoc materiæ genere neceſſariò faciendum fuit: quæſo, quid hîc mihi aliud expectandum ſit, niſi poſtquam fruſtra me defatigando valetudinem attriverim, oculos perdiderim, ſenium acciverim, corpus exhauſerim demum ut poſt hæc omnia multorum me hominum odiis, ſibilis, invidiæ ac calumniæ exponam? In tot iſtis aſperitatibus cùm nihil me tutum præſtare poterit, non Cæſar, non Monarchæ, non Rex, non Regina, non ulla hujus mundi præſidia, præter ſolam Divini numinis potentem dextram; principio igitur, atque ante omnia huc ceu ad tutiſſimum aſylum me recepi, huic me libríumque commendavi & commendo. Tum vero inſuper in eodem Dómino tuum illum candorem (docte piéque Lector) eamque tuam humanitatem appellare volui, qua ex humanioribus literis ſtudiiſque te ſcio præditum, quo noſtris his ſudoribus tuæ approbationis accedat calculus; aut ſi approbationem non mereamur, ſaltem ne favoris deſit benignitas: cui ſi approbatum iri hanc Hiſtoriæ noſtræ farraginem ſenſerimus, cæterorum judicia obtrectatorum, levius feremus.

Nam alioquí non defuturos ſat ſcio qui variis modis nobis faceſſent moleſtiam. Habebit hîc Momus ſuos morſus, Sycophanta ſuos ſibilos, nec deerit Calumniatori ſua lingua & aculeus, quem infigat. Hic fidem detrahet Hiſtoriæ; ille artificium in tranctando, alter diligentiam, vel in excutiendis rebus judicium deliderabit. Illi forſan operis diſplicebit moles, vel minus diſpoſita ſervatáque temporum ratio. Et ſi nihil horum fuerit, attamen in tanta Religionis pugna, in tanta judiciorum, capitum, ſenſuum varietate, ubi ſuæ quiſque favet ac blanditur factioni, quid tam affabrè, aut circumſpectè enarrari poteſt, quod placeat univerſis? Quin & jam nunc muſſitari etiam audio a nonnullis qui longa ſeſe teneri dicant expectatione, quoad hæc tandem Legenda noſtra, ut appellant, Aurea vulganda ſit: qui ſi noſtram primùm in eo tarditatem reprehenſam velint, næ ego ſuaves iſtos homines viciſſim rogatos velim, ut ipſi prius in edendis ſuis ſe præbeant expeditiores, quam alienam inceſſant lentitudinem.

Deinde, ſi tardius exeat ipſorum opinione volumen, meminerit, proverbiali præcepto, Lentam eſſe feſtinationem oportere; & bos dicitur laſſus fortiùs pedem figere. Egimus in hac quidem re pro virili noſtra; Egimus ſpero & pro officio, ſi non ſatis pro temporis modo expediter, at egimus certè pro valetudine; addam porro, egimus ſupra valetudinem. Quin & illud ipſorum venia adjicere liceat, egiſſe nos maturiùs quàm ipſis forſan expediet qui in hunc nugantur modum: certè maturatiùs egimus quam tanti momenti & magnitudinis negotio conveniebat, quod accuratiorem in digerendis rebus moram curamque poſtulabat, cùm à nobis vix integros datos eſſe menſes octodecim præparandæ materiæ, comportandis componendiſque rebus, conferendis exemplaribus, lectitandis codicibus, reſcribendis his quæ ſcripta mandata erant, caſtigandis formulis, conciſinandæ Hiſtoriæ, & in ordinem redigendæ, &c. noverint ii qui teſtes adfuerint, & temporis conſcii, & laboris ſocii. Quod ſi autem Aureæ ſuæ Aureæ titulum huc eò accommodant, quod illius exemplo hanc ſimiliter fabuloſam putent Hiſtoriam, hincque odioſo vocabulo ejus præjudicent veritati, quid his reſpondeam aliud quam quòd ingenuè ſuam ipſi prodant calumniam, quam ne editione quidem libri differre queant, prius de rebus dijudicantes quam noverint. Atque interim quidem illud bene habet, quòd ipſos tandem aliquando Legendæ ſuæ legendæ pudeat tam fabuloſæ. Et tamen fabulis illis non puduit mundum tam diu ludificare, periculum etiam intentantes his, ſi qui Legendæ illæ; hoc eſt, mendaciſſimis illorum nugis auderent detrahere. Quare nihil magis eſſe poſſit impium, quàm ſacroſanctam Eccleſiæ fidem fabulamentis hujuſmodi confictiſque præter omnem veri fidem deliriis commaculare; tamen ineptiſſimi iſti nugatores, ex ſuo ingenio cæteros quoſque ſcriptores metientes, nec ipſi verum adferre ſatagunt, nec afferentibus aliis fidem habendam putant, cuncta videlicet ſuis aureis ſomniis ſimilia exiſtimantes? Quin apage cum Aurea tua Legenda, nugator impudens; quem ego librum, cum omnes eum ſcimus, nec ipſe ignoras prodigioſis mendaciorum portentis & vaniſſimis undique commentis ſcatere, ne cum Homeri quidem fabulis conferre velim; tantum abeſt ut cum verè ſeriis gravibuſque Eccleſiæ Hiſtoriis quicquam commune habeat. Quid? An quia Papiſtis illis tuis & impuris Monachis lic libuit in ridiculis miraculorum ſuorum portentis ineptire, tu protinus nullam gravem Hiſtoriæ authoritatem putas in Eccleſia admittendam? Quin eadem lege & de Euſebii Eccleſiaſtica, & tripartita Sozomeni & Socratis cæterorúmque Hiſtoriis judicemus. Sunt præter hæc & alia quædam de ſanctis & Divis conſcripta miracula, quæ propius ad Legendam hanc accedunt, & tamen nequaquam eo loco apud nos habentur, ut Legendæ illæ Papiſticæ annumerentur, etiam quæ ſuſpectiſſimæ ſunt fidei. Quanquam de ſcriptoribus cæteris mea nihil intereſt cenſuram ferre. Quòd ad hanc verò noſtram ὡς ἐπὶ μαρτυρικῶ, attinet, teſtatum id velim univerſis, datam eſſe à nobis operam ſedulò ne quid uſquam ineſſet operi fabuloſum, aut ejuſmodi quod vel a nobis fictum, vel quod Legendæ illæ Aureæ (magis dicam plumbeæ) non undique foret diſſimillimum. Id quod res ipſa & nativa Hiſtoriæ facies teſtari poterit, cujus tota textura ex ipſis Epiſcoporum Archivis atque Regiſtris, partímque ex propriis Martyrum ipſorum literis hauſta ac conflata videri poterit. In qua Hiſtoria etſi neque id exigam ut ſingula hîc pro oraculis habeantur; at dedimus tamen pro virili operam, ut ſi non plene aſſequeremur, accederemur tamen quàm proximè ad veterem illam Hiſtoriæ legem, ut duas res, præcipuas Hiſtoriæ peſtes, vitaremus, timorem videlicet & aſſentationem; quarum altera ſæpe minus dicit, altera ſemper plus addit, quàm par ſit narrationi. Sed hujus rei fidem ex ipſo magis opere, quam ex mea commendatione aſtrui honeſtius eſt. Habet enim veritas ipſa ſimplicem ſuam & nativam faciem, quam non erit difficile non mucoſis naribus lectori, ex ipſo vel orationis habitu, aut rerum aſpectu, ſive aliis circumſtantiarum notis deprehendere hendere. Sed vereor ne hîc quoque, quemadmodum cæteris in rebus, locum habeat veteris proverbii experientia; Faciunt quippe mendaces ut ne veri etiam dicenti fides habeatur. Cum hactenus in Martyrologicis ſanctorum legendis vitiſque deſcribendis mendacia, ac nugaciſſimæ ſomniorum fictiones pro veris legantur narrationibus, fit ut cæteræ ejuſdem argumenti materiæ eandem pariter ſuſpicionem ſubeant, ut vix jam quicquam legi dicive in Eccleſia cum fide queat. Verùm huic malo cùm mederi nequeamus, ſatis erit, quod noſtrarum erat virium id nos præſtitiſſe. Quod ſupereſt, Divinæ curandum providentiæ relinquamus. Atque de certitudine veritatéque Hiſtoriæ hæc hactenus: quæ utinam ne tam vera quidem certáque eſſet, quàm iſti videri volunt, at falſa potius, conſimiliſque hùic, quam dicunt, Aureæ ipſorum Legendæ, aut Vitis patrum, aut Feſtivali, aut Dormi-ſecure, cæteriſque Papiſticis iſtis τοῖς τῶν λήρων λήροις foret. Nunc verò Martyrum horum non à nobis ficta, ſed inflicta à vobis ſupplicia, atroxque cædes veriorem hanc comprobant hiſtoriam, pluréſque ſuæ veritatis teſtes habent quam vellemus ipſi qui hiſtoriam ſcripſimus. Venio jam ad alteram criminationis partem, quæ de Calendario fortaſſis objicietur. Audio enim & hîc mihi obſtrepere non tacitas modò ſententias, ſed apertas Papiſtarum quorundam voces, quibus iniquè à me factum videbitur, quòd antiquatis atque ex Calendario explotis veteris Eccleſiæ Divis, Martyribus, Confeſſoribus, Virginibúſque, novos eorum loco Martyres ac Confeſſores inſuliciam. Primùm, nulli ego veterum Divorum hoc facto præjudicatum velim. Neque verò ideo inter Divos à me referuntur iſti, quòd inſeruntur in Calendarium. Hanc ego Apotheoſin mihi nunquam ſumpſi, quam ſibi tam confidenter ſumpſit Gregorius nonus. Porro, neque eò ſpectat hoc Calendarium, ut novam aliquam feſtorum dierum legem præſcribam Eccleſiæ; tum multò minus cultum ſancti alicujus inſtituo. Feſtorum dierum jam plus ſatis erat in mundo. Utinam Dominicum ſolum Sabbatum dignè, atque ut par eſt, tranſigeremus. Habeant per me ſuum Papiſtæ Calendarium. Habeat & Eccleſia ſuos ſanctos, tum recentes tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim iidem ne colantur, modo quàm ſint vetuſti tàm verè etiam ſancti ſint.

Verùm enimvero cum non dubitavit ſua etiam ætate Hieronymus multos exiſtimare eorum gehennæ ignibus cruciari, quos multi paſſim pro ſanctis haberent in Eccleſia; quid hîc tum diceret Hieronymus, ſi modo ſuperſtes Papiſticam hanc ſanctorum colluviem & Calendaria, tot Papis, tot Epiſcopis, & Abbatibus oblita cerneret?

Quanquam à me quidem non Calendarium hoc inſtitutum eſt, niſi ut pro indice duntaxat, ſuum cujuſque Martyris menſem & annum deſignante, ad privatum Lectoris ſerviret uſum. Et tamen ſi in Templis etiam fas ſit ſingulorum Menſium dies propriis ſanctorum nomenclaturis conſignare, quî minus liceat id mihi in veris iſtis facere Martyribus, quod ipſi in ſuis pſeudomartyribus, tanta ſibi licentia, ne dicam impudentia, permiſerunt? Si non pœna, ſed cauſa Martyrem faciat, cur non unum Cranmerum ſexcentis Becketis Cantuarienſibus non conferam, ſed prætulerim? Quid in Nicolao Ridleo videtur cum quovis divo Nicolao non conferendum? Qua in re Latimerus, Hoperus, Marſheus, Simpſonus, cæteríque Chriſtiani Martyrii Candidati, inferiores ſummis maximíſque illis Papiſtici Calendarii Divis, imo multis etiam nominibus non præponendi videantur? Interim nullius ego boni ſanctíque viri (modò qui verè ſanctus ſit) cauſam lædo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et ſi cui hoc diſpliceat Calendarium, meminerit, non in Templis collocari, ſed domeſticæ tantum lectioni præparari.

Sed miſſis hiſce adverſariorum calumniis, ad te, docte candidéque Lector (quoniam hæc ad te inſtituta eſt Epiſtola) tempus eſt ut recurrat Oratio, cujus in his rebus judicium ut pluris æſtimo, ita egeo magis hîc quoque Patrocinio. Scio enim, in vaſta hac congerie reperies nonnulla ad quæ meritò corruges frontem. Neque vero fieri facilè potuit, præſertim in tanta operis præcipitatione, ut cuncta ad amuſſim atque ad unguem perfectè adeo elimarentur, quin alicubi vel ex laſſitudine dormitaret ſcriptor, vel per incuriam excideret Authori aliquid, vel ex feſtinatione eveniret, quod cani ſolet in proverbiis nimium præ ſtudio properanti, Cæcos nimirum producenti catulos. In quibus quidem excutiendis rebus magis nobis venia tua quam cenſura imploranda eſt. Quamobrem paucis hæc apud te, docte ſimul & humaniſſime Lector, ante operis ingreſſum libuit προμνάζειν, ut ſi quid inter evolvendum occurrerit, non omnibus perfectum numeris, non ad Cleantis lucernam elucubratum, non ad exquiſitum Theologorum acumen expreſſum, aut minus alioqui acutiſſimis tuis dignum naribus, cogites hæc non tuis auribus data eſſe, ſed meis; hoc eſt, craſſioris turbæ hominibus, a quibus facilius leguntur libri quam judicantur. Aut ſi ne id quidem graviſſimæ tuæ ſententiæ fecerit ſatis, liceat illa mihi uti lege, qua ſemper permiſſum eſt, opere in magno, ſcriptori obrepere ſomnum. Quod ſi verò tuam hac in re facilitatem impetravero, minus laborabo quid cæteri obſtrepant, Græci memor Proverbii, cujus & ipſos commeminiſſe velim, μυμήσεται πίθηκος ἢ μιμήσεται.

To

To the True and Faithful Congregation of CHRIST'S Universal CHURCH, with all and ſingular the Members thereof, whereſoever congregated or diſperſed through the Realm of England, a Proteſtation or Petition of the Author, wiſhing to the ſame abundance of all Peace and Tranquillity, with the ſpeedy coming of CHRIST the Spouſe, to make an end of all Mortal Miſery.

SOLOMON, the peaceable Prince of Iſrael, as we read in the third of Kings, after he had finiſhed the Building of the Lords Temple (which he had ſeven years in hand) made his Petition to the Lord for all that ſhould pray in the ſaid Temple, or turn their face toward it; and his Requeſt was granted, the Lord anſwering him, as we read in the ſaid Book, Chap. 6. I have heard (ſaith he) thy Prayer, and have ſanctified this Place, &c. All eit the infinite Majeſty of God is not to be compaſſed in any material Walls, yet it ſo pleaſed his Goodneſs to reſpect this Prayer of the King, that not only he promiſed to hear them which there prayed, but alſo repleniſhed the ſame with his own Glory. For ſo we read again in the Book aforeſaid, Et non poterant miniſtrare propter nebulam, quia replevit Gloria Domini domum Domini, 3 Reg. 7.

Upon the like truſt in Gods gracious goodneſs if I ſinful Wretch, not comparing with the building of that Temple, but following the zeal of the Builder, might either be ſo bold to ask, or ſo happy to ſpeed, after my ſeven years travel about this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, I would moſt humbly crave of Almighty God to beſtow his bleſſing upon the ſame; that as the Prayers of them which prayed in the outward Temple were heard, ſo all true diſpoſed minds which ſhall reſort to the reading of this preſent Hiſtory, containing the Acts of Gods holy Martyrs, and Monuments of his Church, may by example of their Life, Faith, and Doctrine, receive ſome ſuch ſpiritual fruit to their Souls, through the operation of his Grace, that it may be to the advancement of his Glory, and profit of his Church, through Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. Amen.

But as it happened in that Temple of Solomon, that all which came thither came not to pray, but many to prate, ſome to gaze and ſee News, other to talk and walk, ſome to buy and ſell, ſome to carp and find fault, and finally ſome alſo at the laſt to deſtroy and pull down, as they did indeed; (For what is in this World ſo ſtrong, but it will be impugned? what ſo perfect, but it will be abuſed? ſo true, that will not be contraried? or ſo circumſpectly done, wherein wrangling Theon will not ſet in his tooth?) Even ſo neither do I look for any other in this preſent Hiſtory, but that amongſt many well diſpoſed Readers, ſome Waſpes Neſt or other will be ſtirred up to buz about mine ears. So dangerous a thing it is now adays to write or do any good, but either by flattering a man muſt offend the Godly, or by true ſpeaking procure hatred of the Wicked. Of ſuch ſtinging Waſpes and buzzing Drones I had ſufficient trial in my former Edition before; who if they had found in my Book any juſt cauſe to carp, or upon any true zeal of truth had proceeded againſt the untruths of my ſtory, and had brought juſt proofs for the ſame, I could right well have abide it. For God forbid but that faults, whereſoever they be, ſhould be detected and accuſed. And therefore Accuſers in a Commonwealth, after my mind, do ſerve to no ſmall ſtead.

But then ſuch Accuſers muſt beware they play not the dog, of whom Cicero in his Oration ſpeaketh, which being ſent in Capitolio to fray away Thieves by night, left the Thieves, and fell to bark at true men walking in the day. Where true faults be, there to bay and bark is not amiſs. But to carp where no cauſe is; to ſpie in other ſtraws, and leap over their own blocks, to ſwallow Camels, and to ſtrain at Gnats; to oppreſs truth with lyes, and to ſet up lyes for truth; to blaſpheme the dear Martyrs of Chriſt, and to Canonize for Saints, whom Scripture would ſcarce allow for good Subjects; that is intolerable. Such barking Currs, if they were well ſerved, would be made a while to ſtoop. But with theſe brawling ſpirits I intend not at this time much to wraſtle.

Wherefore to leave them a while, till further leiſure ſerve me to attend upon them, thus much I thought in the mean ſeaſon, by way of Proteſtation or Petition, to write unto you, both in general and particular, the true Members and faithful Congregation of Chriſts Church, whereſoever either congregated together, or diſperſed through the whole Realm of England, that forſomuch as all the ſeeking of theſe Adverſaries is to do what they can, by diſcrediting of this Hiſtory with ſlanders and ſiniſter ſurmiſes, to withdraw the Readers from it: this therefore ſhall be in few words to premoniſh and deſire of all and ſingular of you (all well minded Lovers and Partakers of Chriſts Goſpel) not to ſuffer your ſelves to be deceived with the big Brags, and Hyperbolical Speeches of thoſe ſlandering Tongues, whatſoever they have or ſhall hereafter exclaim againſt the ſame; but indifferently ſtaying your judgment till truth be tried, you will firſt peruſe, and then refuſe; meaſuring the untruths of this Hiſtory, not by the ſcoring up of their hundreds and thouſands of lyes which they give out, but wiſely weighing the purpoſe of their doings according as you find, and ſo to judge of the matter.

To read my Books I allow neither one nor other. Every man as he ſeeth cauſe, ſo let him like as he liſteth. If any ſhall think his labour too much in reading this ſtory, his choice is free either to read this, or any other which he more mindeth. But if the fruit thereof ſhall recompence the Readers travel, then would I wiſh no man ſo light eared, to be carried away for any ſiniſter clamor of Adverſaries, who many times deprave good doings, not for the faults they find, but therefore find faults becauſe they would deprave. As for me and my Hiſtory, as my will was to profit all and diſpleaſe none; ſo if skill in any part wanted to will, yet hath my purpoſe been ſimple, and certes the cauſe no leſs urgent alſo, which moved me to take this Enterpriſe in hand.

For firſt to ſee the ſimple Flock of Chriſt, eſpecially the unlearned ſort, ſo miſerably abuſed, and all for ignorance of Hiſtory, not knowing the courſe of Times, and true deſcent of the Church, it pitied me that part of diligence ſo long to have been unſupplied in this my Country Church of England. Again, conſidering the multitude of Chronicles and Story-Writers, both in England, and out of England, of whom the moſt part have been either Monks or Clients to the See of Rome, it grieved me to behold how partially they handled their ſtories. Whoſe painful travel albeit I cannot but commend, in committing divers things to writing, not unfruitful to be known, nor unpleaſant to be read; yet it lamented me to ſee in their Monuments the principal Points, which chiefly concerned the ſtate of Chriſts Church, and were moſt neceſſary of all Chriſtian people to be known, either altogether pretermitted, or if any mention thereof were inſerted, yet were all things drawn to the honour ſpecially of the Church of Rome, or elſe to the favour of their own Sect of Religion. Whereby the vulgar ſort, hearing and reading in their Writings no other Church mentioned or magnified, but only that Church which here flouriſhed in this World in riches and jollity, were drawn alſo to the ſame perſwaſion, to think no other Church to have ſtood in all the Earth but only the Church of Rome.

The partial dealing of Story-writers.

In the number of this ſort of Writers, beſides our Monks of England (for every Monaſtery almoſt had his Chronicler) I might alſo alſo recite both Italian and other Country Authors, as Platina, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, Martinus, Antonius, Vincentius, Onuphrius, Laziardus, Georgius Lilius, Polyd. Virgilius, with many more, who taking upon them to entermeddle with matters of the Church, although in part they expreſs ſome truth in matters concerning the Biſhops and See of Rome; yet in ſuppreſſing another part they play with us, as Ananias and Saphyra did with their money, or as Apelles did in Pliny, who, painting the one half of Venus coming out of the Sea, left the other half unperfect. So theſe Writers, while they ſhew us one half of the Biſhop of Rome, the other half of him they leave unperfect, and utterly untold. For as they paint him out on the one part gliſtering in Wealth and Glory, in ſhewing what ſucceſſion the Popes had from the Chair of Saint Peter, when they firſt began and how long they ſate, what Churches, and what famous Buildings they erected, how far their Poſſeſſions reached, what Laws they made, what Councils they called, what Honour they received of Kings and Emperors, what Princes and Countries they brought under their Authority, with other like ſtratagems of great Pomp and Royalty; ſo on the other ſide, what Vices theſe Popes brought with them to their Seat, what Abominations they practiſed, what Superſtition they maintained, what Idolatry they procured, what wicked Doctrine they defended contrary to the expreſs Word of God, to what Hereſies they fell, into what diviſion of Sects they cut the unity of Chriſtian Religion, how ſome practiſed by Simony, ſome by Necromancy and Sorcery, ſome by poyſoning, ſome indenting with the Devil to come by their Papacy, what Hypocriſie was in their Lives, what Corruption in their Doctrine, what Wars they raiſed, what Bloodſhed they cauſed, what Treachery they traverſed againſt their Lords and Emperors, impriſoning ſome, betraying ſome to the Templaries and Saracens, in bringing other under their Feet, alſo in beheading ſome, as they did with Fredericus and Conradinus, the Heirs and Off-ſpring of the Houſe of Fredericus Barbaroſſa, in the Year, 1269. Furthermore, how mightily Almighty God hath ſtood againſt them, how their Wars never proſpered againſt the Turk, how the judgments of the godly learned from time to time have ever repugned againſt their Errors, &c. Of theſe and a thouſand other more not one word hath been touched, but all kept as under Benedicite, in auricular Confeſſion.

This partial dealing and corrupt handling of Hiſtories when I conſidered, I thought with my ſelf nothing more lacking in the Church than a full and a compleat ſtory, which, being faithfully collected out of all our Monaſtical Writers, and written Monuments, ſhould contain neither every vain written Fable, for that would be too much, nor yet leave out any thing neceſſary, for that would be too little; but with a moderate diſcretion taking the beſt of every one ſhould both eaſe the labour of the Reader from turning over ſuch a number of Writers, and alſo ſhould open the plain truth of Times lying long hid in obſcure darkneſs of Antiquity. Whereby all ſtudious Readers, beholding as in a Glaſs the ſtay, courſe, and alteration of Religion, decay of Doctrine, and the Controverſies of the Church, might diſcern the better between Antiquity and Novelty. For if the things which be firſt (after the Rule of Turtullian) are to be preferred before thoſe that be later, then is the reading of Hiſtories much neceſſary in the Church, to know what went before, and what followed after; and therefore not without cauſe Hiſtoria, in old Authors, is called the Witneſs of Times, the Light of Verity, the Life of Memory, Teacher of Life, and Shewer of Antiquity, &c. Without the knowledge whereof mans life is blind, and ſoon may fall into any kind of error, as by manifeſt experience we have to ſee in theſe deſolate later Times of the Church, when as the Biſhops of Rome under colour of Antiquity have turned Truth into Hereſie, and brought ſuch new-found Deviſes of ſtrange Doctrine and Religion, as in the former Age of the Church were never heard of before, and all through ignorance of Times, and for lack of true Hiſtory.

Primum quodque veriſſimum eſt. Tertul.

For to ſay the truth, if times had been well ſearched, or if they which wrote Hiſtories had without partiality gone upright between God and Baal, halting on neither ſide, it might well have been found, the moſt part of all this Catholick corruption intruded into the Church by the Biſhops of Rome, as Tranſubſtantiation, Elevation and Adoration of the Sacrament, Auricular Confeſſion, forced Vows of Prieſts not to marry, Veneration of Images, private and ſatisfactory Maſſes, the Order of Gregories Maſs now uſed, the uſurped Authority and Summa poteſtas of the See of Rome, with all the rout of their Ceremonies and Weeds of Superſtition overgrowing now the Church; all theſe (I ſay) to be New-nothings lately coined in the Mint of Rome, without any ſtamp of Antiquity, as by reading of this preſent Hiſtory ſhall ſufficiently (I truſt) appear. Which Hiſtory therefore I have here taken in hand, that as other Story-Writers heretofore have employed their travel to magnifie the Church of Rome, ſo in this Hiſtory might appear to all Chriſtian Readers the Image of both Churches, as well of the one as of the other; ſpecially of the poor oppreſſed and perſecuted Church of Chriſt. Which perſecuted Church though it hath been of long ſeaſon troden under foot by Enemies, neglected in the World, not regarded in Hiſtories, and almoſt ſcarce viſible or known to worldly eyes, yet hath it been the true Church only of God, wherein he hath mightily wrought hitherto, in preſerving the ſame in all extream Diſtreſſes, continually ſtirring up from time to time faithful Miniſters, by whom always have been kept ſome ſparks of his true Doctrine and Religion.

of

Image of both Churches.

Now foraſmuch as the true Church of God goeth not lightly alone, but is accompanied with ſome other Church or Chappel of the Devil to deface and malign the ſame, neceſſary it is therefore the difference between them to be ſeen, and the deſcent of the right Church to be deſcribed from the Apoſtles time. Which hitherto in moſt part of Hiſtories hath been lacking, partly for fear, that men durſt not, partly for ignorance, that men could not diſcern rightly between the one and the other. Who beholding the Church of Rome to be ſo viſible and glorious in the eyes of all the world, ſo ſhining in outward beauty, to bear ſuch a Port, to carry ſuch a Train and Multitude, and to ſtand in ſuch high Authority, ſuppoſed the ſame to be the only right Catholick Mother. The other, becauſe it was not ſo viſibly known in the world, they thought therefore it could not be the true Church of Chriſt. Wherein they were far deceived: for although the right Church of God be not ſo inviſible in the world that none can ſee it, yet neither is it ſo viſible again that every worldly eye may perceive it. For like as is the nature of Truth; ſo is the proper condition of the true Church, that commonly none ſeeth it, but ſuch only as be the Members and Partakers thereof. And therefore they, which require that Gods holy Church ſhould be evident and viſible to the whole World, ſeem to define the great Synagogue of the World, rather than the true Spiritual Church of God.

The deſcent of Chriſts Church from the Apoſtles time deſcribed.

How the true Church of Chriſt is viſible and not viſible

In Chriſts time who would have thought but the Congregations and Councils of the Phariſees had been the right Church? and yet had Chriſt another Church in Earth beſides that; which albeit it was not ſo manifeſt in the ſight of the World, yet was it the only true Church in the ſight of God. Of this Church meant Chriſt, ſpeaking of the Temple which he would raiſe again the third day. And yet after that the Lord was riſen, he ſhewed not himſelf to the World, but only to his Elect, which were but few. The ſame Church after that encreaſed and multiplied mightily among the Jews, yet had not the Jews eyes to ſee Gods Church, but did perſecute it, till at length all their whole Nation was deſtroyed.

After the Jews, then came the Heathen Emperors of Rome, who, having the whole Power of the World in their hands, did what the World could do, to extinguiſh the Name and Church of Chriſt. Whoſe violence continued the ſpace of three hundred years. All which while the true Church of Chriſt was not greatly in ſight of the World, but rather was abhorred every where, and ye notwithſtanding the ſame ſmall ſilly Flock ſo deſpiſed in the World, the Lord highly regarded and mightily preſerved. For although many then of the Chriſtians did ſuffer death, yet was their death neither loſs to them, nor detriment to the Church; but the more they ſuffered, the more of their blood increaſed.

In the time of theſe Emperors God raiſed up then in this Realm of Britain diver's worthy Preachers and Witneſſes, as Elnanus, Meduinus, Meltivianus, Amphibolus, Albanus, Aaron, Julius, and other more. In whoſe time the Doctrine of Faith without mens traditions was ſincerely preached. After their death and Martyrdom it pleaſed the Lord to provide a general quietneſs to his Church, whereby the number of his Flock began more to encreaſe.

The Antiquity of the Church here in England, with the deſcent of the ſame.

In this Age then followed here in the ſaid Land of Britain, Faſtidius, Nivianus, Patricius, Bachiarius, Dubricius, Congellus, Kentigernus, Helmotus, David, Daniel, Sampſon, Elnodugus, Aſaphus, Gildas, Henlanus, Elbodus, Dinothus, Samuel, Nivius, and a great ſort more, which governed the Church of Britain by Chriſtian Doctrine a long ſeaſon; albeit the Civil Governors for the time were then diſſolute and careleſs, as Gildas very ſharply doth lay to their Charge, and ſo at length were ſubdued by the Saxons.

All this while about the ſpace of four hundred years Religion remained in Britain uncorrupt, and the Word of Chriſt truly preached, till about the coming of Auguſtine and of his Companions from Rome, many of the ſaid Britain-Preachers were ſlain by the Saxons. After that began Chriſtian Faith to enter and ſpring among the Saxons, after a certain Romiſh ſort, yet notwithſtanding ſomewhat more tolerable than were the times which after followed, through the diligent induſtry of ſome godly Teachers which then lived amongſt them, as Aidanus, Finianus, Colman Archbiſhop of York, Beda, John of Beverly, Alcuinus, Noetus, Hucharius, Serlo, Achardus, Ealtedus, Alexander Neckham, Negellus, Fenallus, Alfricus, Sygeferthus, and ſuch other; who though they erred in ſome few things, yet neither ſo groſly, nor ſo greatly to be complained of in reſpect of the abuſes that followed. For as yet all this while the Error of Tranſubſtantiation and Elevation, with Auricular Confeſſion, was not crept in for a publick Doctrine in Chriſts Church, as by their own Saxon Sermon made by Ælfricus, and ſet out in the ſecond Volume of this preſent Hiſtory may appear. During the which mean time, although the Biſhops of Rome were had here in ſome reverence with the Clergy, yet had they nothing as yet to do in making Laws touching matters of the Church of England; but that only appertained to the Kings and Governors of the Land, as is in this ſtory to be ſeen.

Tranſubſtantiation not yet received for a publick Doctrine.

The Church when it began to fall from God.

Æneas Sylvius ſaith, That Mathilda made the Pope Heir of thoſe Lands which are called the Patrimony of Saint Peter. Ex Aven. lib. 6.

And thus the Church of Rome, albeit it began then to decline apace from God, yet during all this while it remained hitherto in ſome reaſonable order, till at length, after that, the ſaid Biſhops began to ſhoot up in the world through the liberality of good Princes, and eſpecially of Mathilda a noble Dutcheſs of Italy, who at her death made the Pope Heir of all her Lands, and endued his See with great Revenues. Then Riches begat Ambition, Ambition deſtroyed Religion, ſo that all came to ruine. Out of this Corruption ſprang forth here in England (as did in other places more) another Romiſh kind of Monkery, worſe than the other before, being much more drowned in Superſtition and Ceremonies, which was about the year of our Lord, 980. Of this Swarm was Egbertus, Aigelbert, Egwine, Boniface, Wilfrede, Agathon, James, Romain, Cedda, Dunſtan, Oſwold, Athelwold, Althelwine Duke of Eaſtangles, Lanfrac, Anſelme, and ſuch other.

Monkery when it began to reign in England.

And yet in this time alſo, through Gods Providence, the Church lacked not ſome of better knowledge and judgment, to weigh with the darkneſs of thoſe days. For although King Edgar with Edward his baſe Son, being ſeduced by Dunſtan, Oſwold, and other Monkiſh Clerks, was then a great Author and Fautor of much Superſtition, erecting as many Monaſteries as were Sundays in the year; yet notwithſtanding, this continued not long. For eſtſoons after the death of Edgar came King Ethelrede and Queen Elfthred his Mother, with Alferus Duke of Merceland, and other Peers and Nobles of the Realm, who diſplaced the Monks again, and reſtored the married Prieſts to their old Poſſeſſions and Livings. Moreover, after that followed alſo the Danes, which overthrew thoſe Monkiſh Foundations as faſt as King Edgar had ſet them up before.

And thus hitherto ſtood the condition of the true Church of Chriſt, albeit not without ſome repugnance and difficulty, yet in ſome mean ſtate of the truth and verity, till the time of Pope Hildebrand called Gregory the Seventh, which was near about the year One thouſand and eighty, and of Pope Innocentius the Third, in the year One thouſand two hundred and fifteen. By whom all together was turned upſide down, all Order broken, Diſcipline diſſolved, true Doctrine defaced, Chriſtian Faith extinguiſhed. In ſtead whereof was ſet up preaching of mens Decrees, Dreams and idle Traditions. And whereas before Truth was free to be diſputed amongſt learned men, now Liberty was turned into Law, Argument into Authority. Whatſoever the Biſhop of Rome denounced, that ſtood for an Oracle of all men to be received without Oppoſition or Contradiction; whatſoever was contrary ipſo facto it was Hereſie, to be puniſhed with Faggot and flaming fire. Then began the ſincere Faith of this Engliſh Church, which held out ſo long, to quail. Then was the clear Sunſhine of Gods Word overſhadowed with Miſts and Darkneſs, appearing like Sackcloth to the people, which neither could underſtand what they read, nor yet were permitted to read what they could underſtand. In theſe miſerable days, as the true Viſible Church began now to ſhrink and keep in for fear: So up ſtart a new ſort of Players, to furniſh the Stage, as School-Doctors, Canoniſts, and four Orders of Friers. Beſides other Monaſtical Sects and Fraternities of infinite variety. Which ever ſince have kept ſuch a ſtir in the Church, that none for them almoſt durſt rout, neither Cæſar, King, nor Subject. What they defined, ſtood; what they approved, was Catholick; what they condemned, was Hereſie; whomſoever they accuſed, none almoſt could ſave. And thus have theſe hitherto continued or reigned rather in the Church, the ſpace now of 400 years and odd. During which ſpace the true Church of Chriſt, although it durſt not openly appear in the face of the world, oppreſſed by Tyranny; yet neither was it ſo inviſible or unknown, but by the Providence of the Lord ſome Remnant always remained from time to time, which not only ſhewed ſecret good affection to ſincere Doctrine, but alſo ſtood in open defence of Truth againſt the diſordered Church of Rome.

The true Church when it began firſt to decay.

The true Church continueth in the midſt of their Enemies.

In which Catalogue, firſt, to pretermit Bertramus and Berengarius, which were before Pope Innocent the Third, a learned multitude of ſufficient Witneſſes here might be produced, whoſe Names neither are obſcure nor Doctrine unknown; as Joachim Abbot of Calabria, Almericus a learned Biſhop, who was judged an Heretick for holding againſt Images in the time of the ſaid Innocentius. Beſides the Martyrs of Alſatia, of whom we read an hundred to be burned by the ſaid Innocentius in one day, as writeth Hermanus Mucius. Add likewiſe to theſe the Waldenſes or Albingenſes, which to a great number ſegregated themſelves from the Church of Rome. To this number alſo belonged Reymundus Earl of Tholouſe, Marſilius Patavius, * Gulielmus de S. Amore, Simon Tornacenſis, Arnoldus de nova Villa, Johannes Semeca, beſides divers other Preachers in Suevia ſtanding againſt the Pope, One thouſand four hundred and forty. Ex Crantz. Anno, One thouſand three hundred and fifty, * Georgius Ariminenſis, Anno, One thouſand three hundred and fifty, Joannes de Rupe Sciſſa, impriſoned for certain Propheſies againſt the Pope, Anno, One thouſand three hundred and forty, Gethardus Ridder, who alſo wrote againſt Monks and Friers, a Book called Lacrymæ Eccleſiæ, Anno, One thouſand three hundred and fifty, Godfridus de Fontanis, Gulielmus de Landuno, Joannes Monachus Cardini, Armachanus, Nicolaus Orem, Preacher, Anno, One thouſand three hundred ſixty four, Militzius a Bohemian, who then preached, That Antichriſt was come, and was excommunicate for the ſame, Anno, One thouſand three hundred ſixty ſix, Jacobus Miſnenſis, * Matthias Pariſienſis a Bohemian born, and a Writer againſt the Pope, Anno, One thouſand three hundred and ſeventy, Joannes Montziger, Rector of the Univerſity of Ulm, Anno 1384. Nilus Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, Henricus de Jota, Henricus de Haſſia, &c. Ex Trithemio. Ex Bulla Gregorii, cap. 11. Ex Illyrico.

I do but recite the principal Writers and Preachers in thoſe days. How many thouſands there were which never bowed their knees to Baal, that is known to God alone. Of whom we find in the writings of one * Bruſhius, that ſix and thirty Citizens of Magunt*ia were burned*, Anno, One thouſand three hundred and ninety. Who, following the Doctrine of the Waldenſes, affirmed the Pope to be the Great Antichriſt. Alſo Maſſæus recordeth of one hundred and forty, which in the Province of Narbon were put to the fire, for not receiving the Decretals of Rome, beſides them that ſuffered at Paris to the number of four and twenty at one time, Anno 1210. and the next year after were four hundred burnt under the name of Hereticks; beſides alſo a certain good Heremit, an Engliſhman, of whom mention is made in John Bacon, Diſt. 2. Quæſt. 1. who was committed for diſputing in Pauls Church againſt certain Sacraments of the Church of Rome, Anno 1306. Ex Bruſhio. Ex Chriſtiano Maſſæo. Ex Joan. Bacon. Diſt. 2. Quæſt. 1.

To deſcend now ſomewhat lower in drawing out the Deſcent of the Church. What a multitude here cometh of faithful Witneſſes in the time of John Wickliff, as Ocliff, Wickliff, Anno 1379. William Thorp, White, Purvey, Fatſhal, Pain, Gower, Chaucer, Gaſcoin, Will. Swinderby, Walter Brute, Roger Dexter, William Sautry, about the year, 1400. John Badby, Anno 1410. Nicholas Tailer, Richard Wagſtaff, Michael Scrivener, William Smith, John Henry, William Parchmenar, Roger Goldſmith, with an Anchoreſſe called Mathilde in the City of Leiceſter, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton Knight, John Beverley Preacher, John Huſſe, Jerome of Prague, a Schoolmaſter, with a number of faithful Bohemians, and Thaborites not to be told; with whom I might alſo adjoyn Laurentius Valla, and Joannes Picus, the learned Earl of Mirandula. But what do I ſtand upon recital of Names, which almoſt are infinite?

Wherefore, if any be ſo far beguiled in his Opinion to think the Doctrine of the Church of Rome (as it now ſtandeth) to be of ſuch Antiquity, and that the ſame was never impugned before the time of Luther and Zuinglius now of late, let them read theſe Hiſtories: or if he think the ſaid Hiſtory not to be of ſufficient credit to alter his Perſwaſion, let him peruſe the Acts and Statutes of Parliaments, paſſed in this Realm of ancient time, and therein conſider and confer the courſe of times; where he may find and read, Anno 5. Regis Richardi 2. in the year of our Lord, 1380. of a great number (which there be called evil perſons) going about from Town to Town in Freeze Gowns, preaching unto the people, &c. Which Preachers although the words of the Statute do term there to be diſſembling perſons, preaching divers Sermons containing Hereſies and notorious Errors, to the emblemiſhment of Chriſtian Faith, and of holy Church, &c. as the words do there pretend; yet notwithſtanding every true Chriſtian Reader may conceive of thoſe Preachers to teach no other Doctrine, than now they hear their own Preachers in Pulpits preach againſt the Biſhop of Rome, and the corrupt Hereſies of his Church. Statut. in An. 5 Rich. 2. Anno Dom. 1380

Furthermore, he ſhall find likewiſe in Statut. Anno 2 Hen. 4. cap. 15. in the year of our Lord, 1402. another like company of good Preachers and faithful Defenders of true Doctrine againſt blind Hereſie and Error. Whom albeit the words of the Statute there, through corruption of that time, do falſly term to be falſe and perverſe Preachers, under diſſembled Holineſs, teaching in thoſe days openly and privily new Doctrines and heretical Opinions, contrary to the Faith and determination of holy Church, &c. yet notwithſtanding whoſoever readeth Hiſtories, and conferreth the order and deſcent of times, ſhall underſtand theſe to be no falſe Teachers, but faithful Witneſſes of the Truth, not teaching any new Doctrines contrary to the determination of holy Church; but rather ſhall find that Church to be unholy which they preached againſt, teaching rather it ſelf heretical Opinions, contrary both to Antiquity, and Verity of Chriſts true Catholick Church. Ex Stat. in Anno 2 H. 4. cap. 15. Anno Dom. 1402

Of the like number alſo, or greater, of like faithful Favourers and Followers of Gods holy Word, we find in the year, 1422. ſpecified in a Letter ſent from Henry Chicheſly Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to Pope Martin the Fifth, in the fifth year of his Popedom, where mention is made of ſome many here in England infected (as he ſaid) with the Hereſies of Wickliff and Huſſe, that without force of Army they could not be ſuppreſſed, &c. Whereupon the Pope ſent two Cardinals to the Archbiſhop, to cauſe a tenth to be gathered of all ſpiritual and religious men, and the money to be laid in the Chamber Apoſtolik; and if that were not ſufficient, the reſidue to be made up of Chalices, Candleſticks, and other Implements of the Church, &c. Ex literis Archiepiſc. Cant. ad Martin. 5. Anno Dom. 1422

What ſhall need then any more Witneſſes to prove this matter, when you ſee ſo many years ago whole Armies and Multitudes thus ſtanding againſt the Pope? who though they be termed here for Hereticks and Schiſmaticks, yet in that which they call Hereſie ſerved they the living Lord within the Ark of his true ſpiritual and viſible Church.

And where is then the frivolous brag of the Papiſts, which make ſo much of their painted ſheath, and would needs beat us down, that this Government of the Church of Rome, which now is, hath been of ſuch an old ſtanding, time out of mind, even from the Primitive Antiquity, and that never was any other Church demonſtrable here in Earth for men to follow, beſides the ſaid only Catholick Mother Church of Rome? which as we have ſufficiently proved before, by the continual deſcent of the Church till this preſent time, that the ſaid Church, after the Doctrine which is now reformed, is no new begun matter, but even the old continued Church, by the providence and promiſe of Chriſt ſtill ſtanding, which albeit it hath been of late years repreſſed by the tyranny of Roman Biſhops more than before, yet notwithſtanding it was never ſo oppreſſed, but God hath ever maintained in it the truth of his Goſpel, againſt Hereſies and Errors of the Church of Rome, as in this Hiſtory more at full is to be ſeen.

till

Let us now proceed further as we began, deducing this deſcent of the Church unto the 1501 year.

Bloody Marks of Chriſts Paſſion ſeen on mens garments in Germany, An. 1501.

In which year the Lord began to ſhew in the parts of Germany wonderful Tokens, and bloody Marks of his Paſſion, as the bloody-Croſs, his Nails, Spear, and Crown of Thornes, which fell from Heaven upon the Garments and Caps of Men, and Rocks of Women, as you may further read in this Book. By the which Tokens Almighty God, no doubt, preſignified, what grievous Afflictions and bloody Perſecutions ſhould then begin to enſue upon his Church for his Goſpels-ſake, according as in this Hiſtory is deſcribed; wherein is to be ſeen what Chriſtian-blood hath been ſpilt, what Perſecutions raiſed, what Tyranny exerciſed, what Torments deviſed, what Treachery uſed againſt the poor Flock and Church of Chriſt; in ſuch ſort as ſince Chriſts time greater hath not been ſeen.

Seventy years of Captivity well near expired.

And now by revolution of years we are come from that time of 1501, to the year now preſent 1570. In which the full ſeventy years of the Babyloniſh-Captivity draweth now well to an end, if we count from the firſt appearing of theſe bloody Marks above mentioned. Or if we reckon from the beginning of Luther and his Perſecution, then lacketh yet ſixteen years. Now what the Lord will do with this wicked World, or what reſt he will give to his Church after theſe long Sorrows, he is our Father in Heaven, his Will be done in Earth as ſeemeth beſt to his divine Majeſty.

In the mean time let us for our parts with all patient Obedience wait upon his Graces leiſure, and glorifie his holy Name, and edifie one another with all humility. And if there cannot be an end of our diſputing and contending one againſt another, yet let there be a moderation in our affections. And foraſmuch as it is the good Will of our God, that Satan thus ſhould be let looſe amongſt us for a ſhort time; yet let us ſtrive in the mean while what we can to amend the malice of the time with mutual humanity. They that be in Error let them not diſdain to learn. They which have greater Talents of Knowledge committed, inſtruct in ſimplicity them that be ſimple. No man liveth in that Commonwealth where nothing is amiſs; but yet becauſe God hath ſo placed us Engliſhmen here in one Commonwealth, alſo in one Church, as in one Ship together; let us not mangle or divide the Ship, which being divided periſheth; but every man ſerve with diligence and diſcretion in his Order, wherein he is called. They that ſit at the Helm keep well the point of the Needle, to know how the Ship goeth, and whither it ſhould. Whatſoever weather betideth, the Needle well touched with the Stone of Gods Word, will never fail. Such as labour at the Oars ſtart for no Tempeſt, but do what they can to keep from the Rocks. Likewiſe they which be in inferior Rooms take heed they move no Sedition nor Diſturbance againſt the Rowers and Mariners. No Storm ſo dangerous to a Ship on the Sea, as is diſcord and diſorder in a Weal publick. What Countries and Nations, what Kingdoms and Empires, what Cities, Towns and Houſes diſcord hath diſſolved, in Stories is manifeſt; I need not ſpend time in rehearſing Examples. The God of Peace, who hath Power both of Land and Sea, reach forth his merciful hand, to help them up that ſink, to keep up them that ſtand, to ſtill theſe Winds and ſurging Seas of Diſcord and Contention among us; that we profeſſing one Chriſt, may in one Unity of Doctrine gather our ſelves into one Ark of the true Church together, where we continuing ſtedfaſt in Faith, may at the laſt luckily be conducted to the joyful Port of our deſired landing-place, by his heavenly Grace. To whom both in Heaven and Earth, be all Power and Glory, with his Father and the Holy Spirit for ever. Amen.

Exhortation to the Church of England.

The Utility of this STORY.

THe World being repleniſhed with ſuch an infinite multitude of Books of all kind of matters, I may ſeem, perhaps, to take a matter in hand ſuperfluous and needleſs, at this preſent to ſet out ſuch Volumes, eſpecially of Hiſtories, conſidering now adays the World is ſo greatly peſtered, not only with ſuperfluous plenty thereof, but of all other Treatiſes, ſo that Books now ſeem rather to lack Readers, than Readers to lack Books. In the which multitude of Books, I doubt not but many do both perceive, and inwardly bewail this inſatiable boldneſs of many now adays both in Writing and Printing; which, to ſay the truth, for my part I do as much lament as any man elſe beſide; and would therefore no man ſhould think that unadviſedly or with raſhneſs I have attempted this Enterpriſe, as one being not only doubtful, but alſo both baſhful and fearful within my ſelf for ſetting the ſame abroad. And why? Firſt, I perceived how learned this Age of ours is in reading of Books, neither could I tell what the ſecret judgments of Readers would conceive, to ſee ſo weak a thing to ſet upon ſuch a weighty Enterpriſe, not ſufficiently furniſhed with ſuch Ornaments able to ſatisfie the perfection of ſo great a ſtory, or ſufficient to ſerve the Utility of the Studious, and the delight of the Learned. Which ability, the more I perceived to be wanting in me, the leſs I durſt be bold to become a Writer. Multitude of Books lamented.

But again on the other ſide, when I weighed with my ſelf what memorable Acts and famous Doings this later Age of the Church hath miniſtred to us by the patient Sufferings of the worthy Martyrs, I thought it not to be neglected, that ſo precious Monuments of ſo many matters, meet to be recorded and regiſtred in Books, ſhould be buried by my default, under darkneſs of Oblivion. Me thought ſomewhat was to be ſaid of them for their well deſerving, and ſomething again of our parts for benefit by them received. But above all other things, nothing did ſo ſtir me forward hereunto, as the diligent conſideration and ſpecial regard of the common Utility which every man plentifully may receive by the reading of thoſe Monuments or Martyrology; which Hiſtory as I have taken in hand chiefly for the uſe of the Engliſh-Church, ſo have I framed it in that Tongue which the ſimple people could beſt underſtand.

Now if men commonly delight ſo much in other Chronicles which entreat only upon matters of Policy, and rejoyce to behold therein the variable events of worldly affairs, the Stratagems of valiant Captains, the terror of foughten Fields, the ſacking of Cities, the hurlyburlies of Realms and People; And if men think it ſuch a gay thing in a Commonwealth to commit to Hiſtory ſuch old Antiquities of things prophane, and beſtow all their Ornaments of Wit and Eloquence in garniſhing the ſame, how much more then is it meet for Chriſtians to conſerve in remembrance the Lives, Acts, and Doings, not of bloody Warriors, but of mild and conſtant Martyrs of Chriſt, which ſerve not ſo much to delight the ear, as to garniſh the life, to frame it with examples of great profit, and to encourage men to all kind of Chriſtian godlineſs? As firſt, by reading thereof we may learn a lively teſtimony of Gods mighty working in the life of man; contrary to the opinion of Atheiſts, and all the whole Neſt of Epicures. For like as one ſaid of Harpalus in times paſt, that his doings gave a lively teſtimony againſt God, becauſe he being ſo wicked a man, eſcaped ſo long unpuniſhed; ſo contrariwiſe in theſe men we have a much more aſſured and plain witneſs of God, both in whoſe Lives and Deaths appeared ſuch manifeſt Declarations of Gods divine working, whiles in ſuch ſharpneſs of Torments we behold in them ſtrength ſo conſtant above mans reach, ſuch readineſs to anſwer, ſuch patience in impriſonment, ſuch godlineſs in forgiving, chearfulneſs, ſo couragious in ſuffering, beſides the manifold ſenſe and feeling of the Holy Ghoſt, which they in their Lives ſo plentifully taſted in their Afflictions, as in reading of their Letters evidently we may underſtand. Over and beſides this the mild deaths of the Saints do not a little avail to the ſtabliſhing of a good Conſcience, to learn the contempt of the World, and to come to the fear of God. Moreover, they confirm Faith, encreaſe Godlineſs, abate Pride in Proſperity, and in Adverſity do open an hope of heavenly Comfort. For what man reading the miſery of theſe godly perſons may not therein, as in a Glaſs, behold his own caſe, whether he be godly or godleſs? For if God give Adverſity unto good men, what may either the better ſort promiſe themſelves, or the evil not fear? And as by reading of prophane ſtories we are made perhaps more skilful in Warlike affairs; ſo by reading this we are made better in our livings, and beſides are better prepared unto the, like Conflicts, (if by Gods permiſſion they ſhall happen hereafter) more wiſe by their Doctrine, and more ſtedfaſt by their Example. comparison between worldly Souldiers and the Souldiers of Chriſt.

To be ſhort, they declare to the World what true Chriſtian Fortitude is, and what is the right way to conquer, which ſtandeth not in the power of man, but in hope of the Reſurrection to come, and is now, I truſt, at hand. In conſideration whereof, me thinks I have good cauſe to wiſh, that like as other Subjects, even ſo alſo Kings and Princes, which commonly delight in Heroical Stories, would diligently peruſe ſuch Monuments of Martyrs, and lay them always in ſight, not only to read, but to follow, and would paint them upon their Walls, Cups, Rings, and Gates. For doubtleſs ſuch as theſe are more worthy of honour than an hundred Alexanders, Hectors, Scipio's, and War-like Julies. And though the World judgeth preposterously of things, yet with God, the true Judge, certes such are to be reputed in deed, not that kill one another with a Weapon, but they which being rather killed in Gods Cause do retain an invincible constancy against the Threats of Tyrants, and Violence of Tormentors. Such as these are indeed the true Conquerors of the World, by whom we learn true Manhood, so many as fight under Christ, and not under the World. With this valiantness did that most mild Lamb, and invincible Lion of the Tribe of Juda first of all go before us. Of whose unspeakable Fortitude we hear this Prophetical admiration, Who is this (saith he) which walketh so in the multitude of his strength; Forsooth the high Son of the high God, once conquered of the World, and yet conquering the World after the same manner he was conquered. Isa. 63.

The like dance did all his other Martyrs follow, to whom the ancient Antiquity of the Church did attribute so much honour, as never King or Emperor could purchase in this World with all their Images, Pillars, high Spires, Triumphs, Temples, and all their solemn Feasts. In probation whereof we see with what admiration, and almost superstition, not only the Memory but also the Reliques of those goods Martyrs were received and kept amongst the ancient Christians. We have also for witness the learned Hymns and Songs of Prudentius and Nazianzen, wherewith Pindarus did never so much set out his Triumphs of Olympia and Nemea. I need not here rehearse the learned Orations of Eloquent Cyprian, Chrysostome, Ambrose, and Jerome, who never shewed their Eloquence more, than when they fell into the Commendations of the godly Martyrs.

Whereby it is manifest, what estimation in times past was attributed to Martyrs; with what Gratulation, Rejoyce, Mirth, and common Joy the Afflictions of those godly, dying in Christs Quarrel, were sometime received and solemnized; and that not without good reasonable cause. For the Church did well consider how much she was beholding to their benefits, by whose death she understood her Treasures to increase. Now then if Martyrs are to be compared with Martyrs, I see no cause why the Martyrs of our time deserve any less Commendation, than the other in the Primitive Church; which assuredly are inferior unto them in no point of praise; whether we view the number of them that suffered, or greatness of their Torments, or their constancy in dying, or also consider the fruit that they brought to the amendment of Posterity, and increase of the Gospel. They did water with their Blood the Truth that was newly springing up; so these by their deaths restored it again, being so decayed and faln down. They standing in the foreward of the battel, did receive the first Incounter and Violence of their Enemies, and taught us by that means to overcome such Tyranny; these with like courage again, like old beaten Souldiers, did win the field in the rereward of the battel. They like famous Husbandmen of the World did sow the Fields of the Church, that first lay unmanured and waste; these with fatness of their Blood did cause it to batten and fructifie. Would to God the Fruit might be speedily gathered into the Barn, which only remaineth behind to come.

Comparison between the Martyrs of the Primitive Church, and of the later Church.

Now, if we ascribe such Reputation to godly Preachers (and worthily) which diligently Preach the Gospel of Christ, when they live notwithstanding, by the benefit of time, without all fear of Persecution; how much more reasonable cause have we to praise and extol such men as stoutly spend their Lives for the defence of the same? All these premisses duly of our parts considered and marked, seeing we have found so famous Martyrs in this our Age, [illegible] not fail then in publishing and setting forth their doings, lest in that point we seem more unkind to them, than the Writers of the Primitive Church were unto theirs. And though we repute not their Ashes, Chains, and Swords in stead of Relicks; yet let us yield thus much unto their Commemoration, to glorifie the Lord in his Saints, and imitate their death (as much as we may) with like constancy, or their Lives at the least with like Innocency. They offered their Bodies willingly to the rough handling of the Tormentors; and is it so great a matter then for our part to mortifie our Flesh, with all the members thereof? They neglected not only the Riches and Glory of the World for the love of Christ, but also their Lives; and shall we then keep so great a stir one against another for the transitory trifles of this World? They continued in patient suffering, when they had most wrong done to them, and when their very hearts blood gushed out of their Bodies; and yet will not we forgive our poor Brother, be the injury never so small, but are ready for every trifling offence to seek his destruction, and cut his throat. They wishing well to all men, did of their own accord forgive their Persecutors; and therefore ought we, which are now the Posterity and Children of Martyrs, not to degenerate from their former steps, but being admonished, by their Examples, if we cannot express their charity toward all men, yet at least to imitate the same to our power and strength. Let us give no cause of offence to any. And if any be given to us, let us overcome it with patience, forgiving and not revenging the same. And let us not only keep our Hands from shedding of Blood, but our Tongues also from hurting the fame of others. Besides, let us not shrink, if case so require, by Martyrdom, or loss of Life, according to their Example, to yield up the same in the defence of the Lords Flock. Which thing if men would do, much less contention and business would be in the World than now is. And thus much touching the Utility and Fruit to be taken of this History.

To all the Profeſſed FRIENDS and FOLLOWERS of the POPES Proceedings.

Four Queſtions Propounded.

TO you all and ſingular which profeſs the Doctrine and Religion of the Pope your holy Father, and of your Mother-Church of Rome, pretending the Name of Catholicks, commonly termed Papiſts, whereſoever abiding in the Realm of England, theſe four Queſtions or Problems hereunder following I would move, deſiring you all either to muſe upon them, or to anſwer them at your leiſure. Four demands or queſtions put forth to the Papiſts.

The firſt Queſtion.

FIrſt, Forſomuch as Mount Sion (which God calleth by the Prophet Iſaith the Hill of his Holineſs) beareth in the Scripture an undoubted Type of the Spiritual Church of Chriſt; and forſomuch as the ſaid Iſaiah, Chapter eleventh, and ſixty fifth, propheſying of the ſaid Mount Sion, ſaith in theſe words, Non nocebunt. Iſa. 11. neque affligent in omni monte ſancto meo, dicit Dominus, &c. That is, They ſhall not kill nor hurt in all my holy 65. Hill, ſaith the Lord, &c. And again in the ſame Chapters thus we read, Habitabit Lupus cum Agno, & Pardus cum Hædo accubabit, Vitulus & Leo & Ovis una commorabuntur, & puellus parvulus ducet eos, &c. That is, The Wolf ſhall dwell with the Lamb, and the Leopard with the Kid; the Calf, the Lion, and the Sheep ſhall feed together, and a young Child ſhall rule them. The Cow alſo and the Bear ſhall abide together with their young Ones, and the Lion ſhall eat Chaff and Fodder like the Ox, &c. The firſt queſtion.

Upon theſe premiſſes now followeth my queſtion; How the Church of Rome can be anſwerable to this Hill of Sion, ſeeing in the ſame Church of Rome is and hath been now ſo many years ſuch killing and ſlaying, ſuch cruelty and tyranny ſhewed, ſuch burning and ſpilling of Chriſtian blood, ſuch malice and miſchief wrought, as in reading theſe Hiſtories may to all the World appear? Objection.

To this if they anſwer, and expound theſe words of the Prophet, as pertaining to the Church-Triumphant; thereunto I reply again, that by the words in the ſame place and in the ſame ſentence expreſſed, that ſenſe cannot ſtand, forſmuch as the Prophet in the very ſame place, where he propheſieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy Mountain without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the Earth, and ſheweth alſo the cauſe of that godly peace. Becauſe (ſaith he) the Earth is repleniſhed with Knowledge and Science of the Lord, &c. Ibid. And furthermore the Prophet, ſpeaking of the ſame day when this ſhall be, addeth, ſaying, In that day the Root of Jeſſe ſhall ſtand for a ſign to the people, for the Gentiles to be converted, and to ſeek unto him, &c. Which day in no wiſe can be applied to the Church in Heaven Triumphant, but only here Militant in Earth. Refutation Touching which place of Iſaiah further here is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable Mount Sion (which comprehendeth both the States, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal) is not reſtrained the publick penalty of good Laws needful to be executed upon publick Malefactors, but here is reſtrained the fierceneſs, revenge, cruelty and violence of mens affections. To which affections men being commonly ſubject by nature, through grace and working of the Goſpel they are altered, reformed, and changed to another diſpoſition, from ſtoutneſs to ſoftneſs, from violence to ſufferance, from fierceneſs to forbearing, from pride to humility, from cruelty to compaſſion, from wylineſs to ſimplicity, from ſolemn ſingularity to humanity and meekneſs. Which verdues, if they had been in the Church of Rome (according to the rule of Saint Paul, Which willeth men that be ſtronger to bear with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the ſpirit of meekneſs, &c. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.) I ſhould not have needed now at this time to write ſuch a long Hiſtory as this, of the ſuffering of ſo many Martyrs. Publick execution of Laws not forbidden in Scripture. The Conditions and Properties of the true Church of Chriſt. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.

The ſecond Queſtion.

MY ſecond Queſtion is this, To demand of you Catholick Profeſſors of the Popes Sect, which ſo deadly malign and perſecute the Proteſtants profeſſing the Goſpel of Chriſt; What juſt or reaſonable cauſe have you to alledge for this your extream hatred ye bear unto them, that neither your ſelves can abide to live with them, nor yet will ſuffer them to live amongſt you? If they were Jews, Turks, or Infidels, or in their Doctrine were any idolatrous Impiety, or deteſtable Iniquity in their lives; if they went about any deadly Deſtruction, or privy Conſpiracies to oppreſs your lives, or by fradulent dealing to circumvent you; then had you ſome cauſe to complain, and alſo to revenge. Now ſeeing in their Doctrine ye have neither Blaſphemy, Idolatry, Superſtition, nor miſbelief to object unto them; ſeeing they are baptized in the ſame Belief, and believe the ſame Articles of the Creed as ye do; having the ſame God, the ſame Chriſt and Saviour, the ſame Baptiſm, and are ready to confer with you in all kind of Chriſtian Doctrine, neither do refuſe to be tried by any place of the Scripture; how then riſeth this mortal malice of you againſt them? If you think them to be Hereticks, then bring forth, if ye can, any one Sentence which they arrogantly hold, contrary to the mind of holy Scripture, expounded by the cenſure of moſt ancient Doctors. Or what is there in all the Scripture to be required, but they acknowledge and confeſs the ſame? See and try the order of their lives and doings; what great fault find you? They ſerve God, they walk under his fear, they obey his Law, as men may do: and though they be Tranſgreſſors towards him, as other men are, yet toward you what have they done, what have they committed or deſerved, why you ſhould be ſo bitter againſt them? The ſecond queſtion. The deadly hatred of the Papiſts againſt the Proteſtants grounded upon no juſt cauſe or deſerving.

What offended the poor Inhabitants of Merindoll and Cabriers, when the Biſhop of Aix, the Cardinal of Turon, and other Biſhops of France, wreſting from Francis the French King a Commiſſion, ſent Minerius with his Captain John de Gray, to deſtroy their Country, Anno 1530. who driving the poor people there into a Barn full of ſtraw, ſet the Barn on fire, and burned up Men, Women, and Children? And likewiſe in a Church exerciſed the like cruelty upon them, where were murdered the ſame time to the number of a thouſand Young and Old, Women, Children, and young Infants, beſides ſeven whole Towns, with the moſt part of the dwellers therein, being murdered and burnt in the ſaid Country of Provence. Malice and cruelty of Papiſts againſt the Country of Merindol and Cabriers

Alſo

Malice of Papiſts againſt the Citizens of Tholouſe in France.

Alſo before that, what offended the Citizens of Tholouſe and Avinion, when Pope Gregory the Ninth ſet Lewis the French King to War againſt them, and againſt Raymundus their Earl, without cauſe; where alſo the ſaid King died at the Siege.

Malice and cruelty of Papiſts againſt the Proteſtants of the Town of Vaſſy.

Or to ſpeak of later years, what hurt or harm did the poor Proteſtants in the Town of Vaſſy, who, being peaceably at a Sermon, were miſerably ſlain and cut, Men, Women, and Children, by the Duke of Guiſe and his armed Souldiers? Beſides other infinite Examples almoſt not to be numbred of like cruelty, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Germany, France, and now of late in Flanders, and in other Countries more.

Clemency and mercy ſhewed to Papiſts in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

But to let other Countries paſs, let us turn now to the peaceable Government in this Realm of England, under this our ſo mild and gracious Queen now preſently reigning. Under whom you ſee how gently you are ſuffered, what mercy is ſhewed unto you, how quietly ye live. What lack you that you would have, having almoſt the beſt Rooms and Offices in all the Realm, not only without any loſs of life, but alſo without any fear of death? And though a few of your Arch-Clerks be in cuſtody, yet in that cuſtody ſo ſhrewdly are they hurt, that many a good Proteſtant in the Realm would be glad with all their hearts to change Rooms and Diet with them, if they might. And albeit ſome other for their pleaſure have ſlipt over the Seas; if their courage to ſee Countries abroad did ſo allure them, who could let them? Yet this is certain, no dread there was of death that drave them. For what Papiſt have you ſeen in all this Land to loſe either life or limb for Papiſtry, during all theſe twelve years hitherto ſince this Queens Reign? And yet all this notwithſtanding, having no cauſe to complain, ſo many cauſes to give God thanks, ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and mutter, and are not pleaſed with peace, nor ſatisfied with ſafety, but hope for a day, and fain would have a change. And to prevent your deſired day, ye have conſpired, and riſen up in open Rebellion againſt your Prince, whom the Lord hath ſet up to be your Governour.

The traiterous murdering of the Lord James Regent of Scotland, Martyr.

And as you have ſince that now of late diſturbed the quiet and peaceable State of Scotland, in murdering moſt traiterouſly the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in ſparing the Queens life there, when he had her in his hands, hath now therefore loſt his own;) ſo with like fury, as by your Rebellion appeareth, would you diſturb the golden quiet and tranquillity of this Realm of England, if ye might have your will. Which the merciful Grace of the Almighty, for Chriſt his Sons ſake our Lord, forefend and utterly diſappoint. Amen.

The chief cauſe of all theſe later Perſecutions in the Church, is only the private quarrel of the Biſhop of Rome.

Wherefore theſe premiſſes conſidered, my queſtion is to aſk of you and know, what juſt or reaſonable cauſe ye have of theſe your unreaſonable doings, of this your ſo mortal and deadly hatred, fury and malice you bear againſt theſe your even-Chriſtened, of theſe your Tumults, Conſurations, Gaping and Yoping, Rebellions, Putterings, and Murders wherewith you trouble and diſquiet the whole World? Of all which miſchiefs if the true cauſe were well known, the truth would be found doubtleſs to be none other but only the private cauſe of the Biſhop of Rome, that he is not received, and the dignity of his Church exalted.

The Plantation of the Popes Supremacy proved not to be of God.

Touching which cauſe how unreaſonable and unjuſt it is, more ſhall be ſaid (the Lord willing) in reply, according as I ſhall ſee their anſwer, if it ſhall ſo pleaſe them, or any of them to anſwer this queſtion. In the mean time, this for a brief note ſhall ſuffice; that it ſtandeth not with Scripture, but contrary to Scripture, that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould ſo revenge his own private cauſe. If this Title and Plantation be good and of God, why doth he not refer it unto God? And no doubt, but if it be ſo, God will maintain it though the whole World ſaid No. If it be otherwiſe, it will fall and be rooted out, though all the World ſaid Yea. Yea the greateſt argument to prove this Plantation of the Popes Supremacy not to be of God, is, that the Pope, fighting in his own private cauſe, by outward and worldly force ſeeketh his own glory. Chriſt our Saviour, being here refuſed himſelf, yet neither revenged his own cauſe, nor ſought his own Glory, but only the Glory and Will of his Father, thus ſpeaking of himſelf, Si ego glorifico meipſum, gloria mea nihil eſt, pater meus eſt qui glorificat me, &c. John 8. That is, If I glorifie my ſelf, my glory is nothing; my Father is he that glorifieth me, &c. Even ſo I ſay with Scripture, that if the Popes proceedings were planted of God, he would not ſo wraſtle for his glory, as he doth; But forſomuch as he ſeeketh by ſuch cruelty and bloodſhed to exalt himſelf, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he ſhould be brought low, &c. Luke 18. Luke 18.

John 8.

The third Queſtion.

The third queſtion. Apoc. 13.

My third queſtion I take of the thirteenth Chapter of the Book of Revelation, Which Book as it containeth a Prophetical Hiſtory of the Church, ſo likewiſe it requireth by Hiſtories to be opened. In this Hiſtory mention is made, firſt of a certain Beaſt coming out of the Sea, having ſeven Heads and ten Horns, with ten Diadems of Blaſphemy: Unto the which Beaſt the Dragon the Devil gave his ſtrength, and great Power to fight againſt his Saints, and to overcome them, and to make forty two months; of the which Beaſt one of his heads was wounded at length to death, &c.

The two Beaſts in the Book of Revelation deſcribed.

The ſecond Beaſt with horns like a Lamb.

After this, immediately in the ſame Chapter, mention followeth of another Beaſt riſing out of the Land, having two Horns like a Lamb, and ſpake like a Dragon, and did all the Power of the former Beaſt before his face, and cauſed all dwellers of the Earth to Worſhip the Beaſt, whoſe Head was wounded and lived. Who alſo had had Power to give ſpirit and life to the ſaid former Beaſt, to make the Image of the Beaſt to ſpeak, and to cauſe all men, from the higheſt to the loweſt, to take the mark of the Beaſt in their Hands and Foreheads; and whoſoever worſhipped not the Image of the Beaſt, ſhould be killed, &c.

Upon this deſcripcion of theſe two Beaſts riſeth my queſtion; wherein I deſire all Papiſts, from the higheſt to the loweſt, either to anſwer, or to conſider with themſelves, what the ſpirit of the Proph[illegible] meaneth by the ſaid two Beaſts. Neither is the myſtery of this Propheſie ſo obſcure, but being Hiſtorical by Hiſtories it may be explained and eaſily expounded. Writing therefore to the Papiſts, as men expert in Hiſtories, my queſtion is this, That ſeeing the Propheſie of theſe two Beaſts muſt needs prefigure ſome People or Dominion in the World, of ſome high eſtate and power; they will now declare unto us, what people or domination this ſhould be. Which if they will do plainly and truly, according to the marks and properties of the ſaid two Beaſts here ſet forth, they muſt needs be driven of force inevitable to grant and confeſs, the ſame to agree only to the City and Empire of Rome, and to no other; which by theſe Reaſons following of neceſſity muſt needs be concluded.

The myſtery of the firſt Beaſt riſing out of the Sea, applied.

Firſt, The Beaſt which came out of the Sea, having the Strength, the Seat and Power of the great Dragon (the Devil called the Prince of this World) committed to him, who alſo had Power given over all Tribes, Nations, Languages, People and Countries in the Earth, muſt needs be an Empire or Monarchy of great force, paſſing all other Monarchies in the world beſides: and this muſt needs argue the Empire of Rome and none other.

The Image of the Beaſt reſembled to the Monarchy of Rome, Apoc. 13.

Secondly, In that the Beaſt had ſeven heads and ten horns, with ten Diadems full of blaſphemy upon them; thoſe ſeven heads being expounded in the ſame Book, Chap. 17. for ſeven Hills, notoriouſly importeth the City of Rome, wherein were ſeven hills contained. The like alſo may be thought of the ten horns, being there expounded pounded for ten Kings (ſignifying belike the ten Provinces and Kingdoms of the world, ſubdued to the Roman Empire) with ten Crowns of Blaſphemy upon their heads; all which conveniently agree to the City of Rome.

Thirdly, Where the ſaid Beaſt had Power to make 42 months, and to fight againſt the Saints, and to overcome them, &c. Thereby moſt manifeſtly is declared the Empire of Rome, with the Heathen perſecuting Emperors, which had Power given the ſpace of ſo many months (that is, from Tiberius to Licinius, 294 years) to perſecute Chriſts Church, as in the Table of the Primitive Church hereafter following is diſcourſed more at large. Of theſe forty two months, and the expoſition thereof read after.

Fourthly, Where the Prophet ſpeaketh of one of the heads of the Beaſt to be wounded to death, and the wound afterward to be cured again; by that ye have to underſtand the decay and ſubverſion of the City of Rome, and of Italy which, being one of the heads of the Roman Monarchy, was ſubdued by the Goths, Vandals, and Lombards, and the City of Rome thrice ſackt and taken, between the Reign of Honorius Emperor of Rome, and the time of Juſtinian Emperor of Conſtantinople; and ſo remained this head of Rome wounded a long time under the Dominion of the Lombards, till at length this wound was cured again, as the ſequel of this Prophecie declareth. For ſo it followeth in the aforeſaid Chapter of the Revelation; And after this I ſaw (ſaith he) another Beaſt riſing out of the Land, having two horns like the Lamb, and ſpake like the Dragon. Who practiſed all the Power of the firſt Beaſt before his face, and cauſed all the Inhabitants of the Earth to worſhip the firſt Beaſt, whoſe head was wounded and cured again, &c. And to him it was given to give life to the Image of the Beaſt, and to make it ſpeak: and alſo to make all them that will not worſhip the Image of the Beaſt, to be ſlain, and cauſed all from the moſt to the leaſt, both rich and poor, free-men and bond-men, to take the mark of the Beaſt in their right hand and in their foreheads, ſo that none ſhould buy or ſell, unleſs he had the Beaſts mark about him, &c. The wounded head of the Beaſt in the Revelation what it meaneth. The ſecond Beaſt riſing out of the Land, pretending the horns of a Lamb, what it meaneth.

The deſcription of this ſecond Beaſt being well viewed, it cannot be avoided, but it muſt be applied to the Biſhop of Rome, and to none other; as by Hiſtory, and order of times is evident to be proved. For who elſe repreſenteth the horns of the Lamb of God which taketh away the ſins of the World, but only he? Who ſpeaketh with the voice of the Dragon ſo proudly as he? The voice of the Dragon ſpake unto Chriſt, That all the glory of the World was his, to give to whom he would, and that he would give it, &c. And doth not this falſe horned Lamb, ſpeaking in the ſame voice of the Dragon, ſay by the mouth of P. Greg. 7. That all the Kingdoms of the Earth were his, and that he had Power in Earth to looſe, and take away Empires, Kingdoms, Dukedoms, and what elſe ſoever mortal men may have, and to give them where he would, &c. Ex Plat. in vit. Gregor. 7. Apoc. 13. The myſtery of the thirteenth Chapter of the Revelation expounded.

Furthermore, at what time the declining State of Rome began to decay, and Italy was brought under ſubjection of the Lombards, then the Pope ſtirred up Pipinus and Carolus Magnus, to take his part againſt the Lombards, and to reſtore again the old glory of that Monarchy to his former State. And therefore who cured the wounded head of this Beaſt again, but only he? Who gave life and ſpeech to the Image of the Beaſt, but he? who, after that by the help of the French Kings he had ſubdued thoſe Lombards with other Aliens, and had gotten the poſſeſſion of Rome into his own hands, he ſo repaired and advanced the fame and name of Rome, that ſince that time all perſons from the higheſt to the loweſt, both rich and poor, have been glad to ſend and ſeek to Rome, yea Kings, Emperors, Queens and Dukes have been glad to kiſs that Biſhops feet, and to lead his horſe by the bridle. So that the Majeſty of Rome, in the old Heathen Emperors days was never more terrible nor glorious, nor ever had more power to perſecute and overcome Gods Saints, than theſe Lambelike Biſhops of Rome had, and have exerciſed theſe 500 years in Chriſtendom. And therefore who elſe in all the World hath ſo much Power to do the Works of the firſt Beaſt before his face, as he? or who but he alone? which forceth both high and low, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive the Seal, and ſo become loyal to the City and See of Rome; ſo that whoſoever hath not the mark whereby to be known to hold of the Church of Rome, ſhall have no place to buy and ſell, nor to occupy in all Chriſtendom. Ex Platina in vita Greg. 7. The Image of the old Monarchy revived by the Biſhop of Rome. Power to do the works of the Beaſt before his ſight. Apoc. 13.

Now if any Papiſts whatſoever, in anſwering to this my queſtion, can apply this prophetical myſtery of theſe two Beaſts otherwiſe than thus, I would heartily deſire him to take ſo much pains to ſatisfie this doubt at his good pleaſure and leiſure. In the mean ſeaſon, let this ſtand for a Corolarium, that the Biſhop of Rome by this deſcription muſt be that ſecond Beaſt prophecied to come in the later time of the Church under a falſe pretenſed Lamb, to reſtore again the old Perſecutions of Rome, and to diſturb the whole Church of Chriſt, as this day too truly it is come to paſs.

The fourth Queſtion.

AS touching my fourth queſtion, although I could urge you with another like prophetical place of Scripture, no leſs evident againſt the Biſhop of Rome, taken out of the ſecond Epiſtle of Saint Paul to the Theſſalonians, where mention is made of the Son of Perdition, ſitting in the Temple of God, as God, and advancing himſelf above all that is called God, &c. Which place ye can by no reaſonable evaſion avoid; yet notwithſtanding to let this paſs, I turn my queſtion to ask this of you; Whether the Religion of Chriſt be more ſpiritual, or elſe corporal? If ye affirm it to be corporal, as was the old Religion of the Jews, conſiſting in outward Rites, Sacrifices, and Ceremonies of the Law; then ſhew if ye can, what any one outward action or obſervation is required in Chriſtian Religion by the Scripture, as neceſſary in a Chriſtian man for remiſſion of ſins and ſalvation, ſave only the two Sacramental Ceremonies of outward Baptiſm, and of the Lords Supper? Howbeit, neither theſe alſo as they are corporal; that is to ſay, neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other, conferreth remiſſion of ſins nor ſalvation, but only are viſible ſhews of inviſible and ſpiritual Benefits. And furthermore, if our God whom we ſerve be Spiritual; how can his Religion and Service be Corporal, as we are taught by the mouth of our Saviour, ſaying, God is a Spirit, and therefore they that worſhip him muſt worſhip in Spirit and Verity, &c. John 4.

Now if you grant (as ye muſt needs) this our Chriſtian Religion to be ſpiritual, and not a corporal Religion, then ſhew, if ye can, any one point of all theſe things, which ye ſtrive for ſo much with us, to be ſpiritual, but altogether corporal, and extern matters and Ceremonial Obſervations, nothing conducing to any ſpiritual purpoſe, as your outward ſucceſſion of Biſhops, Garments, Veſtures, Geſtures, Colours, choice of Meats, difference of days, times and places, hearing, ſeeing, ſaying, touching, faſting, numbring of Beads, gilding and worſhipping of Images, building of Monaſteries, riſing at midnight, ſilence in Cloyſters, abſtaining from fleſh and white meat, faſting in Lent, keeping Ember-days, hearing Maſs and Divine Service, ſeeing and adoring the Body in form of Bread, receiving holy-Water and holy-Bread, creeping to the Crois, carrying Palms, taking Aſhes, bearing Candles, Pilgrimage going, cenſing, knæling, knocking, Altars, ſuper-Altars, Candlecticks, Pardons; In Diners, croſſing, anointing, ſhaving, wearing Marriage; In Baptiſm, croſſing, ſalting, ſpeeting, exorciſing, waſhing of hands; at Eaſter, ear-confeſſion, Penance-doing, ſatisfaction: And in receiving, with Beards new ſhaven, to imagine a Body where they ſee no Body; and though he were there preſent to be ſeen, yet the outward ſeeing and touching of him, of it ſelf, without Faith conduceth no more, than it did to the Jews. At Rogation-days to carry Banners, to follow the Croſs, to walk about the fields. After Pentecoſt, to go about with Corpus Chriſti play. At Hollomas to watch in the Church, to ſay a Dirge, and Commemorations, and to ring for All-Souls, to pay Tythes truly, to give to the high Altar. And if a man Religion of Chriſt Spiritual, and not corporal. The whole ſum of the Popes Catholick Religion ſet forth in parts. The Pope turneth the ſpiritual Religion of Chriſt to a corporal Religion.

will be a Prieſt, to ſay Maſs and Mattens, to ſerve the Saint of that day, and to lift well over his head, &c. In ſickneſs to be annealed, to take his Rites; after his death to have Funerals, and Dirites ſaid for him, and to be rung for at his Funeral, month mind, and year mind, &c. Add moreover to theſe the outward Sacrifice of the Maſs, with opus operatum ſine bono motu utentis, &c.

A man may be a Catholick by the Popes Religion, without any working of the Holy Ghoſt.

All which things above recited, as they contain the whole ſummary and effect of all the Popes Catholick Religion; ſo are they all corporal exerciſes, conſiſting in the extern operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right Catholick Chriſtian, then it may be ſaid, that men may be made perfect Chriſtians by fleſh and blood, without any inward working of Faith, or of the Holy Ghoſt. For what is in all theſe, but that which fleſh and blood of his ſtrength is able to accompliſh, though no inward ſtrength or motion of the Holy Ghoſt did work?

The nature of true Chriſtian Religion deſcribed.

But now the order of our Religion, and way of ſalvation, conſiſteth not in ſuch corporal or outward things as theſe, but in other more high and more ſpiritual gifts, which do far exceed the capacity of fleſh and blood; of the which gifts, the chiefeſt and only main cauſe that ſaveth man, and remitteth ſins, is his Faith in Chriſt. Which Faith I thus define; for a man to believe by the bloodſhedding of Jeſus the Son of God, his ſins to be forgiven, Gods wrath to be pacified, and himſelf to be juſtified perfectly from all Accuſations that can be laid unto him, &c. And though the Papiſts make a light matter of this, to believe in Chriſt; and when they hear us ſay, That Faith only juſtifieth, they object to us again, and make it a ſmall matter to be ſaved, if Faith only juſtifieth us; yet notwithſtanding this Faith, if it be well examined, is ſuch a thing that fleſh and blood is not able to attain thereto, unleſs Gods holy Spirit from above do draw him.

Salvation of man ſtandeth only in Faith in Chriſt. Faith in Chriſt no light matter to fleſh and blood.

Moreover, beſides this Faith, many other things are incident alſo to the Doctrine of our Salvation. Albeit as no cauſes thereof, but either as Sacraments and Seals of Faith, or as declarations thereof, or elſe as fruits and effects following the ſame. So Baptiſm, and the Supper of the Lord be as teſtimonies and proofs, that by our Faith only in Chriſt we are juſtified, that as our bodies are waſhed by water, and our life nouriſhed by bread and wine, ſo by the blood of Chriſt our ſins be purged, and the hunger of our ſouls relieved by the death of his body.

Many things incident to ſalvation beſides Faith; but not as cauſes thereof.

Upon the ſame Faith riſeth alſo outward profeſſion by mouth, as a declaration thereof. Other things alſo as fruits and effects do follow after Faith, as peace of Conſcience, joy in the Holy Ghoſt, Invocation, Patience, Charity, Mercy, Judgment, and Sanctification. For God for our Faith in Chriſt his Son therefore giveth into our hearts his holy Spirit of comfort, of Peace and Sanctification, whereby mans heart is moved to a godly diſpoſition to fear God, to ſeek him, to call upon him, to truſt unto him, to ſtick to him in all Adverſities and Perſecutions, to love him, and for his ſake alſo to love our Brethren, to have mercy and compaſſion upon them, to viſit them if they be in priſon, to break Bread to them if they be hungry, and if they be burdened to eaſe them, to cloath them if they be naked, and to harbour them if they be houſeleſs, Matthew the five and twentieth, with ſuch other ſpiritual exerciſes of Piety and Sanctification as theſe. Which therefore I call ſpiritual, becauſe they proceed of the holy Spirit and Law of God, which is ſpiritual.

Works of Sanctification, how they come and follow Faith.

Mat. 25.

And thus have ye a Catholick Chriſtian defined, firſt after the Rules of Rome, and alſo after the Rule of the Goſpel. Now confer theſe Antitheſes together, and ſee whither of theſe is the true Chriſtian, the ceremonial man after the Church of Rome, or the ſpiritual man with his Faith and other ſpiritual Fruits of piety following after the ſame. And if ye ſay that ye mix them both together, ſpiritual things with your corporal Ceremonies, to that I anſwer again, that as touching the end of remiſſion of ſins, and ſalvation, they ought in no caſe to be joyned together, becauſe the main cauſes of all our Salvation and Remiſſion is only ſpiritual, and conſiſteth in Faith and in no other.

And therefore upon the ſame cauſe I come to my queſtion again, as I began, to aſk whether the Religion of Chriſt be a mere ſpiritual Religion; and whether in the Religion of Rome, as it is now, is any thing but only mere corporal things required, to make a Catholick man. And thus I leave you unto your anſwer.

IN turning over the firſt leaf of this Book, thou ſhalt find, gentle Reader, the Arguments of Pighius and Hoſius, wherein thus they argue, That forſomuch as Chriſt muſt needs have a Catholick Church ever continuing here in Earth, which all men may ſee, and whereunto all men ought to reſort; and ſeeing no other Church hath indured continually from the Apoſtles, viſible here in Earth, but only the Church of Rome; they conclude therefore, the Church of Rome only to be the right Catholick Church of Chriſt, &c.

In anſwering whereunto, this is to be ſaid; that forſomuch as the medius terminus of this Argument, both in the Major and Minor conſiſteth only in the word (viſible and unknown) if they mean by this word (viſible) in the Major, that Chriſts Church muſt be ſeen here to all the world, that all men may reſort to it, it is falſe. Likewiſe, if they mean by the ſame word (viſible) in the Minor, that no other Church hath been ſeen and known to any, but only the Church of Rome, they are likewiſe deceived. For the true Church of Chriſt neither is ſo viſible, that all the world can ſee it, but only they which have ſpiritual eyes, and be members thereof; nor yet ſo inviſible again, but ſuch as be Gods Elect, and members thereof, do ſee it, and have ſeen it, though the worldly eyes of the moſt multitude cannot do ſo, &c. Whereof read more in the Proteſtation above premixed to the Church of England.

Four Conſiderations given out to Chriſtian Proteſtants, Profeſſors of the Goſpel, With a brief Exhortation inducing to reformation of Life.

The firſt Conſideration.

AS in the Page before four Queſtions were moved to the Catholick Papiſts, to anſwer them at their leiſure; ſo have I here to the Chriſtian Goſpellers four Conſiderations for them to muſe upon with ſpeed convenient.

The firſt Conſideration is this, That every good man well weigh with himſelf the long Tranquillity, the great Plenty, the peaceable Liberty, which the Lord of his mercy hath beſtowed upon this Land during all the Reign hitherto of this our Sovereign and moſt happy Queen Elizabeth, in ſuch ſort as the like example of Gods abundant mercies is not to be ſeen in any Nation about us; ſo as we may well ſing with the Pſalm in the Church: Non fecit taliter omni nationi, & opes gloriæ ſuæ non manifeſtavit eis; Firſt in having the true Light of Gods Goſpel ſo ſhining among us, ſo publickly received, ſo freely preached, with ſuch liberty of conſcience without danger profeſſed; having withall a Prince ſo vertuous, a Queen ſo gracious given unto us, of our own native Country; bred and born amongſt us, ſo quietly governing us, ſo long lent unto us, in ſuch Peace defending us againſt ſuch as would elſe devour us; briefly, what could we have more at Gods hand, if we would wiſh? Or what elſe could we wiſh in this world that we have not, if this one thing lacked not Grace to uſe that well which we have?

The

The ſecond Conſideration.

AS theſe things firſt are to be conſidered concerning our ſelves, ſo ſecondly let us conſider likewiſe the ſtate and times of other our Countrymen and bleſſed Martyrs aforepaſt; what ſtorms of Perſecutions they ſuſtained, what little reſt they had, with what Enemies they were matched, with what croſſes preſſed, under what Princes, under what Prelates they lived, or rather died, in the days of King Henry the Fourth, King Henry the Fifth, King Henry the Seventh, King Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, &c. under Bonner Biſhop of London, Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, Cholmley, Story, Biſhop Arundel, Stokeſley, Courtney, Warham. At what time Children were cauſed to ſet fire to their Fathers; the Father adjured to accuſe the Son, the Wife to accuſe the Husband, the Husband the Wife, Brother the Siſter, Siſter the Brother, Examples whereof are plenty in this Book to be ſeen.

The third Conſideration.

THirdly, Let us call to mind, conſidering thus with our ſelves, Theſe good men and worthy Martyrs in thoſe dangerous days taſting as they did the heavy hand of Gods ſharp Correction, beginning commonly with his own Houſe firſt; if they were alive now in theſe Halcyon-days, under the Protection of ſuch a peaceable Prince, O what thanks would they give to God! How happy would they count themſelves having but half of that we have, with freedom only of conſcience and ſafety of life? Or if in caſe we our ſelves had been in thoſe times of theirs, ſo troubed and diſtreſſed as they were, ſpoiled of Goods, hated of the World, cited in Conſiſtories, pinched in Priſons, ſequeſtred from Houſe, Wife, and Children, looking for nothing but death; what would we ſay? what would we think? what would we do? Much otherwiſe doubtleſs than we do now; God grant we may do better, for worſe I think we cannot if we would. John Wickliff, W. Swinderby, Thorpe, Sawtry, with a number of godly men more, being then glad in Frieſe Gowns, going bare-foot, to preach where they could; if they were now alive, how glad would they be of theſe days, what pains would they take, yea, what pains would they not take in preaching the Goſpel, not for lucre, nor for money, nor paſſing for Promotions or Dignities of the Church? Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton, with divers worſhipful Gentlemen a great number, if they being in our ſtate might enjoy with us their Houſes and Lands, with the good favour of their Prince (as then they could not) how gladly would they have contented themſelves, though they never raiſed their Rents and Fines to the undoing of their poor Tenants? Likewiſe in the time of John Hus and Jerome of Prague, the Nobility and Gentlemen of Bohemia, if they might have had half this Tranquillity which we have, to enjoy the liberty of Gods Word and true uſe of the Sacraments without moleſtation of Romiſh Prelates, what would they have cared how ſimply they walked in their attire, without any ſuch monſtrous pomp in pranking up themſelves, as we Engliſhmen in theſe Reformed-days walk now, more like Players on a Stage, than Gods Children in his Church?

The fourth Conſideration.

WHerefore, welbeloved, theſe things being ſo, let us call our ſelves to mind, conſidering the times that have been, the times that be, and the times that may come, how we ſtand, and by whom we ſtand. If it be the favour of God only that doth ſupport us in the midſt of ſo many Enemies, let us beware that in no wiſe we provoke his Indignation. If it be his Truth and Goſpel that we profeſs, let us walk in the light of his Truth, and keep our ſelves within the compaſs of his Goſpel. What the Goſpel requireth, and what it abhorreth, who knoweth not? yet who followeth that he knoweth? If St. Paul willeth every one to depart from iniquity, which nameth the Lord Jeſus; and if the Lord Jeſus himſelf teſtifieth plainly his Kingdom not to be of this world, how will then the nature of that Kingdom ſo Spiritual, and our conditions ſo worldly, match well together? To rip up all our deformities in particular I mind not here, neither need I, the ſame being ſo evident to all mens eyes, that who cannot ſee our exceſſive outrage in pompous Apparel, our carnal deſires and unchaſte demeanors without fear of God, our careleſs ſecurity without conſcience, as though there were no judgment to come, our ſtudies ſo upon this World, as though there were no other Heaven? What pride and idleneſs of life, double diſſembling in word and deed without ſimplicity, avarice unſatiable, little regard to hear Gods Word, leſs to read it, leaſt of all to follow it, every man aſpiring to worldly Wealth and Promotion, little or no mercy to the poor, racking of Rents and Fines, bribing and taking unmeaſurable? What ſhould I ſpeak of the contentions and unbrotherly diviſions amongſt us, moſt lamentable to ſee, but more lamentable, if all were ſeen which may or is like to follow upon the ſame. Such were the times once of the Church before the horrible Perſecution of Dioclefian; for ſo we read, ſuch hatred and diſdain through much Peace and Proſperity of the Church to creep in amongſt the Church-men.

Wherefore let us be exhorted, dearly beloved, to reclaim our ſelves while time doth ſerve. If we find the Lord ſo gracious in ſparing us as he doth, let not that make us worſe but better. It is a lewd Child that will not learn without beating. A well-minding man will be good, not forced by coaction, but of voluntary office induced. As Adverſity if it come, ought not to diſmay us; ſo Proſperity now preſent ought not to puff us up in ſecurity, conſidering what commonly is wont to follow, as Plato well writeth, Summæ atque effrenatæ libertatis ſervitutem plerumq; aſſeclam eſſe. Of immoderate liberty and two much ſecurity, followeth moſt commonly extream ſervitude. And as Hypocrates ſaith, Diſpoſitions of Bodies when they are come to the higheſt perfection of health, then are they moſt ſubject to danger of ſickneſs, &c. Let us therefore, having light given us, walk like the Children of light. Otherwiſe, if we walk like Children of Diſobedience, God hath his Rods to ſcourge us; if we will needs be Rebels, he hath his Pharaohs and Nabuchodonoſors to plague us. Or if we will be ſo inordinate and (with reverence be it ſpoken, without offence to God or man) ſo doggiſh and curriſh one to another, the Lord lacketh not his Dog-ſtrikers to whip us. And would God our lives were ſuch, that the deſtruction and ruine here of late ſeen among us may portend nothing againſt us, as I truſt there is no cauſe for us to fear, but rather to fear the Lord, and walk in his Obedience, and amend that which is amiſs amongſt us. Amen.

The Grace of our Lord Jeſus bleſs thee gentle Reader, that long thou maiſt read, and much thou maiſt profit. Amen.

Pax Prædicantibus, Gracia Audientibus, Gloria Jeſu Chriſto. Amen.

In Martyrologium Joan. Foxi, Laurentius Humfredus.

TRiſtes Iliadas docti miramur Homeri,
Quas ſcitè ſtuduit texere πυρὸς ἀνὴρ.
Deflentur tragico multorum fata cothurno,
Hæc madidis ſpectant mœſta theatra genis.
Multa dolenda quidem, ſed Vatum ſomnia multa
Fictis intexunt vera, probata nothis.
Sunt quos delectant vanæ commenta Legendæ,
Quam ſtabulum Augeæ rite vocare queas.
Dum vitam & mortem ſanctorum narrat, ut errat?
Ut pingit, fingit Plumbeus ille liber?
Aurea nunc tandem prodit, nova, vera Legenda;
Egregium Chronicon, lugubris hiſtoria.
Authorem commendat opus, ſic rurſus adornat
Author opus; ſimul hæc utraque felle carent.
Authorem ſpecta; pius eſt, & terſus, & amplus,
Judicio clarus, dexteritate, fide.
Si rem conſideras, caſus, cædeſque bonorum
Tractat, & immeritæ ſtigmata ſæva crucis.
Illudant alii, carpant, at Zoilus olim
Dum periit, quid ſit rodere, jam docuit.
Hic diſcas Lector, quam ſit furioſa Tyrannis
Romanæ caulæ cornigeríque gregis;
Ut Lupus innocuos ſemper graſſetur in Agnos;
Ut fremat, atque avidis faucibus oſſa voret.
Nonne ſatis fuerat Chriſti pia membra cremare?
Et vivos flammis perdere, nonne ſatis?
Nonne ſatis damnaſſe ſenes, pueroſque, viroſque,
Fœmellas, omni ex ordine, nonne ſatis?
Cur juvat, heu, Manes ſcriptis lacerare jacentes,
Et Divos Foxi dicere ſtercoreos?
Ah miſer, ah Chriſti teneros compungis ocellos.
Pupillam tangis, quiſquis es ergo, ſape.
Hæc eſt progenies cujus ſtola, lota cruore
Agni, per Chriſtum candida tota nitet.
Illa ſub altari queruletur, Chriſte, quouſque?
Apoc. 6. Chriſte veni properè, Chriſte quouſque feres?
Extra tela tua eſt, & prædicat illa Tonantem;
Mors pretioſa fuit, vita perennis erit.
Quid furis ô rabioſe Satan? quid ſpicula torques?
Quid reges acuis? quid laniáſque pios?
Fruſtra carnifices, carcer, tormenta, facéſque;
In cœlo regnant membra caputque ſimul.
Corpora ſanctorum mundus conſumpſit, in altum
Migrarunt animæ, nomina Foxus habet.
Ad Chriſtum præcatio. Nomina Foxus habet totum celebranda per orbem, Nomina jam nullo contumulanda die.
Nam cum Martyribus Foxus, cum numine vivent
Nomina, cumque ſuo ſtirps generoſa Deo.
Monſtra, Chriſte, tuis portum, compeſcito fluxus,
Jactatæ navi ſit ſua, Chriſte, quies.
Sanguine fraterno poſthæc ne terra madeſcat;
Ne pergat Foxus ſcribere Martyria.
Perdita decurtes ſceleratæ tempora vitæ,
Tandem mortiferus tranſeat iſte calix.
Sit finis, veniatque tuum, pater optime, regnum;
Sit tibi, ſit Chriſto, Spirituique decus.

In Sanct. Martyrum hiſtoriam, Abrah. Hartwelus.

ELoquio, venerande, tuo non Midſummus ipſi
Sed nos, non cœlum, Foxe, ſed orbis eget,
Illorum creviſſe malis lætoque putatum eſt
Quos nunc ipſe vides degenerare greges.
Illorum, crede, hiſtoria velut ignibus antè
Calfiet quod nunc friget Evangelium.
Certabitque ætas veniens milleſima, quorum
Fortia facta leget, fortia facta ſequi.
Et calamo ſervata tuo tot flagra, tot ignes,
Funera tot, lachrymas, damna, pericla, neces,
Nulla dies tollit, non qui malus intulit hoſtis;
Non quamvis omni cum Phlegetonte velit.
Non renuente Deo, quondam, qui ſæviit hoſtis.
Non, renuente Deo, bis violentus erit.
Bis fremat; innocuo rapietur cum grege Paſtor,
Grex cadet & paſtor, ſpeſque futura gregis.
Nullus reſtabit laceris in ovilibus agnus,
Nulla, Deus, recta ſimplicitate pecus.
Omnia victa malis bona cedent omnibus; alma
Simplicitas fuco, perfidiæque fides:
Injuſto, falſo, ſcelerato, ſanguineoque,
Virtutum ſacer Evangelidumque chorus.
Quid facient diſce ex factis; ventura probantur
Præteritis;
Ni tua de cœlo veniat Clementia, cujus
Tolluntur digito parva, ſuperba cadunt.
Et venias æterne, potens, invicte, triumphans;
Sic, ut in Ægypto vel Babylone, veni.
Non tanti Babylone Draco Beluſque fuere,
Cultuſque inſani, & fœda ſuperſtitio.
Et licet Ægypti crudelia facta legentur,
Ægyptus non tam ſæva minaxque fuit.
Utraque, nec ſatis eſt, monſtrum concrevit in unum,
Et ſi qua ambabus tetrior hydra fuit.
Quid contra fidus præco, ſtylive Magiſter?
Doctæ quid poterunt veriparæque Scholæ?
Quid mitis toto laniatus corpore Martyr?
Martyre quid plenus ſanguiſluusque liber?
Qui truculenta liber, qui vivos undique telles,
Factores vivos, & modò geſta canit?
Scilicet ut monſtret ſanctorum Eccleſia qualis,
Collecti quales ex Acheronte lupi
Ut doceat, firmet, ſoletur corda piorum;
Dedoceat, vincat, excrucietvè malos.
Ut tibi parta, Deus, ſtet ſemper gloria, nati
Ut poſſit tecum gloria ſtare tui;
Sanguinis ut ſacri non occultanda trophæa,
Utraque poſteritas, ſancta, maligna, ſciat.
Hæc, venerande, tibi tanto quæſita labore,
Tot votis optata, & tot vigilata modis,
Noctibus exantlata tot, & ſudata diebus,
Tot placitura bonis, obruitura malos.
Chriſti, non hominum, laudes ſparſura per orbem
Factaque (credo) ætas qualia rara feret:
Hæc, oro, tibi Summipotens nobiſque ſecundet,
Numinis in laudem perpetuumque decus.
Invideat Satanas, & Zoilus ilia rumpat,
Obtrectet mendax cum grege Roma ſuo.

Neſcis adulari, nec verum (Foxe) ſilere;
Scriptaque miraris non placuiſſe tua?

Ejuſdem.

QUiſque bonus te (Foxe) colit, tua ſcripta celebrat,
Dant decus hoc ſtudii tot Monumenta tui.
Te pia vita ornat, doctorum concio laudat,
Unde ergo in libros invidia iſta tuos?
Unde Papizantis ſubita hæc converſio ſectæ;
Nunc audire pudet, quod facere haud puduit.
Unde tot Harpiæ, nempe Hardyngique, Copique?
Unde hæc Lovanii garrula turba Scholæ?
Cauſa patet; furiæ muſas, nec ſacra Papiſmus,
Nec Chriſte athletas raſa larina probat.
Nec te adeò oderunt puto, ſed verumque fidemque,
Heu bene nulla poteſt lingua maligna loqui.

Papa.

ERgone ſic Papa potuit vox improba juſſu
Tam dirum mandare nefas? tot corpora tantis
Cont umulaſſe rogis, cineres ſine honore Sepulchri?
Quod genus hoc hominum? Quæve hunc tam barbara morem
Permittit gens ulla, pios ſine lege necari,
Totque ſimul mactare viros meretricis ob iram?
Papa refer, quæ te rapuit rabieſque furorque,
Corpora tam diris ſanctorum addicere flammis,
Funera tot miſcere hominum, tot plectere cives,
Vaſtare & toto diviſos orbe Britannos?
Dic quid noſtrates in te committere tantum?
Illi quid potuere, quibus tot maxima paſſis
Vix pars ulla manet terræ qua panditur orbis?
An tua quod nobis taxata eſt frauſque doluſq;
Et πολυαργυμόυνε & amor ſceleratus habendi?
An tua quod nobis vox non hominem ſonat; ergo
Rite putabamus Papam cacodæmone natum?
An quod cum Chriſto nos conſpirare dolebas?
Quod te cum Chriſto non conſpirare videmus?
Quod te Romanam crebris cum comibus hydram
Prodimus, ut ſceleris magni vitiique miniſtrum?
Hinc illud quod ſe verſat diriſq; miniſque,
Hinc illud quòd & hos facibus fumantibus uſſit.

Bonnerus. Tu cladis tantæ pars magna Bonnere fuiſti:
Mactator pecudum Chriſti, diſperſor ovilis,
Triſte malum ſtabulis, & nil niſi peſſima clades.
Vos quoque, vos omnes Ihovæ tetlgiſſe Prophetas,
Et calcaſſe pios, numen ſpreviſſe benignum
Quéis loculare fuit, crudeles ponite mentes.
Jam ſatis eſt (proh) plus ſatis eſt, reſipiſcite ſetô,
Sera nimis non ulla dies, nunc diſcite tandem,
Diſcite vel tandem moniti non temnere Chriſtum.
Oſcula libertis gnato, ne ſæviat ultor,
Et male vos ſparſos deturbit tramite vitæ,
Ad Martyres. At vos qui læti quidvis ſuperaſtis acerbum,
Cœlicolæ, quibus æternum licet eſſe beatis,
Dulce decuſque Dei, Chriſtum quia morte decora
Ornaſtis clari ſuperi, cœtuſque triumphans,
Non caro, non mundus, non vos Turcæ, Papa, Dæmon,
Non Phœbe pernox vexabit, ſolvè diurnus.
Et vos ô cuncti, ſcanſo qui culmine cœli,
Vaditis ad patrem, terrena mole relicta;
Quid carcer, quid vincula, compes, tormenta cachinni,
Vultus quid nocuere truces? quid tela, quid ignes?
Scilicet ut ſulvum ſpectatur in ignibus aurum;
Si vos mactarunt ſpectata holocaumata Chriſto,
Interitas veſter Domini pretioſus ocellis.
Horum (Foxe) piis dum tu ſic nomina ſcriptis,

THE LIFE OF Mr. John Fox,

Tranſlated out of the Latine.

TO THE READER.

HAving been often and earneſtly requeſted by many, to gratifie Poſterity, with the Hiſtory of my Fathers life, which I had written above thirty years ſince; and finding that no new matter had faln out, for which (though I were ſilent) I ſhould diſtruſt the judgment of after Ages, concerning a man ſo well known; but that many things to this Purpoſe neceſſary, were now out of my power, by the death of thoſe, upon whoſe Teſtimony the truth of each Particular depended; I made no queſtion, but both eaſily with all men, to find Pardon for my firſt refuſal; and if ſtill I ſhould continue in the ſame mind, as eaſily to keep my ſelf in the right I have to uſe my liberty herein. But when I perceived, that ſome, who were meer ſtrangers to him, and utterly ignorant of his Converſation, had taken upon them, to write his Life; of which they could learn nothing, but by Hear-ſays, and flying Reports; whereby it fell out, that many of his actions were amplified above the truth; many things otherwiſe related than performed; and much paſſed over, that came not to their knowledge; having my ſelf when I was a young man, been always Converſant with him in his later days, and when I was abſent from him, had better Intelligence of any remarkable paſſage in his life; I thought it but my duty, to preſerve his Memory from wrong; and if I could add nothing to it, at leaſt to place it in its true and proper light. Neither feared I, but that I ſhould be able to juſtifie this to the Readers, that being his Son I publiſhed my Fathers life, though in reſpect of my nearneſs to him, I may be ſuſpected. For firſt, that ſo memorable a man ſhould be unknown to Poſterity, even the injury done him, by thoſe who had ill handled his Story, would not ſuffer: neither was it ſafe, that any but his own Friends ſhould undertake to right him; and what reaſon is there, that his Sons credit ſhould be more ſuſpected, than the force of their anger and grief, who deſire that no Memory of him might at all remain? Thus long I have forborn, till being in equal danger, of the offence that may be taken, by the adverſe Party, and thoſe that deſired his Story, I choſe at length to ſatisfie their Minds, who not without ſome vehemence requeſted it of me. At whoſe importunity, I have conſented to ſet forth this Book, written at firſt to no other intent, than to preſerve by me the Image of my Fathers life; and now, in ſo confirmed a Fame of him, rather thought neceſſary by others, than ſo judged by my ſelf.

THE LIFE OF Mr. John Fox.

JOHN FOX was born in Boſton, an ancient Town in the County of Lincoln, Anno 1517. his Father and Mother being of the Commonalty of that Town, well reputed of, and of good ſtate. While he was very young, his Father dying, and his Mother being martied again, he came into the Tutelage of his Father in law, with whom he dwelt during his Childhood: which he had ſcarce paſſed over, when his Friends well approving his good inclination and towardneſs to Learning, ſent him to ſtudy at Oxford. The firſt Nurſe of his more ſerious Studies, was Braſen-Noſe Colledge, where he was Chamber-Fellow with Doctor Nowell ſo famous a man in this City afterward, and Dean of Pauls, That no great marvail it was, if their manners were ſo like in the courſe of their lives, whoſe Education, and Nurture in Youth was the ſame. The native excellence, and ſharpneſs of his wit, were well ſeconded by the fitneſs of the place; where the emulation of Equals was frequent; and where each Students Proficiency was narrowly ſought into: Neither was Induſtry wanting, which as it ſeldom accompanieth the greateſt Wits, ſo where it is conjoyned is moſt available. By which Vertues, when in a ſhort ſpace he had won the admiration of all, and the love of many, in reward of his Learning, and good behaviour he was choſen Fellow of Magdalen-Colledge; which being accounted a Principal Honour in the Univerſity, and uſually due to the Students of that Houſe, was ſeldom, and not unleſs in regard of ſingular Deſerts, beſtowed upon any others. It ſhould ſeem he deſigned the firſt over-branching of any early wit, to the exerciſes of Poetry, and wrote divers Latine Comedies yet to be ſeen, in a copious, and graceful Stile, but ſomewhat lofty, which fault of writing, (in all things elſe ſo grave and temperate) he left not altogether in his elder years, though age, and experience did not a little mitigate it. But even then he began to give earneſt of what he afterward proved, for that neither thoſe firſt flouriſhes of his Youth were ſpent, but in holy Hiſtories of the Bible: nor followed he that vein long. He betook himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity with ſomewhat more fervency, than circumſpection, and diſcovered himſelf in favour of the Reformation then in hand, before he was known to them that maintained the Cauſe, or were of ability to protect the Maintainers of it: whence grew his firſt Troubles. This was the time when King Henry the Eighth uncertain what courſe to take, being at Variance with the Pope, and unreſolved in himſelf, thinking the affairs of the Church (then grown to an infinite height of Power and Pride) neither in all reſpects tolerable, nor that it was neceſſary wholly to alter them, while he deſired to ſhew moderation in both, prevailed in neither, obſcuring an Act, than which none was of more Glory ſince the World began, by an unprofitable indifferency. Never before were the people in more diſtraction, or leſs ſecurity of their Lives, and Eſtates, there being in the Laws ſuch contrarieties, as no man could tell what to take to with ſafety, or what to avoid. For although the Popes Supremacy had been renounced, yet was Doctrine ſtill retained. The firſt News of the aboliſhing the Popes Supremacy was as proſperous as welcome to the Reformers; and divers joyned themſelves to them out of love to the Truth, being further aſſured of the Kings Intentions, by the puniſhment taken on ſome of the contrary part, and eſpecially when the Abbies were diſſolved; nor was their hope a little increaſed, when they perceived the Noblemen more or leſs to riſe in the good Opinion and Favour of the King, as any of them moſt oppoſed the Popes Dominion. In the mean while the Act of the ſix Articles was ſtill in force, and if any were found guilty of the breach thereof, they were ſure of puniſhment. So that as long as the King held the middle way between his own Genius, and the advice of his Counſellors, feeding them with Favours, upon which they could build no aſſurance, and pleaſing himſelf in his own ſeverity, fear and hope, equally prevailed.

But when the Protectors themſelves, and Pillars of the Reformed Religion, were taken away. The Duke of Suffolk by untimely death, the Lord Cromwel by the Sword, the Archbiſhop Cranmer and his Friends born down by thoſe of the contrary ſide; and that neither in the Laws, nor the Protection of the Peers, there was any, the leaſt help remaining; then began all things to haſten back again headlong to their former abuſes, and that with ſo much the more violence, becauſe the conqueſt ſeemed a kind of revenge.

In

In the Univerſities and Schools there was yet no open change, or innovation: I know not whether through fear, or that they would not be Followers.

This was the eſtate of the Church-affairs, when Maſter Fox began attentively to ſeek into the ſubſtance of the Controverſie, then in agitation.

He found the Contention to have been of great Antiquity, and no Age to have been free from ſome debate in the Church. But thoſe firſt quarrels were rather for Dominion, and increaſe of Territory. The Romans endeavouring by ſubtil Practiſes, and pretext of Religion to retain under the Juriſdiction of a High Prieſt, the ancient honour of their City, which by open force they could not defend.

Then no ſooner could any ſhew himſelf to differ from them in point of Faith, but the haſtening of his puniſhment prevented any infection that might ſpread it ſelf among others.

Thus by their Cruelty, and the patience of Princes, who ſuffered it, the greateſt part of theſe Diſſenſions were appeaſed: neither hitherto were all tracts of the old Roman vertue quite worn out, at leaſtwiſe ſome reſemblances of vertue remained among many things that were perverted, and by long time utterly defaced.

Afterward the Pope grown bolder by good ſucceſs, began to draw to himſelf all Power and Authority, nor contented to have weakned the eſtate of the Roman Empire alone, now, longed to be fingring the Scepters of other Princes; and to compaſs his deſign, ſpared not to violate any Humane, or Divine Right: Mean while the Clergy little weighed with how great damage to Religion, men of ſpotted life and converſation were ſometimes choſen to the Papacy, by whoſe example the ſtrictneſs of life, uſed by their Forefathers, was drawn into ſcorn, and their poverty into exprobration; The induſtry of the Prieſthood languiſhed, and on the contrary ſide Ambition, Riot, and Avarice began to reign among them. Then at length were the Practiſes of the Churchmen brought to light, and their Deluſions laid open. It was then known why the Ceremonies and Rites in the Church, had been brought to that exceſſive multitude, to wit, that the number of the Clergy might be increaſed to perform them: Theſe of neceſſity were to be maintained; and to that end were ſuch Opinions broached, as ſeemed moſt likely to draw money from all places: Of the dignity of Works; Of Purgatory; Of the power of Abſolution, and the Popes Indulgences: All which being in themſelves falſe, and ſoon ſubject to decay, were thought fit to be cemented together with that new and ſubtil invention of the Popes infallibility in matters of Faith.

By this handſome connexure, and linking one Opinion to another, the credulity of the Chriſtians was eaſily inſnared; all this while the new forg'd Opinions yielding plentiful increaſe, and great ſums of money, by a hundred deviſes ſcrewed out of the Clergy, and common people, came daily to the Pope, and Court of Rome.

I have often heard Maſter Fox affirm, That the firſt matter which occaſioned his ſearch into the Popiſh Doctrine, was, that he ſaw divers things in their own natures, moſt repugnant to one another, thruſt upon men at one time to be both believed: as that the ſame man might in matters of Faith be Superior, and yet in his life and manners inferior to all the World beſides. Upon this beginning, his reſolution and intended obedience to that Church, were ſomewhat ſhaken, and by little and little followed ſome diſlike to the reſt.

His firſt care was to look into both the ancient and modern Hiſtory of the Church: to learn what beginning it had; what growth and increaſe; by what Arts it flouriſhed, and by what Errors it began to decline; to conſider the cauſes of all thoſe Controverſies which in the mean ſpace had ſprung up, and to weigh diligently of what moment they were, and what on either ſide was produced ſound or infirm.

This he performed with ſuch heat of ſtudy, and in ſo ſhort a time; that before the thirtieth year of his age, he had read over all that either the Greek or Latine Fathers had left in their writings; the Schoolmen in their Diſputations; the Councils in their Acts; or the Conſiſtory in their Decrees; and acquired no mean skill in the Hebrew Language.

By report of ſome who were Fellow-Students with him, he uſed over and above his days exerciſe, to beſtow whole nights at his Study, or not till it were very late to betake himſelf to reſt. Near to the Colledge was a Grove, wherein for the pleaſantneſs of the place, the Students took delight to walk, and ſpend ſome idle hours for their recreation. This place, and the dead time of the night, had Maſter Fox choſen, with the horror of ſolitude and darkneſs, to confirm his mind; which as a freſh-water-Souldier trembled at the guilt of a new imagination.

How many nights he watched in theſe ſolitary Walks; what combats and wraſtlings he ſuffered within himſelf; how many heavy ſighs, and ſobs, and tears he poured forthwith his prayers to Almighty God; I had rather might be ſpared from this Diſcourſe, than touched with opinion of Oſtentation: But therefore of neceſſity, was it to be remembred, becauſe from hence ſprang the firſt ſuſpition of his alienated affections. For no ſooner was the fame ſpread of his nightly retirements, but that the more underſtanding ſort out of their own wiſdom, others according as they ſtood inclined towards him, were apt to interpret all to the worſt ſenſe. At length thoſe with whom he was intimate, being drawn into ſuſpition of him; there were ſome imployed, who under pretence to admoniſh him, might obſerve his walks, and pry with more curioſity into his words and actions; and there wanted not others, who comparing his cuſtoms formerly uſed, with the preſent courſe he now took, did with more bitterneſs aggravate the fact. Why ſhould he not come to Church, ſo often as in former times he had accuſtomed? Why ſhould he ſhun the company of his Equals, and refuſe to recreate himſelf after his wonted manner, unleſs he had felt in his mind ſome ſuddain alteration? nor if that alteration were for the better, would he conceal it.

Being

Being thus reported of, ſurrounded with Treacheries, and by every one accuſed; when the matter came to more ſevere ſcanning, and that he could neither hide his reſolution longer, nor being a man of plain dealing, thought fit to excuſe himſelf by forging a lye; by the judgment of the Colledge, he was convicted, condemned as an Heretick, and removed the houſe. Nevertheleſs his Adverſaries affirmed he was favourably dealt with by that ſentence, and might have been queſtioned for his life, if they had not rather uſe clemency towards him than extremity. But this Wound raged worſe than was thought it would; his Friends upon the report of this accident being ſorely diſpleaſed, and eſpecially his Father in law, who was now grown altogether implacable, either through a real hatred conceived againſt him for this cauſe, or pretending himſelf agrieved, that he might now with more juſtice, at leaſt with more ſecurity withhold from Maſter Fox his own Fathers eſtate. For he both knew it could not be ſafe for one publickly hated, and in danger of the Law, to ſeek remedy by it; and that Maſter Fox was by nature ſo ignorant in requiting injuries, that he would many times with much ado confeſs himſelf wronged, even then, when he had in his hands ability of revenge.

When he was thus forſaken by his own Friends, and left naked of all humane aſſiſtance, GODS Providence began to ſhew it ſelf, procuring him a ſafe Refuge in the houſe of a worſhipful Knight of Warwickſhire, called Sir Thomas Lucy, to whom he was ſent for, to inſtruct his Children: In which houſe, he afterwards married a Wife, and there continued till the Children coming to riper years, had now no longer need of a Tutor. But the fear of the Popiſh Inquiſitions haſtned his departure thence; which now relying on the favour of the Laws, were not contented to purſue publick offences, but began alſo to break into the ſecrets of private Families.

Oft would Maſter Fox in the later times of his life, with much vehemence of mind, in diſcourſe with his Friends, deteſt the wretched condition of that departing; and ſay, That all other miſchances he had pretty well indured; but in this caſe the miſery was ſo much the greater; becauſe to have born it patiently, would have ſeemed unnatural; having brought his faithful Conſort, who entirely loved him, from her Friends and Kindred, whoſe grief and tears were with all officious piety to be comforted. It behoved him therefore, either to find ſome ſpeedy remedy, or in aſſurance of his love to weep with her. For in vain ſhould he ſhew an example of his conſtancy, where ſhe might rather ſuſpect her grief unregarded, than his mind unconquered with ſo great Calamities. He conſulted therefore with himſelf what was beſt to be done, and of two ways only left, whereby he might free himſelf from further incovenience, long debated, whether he might with moſt ſafety, make choice of; either to go to his Wives Father, or his Father in law by marriage of his Mother.

His Wives Father dwelt neareſt, being a Citizen of Coventry, nor yet bearing any hatred towards him, and more likely to be entreated for his Daughters ſake. His Father in law was better known to him, but more ſuſpected. At laſt he reſolved to go firſt to his Wives Father, and in the mean while by Letters to try, whether his Father in law would receive him or not. His Father in laws anſwer was, That it ſeemed to him a hard condition, to take one into his houſe, whom he knew to be guilty, and condemned for a Capital Offence: neither was he ignorant, what hazard he ſhould undergo in ſo doing: nevertheleſs that he would ſhew himſelf a Kinſman, and for that cauſe neglect his own danger. If he would alter his mind, he might come, on condition to ſtay as long as himſelf deſired: but if he could not be perſwaded to that, he ſhould content himſelf with the ſhorter tarriance, and not bring him and his Mother into hazard of their Fortunes, who were ready to do any thing for his ſake.

Maſter Fox his eſtate was at that paſs, that he thought no condition to be refuſed: Beſides he was underhand adviſed by his Mother to come, and not fear his Father in laws ſeverity; For that (perchance) it was needful to write as he did, but when occaſion ſhould be offered, he would make recompence for his words with his actions. The truth is, he had better entertainment with both of them, than he any way hoped for: but ſo his buſineſs required, that he ſhould rely long upon neither; and therefore by often going to and fro, from the one to the other, (which carried with it ſome ſhew of buſineſs) he both deceived their diligence, who enquired after him, and effected, that neither grew weary of his company.

But howſoever he by this means kept himſelf concealed; yet certain it is, that no time of his life paſſed more unknown to Poſterity than that; whether that while he did but little, which is ſcarce credible: or whether it more concerned them who knew what he did, that it ſhould be ſhut up in ſilence, than publiſhed abroad. For his own part he always forbare with particular regard, to ſpeak of that ſtory; leſt where he had deſerved ſo much, he might by extolling a ſmall courteſie, ſeem rather to upbraid the ſlenderneſs of the requital, than to ſhew himſelf thankful by remembring it. Afterward he took his journey towards London; but upon what motives is uncertain; unleſs we may imagine the convenience of the place enticed him thither; which being full of all ſorts of company, both Inhabitants and Strangers from all places might aſſure him ſufficient occaſions, whether he ſhould chooſe to conceal himſelf, or make known his abilities, and get acquaintance with thoſe of alike inclination.

By computation of times, I ſhould think the chief cauſe of his going thither to have been, that about that time Religion began at length a little to recover it ſelf, and gather ſtrength, eſpecially about the City. For he came not to Town till within a few years before King Henry departed this life: Who (as I ſaid before) though the Kingdom were divided into Factions, yet as long as his youth and ſtrength remained, ſo ordered the matter, that ſometimes the power of each party being equalled, and ſometimes one or other prevailing, by his authority both were retained in their Obedience: But when he grew into years, perceiving his health every day impaired, and that his death could not be far off; he then began to conſider with himſelf which ſide was moſt truſty, and which moſt to be doubted; and at what age he ſhould expoſe his Son, to the raging hatred of the Papiſts, who was yet by reaſon of his youth unfit to govern, and brought up in the Diſcipline of a Religion which they oppoſed.

He therefore at laſt reſolved upon that, which in reaſon ſeemed moſt wholſome, and in the end proved moſt fortunate; and having put the Papiſt-Officers from their authority, by his Will he appointed his Son ſuch Tutors, whoſe love to himſelf he had always found readieſt, and by long trial of their fidelity, thought likely to continue the ſame to his Succeſſor. This ſet Religion again in ſafety: But howſoever the Profeſſors thereof, were thereby ſecured of their lives; yet hence no publick benefit or profit was afforded them: So that Mr. Fox was ſtill in as much want as before, having already ſpent, what either his Friends had beſtowed on him, or his own daily induſtry had acquired.

I ſhould forbear to ſpeak of a marvelous accident, and great example of Gods mercy, were not the matter ſo well known abroad, that it would be to no purpoſe for modeſty ſake to be ſilent.

As Maſter Fox one day, ſate in Pauls Church, ſpent with long faſting, his countenance thin, and eyes hollow, after the gaſtful manner of dying-men; every one ſhunning a Spectacle of ſo much horror, There came to him one whom he never remembred to have ſeen before, who ſitting by him, and ſaluting him with much familiarity, thruſt an untold ſum of money into his hand; bidding him be of good chear; adding withall, that he knew not how great the miſfortunes were which oppreſſed him, but might ſuſpect it was no light Calamity: That he ſhould therefore accept in good part that ſmall gift from his Countryman, which common courteſie had enforced him to offer; that he ſhould go, and make much of himſelf, and take all occaſions to prolong his life; in the mean time let him know, that within a few days, new hopes were at hand, and a more certain condition of Livelihood. Never could Maſter Fox learn who that man ſhould be, by whoſe ſo ſeaſonable bounty, in that extream neceſſity, he had been relieved; though he earneſtly endeavoured to find him out. Some who looked further into the event which followed that Propheſie, believed that this man came not of his own accord, but was ſent by ſome others, who by all means deſired Maſter Foxes ſafety; and that it might (perchance) be through the Servants negligence, that he ſuffered the extreameſt of all miſeries, before any relief came. Certain it is, that within three days ſpace, the iſſue ſeemed to make good the Preſage, there being ſome ſent from the Dutcheſs of Richmond, who upon fair terms did invite him into her Service. It had ſo faln out not long before, that the Duke of Norfolk, the famous Warrior, and moſt renowned General of his time, together with his Son, the Earl of Surrey, a man as far as may be imagined of ſincere meaning, and ſharp underſtanding, was committed to Cuſtody in the Tower of London; for what Crimes is uncertain: While they were in priſon, the Earls Children were ſent to the foreſaid Dutcheſs their Aunt, to be brought up, and educated: Thomas who ſucceeded in the Dukedom, Henry who was after Earl of Northampton, and Jane afterwards Counteſs of Weſtmerland.

To theſe young Lords was Maſter Fox appointed Tutor, to inſtruct them both in Manners and Learning: In which charge he deceived not the expectation which the Dutcheſs, a Woman of great Wiſdom, had of him.

For the two Sons grew to that height of Proficiency in their Behaviour and Scholarſhip; that building in their riper years, upon this foundation, The elder Thomas ſeemed to deſerve more than the Kingdom could beſtow upon him; and the younger Henry came to that happineſs, that he was able to meaſure his Fortunes, not by the opinion of others, but by his own ſaciety.

The young Lady Jane, profited ſo wonderouſly in the Greek and Latine Tongues; that ſhe might well ſtand in competition with the moſt learned men of that time, for the praiſe of Elegancy in both kinds.

There he dwelt during thoſe golden days of Felicity (not ſeen long time before) in the laſt years of King Henries Reign, and through the five years Reign of King Edward the Sixth (a young Prince incomparably hopeful, and hope by perfecting the Work begun by his Father, paſſed all the Acts of his Predeceſſors) till the beginning of Queen Maries Sovereignty; who coming to the Crown, and turning the ſtream of Religion, all things again yielded to the Papiſts Authority; whence not long after, that cruel Tempeſt proceeded, the noiſe whereof hath come alſo to the ears of our Age; many who ſuffered in that common Shipwrack, ſwimming out to theſe peaceful times, as to ſafe Harbours of everlaſting Tranquility.

Among theſe Maſter Fox made one, at that time ſheltred by the Protection of the Duke his Sholar; yet not without the eyes of many, who for hatred, or envy looked askew on him, and ſecretly laid wait for, by Doctor Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who both ſaw ſomething in him, which he greatly feared, and alſo diſdained much, that the Heir of one of the chiefeſt Families in the Kingdom, and neareſt joyned to himſelf in Friendſhip, ſhould by his company be depraved.

Of this man becauſe he was Maſter Foxes greateſt enemy, it will not be from our purpoſe to ſpeak ſomething further; that both their natures may the better be known.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter was a man famous in his Youth (for of his Birth or Parentage, I have no certainty:) one that ſtood in the midway, between good and bad; and always as he grew elder, growing worſe. Induſtry, Wit, and Eloquence, Nature had beſtowed on him: his Pride, Craftineſs, and deſire of bearing Sway, he learned of the Cardinal.

Hence were his abilities fit for any Imployments, which he managed with exceeding diligence, to gain new Honours; and having obtained them, he then put on Boldneſs inſtead of Induſtry, Flattery for Obedience; and inſtead of Fidelity, Deceit and Complements, and ſuch like frivolous faſhions of the Court. He was in bearing thoſe Honours which his Vertue won to him cruel and proud: in regaining any that he loſt, able to weary any man with ſubmiſſion and humility. For in his Fortunes alſo appeared as great diverſity, as in his conditions. Some while he he was pleaſing to King Henry, and high in his favour; having by his Pen maintained the Kings Authority againſt the Pope: Afterwards, when his prevaricating therein was underſtood, he was by the King ſlighted, and that he might be the leſs able to do hurt, ſtript out of his Dignity. Under Edward the Sixth he was not only neglected, but impriſoned, and abid the reproach of a mean eſtate. At length in Queen Maries Reign he was ſet at liberty, and being again reſtored to his former Honors, he exerciſed not ſo much command as tyranny: till even ſick with envy, that Cardinal Pool in Dignity out-ſhined him, and with height of Honors overſhadowed his glory, having often, but ſtill in vain tried to cure his Malady with a Cardinalſhip, anger at length exaſperating his Diſeaſe, he pined away.

After this manner began, and ended that man, commended for many excellencies of mind, while he lead a private life; but in his Honors unbrideled, and of no moderation: Well might one ſay, Nature had made him a worthy man, and Fortune corrupted him.

Now Maſter Fox although he was cheriſhed in the boſome of a moſt loving Duke; yet after he ſaw all ſorts of men troubled for their Religions ſake, ſome impriſoned, and others burnt; in brief nothing on all ſides, but Flight, Slaughter, and Gibbets; and that the Biſhop of Wincheſter was the principle Incendiary of all this, who for private reſpects was already his enemy; he then began to fear what might become of him, and to think of ſome ſpeedy way for his departure thence. As ſoon as the Duke knew his intent, gently chiding his fearfulneſs, he uſed many words to perſwade him to leave all thought of going away; affirming it neither agreeable to honour or modeſty, for him to ſuffer his Tutor, ſo well deſerving at his hands, at any time of his life, to be taken from him: but that it ſhould then be done, was not beſeeming for him that deſired it. Let him but think with himſelf, how great a burthen of hatred his Scholar muſt needs bear, among thoſe who were ignorant, whether he forſook him of his own accord, or were forſaken by him: yet that he intreated not to be excuſed from any hatred, which might light upon him, if at leaſt he might do it with Maſter Foxes commodity: But in flying, what miſery would be wanting? Baniſhment, Poverty, Contempt, and among thoſe which knew him not, the reproach of a Runagate. That he acknowledged all this leſs evil than death; but that it was not yet come to ſuch extremity; neither would he ſuffer it ſhould: That he had yet Wealth, and Favour, and Friends, and the Fortune of his houſe: if the miſchance prevailed further, himſelf would partake of the danger, and make the deſtruction common: That he remembred, with what Precepts he had fortified his younger years; neither had he with more attention hearkened to his Inſtructions, than he would with conſtancy put them in practice; only let him be of good courage, and ſo avoid the violence of his enemies, as not to be weary of his Friends company: That this he ſpake, as hoping by his authority to prevail with him: but if that might not be obtained, he would then further him in the courſe he intended.

There was in the Dukes Speech the more credit, becauſe it was known to proceed from the inbred ſincerity of his heart, and a moſt tender good will towards him: and he grew now aſhamed, not ſo much of that he had done in asking leave, as that he had believed his requeſt might have been granted: But his modeſty excuſed him: His anſwer being, That the ſame care befitted not the Lord, and his Servant: That it was indeed for the Dukes Honor, to defend his Tutor from any injury; but his own part, to have a care, leſt for his ſafety, the Duke might incur apparent danger, or perpetual trouble: neither that his fear wanted all excuſe. For though he well knew the Duke could not be drawn from his promiſe and good intentions towards him; yet was he not ignorant, that by ſome wile or other, he might be circumvented and deceived.

For even at that time was the Biſhop of Wincheſter very intimate with the Duke, relying upon the ancient Obſervance he had always uſed to that Family, by whoſe credit he had increaſed his Dignity. Thither he often reſorted, to preſent his Service to the Duke; and at ſeveral times deſired of him, that he might ſee his old Tutor. At firſt the Duke denied his requeſt, one while alledging his abſence, another while that he was ill at eaſe; ſtill after fainting ſeveral delays, to put him off. At length it chanced, that Maſter Fox (not knowing the Biſhop was within the houſe) entred the room where the Duke and he were in diſcourſe; and ſeeing the Biſhop, with a ſhew of baſhfulneſs withdrew himſelf. The Biſhop asking who that was; the Duke anſwered, His Phyſitian, who was ſomewhat uncourtly, as being new come from the Univerſity. I like his counteance and aſpect very well replied the Biſhop, and when occaſion ſhall be, will make uſe of him. The Duke ſtraight underſtood that ſpeech, as the Meſſenger of ſome approaching danger; and now he himſelf thought it high time for Maſter Fox no longer to remain within the ſame City, or within the ſame See, againſt the force of a crafty, and then open deceiver; but by all means, the Biſhops being ſick, muſt be prevented. From that time he cauſed all things neceſſary for his flight, with the leaſt noiſe that might be, to be provided; ſending one of his Servants before to Ipſwich-Haven, to hire a Bark, and make ready all things needful for the Voyage: and becauſe it ſeemed ſcarce ſafe for Maſter Fox to ſtay in any City, or place of reſort, he choſe out the houſe of one of his Servants a Farmer, where he might with convenience expect the warning of a fair Wind to put to Sea. Thither Maſter Fox went as ſecretly as he could, taking his Wife as companion in his Travels, then great with child, but reſolved to go with him, nor yielding to the intreaty of thoſe, who perſwaded her to the contrary; and as ſoon as it was told him, his company expected him, he made haſt to the Port, and went abroad.

Scarce had they weighed Anchor, when ſuddenly a rough Wind riſing from the contrary ſhore, troubled the Sea with ſo great violence of Waves, that the ſtouteſt Mariners began to tremble: Then followed a dark night, with continual ſhowres, and a great multitude of Clouds gathered together into a thick ſtorm of rain and hail, both hindred the Sea-mens work, and took away all poſſibility by the Compaſs any longer to direct their courſe. That night with much ado, they lay at Anchor, and as ſoon as the day appeared when the Tempeſt ſeemed not like to ceaſe, they began to caſt about, and make back again to the ſhore: ſo that the Tide a little favouring them, at length with much difficulty they arrived in the evening at the ſame Haven again, from whence they had looſed the day before. In the mean while that Maſter Fox had been at Sea, a Purſevant from the Biſhop of Wincheſter had broke open the Farmers houſe with Warrant to apprehend him, whereſoever he might be found, and bring him back Priſoner to the City; but underſtanding he was gone already, after he had purſued him even to the Port, and there found that the Ship he was embarqued in, was yet ſcarce out of ſight, had returned back without his arrant. Maſter Fox, as ſoon as he came aſhore, hearing by report of the people what had paſſed, although the News ſomewhat amazed him, yet recollecting himſelf, preſently took horſe, and made as if he would have left the Town; but the ſame night returning, he bargained with the Maſter of the Ship to ſet ſail again with the firſt convenience of the Winds; telling him that ſo his buſineſs required, nor did he much care what ſhore he landed at; only deſiring him to go forward, and not doubt but that God would proſper ſo pious a Work. Whether for reward or pieties ſake, the Pilate took upon him this venturous task, and performed it accordingly. For looſing thence in the nights ſilence, as ſoon as the Tide turned, though the Sea were rough, and the weather bluſtring, within two days ſpace he landed Maſter Fox and his company in ſafety at Newport-Haven on the other ſide the Sea.

Whoſoever ſhall read this ſtory, needeth not a more evident argument, to force him to acknowledge, either the certain courſe of Providence, or the uncertainty of all humane forecaſt; when he may ſee the ſubtileſt deliberations of the wiſeſt heads, oftentimes by errors come to no effect; often overthrown by ſuddain accidents; and now and then thwarted by contrary Counſels: and that all this is done to teach men ſo to uſe their authority, as that the more power Fortune hath conferr'd upon them, ſo much the leſs they ſhould know they are able to do of themſelves, and not deſpiſe thoſe that are of meaner condition. For that God regardeth all men alike, having made them in nature equal, and differenced them by degrees, not to ſwell the one ſort, or ſhame the other, but to exerciſe both their modeſties, or his own Juſtice, if they neglect their duty.

Maſter Fox when he had ſpent ſome few days at Newport, in refreſhing himſelf and his company, went to Antwerp, and from thence by ſmall Journeys to Baſil.

This City was at that time much ſpoken of for the great friendſhip and courteſie ſhewed to thoſe of the Engliſh Nation: for which cauſe many famous men withdrawing themſelves from the cruelty of the Times, had eſcaped out of Ergland thither. Of theſe were many, but of ſlender eſtate, who ſome one way, and ſome another, but the moſt part maintained their Livelihood, by reviewing and correcting the eſcapes of the Preſs; this place for careful Printing, and plenty of diligent and wealthy men in that Profeſſion, then ſurpaſſing all the Cities of Germany; and preferring the induſtry of our men, in that Employment, before any of their own Countrymen.

To theſe men Maſter Fox joyned himſelf, ſo much the better liked of, becauſe having been always inured to hardineſs, and in his Youth put to the trial of his patience, he had learned how to indure labour; and that which ſeemed the greateſt miſery to others, to ſuffer want, to ſit up late, and keep hard diet; were to him but the ſports of Fortune. This (perhaps) may ſeem ſtrange to many, who remember Maſter Fox to have been all his life long but a ſlender bodied man, and in his elder years ſomewhat ſickly: But let no man compare his old age, worn out, and eaten up with cares, and even by the courſe of Nature ruinous, with the flouriſhing prime of his Youth; which by ſo many his works appeareth to have been moſt healthful: whether it be, that in thoſe of indifferent ſize, an upright ſhape of the Limbs and Members may ſufficiently ſerve for health: or that the mind enflamed with deſire of vertuous actions, being content with its own abilities to purſue thoſe things it affecteth, needeth the leſs help from the Body.

His Induſtry may be from hence abundantly teſtified, That being ſo full of employment at Baſil, there nevertheleſs he began to write his Hiſtory of the Acts and Monuments of the Church: a Work by the Title alone ſeeming beyond mans belief. At firſt it ſufficed only to mark it out, and to draw the firſt lines or rudiments, or as it were to faſten the Warp to the Loom: the whole body of the Hiſtory he added and interwove it, after he returned into his own Country. Firſt, he wrote it in Latine, and ſent the Copy to Baſil to be printed; where the Work is ſtill in great eſtimation, as alſo in divers other foreign Nations, among our own men hardly known, whilſt we ſeek after, and admire ſtrangers only; either through careleſsneſs, or envy neglecting our Country-men. Shortly after to gratifie the Unlearned, he wrote it in his Mother Tongue.

In the mean while the Reformed Religion began again to flouriſh in England, and the Papiſt Faction much to decline, by the death of Queen Mary; a Woman, while ſhe followed her own inclination, every way excellent, and well worthy ſo Royal Parentage; but while ſhe denied not any thing to ſome wicked Counſellors, getting this, that ſhe both wanted that praiſe ſhe had otherwiſe deſerved; and if ſhe be not ill ſpoken of, it may be accounted the modeſty of the ſucceeding Age, whoſe cuſtom it is either to commend, or at leaſt to tolerate all the actions of Princes.

I dare neither affirm, that Mr. Fox foreſaw this ſuddain change of the Publick Affairs; nor yet (which by no other I would do) will I take from him the teſtimony of the Reverend and famous Divine, Doctor Elmare, ſometimes Biſhop of London; who in preſence of many yet living, was wont to ſay, That he was himſelf at a Sermon, wherein Maſter Fox, among many things which he preached, to comfort the baniſhed Engliſh, did with confidence tell them, That now was the time come for their return into England, and that he brought them that News by Commandment from God. For which words he was then ſharply reproved by the graver Divines there preſent; but excuſed afterwards by the event; when by comparing of times it was found, that Queen Mary died but the day before Maſter Fox had thus preſaged.

The whole Chriſtian World ſtraight felt ſome benefit by this Change of the Engliſh Government.

The neighbouring-Nations, now disburdened of the exil'd Engliſhmen, rejoyced for the good Fortune of their Gueſts, as for their own. But at home what could be deviſed to aſſure their Safety, or relieve their Diſtreſſes, which they did not ſooner enjoy than preſume to hope for? They who had forſaken their Houſes, were now called home: They who had ſuffered Impriſonment, were now releaſed: They who by loſs of Goods were decayed, were now by Gifts repaired: They who had been thruſt from Places of Honour, were now reſtored to their former Dignities: The unjuſt Laws were in the mean while abrogated, and the wholſome Laws eſtabliſhed in their places: Their Minds were at quiet: Their Conſcience at liberty: All degrees at peace among themſelves, and every mans Goods without danger. For in ſuch ſort did Queen Elizabeth, even in the Infancy of Her Reign, diſpoſe the Affairs of the Commonwealth, that whatſoever the long and proſperous Government of other Princes, doth hardly produce in many years, at her very firſt Entrance, all at once brake forth, beyond the peoples wiſh, as if ſome Deity had diffuſed it ſelf, and poured forth Felicity upon the World. Of which incomparable, and ſince Mans creation, moſt glorious Queen, to have made mention upon any occaſion, and not from thence taken cauſe of ſome further digreſſion, let it be counted for a Capital Crime among all Writers of Hiſtory.

She was born of the Lady Anna Bolen, whom King Henry the Eighth, after his Divorce from his firſt Marriage, took to Wife. From her ſhe received, as a Princely Dowry, a true Zeal to Religion. As ſhe grew elder in years, ſo ſhe increaſed in Manners, Wit and Beauty, which as well make, as beſeem a Princeſs. So that both Nature ſeemed to have boaſted in her, the Maſterpiece, of her moſt abſolute Workmanſhip; and Fortune to have raiſed her, to as high a degree, as Hope could ever aſpire to.

It made her the more capable of ſo great a Fortune, that ſhe had firſt learned to obey; then to command, and ſo uſe that Honour firſt to others, which was ſhortly after to be uſed by others to her: having in a private life had experience of the hatred, fatal to the Succeſſors of great Empires, yet of a more noble ſpirit, than to return the like upon thoſe who were to ſucceed her. As ſoon as ſhe came to the Kingdom, her ſeveral Vertues appeared at once in their brighteſt luſtre; eſteeming all Vices, as well as all Men beneath her. Her mind therefore deſcended not to an overnice care of her Body. The Principles of her new Sovereignty were, to acquaint her ſelf with the publick Reaſons of State; To ſeek fit men to bear part of her Cares; To ſtrengthen all parts of the Kingdom, with faithful Miniſters; To know the Natures and Abilities of thoſe about her; and to ſearch into the Strength, Councils and Attempts of foreign Princes: But all theſe Qualities, if not well tempered, might have had (perhaps) no long continuance. Such therefore was her Gravity, as nothing more pleaſing: Such her Severity, as nothing more gentle; and ſuch her Frugality, as nothing more bountiful. Only ſhe knew no meaſure, in thoſe Excellencies, whoſe glory is founded, not in the even ballancing of differing Vertues; but as it were in the throng of illuſtrious Actions. So was the Nobility of her Birth, heaped with deſire of Glory: Her Religion (though moſt ſincere) ſeconded with Zeal to a holy Life; and her Beauty (though of it ſelf unparallel'd) enriched by a Reſolution of perpetual Chaſtity. But when all theſe Vertues brake forth into Actions: (good God) what days of Happineſs we then enjoyed? What ever more chearful, more ſecure or wealthy did England ſee, than that four and forty years of Peace? For never voluntarily did ſhe provoke any with War, and always preferred the juſtice of the Quarrel before the Victory: To the Iriſh-War, Honour, and ſhame to have loſt a Province, enforced her: To the French, Piety, and pity of her Neighbours danger: To the Spaniſh, her own Safety, and neceſſity comprehending in it ſelf the force of all other Cauſes, compelled her.

In the Progreſs of this War we heard of, and ſaw that which (perchance) never happened in any before. For other Nations, though they fought with never ſo mortal hatred each to other, yet were their Battels reſtrained to ſome certain Fields and Places; but this War was ſo ſcattered over all places, and managed with ſuch haughtineſs of Courage on both ſides, that through all Seas and Havens from Eaſt to Weſt, the Sun might ſtill behold the Engliſh and Spaniſh Navies fighting for their Lives, Honours or Eſtate. Never till then had that Sea, which was accuſtomed to no other command but ours, frothed with ſtrokes of foreign Oars. Nor would a large Volume contain the diſcourſe, if I ſhould relate the number and ſtateline ſs of Ships, the ſtrength of Sea and Land Forces, the multitude of Munition, Engins, Weapons, Guns, and proviſion of Victuals belonging to that Navy, which Philip the Second, King of Spain, with intention to raze out the Engliſh name, ſent hith r in the year of our Redemption, 1588. Let this ſuffice, That never was any preparation by Sea comparable to this Fleet, made by any the moſt powerful Princes or States to be ſhewed in all the Records of Antiquity: Yet that ſo huge and threatning Armada, ſwelling with ſelf-confidence, and a preſumed hope of Victory, was by the Fortune of this invincible Princeſs, even in a moment utterly defeated.

The Navies met together, for number and ſtrength unequal: but the manner of the fight was to the Spaniards diſadvantage, becauſe the Engliſh Veſſels being for bulk much leſs, and lower built afore, could with more eaſe caſt about for the Wind, and immediately having diſcharged, retire to open Sea; thereby deluding the ſluggiſh and unweildy Ships of their Enemies, and by levelling at the broad-ſides of the Spaniſh Gallions, beſtowing their ſhot with a more certain and ſucceſsful aim. To this, our Captains in the skill of Sea-fight, and knowledge of the Tides, far excelled the Spaniſh Commanders, who now taught by the former days experience, that they could no way, but in a ſet fight bear the Engliſh Encounters, calling their Anchors near Callice, there expected new Forces out of Flanders, and by the goodneſs of their Ordnance defended themſelves. This laid them open to the Engliſh for the Victory. For having filled ſome Ships with Tow, Pitch, Brimſtone, and all ſorts of materials ſuddenly combuſtible, and ſetting them on fire, with a favourable Tide, they drove them directly upon the Enemies; who were by this action ſo exceedingly terrified, that the whole Fleet, cutting their Cables as faſt as they could, betook themſelves headlong to flight. In which flight ſome of their Ships were burnt, ſome ſunk, ſome forced to run themſelves on ſhore, ſome ſplit upon the Rocks, and ſome for haſt falling foul on their Fellows, and ſo torn and bruiſed, were taken by our Souldiers. Thoſe that ſcaped beſt, not daring to go back the ſame way they came thither, with long travail both by Sea and Land, returned at length into Spain, by the Coaſts of Scotland, and the Iſlands of the Orcades, through thoſe Seas, which in no age had been ſailed on, but by ſuch as were very good at flying.

Where ſo great Vertues and Victories met together in one perſon, of neceſſity Envy would be an Attendant, followed by hatred and treacheries; which could not, by this moſt innocent Queen, be ſo avoided, but that her ſafety (upon whom the ſafety of almoſt all Nations in Europe depended) was through all her life daily indangered. Which maketh me the rather wonder, what rare Doctrine of our Adverſaries this may be, for pieties ſake which they pretend, perſecuting even vertue it ſelf, whereas (not only in no Heathen, but in none the moſt barbarous Nation, which doth at all acknowledge any Deity) it was never thought juſt to take revenge upon Vertue (which certainly cometh neareſt to the Nature of God) even in their Enemies: unleſs it be ſo that the indulgence of the Chriſtian Religion may be ſo far extended, that although we are commanded to forgive our Enemies, either they muſt not be vertuous, or they muſt not be forgiven. But evident enough it is, that in humane affairs, the deſires of men are often employed to one end, and the Will of God to another. By him was Queen Elizabeth protected always, from the Injuries and wicked Enterpriſes of her Enemies, and brought full of years to that Honour, as to carry with her that glory unſpotted to Heaven, which ſhe wan upon Earth, Envy now in vain barking at her after death, whoſe cauſe all Poſterity doth Patronage.

Now let us return to our Story.

Maſter Fox, when by his Friends he underſtood the happy News in England, That Queen Elizabeth reigned, and that the ſtate of Religion was ſure, and ſo like to continue, about the end of that year, in which this was in hand, came back to his Country: So much ſpace he had taken to bethink himſelf, leſt (if by any inconſtancy of the people, they ſhould grow weary of their preſent eſtate) he ſhould again be forced, to ſeek his Fortunes abroad: beſides (his Family being then increaſed with two Children) he was fain to ſtay, till money might from home be ſent him, to bear his charges in travelling. But before he could get from thence, he was informed that ſome hard Speeches had paſſed of him, as if through Pride he had delayed to come, thereby ſeeking a ſhorter and more ſpeedy way to preferment, as being due to him, when he ſhould be ſent for: This he knew to be a caſt of their cunning, who themſelves with all earneſtneſs ſtriving for Honours, feared Maſter Fox, as a man deſerving, and like (if he would) to be preferred before them. Yet he thought it not worth his labour, to make any excuſe for ſuch a Crime, as would of it ſelf come to nothing: but equally deſpiſing Injuries, and neglecting his own right, hid himſelf wholly in his Study.

As in our Bodies it is commonly ſeen, that thoſe men are more healthful, which uſe moderate diet and exerciſe, than thoſe which exceed in either: So I ſuppoſe doth the caſe ſtand with our Minds, that he, who if Fortune hath given him no rule, preſcribeth none to himſelf, can hardly perſiſt in the ſoundneſs of his duty; whereas he who uſeth modeſty in his Fortunes, is always more freſh and vigorous for any illuſtrious undertakings. For Maſter Fox, being being for his Abilities famous and ſupported (as I before ſhewed) with the Friendſhip of great Perſonages, might with eaſe have attained to whatſoever his deſires had inclined him: but affecting neither Riches nor Authority, the wiſhes of happy men, (though his deſerts were equal with any) yet was he well contented to keep the conſcience of well-doing to himſelf, and that Rewards ſhould remain in the Poſſeſſion of others. This I neither admit, as wholly to his Commendation; nor yet find fault with, as many have done: Let us at leaſt favour good men ſo far, as to allow Vertue, to chooſe what degree of Fortune it liſteth to ſhine in; or if we will needs reſtrain it within certain limits, let us do it to thoſe who are good with hope of reward; as for them who are ſo for no deſign, if their glory overwhelm us not, we ſhall not need to fear their multitude.

I ſhall write of a life, bearing continually true and ſolids fruits, but not ſuch whereon the Readers ſenſes may ſurfeit; where neither the rare ſtratagems of War or Peace ſhall be related, nor any ſuch diſcourſes as Writers uſe, when they intend to captivate the ears of the hearers. I am to ſpeak of a life paſſed over without noiſe, of modeſty at home and abroad, of continence, charity, contempt of the World, and thirſt after heavenly things; of unwearied labours, and all actions ſo performed as might be exemplary or beneficial to others.

I have ſhewed before, that Mr. Fox firſt applied himſelf to write the Hiſtory of the Church, whilſt he was at Baſil, and that the cauſe he did not there finiſh it, was, that he might afterwards uſe the Teſtimony of more Witneſſes. This Work, not a little, vexed the minds of the Papiſts. For well they ſaw that, in vain, they had ſpilt ſo much blood, and to no effect, been guilty of ſo great cruelty, if an account of theſe proceedings muſt be rendred to ſucceeding Ages: and that the Work it ſelf could not be taken out of mens hands, they well underſtood. There was therefore no other hope left, but by charging the Author with falſhood, and feigning ſome Cavils againſt him, ſo to leſſen his credit and authority; which whilſt Mr. Fox endeavoured to remove, and take away from himſelf, he could not avoid it, but muſt needs paſs much the lawful bounds of an Hiſtory, by a new heap of matters and teſtimonies. And let us but by this judge of the induſtry of our Author, that he not only gathered together ſo many ſeveral things, as the materials of his Work, from all diſtances of times or places, and through all Shires of the Kingdom, collected the Acts of both Courts, and the Records of matters judged, but alſo alone by a moſt diſtracted kind of diligence ſearched out, examined, freed even from motheating, and afterward reduced into convenient order thoſe things themſelves, being partly as it were ruſty, and eaten out by Antiquity, partly by hatred or flattery of Authors corrupted, and partly hid in the rugged and ſhort form of old writing. I find by the Authors own Notes, that in the eleventh year after he began to write it, the work was finiſhed; and very probable it is, that Work ſhall live, which was ſo long in bringing forth: Neither in all that time, uſed he the help of any Servant about his writing or other buſineſs: So much doth induſtry employed to one purpoſe, and gathered into it ſelf, afford more uſeful aſſiſtance, than being ſcattered, and the mind divided into many cares at once, though it hath never ſo many helping hands. I have often begun to conſider with my ſelf, of thoſe two ſorts of toylings, which men eſteem an Honour to undertake, which may be the more painful or more grievous, warfare or ſtudying. Many things ſeem to make for both ſides, but not in ſhew alike perſwaſive: For the miſeries of War being grievous, not only to thoſe who endure them, but even to thoſe that but hear them reported, as they give ſcope enough to the Relator, ſo they make no light impreſſion in the judgment of the ſenſe it ſelf: whereas the labour of ſtudying is chiefly conſiderable in the ſilent teſtimony of that, whereby life is maintained, and whereof only the Intellect can determine. Thus is the queſtion transferred to the Mind, and the Body, that of theſe two, that may be thought to have the better cauſe, whoſe evils do in greatneſs outweigh the others. I will neither take to my ſelf authority to decide ſo weighty a Controverſie; nor yet will I conceal what I know many wiſemen to have thought concerning that matter; which is this, That thoſe evils which happen to the Body, though they may be exceſſively raging and diſpleaſant, yet they uſe always to determine in one of theſe three, wearineſs, pain or death; whereof the two firſt are curable by time, and aſſwaged by remedies, and the laſt valiant men uſe alſo to deſpiſe. Now the mind when it is overſtrained, though it produceth in ſome ſort the ſame miſchiefs, yet it ſtoppeth not at wearineſs or pain, but rather proceedeth to the ruine of that whereon even the life of man dependeth. For that in the evils of the mind, he who is once tired, cannot by giving over his Work for a while, or abating ſome part of his diligence in labour, recover again his former ſtrength; nor overcome the diſcommodities he ſhall thereby endure, though with never ſo great abundance of other contentments. They do therefore conclude, that there is as much more miſery in this ſober, than in that glorious kind of warfare, as there is more danger in loſing an appetite to meat or drink, than in having the meat or drink it ſelf taken away; or to lie long ſick of a lingring Conſumption, than to endure the ſmarting of a wound for the preſent; in ſum, that in War, a man loſeth more of his pleaſures, but in eagerneſs of ſtudying, more of himſelf.

The truth of this was, by Mr. Foxes example confirmed, who when he had, for many years, left no time free from thought of his ſtudy, either not at all, or not ſeaſonably affording himſelf what Nature required, was at length brought to that paſs, that his natural livelineſs and vigour being ſpent; neither his Friends nor Kindred could by ſight remember him. By this means he firſt fell into that withered leanneſs of Body, in which many afterward ſaw him, never again returning to that pleaſing and chearful countenance which he had before; but when he would by no means be perſwaded to leſſen his accuſtomed Labours, or lay aſide his ſtudy, to recreate himſelf, the cauſe of his hurt not being removed, the ſigns thereof did likewiſe remain.

From this time Maſter Fox began to be much ſpoken of, for a good Hiſtorian; the other Vertues of his Mind, as they were leſs known abroad, ſo being by that which was known overſhadowed. Shortly after, he began alſo for other Endowments, to wax famous, not only as a man learned, but as one for his friendlineſs uſeful, and no leſs by art, than a natural inclination made to be helpful to others. But modeſty will not allow me, by way of Journal, to rehearſe the voluntary pains he took upon him: in general to ſay ſomething of it will not be amiſs; and how, either by good Advice, comfortable Perſwaſions, or a charitable Hand, he either relieved the wants, or ſatisfied the deſires of innumerable perſons; whereupon no mans houſe was in thoſe times thronged with more Clients than his. There repaired to him both Citizens and Strangers, Noblemen, and common people of all degrees, and almoſt all for the ſame cauſe; To ſeek ſome Salve for a wounded Conſcience. At length, ſome who were likewiſe ſick in Body, would needs be carried to him; but this, to ſtop rumours, he would not ſuffer to be uſed. For, becauſe they were brought thither, they were by ſome reported to be cured.

Thus ſpending the day at home in ſuch like Duties, frequently preaching abroad, and going to viſit thoſe, who were not able to come themſelves to him, he both fulfilled that, which by the courteſie of his own diſpoſition was injoyned him, and neglected not the performance of that duty, which the Office of his Miniſtery had impoſed upon him. That little time which his Friends, either called away by other occaſions, or aſhamed of being too tedious, had left free to his own diſpoſure, he beſtowed not in ſleeping, or taking his pleaſure, but in prayer and ſtudying; in both which, he always retired himſelf into ſome private place apart, or made uſe of the nights ſilence for ſecrecy, unleſs by chance ſometimes the vehement groans he mingled with his Prayers, being heard by ſome that were near the place, gave notice how earneſt he was in his Devotions. For at no time of the night could any man come to find his Labours ended; but often hath the next mornings light ſeen the laſt of his nights care diſpatched.

Now although theſe things be true, yet well I know there are many who will find fault, that I have ſo ſlightly paſſed them over; and demand, why I produce not the matters themſelves, as witneſſes of his actions, or at leaſtwiſe ſome particular example in each kind, that they may with more ſecurity give credit to the reſt. But many things there are which hinder me from ſo doing. Firſt, that common civility forbiddeth us, to publiſh abroad that, which the Conſcience of another hath committed to our ſecrecy; and a very ill example ſhould he give, who ſhould not rather by all means conceal, than make known to the World, the ſecrets of private Houſes, the jarrings of Friends, and ſuch privy ſlips in mens lives, whereof it may either aſhame, or repent them: Next, that the matters themſelves, which uſed in the greateſt privacy that might be, to be diſpatched, could by no means come to our knowledge; or if by ſuſpition ſomewhat were gathered, and that I ſhould inſtance in one or two Particulars; yet what great aſſurance in the reſt, could I draw from hence.

I will now bring the laſt Argument, I know not whither I ſhould ſay, of his Ability or Induſtry; that he, who ſo wholly had given himſelf to pleaſure his Friends, that he had ſet apart no time, for his other occaſions, yet wrote ſo much, as it might well have been believed, he had done nothing elſe.

I have here for their ſakes, who may deſire it, ſet down the Titles of thoſe Books he wrote; which are theſe, Comædiarum libri 2. Syllogiſticon. Admonitio ad Parliamentum. De lapſis per errorem in Eccleſiam reſtituendis. Oliva Evangelica. De Chriſto gratis juſtificante. De Chriſto Crucifixo. Papa confutatus. Contra Oſorium de Juſtitia. Meditationes ſupra Apocalypſim Rerum in Eccleſia geſtarum Commentarii. The Acts and Monuments of the Church.

We are now come ſo far, as to be able from hence, to give the Readers a full ſight at once, of the reſt of Maſter Foxes life; which ought (I ſuppoſe) in like manner to pleaſe them, as we ſee thoſe that travel, when they have been long tired with continual rugged ways and rough Foreſts, and come at length into the plain and Champion-Countries, are with the very change of ſoil not a little delighted and refreſhed.

In this (as it were) draught of his conditions, we ſhall firſt obſerve that which might well be thought the chiefeſt of his Vertues; to wit, a deliberate and reſolved contempt of all things, which are in greateſt eſteem among men, and eſpecially of Pleaſures: which mind of his, whether inbred by Nature, acquired by Diſcipline, or infuſed by God, did of neceſſity give him great ability to perform with commendation in whatſoever he liſted to take in hand; there being nothing which can miſlead the mind into errors, which would otherwiſe of it ſelf hold the right way, but what proceedeth from ſome pleaſure or other; lying in wait to entrap us in our journey. But ſo did Maſter Fox hold play with theſe Enemies, as one who deſired not to ſave himſelf by flying, or ſhelter himſelf in ſome ſecret place of retire; but by often skirmiſhing, and experience in the manner of fight, to encreaſe his own ſtrength, and give to others an example of fortitude; uſing to ſay, That they did no great matter, who forſook buſineſs and employments in the World, leſt they ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be allured and deceived by them. For, that the things were in themſelves innocent, and then firſt of all grew hurtful, when they were overvalued and purſued with avaritious deſire; which he that can beat back when it aſſaileth him, and ſtriveth to break in upon him, is deſervedly called temperate; but that he who was never in any temptation, may rather ſeem to have been good through want of occaſion to be otherwiſe, than by his own Vertue.

He

He never therefore declined the Friendſhip of Illuſtrious Perſonages; not to gain honour to himſelf, that thereby he ſaw his commendation would be more effectual, when he ſhould deſire favour on the behalf of others. The money, which ſometime rich men offered him, he accepted, returning it back to the Poor. He likewiſe frequented the Tables of his Friends, not for his pleaſure-ſake, being of a ſpare diet; but both in courteſie to keep them company, and leſt any ſhould imagine, he either feared, or fled from the wraſtling, and ſtriving with voluptuous Encounters, or that he thought himſelf, by being abſent, better defended againſt the pleaſures incident to eating and drinking, than by the guard of his own moderation. In a word, ſo did Mr. Fox behave himſelf in thoſe things which are followed by delights, that certain it is, none of thoſe who were always in his company, can remember any ſpeech or action of his, which might bewray the leaſt ſhew of a deſire to them; and ſo far was he from thirſting after Honour, Riches, Applauſe, or any outward good; that he would at no time ſuffer the care of his private Eſtate to enter his mind, much leſs that it ſhould by taking thought for his Houſhold-affairs, be overcome or drawn aſide: which either ſecurity of his, or as ſome called it, Slothfulneſs in his own Fortunes, I will hereafter declare whence it proceeded. In the mean time, whilſt I conſider the cauſe wherefore he thought all other things ſo much contemptible, eſpecially ſince that could not be imagined to ariſe from any obſtinate diſdainfulneſs, much leſs from a ſleepineſs or ſluggiſhneſs of mind; I aſſure my ſelf, it was only the love of God, wherewith his mind was ſo filled, and ſo much delighted, that he left no room, nor any affection free for other pleaſures, of his own accord ſeparating himſelf from the faſhions of the World, of which he was not otherwiſe incapable; and devoting himſelf wholly to this care, like one who had found an invaluable Treaſure, he bent his eyes and his mind upon this only, neither hoping nor expecting any thing beſides, but reſolved to make this the ſcope of all his wiſhes and deſires: Whereby (as in ſuch a caſe muſt needs happen) it ſo fell out, that they who obſerved his mind ſo ſtedfaſtly fixed upon God, and that he both ſpoke and did many things beyond the opinion of an ordinary good man, believed that he could not be void of ſome divine Inſpiration; and now ſome began, not as a good man to honour him, but as one ſent from Heaven, even to adore him, through the folly of mankind, madly doting upon any thing, whatſoever their own will hath ſet up to be worſhipped.

I will neither mince the truth of any ſtory, nor will I with additions flatter Report. Many things did Maſter Fox foretel, by occaſion of comforting the afflicted, or terrifying thoſe that were ſtubborn, to which the event proved after anſwerable, and (perchance) in many things he was deceived.

It hath been already related, with what conſtancy, whilſt he remained at Baſil among his baniſhed Country-men, he ſignified the times of their return. It is likewiſe well known, what Anſwer he gave concerning that noble and vertuous Woman, the Lady Anne Hennage, who lying ſick of a violent Feaver, when the Diſeaſe had ſo far increaſed, that the Phyſitians had pronounced it deadly, Maſter Fox was called to be preſent at her ending, whoſe counſel and fidelity ſhe had often made uſe of, in matters appertaining to her Souls health. After he had performed what he came for, in reading Prayers, and comforting the ſick Woman, with ſuch perſwaſions as ſeemed good to him; Well have you done (ſaid he) and according to your duty, to prepare your ſelf for all events; but know this from me, That of this ſickneſs you ſhall not die. By chance, among thoſe who ſtood by, was Sir Moyle Finch, a well known and honourable Knight, the Ladies Son in law, who either moved with ſo unuſual a Speech, or deſirous to get ſomewhat more out of him, as ſoon as Maſter Fox was a little withdrawn from the reſt of the company, began ſeemingly to chide with him; telling him, that he could not but marvel what his intent was, that contrary to the opinion of the Artiſts, he being an unskilful man, ſhould preſume to determine the end of the Diſeaſe, and by ſo doing bring the ſick Woman, by condition of her Sex, wavering, yet hitherto undiſmayed, to an impatience of dying, by giving her this hope and expectation of life: if his Mother in law might be likely to live, that no man had more cauſe of joy than himſelf; but if her death were indeed at hand, it befitted no man leſs to diſſemble it, than he, who ought to provide for the good of her Soul: that he did therefore, for the friendſhip he bare him, much fear, leſt, by that untimely word, he had loſt a great part of the good opinion which men had formerly of his truth and modeſty. To this Maſter Fox, ſmiling, made anſwer, That for his part he hindred not any man to think of him as he pleaſed; but concerning the ſick Lady, it had ſo ſeemed good unto God, that ſhe ſhould recover of that Diſeaſe; and that he had ſaid no more than was commanded him. The Lady recovered: nor can I in this tell an untruth, there being many yet living, who could reprove me.

Like to this, and no leſs true was that ſtory of Miſtriſs Honiwood, an honourable Gentlewoman, who had almoſt twenty years lain ſick of a Conſumption through Melancholy, neither did any one ſeem to have advice or courage ſufficient againſt the force of ſo miſchievous a Diſeaſe, though ſhe had already conſulted with the graveſt Divines, and the beſt Phyſitians, and with all, who either in the art of curing, or power of perſwading were accounted to excel the reſt. At length ſhe ſent alſo for Mr. Fox. They who went along with him thither related afterward, that never had they entred into a more heavy or afflicted houſe. There ſate by the ſick Woman to attend her, her Friends, Kinsfolk, Children and Servants, ſome upon Seats, and ſome on the Chamber-floor, not weeping or ſighing, as thoſe commonly do that lament, but having ſpent all their tears, reſolutely ſilent, neither riſing to thoſe that came in, nor anſwering thoſe who asked any queſtion, as if that alſo became their mourning; you might have gueſt them ſo many many ſtatues of Mourners in humane likeneſs. The ſick Woman lay upon her Bed, without any hope of life, together with her frequent ſighs, faintly breathing forth ſome few words, the effect whereof was, That ſhe deſired to end her days. Maſter Fox when he had ſo many Patients under his hands at once, not thinking fit, where a grief ſo violent would make ſtrong reſiſtance, to attempt any thing in vain, leſt, in not being by reaſon overcome, they might ſeem to have had reaſon on their ſides, left all other means of conſolation, and what he thought neceſſary to cure their afflicted minds, he diligently mingled with his Prayers; ſo that within a few days, they who were thought impoſſible, by mans help to be cured, did now ſeem, of their own accord, to begin to recover. At length, having farther endeared himſelf, he then told her, That ſhe ſhould not only grow well of that Conſumption, but alſo live to an exceeding great age. At which words the ſick Gentlewoman a little moved, and earneſtly beholding Maſter Fox: As well might you have ſaid (quoth ſhe) that if I ſhould throw this Glaſs againſt the Wall, I might believe it would not break to pieces; and holding a Glaſs in her hand, out of which ſhe had newly drunk, ſhe threw it forth; neither did the Glaſs, firſt by chance lighting on a little Cheſt ſtanding by the Bed-ſide, and afterward falling upon the ground, either break or crack in any place about it: And the event fell out accordingly. For the Gentlewoman, being then threeſcore years of age, lived afterward for all example of ſenſcity, ſeldom ſeen in the Off-ſpring of any Family, being able, before the 90 year of her age, (for ſhe lived longer) to reckon three hundred and threeſcore of her Childrens* Children and Grandchildren.

* Among which at this day, to wit, in the year of our Lord, 1641. In which this Book is ſet forth, there liveth Mrs. Horace Hennage, the Daughter of the ſaid Miſtriſs Honnard, a Gentlewoman of great worth, and the Widow of an honourable Gentleman, Maſter Michael Hennage, who affirmeth, that ſhe was preſent at the ſame time this was done, being a witneſs of more Integrity, and more ſincere than thather Teſtimony ſhould without great wrong be doubted of.

I could here relate many ſtories of like nature, but they, for the moſt part, being dead, who might juſtifie the Particulars, I will not intreat to be believed, where I cannot bring proof enough to deſerve it. That which followeth is more commonly known, than that it ſhould need to be confirmed by Witneſſes.

Maſter Fox went one day, in duty, as his cuſtom was, to ſee the Earl of Arundel, Son to the Duke of Norfolk, and Father to this Right Honourable Earl now living. The Earl, in his courteſie, when he was going away, brought him to the Water-ſide, at the lower end of his Garden; but obſerving the River very rough by the ſuddain riſing of the Winds, he counſelled Maſter Fox not to truſt himſelf in ſo boiſterous a Tempeſt upon the Waters: But he continuing in his reſolution of going; So my Lord (quoth he) let theſe waters deal with me, as I have in truth and ſincerity delivered to you all that I have ſpoken: and with that entring into the Boat, before they could put off from the Bridge, the Wind ceaſed, and the River began to run with a ſmoother ſtream.

Being often asked by his familiar Friends, why he had no more regard to the ſtraightneſs of his own Eſtate, it being the firſt precept of Charity to begin at home; his anſwer was, That God by his Covenant had the charge of his affairs, who well knew both what was fit for him, and when to beſtow it; and ſince he had never yet failed him, when could he begin to doubt of him, without manifeſt ingratitude?

Theſe and ſuch like things, although by all men much wondred at, yet dare I not preſume to affirm, what that was in all theſe actions, which did principally tend to Maſter Foxes commendation: whether it be, that the mind by how much the purer and more ſublime it is, ſeeth ſo much the farther: or whether there be ſome hidden cauſe, why God may be pleaſed ſometimes to declare his purpoſes, by men, not ſpeaking out of their own knowledge, but as they are moved.

We muſt make haſte now to other matters, in which there was nothing that ſo much wan to Maſter Fox the love of people, as the pity he uſually ſhewed to all ſorts of men in diſtreſs; and ſome you may find, who affirm, that Maſter Fox, not only gave away to the poor his Money, but his Cloaths and Houſhold-ſtuff alſo, without his Wives privity; which modeſty forbiddeth me to maintain for truth. For ſince I know well enough, that many things, concerning the reſt of his behaviour, have been either feigned, or amplified by the affections of men, I ought not a little to ſuſpect, leſt in this they have done the like. True it is, that Maſter Fox gave largely to the Poor, and therein exceeded the meaſure of his own ſubſtance, but that his bounty ever proceeded to the diſfurniſhing of his houſe, I neither have any Author worth the credit, who avoucheth it; nor is it likely that he ſhould deſcend to ſuch extream courſes, who by the liberality of others that ſupplied him with money to that purpoſe, wanted not ſufficient means to ſhew his Charity.

All theſe Vertues of his were fenced about, as with a Bulwark, by a ſingular modeſty and integrity of life; which ſuffered not any thing either to enter into his manners, or to break forth in his actions, but what was firſt with much diligence ſearched into and examined, whether it might beſeem him or not; which alſo having always before him, if at any time (by the condition of mans frailty) ought within began to be ſhaken, yet was proviſion quickly made, before the matter proceeded to any great breach in his manners, by forſaking all commerce with any kind of Vices, againſt which the ſhame to do evil, and the regard he had to his own credit, kept a continual watch and ward.

Yet for all this there want not ſome, who accuſe Maſter Fox of Injuſtice, in the higheſt degree; which injury, becauſe many are intereſſed in, I ſhall further inquire into.

Maſter Fox in that part of his Hiſtory, wherein he deſcribeth the lamentable Troubles in the five years Reign of Queen Mary, hath by name mentioned not only the Authors of thoſe Executions, but alſo many, who were but Miniſters and Aſſiſtants, among whom were ſome perſons of great note. This, ſome of their Poſterity complain to have been done unjuſtly by

Maſter

Maſter Fox, and that the fatal neceſſity of thoſe times, their modeſty in obeying, or the publick Offices impoſed upon them, ought not to be a ſcandal to them, or their Poſterity. Now though I might juſtly anſwer theſe men, that the ſame excuſe of neceſſity, which they alledge for their Anceſtors, ought to ſuffice on Maſter Foxes behalf, ſince he could no way leave the Miniſters nameleſs, but he ſhould leave his Adverſaries occaſion of cavilling at his ſtory: yet willingly would I give them further ſatisfaction, than they can in juſtice challenge; deſiring, that what hath been done might poſſibly have been done otherwiſe, and intreating them, not to ſuppoſe that done with a thought of hurting, which was only the Fortune of thoſe who were hurt; in the mean while (notwithſtanding) I adviſe them, that they joyn not their grief, with the anger of thoſe men, who are offended with Maſter Fox for a far different cauſe, and under colour of the perſons, ſtrike at a matter of another condition; there being two ſorts of men, who in this reſpect complain they are injured, the one out of Nature, the other out of Faction. To the firſt, as their due, I willingly grant all benefit that courteſie can afford them. Though they are angry, they are ſtill Subjects, and in their Obedience: neither would I make ſo light of the grief, though unjuſtly taken by any good Subject, as not rather to loſe a part of my right, than that he ſhould relinquiſh any part of his Loyalty. To the laſt, I have ſomewhat elſe to ſay, as to men, who had the Fortune to fall out firſt with their Country, and to have that as the true and principal Cauſe of their hatred: than to grow angry with Maſter Fox, whom they hate not, but for their Countries ſake. To theſe men I am ſo far from thinking any ſatisfaction due, as that I cannot afford them the favour of reaſoning with them, which is granted even to Enemies. For the ſafety of civil entercourſe, and all hope of reconcilement they have taken away, and broken all ties of humane ſociety: And what can I hope he ſhould ever after do, either like an underſtanding man, or like a man at all, who could forſake his duty to his Country? which alone ſo draweth into it ſelf the power and right of all duties, that according as any man ſheweth more or leſs love towards it, ſo may the moſt infallible judgment be given, how he ſtandeth affected towards God. But if they ſay, their Country hath failed in its duty: Firſt, that will be a queſtion, whether it hath failed or not and how far it hath failed; but it is without all Controverſie their duty to let paſs any diſcontent for their Countries ſake: Next, how bold a face muſt he have, who being himſelf a party to an Action, of which God only can determine, ſhould preſume to make himſelf his own Judge, and (not content to have ſet at nought that Authority, which amongſt men is moſt weighty) neither grant to his Country ſpace of appealing, nor awaite the Judgment of Almighty God, but as if he had already won the day, ſeize all things before hand by foul and ſtubborn attempts, and rather gratifie an Enemy with his diſloyalty, than perform his duty to his Country ſo well, deſerving it? So that if it ſhould happen at any time, that this famous Kingdom (which is not impoſſible in this ſtate of humane weakneſs) ſhould err in any part of duty towards God, yet might moſt dangerous examples of treachery be given, if when any man ſhall have a deſire to his Countries deſtruction, he may by excuſe of his Countries Crime, not only ſeem to have quitted himſelf of ſo hainous a fault, but alſo to have done what his duty required.

This I have ſpoken of the more largely, becauſe I underſtand that many of our own Party think fit, that ſome Anſwer ſhould be made to the Papiſts, concerning the evil Speeches they have uſed againſt Maſter Fox. To ſatisfie whoſe deſire in a few words, let us firſt ſee what thoſe evil Speeches are: That he is a lying Author: It is therefore a lye, that Maſter Rogers, Archbiſhop Cranmer, Biſhop Hooper, Biſhop Ridley, Biſhop Latimer, and other moſt holy and innocent men of the ſame train were burned for their Religion. But if this, even by their own confeſſion, be true, what (I marvel) may thoſe matters be, by whoſe falſhood the reſt of the whole work hath incurred the infamous Title of a lye, as they do make their Followers believe? Some things they alledge miſtaken in the names or number of ſuch as ſuffer, or in the time of their ſuffering, which were either recalled in the following Editions, or by the Author ſo well defended, that as long as he lived no man exclaimed any more. Somethings they likewiſe urge in the Hiſtory of former Ages, contradicted by the Hiſtoriographers themſelves, which they might eaſily do, in ſo great contention of differing Opinions, that whatſoever Author a man ſhould follow, he muſt ſtill fall into the ſame inconvenience. Yet all they can ſay is of ſuch a nature, as neither we much care if it were true, nor they if it be falſe. But let us (if you will) grant them ſomewhat, and be liberal of Maſter Fox his right: If I ſhall take quite out of the Hiſtory, all that they have ſaid to be falſe, will they then promiſe me to ſuffer their Followers with freedom to read the reſt? They will no more yield to this condition, than they will be contented to be quiet: What ſhall a man do to ſuch men, as are never ſatisfied, whether you grant that they plead for, or deny it them? And how great a frowardneſs it were to expect from any Author, that in the whole courſe of ſo long a ſtory, whilſt one man doth with his own only labours handle ſo many ſeveral matters, he ſhould never ſo much as miſtake any thing? As well might they tax that moſt accompliſhed Writer Julius Cæſar with telling a lye, if where he deſcribeth our Iſle of Great Britain, he ſhould by chance in the circuit of any Iſland, or paſſage from one place to another, differ by a few miles from later accompt, who (indeed) wrote the Hiſtory of his Wars and Expeditions, with that truth he ought to do, but in the reſt followed the common report, and believed the Relations of others, not willing to be over curious in things of no great importance.

And thus much it ſeemed good to me to anſwer, rather out of the opinion of ſome of our own ſide, than that my ſelf thought it neceſſary: But if our Adverſaries themſelves require a further Anſwer, I will deal with them upon other terms; Let them firſt return to their Obedience, dience, make ſatisfaction to their Country, and then proſecute their private diſpleaſures, when they are clear of all publick Offences: But if they will needs run on ſtill in this heat, and after they have neither any hope nor credit left, think to frighten us with railing, I ſhall (for my part) be well content to let them gain as much commendation for their good pleading, as they have reaped fruit in that courſe of life they have heretofore uſed; and to allow them this double glory, neither in evil-doing, nor in evil-ſpeaking to have any Fellows: If this condition ſeemeth over hard, yet (at leaſt) let them equal the dignity of that Hiſtory they ſo much carp at. Let them be Authors of equal credit. So would the fight be more honourable, if they might with as much damage to themſelves be overcome, as they ſhould with advantage get the Victory. If otherwiſe it be their deſire to purchaſe to themſelves ſome blaſt of fame, by cavilling at this laſting Work, in their Pamphlets and under-hand Invectives, not ſuch as the judgments of underſtanding men, but the fancies of ſome eaſier Women; is there any man ſo ſenſeleſs, as by oppoſing them, to make thoſe Writings of longer continuance, which would, by being contemned, in a ſhort time be quite forgotten?

Now further, that they may underſtand how much their ill Language hath made more for Maſter Fox his honour than reproach; I will ſpeak a word or two of his moderation towards them. I could produce Letters of his, wherein he perſwadeth the Lords and others, who then held the places of chiefeſt Authority, not to ſuffer Edmund Campian, and his fellow Conſpirators to be put to death, nor to let that cuſtom continue longer in the Kingdom, that death rather than ſome other puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on the Papiſt Offendors. And leſt he might ſeem only out of the goodneſs of his Nature, and not out of the judgment of his mind to have ſo ſpoken, he there endeavoureth to prove by many reaſons, how much it was to the weakning of the cauſe, rather to follow the example of their Adverſaries, in appointing puniſhments, than their own mildneſs; and that they much rather ought to ſtrive, as well in mercy and clemency to overcome them, as they had already in the juſtice of their cauſe got the upper hand. This he repeated often, adventuring, even till he was in danger of giving offence by his importunity to intreat for them. Whereas on the other ſide the Lords gave him to underſtand; That this was a matter of State, not of Controverſie; That the Kings life, the publick Liberty, and the aſſurance of the Kindgom reſted on this Point; That Subjects ought by their own peril to be warned, how they grow too prodigal of their Countries bleſſings; That ſuch was the eſtate of the Kingdom, as that nothing could be more glorious, or more ſecure, if the Subjects, only would conſent, to keep their abilities to their Countries uſe, nor had it further failed of that felicity, than it had been hindred by the revolts and conſpiracies of our own men. Yet for all this did Maſter Fox continue in his opinion, and though he could by intreaty gain nothing, yet would he with many ſighs teſtifie his ſorrow, as often as he heard, that any of them were put to death.

And thus having ſeen his moderations to the perſons, it will not be out of the way to add in general what he thought of the Churches of Rome, and the Biſhop thereof, as far as they may be gathered out of his Speeches, when being of ripe years, he had ſtrengthened his judgment with much experience.

The Heads of his Opinions were theſe:

That among the Chriſtian-Churches, the Roman had been in dignity always chiefeſt, and of moſt Antiquity. That it retained this dignity and opinion many Ages after, by little and little growing to greater Authority, not by conſent of people, or by any right to that Claim, but by reaſon of a certain inclination and cuſtom among men, that where any chance far to excel others, they firſt begin to be powerful among the reſt, and at length to exerciſe command over them. That the greateſt Honour and Authority it had, was among theſe Weſtern Kingdoms, which, as every one moſt affected the Chriſtian Religion, ſo were they by the diligence and piety of the Romans moſt aſſiſted, in which reſpect it had not ill deſerved to be called the Mother of thoſe Churches. That the occaſion of ſo great an increaſe was, that the City of Rome being of ſo ancient Renown, and as it were by deſtiny appointed Monarch of the World, in all Ages abounding with men of great courage and vertue, being well peopled, wealthy, uſefully ſeated, and always under the Emperors ſight, eaſily afforded this convenience. That at the firſt the Chriſtians could no where meet together with leſs trouble, more plentifully be provided for, more ſafely be concealed, or, when need was, die with more conſtancy; all which made Poſterity ſo much to admire and honour them. That the Church at firſt flouriſhed rather in good Diſcipline, and the approved holineſs of the Profeſſors, than in abundance of riches, there being yet no looſeneſs, no pride or ambition found in the manners of the Clergy, and Money, Servants, Lands, Jewels, and ſuch like goods, altogether unknown to them; in fine, all things ſo reſtrained, either by modeſty in uſing what they had, or contentedneſs in wanting what they had not, as that in Rome only, ſeemed to be the Seat of Chriſtian Religion. That all this was with moſt ſtrictneſs obſerved in the times neareſt to the Churches Infancy; but in proceſs of time, by little and little began to be neglected and corrupted, after the ſame manner as Rivers, whoſe ſtreams near their head being ſmalleſt and cleareſt, the farther they proceed, run in a larger Channel, but with more troubled waters; till at length, by mixture with the Sea, they grow alſo unwholſome; and though in no one place, we can perceive where they are, any jot changed from their firſt purity; yet may we eaſily enough find a great difference, if we compare the extreams together. For that in the Church it ſo fell out, that having brought all Nations to the Chriſtian Faith, after they once began to think it for the Honour of the Empire, that the Prieſts ſhould no longer (as they had formerly accuſtomed) endure Poverty, but live in a more plentiful way, to which purpoſe the Emperors granted many things to the Church-men, both as an Ornament and Reward to them; then alſo the Prieſts began, firſt to be taken with the love of Riches, then by degrees to grow wanton through abundance, and not care how little pains they took, after (as always the ſucceeding Age addeth to the Vices of the former) they affected Power alſo, which when they had once obtained, and by the Emperors Gift, received the Command of the Church, they gave not over, till (having caſt down the Emperors, by whoſe bounty they had ſo prevailed) they both invaded the Priviledges of the Empire, and now laid Claim to both Spiritual and Temporal Government; in the mean while neglecting thoſe Rules of Religion which their Predeceſſors had preſcribed them, neither themſelves much ſearching the Scriptures, nor permitting others to do it; and eſteeming the Worſhip of God to conſiſt rather in outward Devotion, and Pomp of Ceremonies, than in the Obedience of Faith. That by this means it ſo came to paſs, that the Church of Rome (as all other immoderate Empires) not only fell from that high degree it once held, but alſo ſubverted in it ſelf the very ſubſtance and ſtate of a Church: nor that this ought to ſeem ſtrange, if as the moſt healthful Bodies fall into ſickneſs with moſt danger, ſo it befalleth, that the prime of all Churches ſhould have no mean, but either remain in the perfection of health, or become the moſt dangerous Enemy to it; and that for this cauſe the Pope now ſeemed to be Antichriſt. That notwithſtanding the caſe was ſo plain, yet neither part ought to lend too much belief to Arguments, nor be too earneſt in hindering it, if by any moderation of men the matter might be brought to ſoundneſs and agreement. That it was not (perchance) in our Power to take from Rome her ancient Honour, and the opinion of her Religion ſo fixed already in the minds of men. That the Church of Rome had fallen by her own covetouſneſs, ambition, and prevarication; but that never any man had gone ſo far in ſinning, as that Repentance had not pierced as far. That therefore it were fit to allow them, as a returning to Repentance, ſo ſome convenient means to move them to it, and ſufficient ſpace to repent in. That it might be the Author diſliked them, becauſe a German or French man, and not an Italian of their own Nation had told them of their Errors. That there might one day among their own men be found ſome, by whoſe Authority they ſhould not be aſhamed to amend their faults, and with more willingneſs part with their own power, to procure the peace of the whole World. That there was at leaſt this hope left, it might ſo fall out, that they had no further erred in the Articles of Faith, than that they would not ſuffer too much to be known. That the conditions of agreement would be, firſt, That the Pope ſhould forſake all thoſe Tenents, by which he gained ſo great ſums of money; there being nothing, whereto the people might with more difficulty be perſwaded, than that Chriſt, the Saviour of the World, had inſtructed his Church in the ways of money, and ſetting Scriptures to ſale. Next that he ſhould renounce all Secular Juriſdiction, and not ſuppoſe himſelf to have Title, or any thing to do with the right of Princes. That on the other ſide his Oppoſers ſhould not refuſe, that ſome one man may have the principal place of Counſel and Government in the Church-affairs, as being a thing which would have many conveniences in it, when it might be done with ſecurity; neither that the Roman-Church had once fallen, ought to make againſt it, nor that it had firſt flouriſhed, to prevail for it, herein to be preferred before any other, but that all this was to be left to the diſcretion of a General-Council of the Chriſtians, which might be ſo equitable, as that neither the Power or Favour of any one ſhould be able, either from the place of meeting, or the difference in number of Voices to promiſe it ſelf any advantage to the injury of the reſt. That in the mean while it would be of great moment to the hope and ſpeedineſs of ſetling all Controverſies, if hereafter on both ſides they would give ſuch Inſtructions, as might cauſe in each Party a better hope and opinion of the other, eſpecially that they ought to leave off that ſtubborn conceit, whereby each of them, preſuming it ſelf to be the only true Church, ſuppoſeth the other excluded. For that it were not only wicked, but alſo highly to the diſhonour of God, to think that he had ſo given his Commandments to Mankind, as that they ſhould be turned to the deſtruction of thoſe that obey them; which muſt of neceſſity come to paſs, if when all men will not conſent in the ſame opinion, they who underſtand moſt ſhall refuſe to admit of the reſt; Was therefore the Kingdom of Heaven reſerved only for the more underſtanding ſort, and thoſe that know moſt? Where ſhould then the Fools of the World be; where ſhould little Children be, whom Chriſt had ſet apart for himſelf? How much better ſhould we ſerve God, by following that which was evident, than by interpreting that which was doubtful? How much more probable were it, that Gods mercy was ſo abundant, as when men were once agreed in point of general Obedience, there ſhould nothing elſe be laid to their charge? For, that the force of Obedience was before God ſo great, as thereby only all other inequalities might be made even; but if all were not in equal condition, that certainly with God they were beſt eſteemed, who judged with moſt modeſty of others.

From Maſter Fox his Enemies, I will now paſs to his Friends, among which I have already ſhewed, with how great affection he was beloved by the Duke of Norfolk, being by his bounty maintained in his life, and after his death, by the Penſion he beſtowed on him, which his Son, the Right Honourable Earl of Suffolk, to whom thoſe Revenews deſcended, out of his liberality, confirmed.

His Fortunes were encreaſed by the Lord William Cecill, then Lord Treaſurer, a man beyond expreſſion excellent, whom it as much availed Queen Elizabeth, to have for her Miniſter, as it availed the Kingdom, to have Elizabeth for their Queen; and without doubt moſt deſerving, that in himſelf, and his Poſterity, he ſhould flouriſh in that Kingdom, which he had by his wiſdom and advice made moſt flouriſhing. He of the Queens Gift obtained for Mr. Fox the Rectory of Shipton, upon no other inducement but his publick Deſert, and when Mr. Fox delayed, and after his manner entreated leave to excuſe himſelf, the Lord Cecill politickly overcame his bathfulneſs, by telling him, That he neither accepted that for an anſwer, nor had he deſerved that the blame of Mr. Foxes refuſing the Queens Gift, ſhould be laid upon him, as if he had been his hindrance.

To the Earls of Bedford and of Warwick, he was very acceptable, and approved by them for the likeneſs of his inclination.

He

He was very intimate with Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary of State, a prudent and vigilant man, and one who deſervedly was the firſt that advanced the Power of the Secretariſhip.

The two Brethren, Sir Thomas Hennage and Maſter Michael Hennage, he entirely affected, the firſt for the ſweetneſs of his Behaviour, the other for his ſolid Learning and ſingular modeſty of Life, and though they were each of them in their kind moſt accompliſhed Gentlemen, yet was he wont to ſay, that Sir Thomas Hennage had as much as was requiſite any way to a compleat Courtier, but that Maſter Michael Hennage had both all his Brother in himſelf, and that beſides of his own, which the Court had not corrupted.

To Sir Drue Drury he bare (likewiſe) ſingular affection, as to a man of ſincere intentions, and of great conſtancy in all Fortunes and (perchance) the only man in the Court, who continued his favour without loſs of his Freedom.

Among the Prelates he principally reverenced Doctor Grindal Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Doctor Elmar Biſhop of London, Doctor Pilkington Biſhop of Durham, and Doctor Nowell Dean of Pauls, who were his Partners in baniſhment at Baſil.

Among the Writers of his time, he preferred before the reſt, Doctor Humphrey, Doctor Whitetaker, and Doctor Fulk, with whoſe Learning he was wondrouſly delighted, and eſteemed it no ſmall benefit to be again beloved by them.

But with none had he more familiar acquaintance, than with Maſter John Crowly, and Maſter Baldwine Collins, whoſe counſel he made uſe of in all his affairs, eſpecially of Maſter Collins, concerning whom he was wont to ſay, That he knew not which had greateſt ſhare in him, excellence of knowledge, or modeſty of mind.

Among military men, Sir Francis Drake was much delighted with his Familiarity; whom to commend near the times, he lived in, were needleſs, but to commend him to Poſterity, according to his deſert, many Volumes would ſcarce ſuffice.

Among the Citizens of London, he always found great good will; eſpecially with Sir Thomas Greſham, Sir Thomas Roe, Alderman Bacchus, Maſter Smith, Maſter Dale, and Maſter Sherington, who had him in great account and eſtimation, being part of them ſuch as had born the higheſt places of Honour in the City, and part of them Merchants of great ſubſtance.

I paſs by many, who (perhance) had as great ſhare in Maſter Fox his Friendſhip, as any of theſe; nor ought it to be accounted a fault, if I either knew not, or remembred not at all: But this I ought not to ſlip, (as being the chiefeſt cauſe why I thought fit to mention the forenamed worthy men) That theſe were they, from whom, I before ſaid, Maſter Fox received ſuch large ſums of money to divide among the poor: which although they did with ſo much privacy, as that they truſted not to Meſſengers in delivering it, not regarding any outward praiſe, their well doing might procure them, knowing the conſcience thereof to be as much as they needed to deſire; Yet was it not fitting for me in Maſter Fox his Hiſtory to diſſemble it, or to give any man occaſion to ſuppoſe the truth not opened by Maſter Fox, though they themſelves thought good to neglect the fruit of ſo great Liberality, eſpeciall ſince it may abundantly ſerve for commendation of both him and them, that they ſhould be known by their own actions, and he by none but his own.

He uſed always among his Friends a pleaſant kind of familiarity, wherewith he ſeaſoned the gravity and ſeverity of his other behaviour.

Being once asked at a Friends Table, what Diſh he deſired to be ſet up to him, to begin his meal with, he anſwered, the laſt; which word was pleaſantly taken, as if he had meant ſome choicer Diſh, ſuch as uſually are brought for the ſecond Courſe; whereas he rather ſignified the deſire he had to ſee dinner ended, that he might depart home.

Going abroad (by chance) he met a Woman that he knew, who pulling a Book from under her arm, and ſaying, See you not that I am going to a Sermon; Maſter Fox replied, But if you will be ruled by me, go home rather, for to day you will do but little good at Church; and when ſhe asked, At what time therefore he would counſel her to go; Then (anſwered he) when you tell no body before hand.

It happened at his own Table, that a Gentleman there ſpake ſomewhat too freely againſt the Earl of Leiceſter, which when Maſter Fox heard, he commanded a Bowl filled with Wine to be brought him, which being done: This Bowl (quoth he) was given me by the Earl of Leiceſter, ſo ſtopping the Gentleman in his intemperate Speeches without reprehending him.

When a young man, a little too forward, had in preſence of many, ſaid, That he could conceive no reaſon, in the reading of the old Authors, why men ſhould ſo greatly admire them. No marvel indeed, (quoth Maſter Fox) For if you could conceive the reaſon, you would then admire them your ſelf.

I could ſpeak of many ſtories of this kind, but that I will not exceed my intended limits too far.

At length having in ſuch actions, and ſuch behaviour ſpent out his Age, being now full of years, and ſtored with Friends, ere he had quite paſſed through his ſeventieth year, he died, not through any known Diſeaſe, but through much Age. Yet did he foreſee the time of his departure, nor would ſuffer his Sons (which notwithſtanding he entirely loved) to be preſent at his death, but forbad the one at any hand to be ſent for, and ſent the other on a Journey three days before he died, then calling both of them unto him, when he well knew, though they made never ſo great haſte, they ſhould come too late; whether he thought them unable to bear ſo heavy a Spectacle, or would not have his own mind at that time troubled with any thing that might move him to deſire life. Which to me and my Brother was the moſt grievous of all chances, that thereby we could neither come to cloſe his eyes, to receive his laſt Bleſſing and Exhortations, nor ſatisfie our minds with that laſt ſight of him. Perchance we could with more patience have endured to ſee the fainting approaches of his death drawing on, than to have loſt in him ſo good an example how to die.

Upon the report of his death the whole City lamented, honouring the ſmall Funeral which was made for him, with the concourſe of a great multitude of people, and in no other faſhion of mourning, than as if among ſo many, each man had buried his own Father, or his own Brother.

AD LECTOREM.

COntendentibus a me multis, idque ſæpenumero, ut Patris mei vitam, ante triginta annos a me conſcriptam poſteritati donarem; cum nulla nova res acciderit, propter quam (vel me tacente) judicio poſterorum de clariſſimo viro diffiderem; multa autem me nunc neceſſaria huic inſtituto deficerent, exceſſu eorum, in quorum teſtimonio fides rerum continebatur: non dubitavi quin & prioris recuſationis meæ veniam apud cunctos conſequi, & ſi in recuſando perſeverarem, hujus quoque libertatis jus tenere facile potuiſſem. Sed cum viderem homines alienos, & conſuetudinis ejus prorſus ignaros, hoc ſuum negotium feciſſe, ut de vita ejus ſcriberent; de qua nihil niſi per vagas, & fortuitas auditiones doceri potuerunt; eoque fieri, ut multa de eo ſupra quam facta ſunt, extulerint; multa ſecus quam facta ſunt narrarint; plurima ignoratione præterierint; qui adoleſcens ſupremis ejus vitæ temporibus perpetuus interfui, & cum abeſſem propiores cauſas cognoſcendi quicquid attentius geſſiſſet ſemper habui; adductus ſum officio, ut memoriam ejus illæſam eſſe vellem; & ſi luce eam donare non poſſem, at eam in vero, & ſuo lumine collocarem. Neque veritus ſum, ut hoc factum meum legentibus probare poſſim, quod filius Patris mei vitam compoſuerim, exemplo propter propinquitatem ſuſpecto: Nam primum celari poſteros memorabilem virum, nec injuria eorum qui perperam de eo ſcripſerunt finebat: defendi autem eum aliter quam ab ſuis, tutum non erat: neque eſt, cur in filio magis ſuſpecta ſit fides ſua, quam in iis qui nullam de eo memoriam extare volunt vis doloris, & iracundiæ ſuæ. Hactenus ſuſtinui, donec æquato periculo offenſionis inter infenſos, & cupidos, vicit tandem ratio parendi eis, qui hoc meum ſtudium, etiam cum expoſtulatione, flagitabant; quorum importunitate conſenſi in opus emittendum, initio non alio deſtinatum, quam ut imaginem Paternæ conſuetudinis apud me ſervarem, & nunc, in tanta hominis fama, aliorum magis opinione, quam judicio meo neceſſarium.

JOhannes Foxius Boſtona antiquo oppido conventus Lincolnienſis ortus, Anno 1517. utroque genere plebeio, ſed honeſto inter ſuos, & copioſo fuit: Patrem parvulus admodum amiſit: cujus morte poſtquam mater denupſerat, in domum vitrici conceſſit; ibique puritiam exegit; qua vix dum egreſſus, probatiſque ſuis ob bonitatem, vigoremque indolis, Oxonium ad artes capeſſendas miſſus eſt. Prima literarum elementa in Collegio Aenei naſi hauſit, datus in contubernium Alexandro Noello, ſummo poſtea hujus civitatis viro, & Decano Paulinæ Eccleſiæ; ut non mirum ſit, quorum educatio par, idemque pueritiæ cultus fuit, inter eos ſimilitudinem quoque morum ad extremam ſenectam duraviſſe. Egregium, acremque ad ſtudia animum incendit locus, ferax æmulationum, & exactor profectus ſui in ſingulis; aderatque induſtria, quæ raro excellentibus ingeniis comes, ubi ea quoque adjumitur, tum demum efficaciſſima eſt: Ob quas dotes cum intra breve tempus admirationem ſui apud cunctos, charitatem apud plurimos peperiſſet, eruditionis, morumque nomine, delectus eſt in numerum ſodalium Magdalenenſium, qui honor inter præcipuos Academiæ habitus, & Alumnis Collegii debitus, paucis externis, nec niſi in præmium ſingularis virtutis concedi ſolet. Apparet prima exuberantis ingenii Germina Poetices ſtudioſe profudiſſe: Extant Comœdiæ ab ipſo conſcriptæ, ſtilo uberi, & ornato, ſed Paulo tumentiore, quod vitium Orationis, & ſi ætas, & experientia multum mitigavit, cum ipſo tamen magna ex parte conſenuit, cum in aliis rebus eſſet ſedatiſſimus: Sed & tum ſpecimen dedit, quem in virum evaſurus eſſet; cum illi ipſi luſus effervescentis adoleſcentiæ, non niſi Argumentis ſacræ Hiſtoriæ inſtruerentur: matureque coercuit. Neq; vero conſtat cujus rei potiſſimum impulſu Londinum ſe poſtea tranſtulit; niſi ſuſpicari libeat illectum loci opportunitate id feciſſe; utpote qui incolarum, convenarumq; omnis generis abundantiſſimus facultatem ſummam præſtabat, ſive occultare ſe mallet, ſive ingenium ſuum proferre, & apud ſimiles ſui noteſcere. Supputatione temporis facta, exiſtimaverim præcipuam ei cauſam adeundi urbem fuiſſe, quod Religionis res tum demum recreari parumper, & revalceſcre iterum apud urbem præſertim cœperunt. Paucis enim annis prius venit, quam Henricus Rex humanis exceſſit. Is, uti dictum eſt, quam diu vires & ætatis robur ſuppetebant, ſciſſum in ſtudia regnum ita tamen moderabatur, ut modo æquata partium potentia, modo prævaleſcente altera, utramq; in officio authoritate ſua contineret. Sed poſtquam jam ſenior factus minui indies valetudinem, & finem imminere intellexit; reputans ſecum quid in partibus fidum ſibi maxime, quid ſuſpectum eſſet, quaq; ætate filium nondum habilem Regno, & innutritum contrariis diſciplinis flagrantibus Pontificiorum odiis committeret; flexit ad id conſilium, quod ratio ſaluberrimum, exitus fœliciſſimum comprobavit: dejectiſq; de dignitate & de Adminiſtratione Pontificiis, eos filio tutores Teſtamento dedit, quorum voluntatem erga ſe ſemper promptiſſimam fuiſſe perſpexit, eandemque ſucceſſori manſuram, multa fidelitatis experientia judicavit. Ea res Religioni ſalutem attulit. Verum ut ſalus eorum qui Religionem ſectabantur magis in ſecuro conſtituta eſt; nondum tamen quicquam publici emolumenti, utilitatiſque ad ipſos pervenit: unde Foxio eadem egeſtas quæ antea fuit; conſumpto quicquid vel neceſſariis ipſius erogaverant, vel ipſe quotidiana induſtria quæſiverat. Rem miram, & Divinæ miſerationis documento inſignem ſuperſederem referre; niſi modeſtiam ſilentii fama rei celebris fruſtra faceret. Sedebat quodam die Foxius in Æde Paulina, inedia longa victus, vultuque, & oculis in ſupremam morientium torvitatem excavatis. Cæteris autem vitantibus tam deformem aſpectum; acceſſit ad eum homo quidam facie incognitus; qui poſtquam juxta aſſediſſet, familiariterq; ſalutaſſet, prehenſa ejus dextera incertæ pecuniæ ſummam illi in manum inſeruit; jubens bonum animum haberet, & ſubjiciens: non quidem ſe ſcire quantus infortunii modus eſſet quo conflictaretur, verum ſuſpicari debere haud levem eſſe: proinde non gravaretur id abs ſe populari ſuo munuſculi accipere, quod vel communis humanitatis ratio expreſſerat iret, refocillaret animum & vivendi cauſas reciperet: interim ſciret haud multorum dierum intervallo adeſſe ſpes novas, & ſubſidia vitæ certiora. Quis ille mortalium fuerit, cujus opportuna liberalitate ultima illa neceſſitas depulſa ſit, reſciri poſtea nunquam potuit, quamvis multum admitente Foxio ut detegeretur. Crediderat qui vaticinii exitum altius attendebant, hunc non ſuo, ſed aliorum ſtudio miſſum, qui Foxium omnino ſalvum eſſe cupiebant: nam quod extrema prius adierit, quam ſubventum ipſi eſſet, in eo fortaſſe miniſtri negligentia erratum. Certe eo triduo nondum exacto, præſagii fides impleri viſa eſt; miſſis ad eum ab Duciſſa Richmondenſi qui ſub honeſtiſſimis conditionibus eum in familiam ſuam perlicerent. Acciderat per eos dies ut Dux Norfolcius, is quem inclytum Militia & Imperatoriis artibus celeberrimum illa ætas vidit, unaque cum eo filius, Comes Surriæ, vir in quantum dici poteſt rectiſſimæ mentis, acerrimiq; ingenii, incertum quibus criminibus, in cuſtodiam Arci Londinenſi traderentur. Dum hi in vinculis erant, liberi Comitis apud amitam præfatam Ducifſam educabantur, Thomas qui in Ducatu ſucceſſit, Henricus poſtea Comes Northamptonæ, & Jana poſtea Comitiſſa Weſtmerlandiæ. Horum puericiæ Foxius admotus eſt, ut & mores eorum regeret & literas doceret. In quo munere prudentiſſimæ fœminæ de ſe judicium minimè fefellit. Nam Thomas & Henricus eos morum, & ſcientiæ profectus fecerunt, quibus ſubſtructa eorum grandior ætas, illum ad id opinionis extulit, ut plus meruiſſe quam regnum ei conferre poſſet videretur: hunc ad id fælicitatis, ut conſtet modum fortunæ ſuæ eum non in hominum judicio, ſed in ſatietate ſua habuiſſe: & Jana græcis latiniſque literis in miraculum exculta, doctiſſimis illius temporis viris de utraq; eleganti concertavit. Interim pertranſierunt tempora illa non alias viſæ fœlicitatis, ab ſupremis Henrici annis, per quinquennium Edvardi ſexti, (incomparabilis ſpei juvenis, & perfecto patris opere omnium Regum opera prætervecti,) ad initia principatus Reginæ Mariæ: qua rerum potita, converſoque Religionis ſtatu, cuncta rurſus Pontificiorum potentiæ ceſſerunt: unde non multo poſt atrox illa tempeſtas inhorruit, cujus fragorem noſtra etiam ætas ſenſit, multis eorum qui illud naufragium perpeſſi ſunt, ad hanc pacem & in æternum duraturæ tranquillitatis ſtationem enatantibus: In quibus Foxius noſter fuit, tum fide, & authoritate Ducis diſcipuli ſui incolumis, ſed obliquis in eum odio, atq; invidia multorum oculis, & clam Gardineri Epiſcopi Wintonienſis inſidiis petitus; utpote qui notum hominis ingenium metuebat, pariterq; indignabatur, conſuetudine ejus ſobolem principis in Regno familiæ, ſibique conjunctiſſimæ depravari. De quo viro, quoniam Foxio inimiciſſimus fuit, altius repetere nos abs re fuerit, ut utriuſque ingenium noſcatur. Erat Wintonienſis (nam de initiis ejus nihil habeo compertum) adoleſcentia clarus, vir inter bonas, malaſque artes medius, eo ſemper deterior, quo provectior. Induſtriam, indolem, eloquentiam, ab Natura acceperat: ſuperbiam, vafritiem & appetitum potentiæ in domo Cardinalitia didicerat. Hinc ingenium erat negotiorum mire capax, eaque impigre pro parandis honoribus adminiſtrabat: Eos adeptus pro induſtria audaciam, pro obſequio adulationem, pro fide fucum, & formulas, cæteraq; Aulæ inania induit. Idem in gerendis honoribus quos virtute paraverat atrox, & ſuperbus: in recuperandis quos amiſerat, uſq; ad tædium, humilis, & demiſſus fuit. Nam ut morum ita fortunæ quoq; varietatem ſenſit. Aliquamdiu Regi ſuo Henrico gratus, & in animo ejus validus fuit: cujus nimirum authoritatem contra Papam ſcripto defenſaverat: poſtea cognita prævaricatione neglectus, & quo minor nocendi facultas eſſet dignitate exutus eſt. Sub Edvardo ſexto vincula etiam & extremæ ſortis opprobrium pertulit. Tandem regnante Maria exolutus iterum, reddituſq; dignitati non potentiam amplius, ſed rabiem exercuit, donec invidia prænitentis in Polo Cardinalitii fulgoris æger, cujus faſtigio obumbrari gloriam ſuam videbat, fruſtraque, & ſæpe tentato Cardinalatus remedio, iracundia aſperante ægritudinem contabuit. Eumq; ad modum cæpit & finivit ille vir, dum privatum ageret ob multa bona animi laudatus, in magiſtratibus impotens, & immodicus, ut diceres Naturam illum egregium virum feciſſe, Fortunam corrupiſſe. At Foxius quamquam in ſinu optimi Ducis fovebatur poſtquam tamen omnis generis homines ob Religionem vexari animadvertit alios vinciri, cremari alios, undiq; fugam, cædes, patibula, & præcipuam ejus incendii facem Wintonienſem eſſe, ſibi privatis de cauſis infenſum, vehementer vereri rebus ſuis cæpit, & conſilia fugæ agitare. Id ubi Norfolcius reſcivit increpita clementer Foxii formidine, cum eo multis egit ut abeundi cogitationes deponeret: affirmans neq; dignitatis, neq; verecundiæ ſuæ eſſe, ſinere divelli abs ſe ullo vitæ ſuæ tempore præceptorem de ſe optime meritum: id vero eo præſertim tempore fieri, neq; ipſi qui petebat decorum fore: Reputaret ſecum quanta invidiæ molæ oneratum alumnum ſuum relinqueret apud neſcios utrum relinqueret, an relinqueretur. Demonſtratum paulò ante eſt,* Foxium dum Baſileæ eſſet Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ ſcribendæ mentem adjeciſſe; quod ultimam manum non impoſuerat cauſam fuiſſe, quo teſtatius aliquando ſcribere poſſet. Id opus Pontificiorum animos varie anxit. Fruſtra enim tantum ab ſe effuſum ſanguinis, fruſtra ſuſceptam tantæ crudelitatis conſcientiam videbant, ſi horum omnium reddenda poſteris ratio eſſet. Et opus ipſum ex hominum manibus tolli non poſſe intelligebant. Relinquebatur ſi falſitatis coargui, & conflictis ad id calumniis extenuari fides ejus, atque authoritas poſſet. Quibus amoliendis, depellendiſque ab ſe dum Foxius annititur, evitari non potuit, quin ex tot rerum, teſtimoniorumq; novo aggeſtu, legitimum Hiſtoriæ limitem multum exſcenderet. Indeque æſtimetur diligentia noſtri ſcriptoris, qua non modo tot res ceu materiem operis ſui, ex omni temporum, locorumque diſtantia comportaverit, & utriuſque fori acta, tabulaſque rerum judicatarum per omnes Regni Juriſdictiones congeſſerit, ſed etiam eas ipſas res partim vetuſtate tanquam rubigine adroſas, partim eorum qui ſcripſerunt odio vel aſſentatione depravatas, partim in informi truncaque veterum ſcriptura latentes, ipſe ſolus, diſtractiſſimo conatus genere, primum eruerit, examinarit, ab ſitu vindicarit, deinde in convenientem ſtructuram redegerit. Undecimo quam ſcribi cæptum eſt anno finitum opus fuiſſe ex commentariis authoris reperio, ut credibile ſit victurum opus, cujus tam prolixa fœtura fuit. Quo tamen tempore, neq; ipſe Amanuenſis unquam opera ad ſcribendum, neq; ſervi ad alia vitæ miniſteria uſus eſt. Tanto plus in ſe efficacis ſubſidii induſtria habet uni tantum rei inſerviens, & in ſe unam collecta, quam extra ſe licet multis adminiculantibus, ſi modo ipſe in plura divideris.

Sæpe apud animum meum inſtitui inquirere, ex duobus ærumnæ generibus, quæ maxime ſubire homines dignitatis ſuæ eſſe arbitrantur, quodnam uſu gravius, atq; aſperius reperiatur, militiæne, an ſtudiorum. Pro utroq; multa facere videntur, ſed non utraq; juxta in ſpeciem valida. Nam bellandi incommodo non modo iis qui ea præferunt, ſed audientibus etiam gravia, ut liberum narrandi egreſſum, ita pronum in ipſius ſenſus æſtimatione patrocinium habent. Contra meditandi labor, & exercitatio tantummodo in principiorum vitæ tacitis ſuffragiis vim ſuam retinet, quorum judex intellectus eſt. Ita quæſtio ad animum corpuſq; transfertur, ut ex his duobus, cujus mala alterius malis magnitudine præponderant, id potiorem cauſam habere exiſtimetur. Mihi neq; definiendæ tantæ litis arbitrium adſumitur, neq; tamen reticebo quid ſapientes viros de ea re ſenſiſſe intelligo. Id ita ſe habet. Quæ enim corpori contingunt, etſi ea ſæva & acerba vehementer eſſe poſſint, eorum tamen extremum ſemper conſuevisſe eſſe, vel defatigationem, vel dolorem, vel deniq; mortem, quorum illa altera ad tempus ſunt, & remediis cedunt; hanc viri fortes etiam contemnere ſolent. Jam animus ubi intenditur, etſi paria his genere mala infert, non tamen ultimum illud habet, ut homo defatigetur, vel doleat, ſed potius illud quod cum eorum unde homo exiſtit ruina conjungitur. In his enim malis fieri, ut neq; vacationibus, remiſſionibuſq; laborum fatigatus denuo inſtauretur, neq; ex copia commodi incommodum arceatur. Ita concludunt, quanto pernicioſius eſſe, appetentiam ſomni, cibique, quam ſomnum ipſum, cibumve auferri; & ex tabe, quam ex vulnere decumbere, tanto plus miſeriarum in hoc ſobrio, quam in illo luculento militiæ genere ineſſe: in altero nimirum plus voluptatis, in altero plus hominis homini ademptum eſſe.

Confirmavit rem ita esse Foxius, qui cum per tot annos nullum omnino tempus ab cogitationibus scribendi vacuum feciſſet, plurimumque ſibi in iis quæ naturæ debentur vel denegaviſſet, vel intempeſtive conceſſiſſet, eo ſe tandem redegerat, ut conſumpto quod corpori inerat naturaliter floridi, ſuccu-lentique, non ab amicis, non ab propinquis noſci potuerit. Hoc enim initio cæpit primum in eam cor-poris maciem areſcere, qua multi eum fuiſſe viderunt: neque rediit unquam priſtini vultus decor, aut flos, ſed manentibus noxæ cauſis, cum nullo modo dimittendam ſibi conſuetudinem ſuam, aut laxan-dum ab curis animum putaret, etiam indicium noxæ permanſit. Multus igitur dehinc Foxius in re hominum fuit Hiſtorici nomine: Nam reliqua quæ animum ejus incolebant bona, ut minus nota in vul-gus, ita notorum magnitudine obterebantur. Mox aliis quoq; artibus cæpit clareſcere: neq; modo lite-ris bonus videri, ſed & officiis commodus, & ad juvandum alios non minus arte, quam naturali qua-dam anxietate comparatus. Sed inſtituta induſtriæ ejus per modum Diariorum componere vetat mo-deſtia operis: per genera noſci non indecens erit, ut ille conſolando, conſilio, nunu infinitorum hominum, aut inopiam ſublevarit, aut deſideria implerit. Hinc nullius domus conſulentium cætibus; frequentior ea tempeſtate quam Foxii *fuit. Adiere eum cives, pariter atq; Advenæ; illuſtres, atq; plebei; etiam infimæ conditionis homines. Una fere omnibus adeundi cauſa; conſcientiæ vulnera: His medela quærebatur. Tandem ægri quoq; corpore portari cæpti. Id fieri vetuit ut rumoribus occurreret, quia duci, etiam ſanari dicebantur. Cum autem per talia officia domi diem eximeret, tum foris etiam frequentiſſime prædicando, adeundoq; eos ab quibus ipſe adiri non poterat, & quod humanitatis ſuæ erat implevit, & quod paſtoris munus erat non intermiſit. Reliquum tempus quod ſibi amicorum, vel digreſ-ſus, vel pudor fecit, non amœnitati, aut ſomno, ſed vel orationi, vel ſtudiis addixit, & utriſque ſecre-tum adhibuit loci, vel noctis, niſi qua erumpentes pectore gemitus ex propinquo auditi orantis impetum prodebant: Nam nocturnæ curæ finem nemo unquam; lux nova ſæpè deprehendit. Cum hæc ita ſint, ſcio tamen futurum, ut multi hæc à me tanquam nimis aridè decurſa reprehendant, poſtulentq; res ipſas, teſtes officiorum protluci, aut ſaltem in unoquoq; genere ſingulare aliquod factum proferri quo fides de reliquis ſecurior ſit. Id vero ne facere poſſem multis prohibeor. Primum quod conſcientiæ depoſita efferri in vulgus vel ipſa humanitatis ratio vetat: peſsimoq; exemplo fecerit, qui arcana domuum, neceſſariorum controverſias, clandeſtinos hominum lapſus, cujuſque quemq; in vita vel pudet, vel pœni-tet, non omni modo celanda potius, quam enarranda exiſtimet. Deinde quod hæc ipſæ res, quæ ſecre-tiſſimis colloquiis tranſigi conſueverunt ad noſtram cognitionem pervenire nullo pacto potuerunt, aut ſiquæ ſuſpicionibus emanarunt, unumq; aut alterum tale exemplum prodatur, at quota id pars diſſolvendæ fidei fuerit? Jam ultimum illud induſtriæne, an ingenii dicam argumentum proferatur? Hunc virum qui ſe adeo totum amicorum uſibus condonaſſet, ut nihil ſibi ad eam curam reliqui faceret, ſic tamen interim ſcripſiſſe tanquam nihil aliud facere videretur. Perventum jam eſt ad id, unde ſimul in totam reliquam Foxii vitam proſpectus datur. Id vero legentibus (opinor) pergratum accidere debet, perinde atq; in itinere hominibus uſuvenire videmus, ut qui ſe multum locis aſperis, ſaltuoſiſq; fatigaverint, ii poſtquam campos, & planitiem aperuerint, ipſa variantis ſoli ſpecie reſici, & tanquam renovari videantur. In hoc veluti tractu morum occurrit primum quod facile primum in virtutibus Foxii fuit: Omnium ſcilicet rerum quæ hominibus maxime in pretio ſunt, voluptatumq; imprimis deliberata contemptio. Quod illi ſive ab Natura ingenitum, ſive ab diſciplina hauſtum, ſive divinitùs datum, neceſſe fuit, ut magnam ei facultatem afferret, præ-clare quicquid vellet faciendi: cum nihil ſit quod animum per ſe recta iturum in prava detorqueat quin id ab aliqua voluptatum tanquam inſidiatore, ſpeculatoreq; itineris noſtri proficiſcatur. Cum hoc tamen hoſte rem ſic habuit Foxius, ut qui non fuga aut latebra incolumis eſſe vellet; ſed qui potius cuperet uſu congrediendi, & notitia certaminum, tum robur ſibi augeri, tum aliis exemplum reſiſ-tendi dari: ſolituſq; eſt dicere, nihil eos magnum facere, qui res, & negotia eo fine deſererent, ne capi ſe, aut deliniri ab iis paterentur: Res enim ipſas natura innocentes eſſe: nocere tum incipere, cum nimiùm æſtimentur, cupianturq; quam cupiditatem qui irrumpentem, inferentemq; ſe propellere poſſet, eum merito temperantem eſſe; qui in nullo unquam periculo fuerit, cum non tam propria virtute quam occaſionis defectu bonum videri. Itaq; neque ille illuſtres amicitias unquam recuſavit: non quo ſibi honori eſſent, ſed quod in iis magnum uſum commendationis ſuæ, quoties aliquem ab ſe adjutum vellet ſore intellexit. Pecunias ab divitibus oblatas accepit, ſed quas in pauperes refunderet. Etiam convivia amicorum multoties celebravit: non animi cauſa, cum cibi parciſſimus eſſet: Intereſſe voluit, cum urbanitatis cauſa, tum ne quis exiſtimaret ſe luctam, & certamen voluptarii congreſſus reformi-dare, vel refugere, aut adverſus epularem laſciviam abſentiæ, quam moderationis ſuæ præſidio muniti-orem ſibi videri. Breviter dicam: In his rebus ad quas voluptas conſequitur Foxium ſic eſſe verſatum, ut conſtet neminem eorum qui una ſemper adfuimus meminiſſe poſſe ejus vel vocis, vel facti, quo ille, vel leviſſimam cupiditatem prodiderit: adeoque non honoris, non pecuniæ, non laudis, aut cujuſpiam externi boni aut avidum, aut appetentem fuiſſe, ut ne rei quidem familiaris curam intrare animum ejus ullo tempore, nedum vinci eum aut abduci domeſticis cogitationibus pateretur. Quam ego ejus ſive ſecuritatem, ſive, ut alii appellarunt, in propriis fortunis ſocordiam, unde profecta ſit, alio loco demon-ſtrabo.

Interim, dum mecum cauſas conſidero, propter quas ille vir reliquia omnia tantopere ſpernenda cen-ſeret, cum præſertim id neque ab parva ambitione, multoque minùs ab ſomno, aut torpore animi profectum exiſtimari poſſit; compertum habeo: unum amorem divinum fuiſſe, quo perfuſus, atque impletus animus ejus, non locum non effectum ad reliquas voluptates relinqueret, ultroq; ipſe ſe ſeculo

Is dicti novitate permotus, ſive ſtudio plura eliciendi, digreſſum paullulum ab turba* Foxium ficto jurgio adoritur: Mirari ſe dicens, qua mente feciſſet, ut contra quam res, & periti artis judicabant, imperitus ipſe, de ægritudinis fine ſtatuendum putaret, eoq; facto mulierem, ſexu ipſo mobilem, adhuc tamen interritam, ad impatientiam moriendi, ſpe, atq; expectatione vitæ converteret: ſi inter vivos referri ſocrus ſua poſſet, nullius lætitiæ juſtiores eſſe cauſas quam ſuæ, ſin moriendum illi ſit, nulli minus convenire, id diſſimulare, quam ei qui in animam conſuleret. Vehementer igitur ſe pro amicitia vereri, ne ille magnam partem opinionis, quam de fide, atq; modeſtia ejus homines habebant eo intempeſtive dicto deperdidiſſet. Ad quæ renidens Foxius reſpondit: per ſe non ſtare quo minus quiſq; quod ei collibitum eſſet, de ſe ſentiret: ſed de ægra ſic viſum Deo, ut eo morbo non extingueretur: idq; ſe demandato dicere. Placuit tandem Foxium quoq; acciri. Qui una ierant retulerunt ſe mœſtiorem illa, afflictioremque domum nunquam introiviſſe. Aſſidebant quotidie per officium ægræ familiares, propinqui, liberi, ſervi, pars ſedilibus affixa, pars humi fuſa, non flentes, gementeſque, quod vulgo fit; ſed conſumptis lacrymis, contumaci ſilentio: ſub ſpecie humana tot ſimulachra mœrentium diceres; itaque non aſſurgere venientibus, non interrogati reſpondere, tanquam id quoque luctum deceret: Ipſa ægra, projecta ſpe vitæ jacebat in lectulo, inter denſa ſuſpiria, obſcurum quid pectore expromens, cujus ſumma erat, quod exolui ſe cuperet. Cum tantum ægrorum præ manibus Foxius haberet, neque contra violentiſſimum doloris renixum quicquam fruſtra tentari placeret; ne rationem quoque habere viderentur qui ratione victi non eſſent, reliqua omnia demulcendi doloris remedia dimiſit: ſi quid ad ſanandas eorum mentes pertinebat, id precibus diligenter immiſcuit. Ita conſuetudine paucorum dierum effecit, ut qui humana ope ſanari ſe poſſe diffiderent ultro ſaneſcere viderentur: Cum tandem charior factus pronunciaret coram plurimis, futurum, non modo, ut ægra ex ea tabe convaleſceret, ſed ut quam extenſiſſimam in ſenectam vita ejus protolleretur: Quo Sermone audito, ægra paullùm excitata, & Foxium *acriter intuita: Qua eadem inquit ratione, ſi ego vitrum hoc in parietem adegero, confidam fore, ut non frangatur: Tenebat autem in manu ciathum vitreum, ex quo biberat, projecitque: neque vas caſu impactum primo in ciſtellam lecto attiguam, & poſtea ſolo illapſum, ulla ex parte comminutum eſt. ter, in eaque re ſuarum ipſe virium modum egreſſus eſt: ſed neque quod ad diſſipationem domus ſuæ liberalitas ejus unquam progreſſa eſt, ullum dignum authorem habeo: neq; convenit, qua ipſe aliorum liberalitate adjutus eſt, qui pecuniam illi Eleemoſynæ nomine copioſiſſime ſubminiſtrabant, illum ad tam extraordinaria ſubſidia dilapſum. Quas omnes virtutes tanquam vallo clauſit inſignis vitæ modeſtia, atque integritas, ut nihil alienum in mores ingredi, nihil foras in facta prodire poſſet, niſi ſumma diligentia excuſſum, examinatumque an deceret. Cujus etiam objectu, ſi quid intus, per humanæ imbecillitatis ſortem, vacillare contingeret; ne tamen id in magnum morum detrimentum abiret providebatur, ſublato undiq; corruptelarum omnis generis commercio, contra quas perpetuis ſtationibus, atq; cuſtodiis pudor peccandi & decoris ſui cura excubabant. Interim tamen non deſunt qui Foxium ſummæ in ſe iniquitatis inſuſſent: id autem quale ſit, quoniam ad plures ea injuria pertinere videtur altius inveſtigabimus.

Foxius in ea parte Hiſtoriæ, qua luctuoſum illud quinquennii Reginæ Mariæ incendium deſcribit, multos nominaverat, non authores modo cladium, ſed etiam miniſtros, adjutoreſque; inter quos etiam aliquos illuſtri loco viros. Id horum poſteri Foxium injuſte feciſſe queruntur: neq; debuiſſe neceſſitatem illam fatalem temporum, modeſtiam parendi, aut impoſita publice miniſteria, aut ipſis, aut poſteris ipſorum ignominiæ eſſe. Quibus tametſi juſtiſſime reſpondetur eandem quam ipſi pro majorum facto afferunt, neceſſitatis excuſationem, pro Foxio quoq; valere debere; aliter enim calumniæ locum relinqui, ſi miniſtri non ederentur: his tamen ego longe aliter quam pro jure ſatisfactum velim: Cupere enim, ut quod factum ſit, id ita fieri omnino neceſſe non fuiſſet: petere etiam, ne quod fortuna læſorum factum eſt, id animo lædendi factum arbitrentur: monere tamen interim, ne dolorem ſuum cum eorum iracundia miſcere velint, qui Foxio longe alia de cauſa ſuccenſent, & ſub perſonarum invidia aliam rem proſcindunt. Duplex enim genus animadvertas eorum, qui nomine poſterorum ſe læſos ferunt: alterum natura: factione alterum. Illis uti dixi humanitatis fructus debetur, atq; conceditur: irati ſunt, ſed interim cives, atq; in officio ſunt: Neque ego cujuſpiam boni civis, quamvis injuſtum dolorem, ita contemnerem, ut non potius quam ille de fide, ego de jure meo cederem: Cum his alteris longe alia res eſt: quibus nimirum contigit, patriæ prius iraſci, quam Foxio, illamq; primam, & veram cauſam odii habere, hunc non niſi patriæ cauſa odiſſe. Quibus ego non modo ſatisfactionis ullam, ſed ne quod hoſtibus conceditur, vel expoſtulationis gratiam deberi exiſtimo. Suſtulerunt ipſi fidem commercii, ſpem reconciliationis; ſocietatis, humanitatiſq; fœdera omnia diremerunt. Quid enim eum vel pro ſano, vel pro homine poſtea facturum ſperem, qui patriæ charitatem potuit deponere? Ea una ſic omnium officiorum vim, atque jus in ſe trahit, ut nullum gravius judicium ſit, quo quiſq; animo in Deum affectus ſit, quam quanta in patriam charitate extiterit. At patria ipſa deſcivit. Primum id in controverſia eſt, deſciveritne, & quantum deſciverit: extra controverſiam eſt, debere eos omnem ſuum dolorem patriæ dimittere. Deinde quam duri illud oris eſt, cujus nimirum litis cognitionem ſolus Deus poteſt ſuſcipere, ejus litis litigatorum, judicem ſe facere, neq; modo eam quæ inter homines graviſſima eſt authoritatem non ſequi, ſed neq; vel patriæ provocandi, neq; ipſi Deo ſpacium determinandi velle concedere; ſed omnia fœdis, proteriſque factis ante capere, tanquam victa cauſa, & potius hoſtibus ſcelus ſuum commodare, quam optimæ patriæ præſtare officium? ut ſi contingeret præluriſſimam hanc patriam (quod tamen humana conditio facile recipit) contra Deum ulla in parte delinquere: at pernicioſiſſima exempla perfidiæ monſtrarentur, ſi quotuſquiſq; animum perdentæ patriæ ſumpſit, is excuſatione patrii delicti non modo liberaſſe ſe ſcelere, ſed id quod juris ſui eſt feciſſe videatur. Quæ eo pluribus quoniam intelligo in noſtris etiam multos eſſe, qui reſpondendum Pontificiis de maledictis in Foxium cenſent: Quibus ut paucis obſequar. Primum quid illud maledicti eſt quod jaciunt? Mendacem ſcriptorem eſſe: Igitur mendacium eſt Rogerium, Cranmerum, Hoperum, Ridleyum, Latimerum, alioſq; ejuſdem porticus ſanctiſſimos atq; innocentiſſimos viros Religionis cauſa eſſe exuſtos. Sin iſta, vel ipſorum confeſſione, vera ſunt, quænam tandem illa ſunt quorum vitio totum reliquum opus in mendacii infamiam abierit, quod ſuis perſuadent? Nonnulla afferunt in nominibus, in temporibus, in numeris errata; quæ partim in ſequentibus editionibus retractata ſunt, partim ab ipſo authore ita defenſa, ut eo vivo nemo amplius oblatraret. Nonnulla etiam afferunt in ſuperioris ſeculi Hiſtoria ab Hiſtoricis ipſis contradicta, quod facillimum factu fuit, in tanta diſcordantium Authorum pugna, ut quemcunque Authorem ſecutus ſis in eundem ſcopulum impingeres. Ejuſmodi tamen omnia afferunt, quæ neque ſi vera, nobis valde curæ ſint, neque illis ſi falſa. Demus tamen illis aliquid, ſi placet; ſimus liberales in Foxii jure: Si ego iſta falſa quæ faciunt de Hiſtoria penitus excerpſero, polliceanturne mihi paſſuros ſe reliquum opus in ſuorum manibus liberè verſari? Non magis ferant conditionem quam pacem. Quid his hominibus facias, qui neque datis neque negatis acquieſcunt? Jam illud quoque quantæ proteruiæ eſt, exigere ab ullo Scriptore, ut in curſu longi operis, dum innumerabiles res unius homines labore perſequitur, nuſquam vel hallucinetur? ut ſi Cæſarem contingat, quo in loco Britanniam noſtram deſcribit, de circuitu, vel trajectu inſularum paucis milliaribus diſſentire ab eo quod hodierna dimenſio reperit, idcirco abſolutiſſimus Scriptor mendacii poſtuletur. Scripſit ille bella, expeditioneſq; ſuas, quod inſtitutum operis fuit, ea fide qua debuit: in reliquis ſecutus eſt famam; credidit renunciantibus; noluit in re non nimis neceſſaria eſſe accuratus. Atq; hæc ex noſtrorum potius hominum opinione, quam quod id faciendum putavi reſpondere viſum eſt. Quod ſi illi ipſi reſpondendum ſibi poſtulent, alia cum illis conditione agam. Redeant ad obſequium, Satisfaciant patriæ, Diſcedant ab hoſtibus: cum nullum publicum crimen illis adhæreat, tum privatas offenſiones proſequantur. Sin perſeverare adhuc in ſtudio volunt, deinde poſtquam omnem ſpem, famamq; conſumpſerint, maledictis terrere incipiant; næ ego facile concedam, ut quem anteactæ vitæ fructum ceperint, eam orationis quoq; laudem habeant: ita utrumq; decus obtineant, ut neq; maleficio, neq; convitiis quiſquam cum iis poſſit contendere. Si iſta durior conditio videatur: Æquent ſaltem dignitatem inviſi operis. Sint Authores pari fama: Honeſtius certamen fuerit, ſi quanto ſuo compendio vicerint, tanto ſuo detrimento vinci paſſint. Quodſi per libellos, & furtivas declamationes obtrectando æterno operi, eo pacto nomen ſuum famæ ſtudeant inſerere, neque virorum, ſed mulierculârum animis per convitia adrepant, quis ita demens eſt, ut quæ ſcripta contemnendo perire ſtatim faciat, ea oppugnando faciat diuturniora?

OF THE # CHRISTIAN MARTYRS,

AND

Matters Ecclesiastical passed in the Church of CHRIST;

From the Primitive beginning, to these our days, as well in other Countries, as namely in this Realm of ENGLAND, and also of SCOTLAND; Discoursed at large.

And first, the difference between the Church of ROME that now is, and the Ancient Church of ROME that then was.

CHRIST our Saviour in the Gospel of S. Matth. cap.16. hearing the confession of Simon Peter, who first of all other, openly acknowledged him to be the Son of God, and perceiving the secret hand of his Father therein, answered again, and alluding to his name, called him a Rock, upon which Rock he would build his Church so strong, that the gates of Hell should not prevail against it, &c. In which words three things are to be noted. First, that Christ will have a Church in this world. Secondly, that the same Church should mightily be impugned, not only by the World, but also by the uttermost strength and powers of all Hell. And thirdly, that the same Church, notwithstanding the uttermost of the Divel and all his malice, should continue. Which prophecy of Christ we see wonderfully to be verified, insomuch that the whole course of the Church to this day, may seem nothing else but a verifying of the said Prophecy. First, that Christ hath set up a Church, needeth no Declaration. Secondly, what force, what sides and sorts of men, of Princes, Kings, Monarchs, Governors, and Rulers of this World, with their Subjects publickly and privately, with all their strength and cunning, have bent themselves against this Church. And Thirdly, how the said Church, all this notwithstanding, hath yet endured and holden his own. What storms and tempests it hath overpast, wondrous it is to behold. For the more evident declaration whereof, I have addressed this present History, intending by the favourable aid of Christ our Lord, not so much to delight the ears of my Country in reading of News, as most specially to profit the hearts of the godly, in perusing antiquities of ancient times, to the end that the wonderful works of God, first in this Church, might appear to his glory. Also that the continuance and proceedings of the Church from time to time, being set forth in these Acts and Monuments, more knowledge and experience may redound thereby, to the profit of the Reader and edification of Christian Faith.

Three things noted in Christs words.

For the better accomplishing whereof, so to prosecute the matter, as may best serve to the profit of the Reader: I have thought good first, beginning from the time of the Primitive Church, and so continuing (by the Lords grace) to these latter years, to run over the whole state and course of the Church in general, in such order as digesting the whole tractation of this History into five sundry diversities of times.

The order of the disposition of this History.

1. First, I will intreat of the suffering time of the Church, which continued from the Apostles age about three hundred years.

The suffering time of the Church.

2. Secondly, of the flourishing time of the Church, which lasted other three hundred years.

The flourishing time of the Church.

3. Thirdly, of the declining or backsliding time of the Church, which comprehendeth other three hundred years, until the loosing out of Satan, which was about the thousandth year after the ceasing of Persecution. During which space of time, the Church although in ambition and pride it was much altered from the simple sincerity of the Primitive Time, yet in outward profession of Doctrine and Religion, it was something tolerable, and had some face of a Church: notwithstanding some corruption of Doctrine, with Superstition and Hypocrisie was then also crept in. And yet in comparison of that which followed after, it might seem as I said, something sufferable.

The declining time of the Church.

4. Fourthly, followed the time of Antichrist, and loosing of Satan, or desolation of the Church, whose full swinge containeth the space of four hundred years. In which time both Doctrine and sincerity of Life was utterly almost extinguished: namely, in the chief Heads and Rulers of this West Church, through the means of the Roman Bishops, especially counting from Gregory the seventh, called Hildebrand, Innocentius the third, and Friers which with him crept in, till the time of John Wickliffe and John Huß, during four hundred years.

The time of Antichrist in the Church.

5. Fifthly and lastly, after this time of Antichrist reigning in the Church of God by violence and tyranny, followeth the reformation and purging of the Church of God, wherein Antichrist beginneth to be revealed, and to appear in his colour, and his Antichristian Doctrine to be detected, the number of his Church decreasing, and the number of the true Church increasing. The durance of which time hath continued hitherto about the space of two hundred and fourscore years, and how long it shall continue more, the Lord and Governor of all times, he only knoweth. For in these five diversities and alterations of times, I suppose the whole course of the Church may well be comprised. The which Church because it is universal, and sparsedly through all Countries dilated, therefore in this History standing upon such a general argument, I shall not be bound to any one certain Nation more than another: yet notwithstanding keeping mine argument aforesaid, I have purposed principally to tarry upon such Historical Acts and Records, as most appertain to this my Country of England and Scotland.

The Reformation of the Church.

And for so much as the Church of Rome, in all these Ages above specified, hath challenged to it self the Supreme Title, and Ringleading of the whole Universal Church on Earth, by whose direction all other Churches have been governed: in writing therefore of the Church of Christ, I cannot but partly also intermeddle with the acts and proceedings of the same Church, for so much as the doings and orderings of all other Churches from time to time, as well here in England, as in other Nations, have this long season chiefly depended upon the same. Wherefore, as it is much needful and requisite to have the doings and orderings of the said Church to be made manifest to all Christian Congregations: so have I framed this History, according to the same purpose. First, in a general description briefly to declare, as in a summary table, the misguiding of that Church, comparing the former primitive state of the forenamed Church of Rome, with these latter times of the same: which done, then after in a more special tractation, to prosecute more at large all the particulars thereof, so set ſuth as ſhall ſeem not unprofitable for the publick inſtruction of all other Chriſtian Churches, to behold and conſider the manner and dealing of this one. In the which one Church of Rome four things, as moſt ſpecial points, ſeem to me chiefly to be conſidered. To wit, Title, Juriſdiction, Life and Doctrine. Wherein I have here to declare, firſt, concerning the Title or Primacy of the Church, how it firſt began, and upon what occaſion. Secondly, concerning the Juriſdiction and Authority thereof, what it was, and how far it did extend. Thirdly, touching the miſorder of life and converſation, how inordinate it is. And fourthly, the Form of Doctrine, how ſuperſtitious and idolatrous of late it hath been. Of the which four, the firſt was prejudicial to all Biſhops. The ſecond, derogatory to Kings and Emperors. The third deteſtable to all men. The fourth, injurious againſt Chriſt.

The Church of Rome.

Four things to be conſidered in the Church of Rome. 1. Title. 2. Juriſdiction. 3. Life. 4. Doctrine.

The title of the Pope.

For firſt, the Title and Stile of that Church was ſuch, that it overwent all other Churches: being called The Holy Univerſal Mother Church, which could not erre: and the Biſhop thereof, Holy Father the Pope, Biſhop Univerſal, Prince of Prieſts, Supream Head of the Univerſal Church, and Vicar of Chriſt here in Earth, which muſt not be judged, having all knowledge of Scripture, and all Laws contained within the cheſt of his Breſt.

The juriſdiction of the Pope.

Secondly, the Juriſdiction of that Biſhop was ſuch, that challenging to himſelf both the Swords, that is, both the Keyes of the Scripture and the Scepter of the Laity: not only he ſubdued all Biſhops under him, but alſo advanced himſelf above Kings and Emperors, cauſing ſome of them to lie under his feet, ſome to hold his ſtirrup, Kings to lead his Horſe by the Bridle, ſome to kiſs his feet, placing and diſplacing Emperors, Kings, Dukes and Earls, whom and when he lifted, taking upon him to tranſlate the Empire at his pleaſure; firſt, from Greece to France, from France to Germany, preferring and depoſing whom he pleaſed, confirming them which were elected. Alſo being Emperor himſelf Sede vacante, pretending Authority or power to inveſt Biſhops, to give Benefices, to ſpoil Churches, to give authority to bind and looſe, to call General Councils, to judge over the ſame, to ſet up Religions, to Canonize Saints, to take Appeals, to bind Conſciences, to make Laws, to diſpenſe with the Law and Word of God, to deliver from Purgatory, to command Angels, &c.

The properties of life in the Romiſh Clergy.

Thirdly, what was the life and converſation of the Court of Rome, hereafter in the proceſs of this Hiſtory followeth to be ſeen and obſerved.

The Doctrine of the Pope.

Fourthly, ſuch was his Doctrine in like manner, tedious to ſtudents, pernicious to mens Conſciences, injurious to Chriſt Jeſus, and contrary to it ſelf. In Laws more divers, in Volume more large, in diligence and ſtudy more applied, in vantage and preferment more gainful than ever was the ſtudy and learning of the holy Scripture of God.

All which four points well conſidered and adviſed in this preſent Hiſtory ſet forth, I truſt it may miniſter to the indifferent Chriſtian Reader, ſufficient inſtruction to judge what is of this See and Church of Rome to be eſteemed.

But here by the way it is to be noted, that all theſe deformities above touched of vain Title, of pretended Juriſdiction, of Heretical Doctrine, of Schiſmatical Life, came not into the Church of Rome all at one time, nor ſprang with the beginning of the ſame Church, but with long working, and continuance of time by little and little crept up, through occaſion, and came not to full perfection, till the time partly of Pope Silveſter, partly of Pope Gregory the ſeventh, in the year of our Lord 1170. partly of Innocentius the third, and finally of Pope Boniface the eighth, in the year of our Lord 1300. Of the which four Popes, the firſt brought in the Title in the year of the Lord 670. which was never in ſuch ample wiſe before publickly enacted, and received publickly in the ſaid Church of Rome. The ſecond brought in Juriſdiction. The third which was Pope Innocent with his rabble of Monks and Friers (as Thomas Aquine, Petrus Lombardus, Johannes Scotus) and with ſuch other Biſhops as ſucceeded in the ſame See after him, corrupted and obſcured the ſincerity of Chriſts doctrine and manners alſo. And laſtly, Pope Bonifacius the eighth, and after him Pope Clement the fifth over and beſides the Juriſdiction ſufficiently advanced before by Pope Hildebrand, added moreover the Temporal Sword to be carried before them. And that no Emperor (were he never ſo well elected) ſhould be ſufficient and lawful, without the Popes admiſſion, in the year of our Lord 1300. whereby the Popes power was brought now to his full pride and perfection. And thus came up the corruption of the Romiſh Church in continuance of years by degrees, and not altogether, nor at one time, as is declared, and hereafter more particularly (Chriſt willing) ſhall be expreſſed.

Pope Silveſter the 2d. Pope Gregory the 7th called Hildebrand. Pope Innocentius the third. Pope Boniface the eighth.

Wherefore, whoſoever ſhall have hereafter to do with any adverſaries, about the Antiquity or Authority of the Church of Rome, let him here well conſider when and how, the Title, Juriſdiction and Corruption of Doctrine firſt began in the Popes See. And ſo ſhall he ſee, that the Church of Rome, as it is now governed with this manner of Title, Juriſdiction and Inſtitution of Doctrine, never deſcended from the Primitive Age of the Apoſtles, or from their Succeſſion, Niſi tantum æquivoce, & non univoce; Like as Sancta Maria picta non eſt Sancta Maria, & homo pictus non eſt homo, as the Schools do ſay: that is, As the picture of the Holy Virgin, is not the Holy Virgin, and as a man painted on the Wall is not a Man: ſo it is to be ſaid of the Church of Rome (the Inſtitution and Doctrine of the Church of Rome I mean) that although it hath the name of the Church Apoſtolical, and doth bring forth a long Genealogy of outward ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles, as the Phariſes did in Chriſts time bring their deſcent from Abraham their Father: yet all this is (as I ſaid) but only Æquivoce, that is, in name only, and not in effect or matter, which maketh the Apoſtolical Church indeed; for as much as the definition of the Apoſtolical Church neither now agreeth with this preſent Church of Rome, nor yet the manner, form and inſtitution of the ſaid Romiſh Church, as it now ſtandeth with this Title, Juriſdiction and Doctrine, had ever any Succeſſion or Offspring from the Primitive Church of the Apoſtles. But as Chriſt ſaid by the Phariſes, that they were the Children, not of Abraham, but of the Devil: in ſemblable wiſe may be anſwered, that this Church of Rome now preſent, with this Title, Juriſdiction and Doctrine now uſed, cannot be fathered upon the Apoſtles, neither Petrus, nor Linus, but of another Author, whom here I will not name.

That is but name only, and not in very deed. Univoce. That is both in name, and alſo in definition and effect, agreeing with the name. The Church of Rome, as now it is, is not apoſtolical, but only æquivoce.

The argument of Pighius, Hoſius and Eccius for the authority of the Church of Rome.

And here now cometh in the Argument of Pighius, Hoſius and Eccius, to be anſwered unto, who arguing for the Antiquity and Authority of the Church of Rome, reaſon on this manner.

Da That forſomuch as an ordinary and a known Church viſible muſt here be known continually on earth, during from the time of the Apoſtles, to the which Church all other Churches muſt have recourſe:

ri- And ſeeing then there is no other Church viſible, orderly known to have indured from the Apoſtles time, but only the Church of Rome:

i. They conclude therefore, that the Church of Rome is that Church whereunto all other Churches muſt have recourſe, &c.

Anſwer. Fallacia æquivoce.

To the which Paralogiſme I anſwer thus: that this word Durans Eccleſia, the during Church in the Minor, hath Fallaciam æquivoci. For although the name of the Church and outward ſucceſſion of Biſhops have had their durance from the time of the Apoſtles, yet the definition and matter which maketh a true Apoſtolical Church indeed, and Univoce, neither is now in the Church of Rome, nor yet the form and inſtitution of the Church now uſed in Rome, was ever from the Apoſtles; which Apoſtles were never authors or fathers of this Title, Juriſdictions and Doctrine now taught in Rome, but rather were enemies ever to the ſame.

The minor examined.

The Major examined.

Again to the Major, which ſtandeth upon two parts, I anſwer: Firſt, although the neceſſity of the Church during from the Apoſtles, may and muſt be granted; yet the ſame neceſſity was not bound to any certain place or perſon, but only to faith: ſo that whereſoever, that is to ſay, in whatſoever Congregation true Faith was, there was the Church of Chriſt. And becauſe the true faith of Chriſt muſt needs ever remain on earth, therefore the Church alſo muſt needs remain on earth. And God forbid, that the ſaid true faith of Chriſt ſhould only remain in one City in the World, and not another as well. And therefore to the ſecond part of the Major is to be ſaid, that as this true and ſincere faith of Chriſt is not ſo given, to remain fixtly in one place or City alone: ſo neither is there any one Church in the World ſo ordained and appointed of God, that all other Churches ſhould have their recourſe unto it, for determination of their cauſes and controverſies incident, &c. And thus much to the Argument of Pighius and Hoſius, &c.

World

Now as touching the authorities and allegations of the ancient Doctors and holy Fathers in the commendation of the Church of Rome; here cometh in alſo to be noted, that whoſoever will underſtand rightly their authorities and anſwer to the ſame, muſt firſt learn to make a difference and diſtinction of the ſaid Church of Rome, from that it was, to that it is: foraſmuch as the Church of Rome is not the ſame Church now, which it was then, but only Æquivoce: otherwiſe as touching the very property and definition of a Church, it is another Church, and nothing agreeing to that it was then, ſave only in outward name and place. Therefore by this diſtinction made, I anſwer the place of Ireneus, Cyprianus, and other famous Drs. commending the Church of Rome as Catholick and Apoſtolical, and ſay that theſe Doctors, ſpeaking of the Church of Rome which then was, ſaid not untrue, calling it Catholick and Apoſtolical, for that the ſame Church took their ordinary ſucceſſion of Biſhops joyned with the ordinary Doctrine and Inſtitution from the Apoſtles. But ſpeaking of the Church of Rome which now is, we ſay the ſaid places of the Doctors are not true, neither do appertain to the ſame: all which Doctors neither knew the Church of Rome that now is, neither if they had, would ever have judged any thing therein worthy ſuch commendation.

A diſtinction.

The Church of Rome diſtinguiſhed into a double conſideration of times.

The Church of Rome, how it was commended of the old Doctors

Over and beſides, our adverſaries yet more objected againſt us, who heaving and ſhooving for the Antiquity of the Romiſh Church, for lack of other ſufficient reaſon to prove, are driven to fall in ſcanning the times and years. What (ſay they)? where was this Church of yours before theſe fifty years? To whom briefly to anſwer, firſt we demand what they mean by this which they call our Church? If they mean the ordinance and inſtitution of Doctrine and Sacraments now received of us, and differing from the Church of Rome, we affirm and ſay, that our Church was, when this Church of theirs was not yet hatched out of the ſhell, nor did yet ever ſee any light: that is, in the time of the Apoſtles, in the primitive age, in the time of Gregory the firſt, and the old Roman Church, when as yet no Univerſal Pope was received publickly, but repelled in Rome: nor this fulneſs of plenary power yet known, nor this Doctrine and abuſe of Sacraments yet heard of. In witneſs whereof we have the old acts and hiſtories of ancient time to give teſtimony with us, wherein we have ſufficient matter for us to declare the ſame form, uſage and inſtitution of this our Church reformed now, not to be the beginning of any new Church of our own, but to be the renewing of the old ancient Church of Chriſt: nor to be any ſwerving from the Church of Rome, but rather a reducing to the Church of Rome. Whereas contrary, the Church of Rome which now is, is nothing but a ſwerving from the Church of Rome, as partly is declared, and more ſhall appear (Chriſt willing) hereafter.

The principal objection of the Papiſts againſt the Proteſtants.

Anſwer to the objection.

The Church of Rome revolted from the Church of Rome.

And where the ſaid our adverſaries do moreover charge us with the faith of our Fathers and Godfathers, wherein we were baptiſed, accuſing and condemning us for that we are now revolted from them and their faith, wherein we were firſt chriſtened: To this we anſwer, that we being firſt baptiſed by our Fathers and Godfathers, in water, in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, the ſame faith wherein we were chriſtned then, we do retain: and becauſe our Godfathers were themſelves alſo in the ſame faith, therefore they cannot ſay that we have forſaken the faith of our Godfathers, &c. As for other points of Eccleſiaſtical uſes, and circumſtances conſidered, beſides the principal ſubſtance of Faith and Baptiſm, if they held any thing which receded from the Doctrine and Rule of Chriſt, therein we now remove our ſelves; not becauſe we would differ from them, but becauſe we would not with them remove from the Rule of Chriſts Doctrine. Neither doth the Sacrament of our Baptiſm bind us in all points to the opinions of them that baptiſed us, but to the Faith of him in whoſe Name we were baptiſed. For as if a man were chriſtened of an Heretick, the Baptiſm of him notwithſtanding were good, although the Baptiſer were naught: ſo if our Godfathers or Fathers, which chriſtned us, were taught any thing not conſonant to Chriſtian Doctrine in all points, neither is our Baptiſm worſe for that, nor yet we bound to follow them in all things, wherein they themſelves did not follow the true Church of Chriſt.

Another objection of the Papiſts.

An anſwer to the objection.

No man bound to follow the opinions of his Godfathers in all points unleſs they be conſonant in all things

Wherefore as it is falſe, that we have renounced the faith of our Godfathers wherein we were firſt Baptiſed, ſo is it not true, that we are removed from the Church of Rome: but rather ſay, and (by the leave of Chriſt) will prove that the Church of Rome hath utterly parted from the Church of Rome, according to my diſtinction before touched. Which thing the more evidently to declare, I will here compare the Church of Rome with the Church of Rome; and in a general Deſcription ſet forth (by Gods grace) the difference of both the Churches, that is, of both the times of the Church of Rome: to the intent it may be ſeen whether we or the Church of Rome have more apoſtated from the Church of Rome. And here firſt I divide the Church of Rome in a double conſideration of time: firſt, of thoſe firſt ſix hundred years which were immediately after Chriſt: and ſecondly, of the other ſix hundred years, which now have been in theſe our later days: and ſo in comparing theſe two together, will ſearch out what diſcrepance is between them both. Of the which two ages and ſtates of the Roman Church, the firſt I call the Primitive Church of Rome, the other I call the later Church of Rome counting this later Church from the thouſand years expired after the binding of Satan, to the time of his looſing again, according to the Prophecy of the twentieth Chapter of St. Johns Revelation: counting theſe thouſand years from the ceaſing of Perſecution, under Conſtantinus Magnus, to the beginning of Perſecution of the Church again under Innocentius the third, and Ottomannus the firſt Turcian Emperor. And thus have ye the Church of Rome parted into two Churches, in a double reſpect and conſideration of two ſundry ſtates and times. Now in ſetting and matching the one ſtate with the other, let us ſee whether the Church of Rome hath ſwerved from the Church of Rome more than we, or no.

The Church of Rome diſtinguiſhed from the Church of Rome.

Two times of the Church of Rome conſidered and examined.

AND to begin firſt with the order and qualities of life I ask here of this Roman Clergy, where was this Church of theirs which now is, in the ancient time of the primitive Church of Rome, with this pomp and pride, with this riches and ſuperfluity, with this Gloria mundi, and name of Cardinals, with this pranſing diſſoluteneſs, and whoring of the Curtiſans, with this extortion, bribing, buying and ſelling of Spiritual Dignities, theſe Annats Reformations, Procurations, Exactions, and other practices for mony, this avarice inſatiable, ambition intolerable, fleſhly filthineſs moſt deteſtable, barbarouſneſs and negligence in preaching, promiſe-breaking faithleſneſs, poyſoning and ſupplanting one another, with ſuch ſchiſms and diviſions, which never were more ſeen than in the elections and Court of Rome theſe ſeven hundred years, with ſuch extreme cruelty, malice, and tyranny in burning and perſecuting their poor brethren to death?

The firſt point.

The enormities of life in the later church of Rome deſcribed. Policies and practices of Rome to get money.

It were too long, and a thing infinite, to ſtand particularly upon theſe above rehearſed. And if a man ſhould proſecute at large all the Schiſms that have been in the Church of Rome ſince the time of Damaſus the firſt, which are counted to the number of eighteen ſchiſms: what a Volume would it require? Or if here ſhould be recorded all that this See hath burned and put to death ſince the looſing out of Satan, who were able to number them? Or if all their ſleights to get money ſhould be deſcribed, as proceſs of matter would require, who were able to recite them all? Of which all notwithſtanding, the moſt principal grounds are reckoned at leaſt to fourteen or fifteen ſlights.

Fifteen practices of the new church of Rome to get money.

1. Firſt, for annats or vacancies of Arch-Biſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Abbacies, Priories conventual, and other Benefices elective.

2. Secondly, for the holding and retaining of all other ſpiritual livings whatſoever, beſides this which now the Incumbent paieth for, or which he may hold hereafter.

3. Thirdly, new annates for all the ſame are required again, Tories quoties any one of all his ſpiritual livings be, or are ſained to be not orderly come by, whereby it hath chanced divers times three or four annats to be paid for one Benefice.

4. Fourthly, for giving out preventions of Benefices before they fall, and many times ſome one prevention to be given to diveſs and ſundry perſons by the office for monies ſake.

5. Fifthly, for reſignations upon favour, which in many caſes the Pope challengeth to be reſerved to himſelf.

6. Sixthly, for Commendams.

7. Seventhly, for compounding with ſuch as be abſent from their charge, and give their attendance about the Court.

8. Eighthly, for infinite diſpenſations, as to diſpence with age, with order, with Benefices incompatible, as if the number be full, if the Houſe be of ſuch or ſuch an Order. Item, diſpenſation for irregularity, for whoredome and adultery, for times of marriage, for marrying in degrees forbidden, or in affinity Canonical for goſſips to marry, for the which it hath been ſeen in France a thouſand Crowns to be paid to Rome at one time, for diſpenſing with this Canonical affinity of Goſſips, as we call it, the ſame being yet not true but fained. Item, diſpenſing for eating meats in times prohibited.

9. Ninthly, for innumerable privileges, exemptions, graces for not viſiting, or viſiting by a Proctor, for confirmations of privileges, for tranſactions made upon ſpecial favour of Pope, for permutations of Benefices with diſpenſation annexed, or making of Penſions, with ſuch like.

10. Tenthly, for Mandats granted by the Pope, to Ordinaries, whereof every Ordinary if he have the collation or preſentation often, may receive one Mandat: if he have fifty, he may receive two Mandats: and for every Mandat there comes to the Pope about twenty Ducats. And yet notwithſtanding ſo many are ſold, as will come buyers to pay for them.

11. Eleventhly, for the Popes penitentiary, for abſolution of caſes reſerved to the Pope, for breaking and changing of Vows, for tranſlation from one Monaſtery to another, alſo from one order to another, for licence to enter into certain Monaſteries, to carry about Altars, with many other things of like device, pertaining to the office of the Popes penitentiary.

12. Twelfthly, for giving and granting of innumerable pardons and indulgences, to be read not only in publick temples, but alſo to be bought in private houſes, and of private perſons, in divers and ſundry reſpects.

13. Thirteenthly, for making Notaries, and Protonotaries, and other offices of the Court of Rome.

14. Fourteenthly, for granting out Bulls and Commiſſions of new foundations, or for changing of the old, for reducing regular Monaſteries to a ſecular ſtate or for reſtoring again into the old, and for other infinite reſcripts and writs about matters depending in controverſie, that otherwiſe might and ought by the Ordinary to be decided.

15. Fifteenthly, for giving the Pall to Archbiſhops newly elected. By reaſon of all which devices (beſides the firſt of the Annates) it hath been accounted out of the Kings Records in France, in the time of Ludovick the ninth (as teſtifies Molineus) to the number of two hundred thouſand Crowns, only out of France, payed and tranſported to Rome. Which Sum ſince that time hath been doubled and trebled, beſides Annates and Palls, which altogether are thought to make the total ſum yearly going out of France to the Popes Coffers of late years, ten myriads, or millions, every myriad mounting to ten thouſand Crowns. Now what hath riſen beſides in other Realms and Nations, let other Men conjecture.

Wherefore if the Goſpel ſend us to the fruits to know the Tree, I pray you what is to be thought of the Church of Rome, with theſe fruits of life? Or if we will ſeek the Church in length and number of years: where was this Church of Rome with theſe qualities then, at what time the Church of Rome was a perſecuted Church, not a perſecuting Church? And when the Biſhops thereof did not make Martyrs, as theſe do now, but were made Martyrs themſelves, to the number of five and twenty, in order one after another? Or when the Biſhops thereof were elected and exalted, not by factious conſpiring, not by power or parts taking, not by money or friends making, as they be now, but by the free voices of the People and of the Clergy, with the conſent of the Emperour joyned withal, and not by a few conſpiring Cardinals, cloſed up in a corner, as now they be, &c.

The juriſdiction and power of this new Church of Rome examined.

AND yet if there were no other difference in the matter, but only corruption of life, all that we would tolerate, or elſe impute to the common fragility of man, and charge them no farther therein than we might charge our ſelves. Now over and beſide this deformity of life, wherein they are clean gone from the former ſteps of the true Church of Rome, we have moreover to charge them in greater points, more nearly touching the ſubſtantial ground of the Church, as in their juriſdiction preſumptuouſly uſurped, in their Title falſly grounded, and in their Doctrine heretically corrupted. In all which three points, this later pretended Church of Rome hath utterly ſequeſtred it ſelf from the image and nature of the ancient and true Church of Rome, and have erected to themſelves a new Church of their own making, as firſt uſurping a Juriſdiction never known before to their ancient Predeceſſors. For although the Church of Rome in the old primitive time had his due authority and place due unto that See, among other Patriarchal Churches, over and upon ſuch Churches as were within his Precinct, and bordering near unto it, as appears by the Acts of the Nicen Council: yet the univerſal fulneſs and plenitude of power in both the regiments, ſpiritual and temporal, in depoſing and diſpenſing matters of the Church not to him belonging, in taking Appeals, in giving Elections, inveſting in Benefices, in exempting himſelf from obedience and ſubjection of his ordinary power and Magiſtrate, with his coactive power newly erected in the Church of Rome, was never received nor uſed in the old Roman Church, from the which they diſagree in all their doings.

This new Church of Rome in three points challenged.

Nicen. ca. 6.

For although Victor then Biſhop of Rome, Anno 200. went about to Excommunicate the Eaſt Churches, for the obſervation of Eaſter day: yet neither did he proceed therein, neither was permitted by Irenæus ſo to do. And although Boniface the firſt likewiſe, writing to the Biſhops of Carthage, required of them to ſend up their appellations unto the Church of Rome, alledging moreover, the Decree of the Nicen Council for his authority: the Biſhops and Clergy of Carthage aſſembling together in a General Council (called the ſixth Council of Carthage) to the number of two hundred and ſeventeen Biſhops, after that they had peruſed the Decrees in the authentique Copies of the aforeſaid Nicen Council, and found no ſuch matter by the ſaid Boniface alleadged, made therefore a publick Decree, that none out of that Country ſhould make any Appeal over the See, &c. And what marvel if Appeals were forbidden them to be made to Rome, whenas both here in England the Kings of this Land would not permit any to Appeal from them to Rome, before King Henry the 2d. becauſe of the murther of Thomas Becket, being thereunto compelled by Pope Alexander the third? And alſo in France the like prohibitions were expreſly made by Ludovicus Pius, Anno 1268. which did forbid by a publick inſtrument called Pragmatica ſanctio, all exactions of the Popes Court within this Realm. Alſo by King Philip named Le bel, Anno 1296. the like was done, which not only reſtrained all ſending or going up of his Subjects to Rome, but alſo, that no Money, Armour, nor Subſidy ſhould be tranſported out of his Realm. The like alſo after him did King Charles the fifth, ſirnamed the wiſe, and his Son likewiſe after him Charles the ſixth, who alſo puniſhed as Traytors certain ſeditious perſons for appealing to Rome. The like reſiſtance moreover was in the ſaid Country of France, againſt the Popes reſervations, preventions, and other like practices of his uſurped Juriſdiction in the days of Pope Martin the fifth, Anno 1418. Item, when King Henry the ſixth in England, and King Charles the ſeventh in France, did both accord with the Pope, in inveſting and in collation of Benefices: yet notwithſtanding the High Court of Parliament in France did not admit the ſame, but ſtill maintained the old liberty and cuſtoms of the French Church. Inſomuch that when the Duke of Bedford came with the Kings Letters Patents to have the Popes procurations and reſervations admitted, yet the Court of Parliament would not agree to the ſame, but the Kings Procurator General was faigne to go betwixt them, as is to be ſeen in their Regiſters, Anno 1425. the fifth day of March. In the days of the which King Charles the ſeventh, was ſet forth in France, Pragmatica ſanctio, as they call it, againſt the Annats, reſervations, expectatives, and ſuch other proceedings of the Popes pretended Juriſdiction, Anno 1438. Wherefore what marvel if this Juriſdiction of the Popes Court in Excommunicating, taking Appeals, and giving of Benefices, was not uſed in the the old Church of Rome, whenas in these later days it hath been so much resisted.

The Popes Jurisdiction concerning elections examined.

And what should I speak of the form and manner of Elections now used in the Church of Rome, clean converted from the manner of the old Church of their Predecessors? For 1st. in those ancient days, whenas yet the Church remained in the Apostles only, and a few other Disciples, the Apostles then with prayer and imposition of hands elected Bishops and Ministers, as by the Apostles, James was made Bishop of Hierusalem, Paul in Creta elected Titus, and Timothy in Ephesus. Also Peter ordained Linus and Clement in Rome, &c. After which time of the Apostles, when the Church began more to multiply, the election of Bishops and Ministers stood by the Clergy and the People, with the consent of the chief Magistrate of the place, and so continued during all the time of the primitive Church, till the time, and after the time of Constantine the fourth Emperor, which Emperor (as writeth Platina and Sabellicus, Ene[illegible]. lib. 6.) published a law concerning the election of the Roman Bishop, that he should be taken for true Bishop, whom the Clergy and People of Rome did choose and elect, without any tarrying for any authority of the Emperor of Constantinople, or the Deputy of Italy: so as the custom and fashion had ever been before that day, Anno 280. And here the Bishops began first to writhe out their elections and their necks a little from the Emperors subjection, if it be so as the said Platina and Sabellicus after him reporteth. But many conjectures there be, not unprofitable, rather to think this constitution of Constantine to be forged and untrue: First, for that it is taken out of the Popes bibliothecary, a suspected place, and collected by the keeper and master of the Popes library, a suspected author, who whatsoever feigned Writings or Apocrypha he could find in the Popes Chests of Records, making any thing on his masters side: that he compiled together, and thereof both Platina, Sabellicus, and Gratianus take most part of their reports, and therefore may the more be suspected, &c.

Platina Sab. Enead 8. l. 6.

Constantine the fourth Emperor of Constantinople. The Popes bibliothecary suspected. The Constitution of Constantine the fourth Emperor of Constantinople examined.

Secondly, where Platina and Sabellicus say that Constantine moved with the holiness of Pope Benedict the first, made that constitution: how seemeth that to stand with truth, when both the Emperour was so far off from him, being at Constantinople, and also for that the said Pope reigned but ten Months? which was but a small time to make his Holiness known to the Emperor so far off. And grant he were so holy, yet that holiness might rather be an occasion for the Emperor so to confirm and maintain the old received manner of his institution, than to alter it.

The third conjecture is this, for that the said constitution was not observed, but shortly after by the said Benedict, was broken in the election of Pope Conon. And yet notwithstanding albeit the constitution were true, yet the election thereby was not taken away from the People, and limited to the Clergy only, and muchless might be taken away from the Clergy, and be limited only to the Cardinals, without the consent of their Prince and Ruler, according to their own Rubric in their Decrees, where the Rubric saith: De ordinatione Episcopi: Nullus invitis detur Episcopus; cleri, plebis, & ordinis consensus & desiderium requiratur, &c. That is: Let no Bishop be given to any People against their wills: but let the consent and desire both of the Clergy and of the People, and of the order, be also required, &c. And in the same distinction also, cap. Sacrorum, we read the same liberty and interest to be granted by Carolus magnus, and Ludovicus his Son, not to a few Cardinals only, but to the order as well of the Clergy, as of the people, to choose not only the Bishop of Rome, but any other Bishop within their own Diocess whatsoever, and to the Monks likewise to choose their own Abbot, setting aside all respect of persons and gifts, only for the worthiness of life, and gift of wisdom, so as might be most profitable for Doctrine and Example unto the Flock, &c. And this continued till the time of the aforesaid Carolus magnus and Ludovicus his Son, Anno 810. of the which two, Carolus the father, received expresly of Pope Adrian the first, full jurisdiction and power to elect and ordain the Bishop of Rome, like as Pope Leo the ninth did also to Otho the first German Emperor, Anno 961. The other, that is Ludovicus, Son to the aforesaid Charles, is said to renounce again, and surrender from himself and his successors, unto Pope Paschalis and the Romans, the right and interest of choosing the Roman Bishop, and moreover to give and grant to the said Paschalis the full possession of the City of Rome, and the whole Territory to the same belonging, Anno 821. as appeareth by the Decree, Ego Ludovicus, Dist. 63. But admit that fained Decree to be unfeignedly true (as it may well be suspected for many causes, as proceeding out of the same fountain, with the constitution of Constantine aforementioned, that is, from the master of the Popes Library, of whom both Gratianus and Volateran, by their own confession, take their ground) yet the same Decree doth not so give away the freedom of that election, that he limiteth it only to the Cardinals, but also requireth the whole consent of the Romans: neither doth he simply and absolutely give the same, but with condition: so that, Omnes Romani uno consilio, & una concordia, sine aliqua promissione ad pontificatus ordinem eligerent: that is, Whom as all the Romans with one Council, and with one accord, without any promise of their voices granted before, shall choose to be Bishop of Rome. And moreover in the same decree is required, that at the consecration of the same Bishop, messengers should be directed incontinent to the French King concerning the same.

Rubrica de ordinatione episc. ex Cælestino Papa Dist. 63. ca. Cleri. di. 63. ca. sacrorum.

Liberty granted to the Clergy, and to the People to to choose their Bishop

Carol. Mag. Ludov. pius.

The decree, Ego Ludovicus, dist. 63. suspected.

Gratianus and Volateranus, what ground they have of their records.

Dist. 63. cap. Ego Ludov. Election of the Bishop of Rome standeth upon the consent of the Clergy, and the people of Rome.

Furthermore, neither yet did the same Decree (albeit it were true) long continue. For although Pope Stephen the fourth, and Pope Paschalis the first, in Ludovicus time were impapased through discord, without election of the Emperor, yet they were faine by message to send their purgation to him of their election. And after that, in the time of Eugenius the second, which succeeded next to Paschalis, Lotharius son of Ludovicus, and Emperor with his father, came to Rome, and there appointed Laws and Magistrates over the City. Whereby may appear the donation of Ludovike, in giving away the City of Rome to the Pope, to be feigned. And after Eugenius, Pope Gregory the fourth, who following within a year after Eugenius, durst not take his election without the consent and confirmation of the said Emperour Ludovicus. And so in like manner his successors, Pope Sergius the second, Pope Leo the fourth, Pope Nicholas the first, and so orderly in a long tract of time, from the aforesaid Nicholas the first, to Pope Nicholas the second, Anno 1061. (which Nicholas in his decree, beginning, In nomine Domini, dist. 23. ordained also the same) so that in the election of the Bishops of Rome, commonly the consent of the Emperour and the people with the Clergy of Rome was not lacking After which Nicholas, came Alexander the second, and wicked Hildebrand, which Alexander being first elected without the Emperours will and consent, afterward repenting the same openly in his preaching to the People, declared that he would no longer sit in the Apostolical See, unless he were by the Emperour confirmed. Wherefore he was greatly rebuked, and cast into Prison by Hildebrand, and so deposed. Then Hildebrand and his followers so ordered the matter of this election, that first the Emperour, then the Lay People, after that, the Clergy also began to be excluded. And so the election by little and little was reduced to the hands of a few Cardinals, contrary to all ancient order, where ever since it hath remained.

The decree Ego Ludovi. proved false

Dist. 23. cap. In nomine Domini.

And like as in elections, so also in power judiciary, in deciding, and determining of causes of faith, and of Ecclesiastical discipline, the state of the Church of Rome now being, hath no conformity with the old Roman Church heretofore. For then Bishops debated all causes of faith only by the Scriptures, and other questions of Ecclesiastical discipline they determined by the Canons, not of the Pope, but of the Church, such as were decreed by the Ancient Councils, as writeth Gregor. Turonensis in Francorum historia. Whereas now both the rule of Scripture, and sanctions of the old Councils set aside, all things for the most part are decided by certain new Decretal, or rather, Extradecretal and extravagant constitutions, in the Popes Canon law compiled, and in his Consistories practised.

The judiciary power of the Pope examined.

G. Turonens. in Fran. hist. li. 10. ca. 18. The Popes Jurisdiction usurped in giving and disposing ecclesiastical promotions.

And whereas the old ordinance and disposition, as well of the Common Law, as of the sacred Councils and Institution of Ancient Fathers, have given to Bishops, and other Prelates, also to Patrons and Doctors of Ecclesiastical Benefices, every one within his own Precinct and Dominion, also to Cathedral Churches and other, to have their free Elections, and to proſecute the ſame in full effect, ordering and diſpoſing promotions, collations, proviſions and diſpoſitions of Prelacies, Dignities, and all other Eccleſiaſtical Benefices whatſoever, after their own arbitrement, as appeareth by the firſt General Council of France, 16. q. 7. cap. Omnes Baſilicæ, by the firſt General Council of Nice, cap. 6. Alſo by the General Council of Antioch, cap. 9. and is to be ſeen in the Popes Decrees, 9. q. 3. Per ſingulas. And likewiſe beſide theſe ancient decrees, the ſame is confirmed again in more later years by Ludovicus the ninth French King, in his conſtitution, called Pragmatica ſanctio, made and provided by full Parliament againſt the Popes Exactions, in the year of our Lord 1228. in theſe words as follow. Item exactiones & onera graviſſima pecuniarum, per curiam Romanam Eccleſiæ regni noſtri impoſitas vel impoſita (quibus regnum miſerabiliter depauperatum exiſtit) ſive etiam imponendas vel imponenda levari aut colligi nullatenus volumus: niſi duntaxat pro rationabili, pia & urgentiſſima cauſa, vel inevitabili neceſſitate, ac etiam de expreſſo, & ſpontaneo juſſu noſtro, & ipſius Eccleſiæ regni noſtri, &c. that is, Item, all Exactions and importable burdens of money, which the Court of Rome hath laid upon the Church of our Kingdom (whereby our ſaid Kingdom hath been miſerably hitherto impoveriſhed) or hereafter ſhall impoſe or lay upon us, we utterly diſcharge and forbid to be levied or collected hereafter for any manner of cauſe, unleſs there come ſome reaſonable, godly, and moſt urgent and inevitable neceſſity; and that alſo not to be done without the expreſs and voluntary commandment of us, and of the Church of the ſame our forefaid Kingdom, &c. Now contrary to and againſt theſe ſo manifeſt and expreſs Decreements of General Councils and Conſtitutions Synodal, this later Church of Rome of late preſumption, degenerating from all the ſteps of their elders, have taken upon them a ſingular Juriſdiction by themſelves, and for their own advantage, to intermeddle in diſpoſing and tranſpoſing Churches, Colleges, Monaſteries, with the collations, exemptions, election, goods and lands to the ſame belonging, by reaſon and example whereof have come in theſe Impropriations, firſt fruits, and reſervations of Benefices, to the miſerable diſpoiling of Pariſhes, and horrible decay of Chriſtian faith, which things among the old Roman elders were never known. For ſo much then did it lack, that due neceſſities were pluckt from the Church, that Emperours, Kings and Princes plucking from their own, did rather cumulate the Church with ſuperfluities.

Impropriations and firſt fruits of Benefices

Again, when ſuch goods were given the Church by thoſe Anceſtors, they were neither ſo given, nor yet taken to ſerve the private uſe of certain Churchmen taking no pains therein, but rather to ſerve the publick ſubvention of the needy, as is contained in the Canonical Inſtitutions by the Emperour Ludovicus Pius, ſet forth in the year of the Lord, 380. The words be theſe: Res Eccleſiæ vota ſunt fidelium, pretia peccatorum, & patrimonia pauperum: that is, The goods of the Church be the vows and bequeſts of the faithful, prices to ranſom ſuch as be in captivity or priſon, and patrimonies to ſuccour them with hoſpitality that be needy.

Whereunto agreeth alſo the teſtimony of Proſper, whoſe words be theſe: Viros ſanctos Eccleſiæ res non vendicaſſe ut proprias, ſed ut commendatas pauperibus diviſiſſe: that is, good men took the goods of the Church, not as their own, but diſtributed them as given and bequeathed to the poor. And ſaith moreover: Quod habet Eccleſia, cum omnibus nihil habentibus habet commune: that is, Whatſoever the Church hath, it hath it common with all ſuch as have nothing, &c.

Vowſons & pluralities of benefices.

Likewiſe Vowſons and pluralities of Benefices were things then as much unknown, as now they are pernitious to the Church, taking away all free election of Miniſters from the flock of Chriſt.

three points wherein the Popes Church erreth in his

All which inconveniences as they firſt came and crept in chiefly by the pretended authority and juriſdiction abuſed in this later Church of Rome: ſo it cannot be denied, but the ſaid later Church of Rome hath taken and attributed to it ſelf much more than either the limits of Gods Word do give, or ſtandeth with the example of the old Roman Church, in theſe three things eſpecial. Whereof as mention is touched before, ſo briefly I will recapitulate the ſame.

1. Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction fully reſtrained and impropriate to the Church of Rome, which ought to be generally equal to all Churches Chriſtian.

The firſt is this, that whatſoever the Scripture giveth and referreth, either to the whole Church univerſally, or to every particular Church ſeverally, this Church now of Rome doth arrogate to it ſelf abſolutely and only, both doing injury to other Churches, and alſo abuſing the Scriptures of God. For albeit, the Scripture doth give authority to bind and looſe, it limiteth it neither to perſon nor place, that is, neither to the City of Rome only, more than to other Cities, nor to the See of Peter, more than to other Apoſtles, but giveth it clearly to the Church, whereof Peter did bear the figure, ſo that whereſoever the true Church of Chriſt is, there is annexed power to bind and looſe, given and taken meerly as from Chriſt, and not mediately by the Pope or Biſhop of Peter's See.

2. Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction abuſed and extended in the Church of Rome further than the Word limiteth.

The 2d point wherein this preſent Church of Rome abuſeth his Juriſdiction contrary to the Scripture and ſteps of the old Roman Church, is this, for that it extendeth his authority further and more amply, than either the warrant of the Word, or example of time will give. For although the Church of Rome hath (as other particular Churches have) authority to bind and abſolve, yet it hath no ſuch authority to abſolve Subjects from their Oath, Subjection and Loyalty to their Rulers and Magiſtrates, to diſpenſe with perjury, to denounce remiſſion where no earneſt repentance is ſeen before, to number remiſſion by days and years, to diſpenſe with things expreſly in the word forbidden, or to reſtrain that which the word maketh free, to divide Religion into Religions, to bind and burthen Conſciences with conſtitutions of men, to excommunicate for worldly matters, as for breaking of Parks, for not ringing of Bells at the Biſhops coming, for not bringing litter for their horſe, for not paying their fees and rents, for withholding the Church goods, for holding on their Princes ſide in princely caſes, for not going at the Popes commandment, for not agreeing to the Popes Election in another Princes Realm, with other ſuch things more, and more vain than theſe, &c. Again, although the Scripture giveth leave and authority to the Biſhop and Church of Rome, to miniſter Sacraments: yet it giveth no authority to make Sacraments, much leſs to worſhip Sacraments. And though their authority ſerveth to baptiſe men, yet it extendeth not to chriſten Bells: neither have they authority by any Word of God to add to the Word of God, or take from the ſame, to ſet up unwritten verities under pain of damnation, to make other articles of belief, to inſtitute ſtrange worſhip, otherwiſe than he hath preſcribed which hath told us how he would be worſhipped, &c.

Chriſtening of Bells.

3. The Juriſdiction of the Pope abuſed and uſurped in temporal matters where he has nothing to do.

The third abuſe of the Popes Juriſdiction ſtandeth in this, that as in ſpiritual juriſdiction they have vehemently exceeded the bounds of Scripture, ſo they have impudently intermedled themſelves in temporal Juriſdiction, wherein they have nothing to do. Inſomuch that they have tranſlated their Empire, they have depoſed Emperors, Kings, Princes, Rulers, and Senators of Rome, and ſet up other, or the ſame again at their pleaſure, they have proclaimed Wars, and have warred themſelves. And whereas Emperours in ancient time have dignified them in titles, have enlarged them with donations, and they receiving their confirmation by the Emperours, have like ingrateful Clients to ſuch Benefactors, afterward ſtampt upon their Necks, have made them to hold their Stirrop, ſome to hold the Bridle of their Horſe, have cauſed them to ſeek their Confirmation at their hand; yea, have been Emperours themſelves, Sede vacante, & in diſcordia electionis, and alſo have been Senators of the City; moreover, have extorted into their own hands the plenary fulneſs of power and juriſdiction of both the Swords; eſpecially ſince the time of Pope Hildebrand; which Hildebrand depoſing Henry the 4th Emperor, made him give attendance at his City gate. And after him Pope Boniface the 8th. ſhewed himſelf to the People on the 1ſt day like a Biſhop, with his keyes before him, and the next day in his Robes Imperial, having a naked ſword born before him, like an Emperor, in the year of our Lord 1298. And for ſo much as this inordinate juriſdiction hath not only been uſed of them, but alſo to this day is maintained in Rome; let us therefore now compare for uſage hereof to the old manner in times paſt, meaning the Primitive and firſt age of the Church of the Romans. Wherein the old Biſhops of Rome in thoſe days, as they were then ſubject to their Emperor, ſo were other Biſhops in like manner of other Nations ſubject every one to his King and Prince, acknowleding them for their Lords, and were ordered by their authority, and obeyed their Laws, and that not only in cauſes Civil, but alſo in regiment Eccleſiaſtical, as appeareth, Diſt. 10. cap. 1. & 2. Diſt. 97. cap. De illicita.

Popes ſubmitted in the old time to Emperors. Ex cap. de juramento calumniæ.

Alſo, 24. q. 3. So was Gregorius, ſirnamed Magnus, ſubject to Mauricius, and to Phocas, although a wicked Emperor. So alſo both Pope and People of Rome took their Laws of the Emperors of Conſtantinople, and were ſubmitted to them, not only in the time of Honorius an hundred years after Conſtantine the great, but alſo in the time of Martianus, Anno 451. and ſo further unto the time of Juſtinian and of Carolus Magnus, and alſo after the days of them: in all which continuance of time, it is manifeſt, that the Imperial Law of Martian did rule and bind in Rome, both in the days of Juſtinian, and 150 years after, till the time of the Empire being tranſlated from Greece unto France. Whereby it may appear falſe, that the City of Rome was given by Conſtantine the firſt, unto the Biſhop of Rome to govern: for that Pope Boniface the firſt, writing to the Emperor Honorius, calleth in the ſame place Rome the Emperors City, Diſt. 97. cap. 1. And Lotharius alſo Emperor, appointed Magiſtrates and Laws in Rome, as is above mentioned. Moreover, for further probation hereof, that both the Biſhop of Rome, and all other Eccleſiaſtical perſons were in former time, and ought to be ſubject to their Emperors and lawful Magiſtrates, in cauſes as well Spiritual as Civil, by many evidences may appear, taken out both of Gods Law and mans law. And firſt by Gods Law, we have example of godly King David, who numbred all the Prieſts and Levites, and diſpoſed them into four and twenty orders or courſes, appointing them continually to ſerve in the Miniſtry, every one in his proper order and turn, as came about: which Inſtitution of the Clergy alſo, good King Ezechias afterward renewed, of whom it is written: He did that which was right in the ſight of the Lord, according to all things as his father David had done before: he took away the high groves, and brake down Images, &c. 4 Reg. 8. The ſaid Ezechias alſo reduced the Prieſts and Levites unto their orders preſcribed by David before, to ſerve every one in his office of miniſtration: 2 Paralip. 30. 31. And this order from David ſtill continued till the time of Zachary, at the coming of Chriſt our Lord, being of Abias courſe, which was the eighth order of the Prieſts appointed to ſerve in the Tabernacle, Luke 1. To paſs over other lighter offices as tranſlated from the Prieſts to Kings authority, as concerning the ordering of oblations in the Temple, and reparations of the Lords Houſe, King Solomon diſplaced Abiathar the High-Prieſt by his Kingly Power, and placed Sadoch in his ſtead: 3 Reg. cap. 6. Alſo dedicating the Temple of the Lord with all the People, bleſſed the whole Congregation of Iſrael, 3 Reg. 8. Judas Machabeus alſo elected Prieſts, ſuch as being without ſpot, had a zeal to the Law of the Lord, to purge the Temple, which the idolatrous Gentiles had before prophaned, 1 Mac. 4.

Alſo King Alexander witing to Jonathas, appointed him chief Prieſt in his Country, 1 Mac. 10. Demetrius ordained Simon and Alchimus in the like office of Prieſthood. Joſaphat likewiſe as in the whole Land did ſet Judges: ſo alſo in Jeruſalem he appointed Levites and Prieſts, and Heads of Families to have the hearing of cauſes, and to miniſter judgment over the People: 2 Paral. 19. By theſe and many other is to be ſeen, that Kings and Princes in the old time, as well when Prieſts were born Prieſts, as when they were made by election, had the dealing alſo in Eccleſiaſtical matters, as in calling the People to Gods ſervice, in cutting down groves, in deſtroying Images, in gathering Tithes into the Lords Houſe, in dedicating the Temple, in bleſſing the People, in caſting down the brazen Serpent within the Temple, in correcting and depoſing Prieſts, in conſtituting the order and offices of Prieſts, in commanding ſuch things as pertained to the ſervice and worſhip of God, and in puniſhing the contrary, &c. And in the New Teſtament, what meaneth the example of Chriſt himſelf, both giving and teaching Tribute to be given to Ceſar? to Ceſar I ſay, and not to the High-Prieſt. What meaneth his words to Pilate, not denying power to be given to him from above? John 19.

2 Par. 19.

And again, declaring the Kings of Nations to have dominion over them, and willing his Diſciples not ſo to do, giving us to underſtand the difference between the regiment of his ſpiritual Kingdom, and of the Kingdoms of this World, willing all worldly ſtates to be ſubject under the ſuperior Rulers and Magiſtrates, in whoſe regiment is dominion and ſubjection, and not in the other. Whereunto accordeth alſo the Doctrine of St. Paul, where it is written: Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher Powers, under whoſe obedience, neither Pope, Cardinal, Patriarch, Biſhop, Prieſt, Frier nor Monk is excepted nor exempted: as Theophylactus expounding the ſame place declareth and ſaith, Univerſos erudit; ſive Sacerdos ſit ille, ſive Monachus, ſive Apoſtolus, ut ſe principibus ſubdant: that is, He teacheth all ſorts, whether he be Prieſt, or Monk, or elſe Apoſtle, that they ſhould ſubmit themſelves under their Princes, &c. And S. Auguſtine writing ad Bonifacium ſaith in much like ſort: Quicunque autem legibus imperatoris, quæ pro Dei veritate feruntur, obtemperare noluit, acquirit grande ſupplicium: that is, Whoſoever refuſeth to obey the Laws of the Emperor, which make for the verity of God, incurreth the danger of great puniſhment, &c. Alſo in another place, writing contra Creſconium, hath theſe words, In hoc enim reges, ſicut eis divinitus præcipitur, Deo ſerviunt, in quantum reges, ſi in ſuo regno bona jubeant, mala prohibeant, non ſolum quæ pertinent ad humanam ſocietatem, verum etiam quæ ad divinam religionem, &c. that is, Kings according as it is enjoyned them of God, do ſerve God in that they are Kings, if they in their Kingdoms command thoſe things that be good, and forbid things that be evil, ſuch as appertain not only to human ſociety, but alſo to Gods Religion, &c. And yet to come more near to the Popes own Doctors, Thomas Aquine not much diſcrepant from the injunction of the Apoſtle above alledged, thus deſcribeth the office of a King, Hoc, inquit, officium Rex ſe ſuſcepiſſe cognoſcat, ut ſit in regno ſicut in corpore anima, & ſicut Deus in mundo, &c. Let a King (ſaith he) underſtand, that he hath taken this office upon him to be as the ſoul within the body, and as God in the World. In like agreement with the holy Apoſtle St. Paul, joyneth alſo St. Peter: Be you ſubject (ſaith he) to every humane creature, whether it be to the King as moſt preeminent, or to other ſet over you, &c. Where the common gloſs addeth thereto, To obey the ſame, whether they be good or evil. Theſe places rightly pondered, let any man now judge, whether the Pope hath done open wrong to the Emperor, in ſurpriſing above the juriſdiction of his lawful Prince and Magiſtrate, notwithſtanding whatſoever his own Canon Law ſaith to the contrary.

And as it is ſufficiently hitherto proved by Gods Law, that all Eccleſiaſtical perſons owe their due ſubjection to their lawful Princes, in matters as well temporal as ſpiritual: ſo no leſs evidences may alſo be inferred out of mans Law, and examples of the oldeſt Fathers to prove the ſame. And firſt to begin with the example of Gregory the great, who in his Epiſtle to Mauritius writeth thus, Dominus meus fuiſti, quando adhuc Dominus omnium non eras: ecce per me ſervum ultimum ſuum & veſtrum reſpondebit Chriſtus, &c. that is, You were then my Lord, when you were not the Lord of the whole Empire: behold Chriſt himſelf ſhall make you anſwer by me, which am his moſt ſimple ſervant and yours, &c. And before him Eleutherus his Predeceſſor, Biſhop of Rome, writing to Lucius, King of this Realm, calleth him by the name of Chriſts Vicar. But what needeth much confirmation of this matter, when the Popes Decrees and Canons be full of Records hereof, teſtifying how the ancient Church of Rome, not only received, but alſo required of the Emperors, Laws and Conſtitutions to be made, touching not only ſuch cauſes, but alſo ſuch perſons as were Eccleſiaſtical? And here to omit by the way the chapter, Principes ſeculi, alſo Chapter Adminiſtratores, 23, quæſt. 5. with divers other beſide, I will recite out of the Epiſtle of Boniface the firſt, to the Emperor Honorius, ſo much as ſerveth for our purpoſe, written Diſt. cap. 92 Eccleſiæ, cap. Victor. Where it is mentioned, that the ſaid Bonifacius Biſhop of Rome, ſent an humble ſupplication to the forenamed Emperor, deſiring him by his authority, to provide ſome remedy againſt the ambitious contentions of the Clergy, concerning the Biſhoprick of Rome. Which Emperour Honorius incontinent at his requeſt, directed and eſtabliſhed a Law, that none ſhould be made Biſhop of Rome through ambition, charging all Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters to ſurceaſe from ambition; appointing moreover, that if two were elected together, neither of them both ſhould be taken, but the election to proceed further to another to be choſen by a full conſent of voices, as is expreſſed, Diſt. 79. cap. Si duo.

Diſt. 79. ca. Si duo.

To this I adjoyn alſo the Law and Conſtitution of Juſtinian the Emperour, ratified and renewed afterward in the Council of Paris, in time of King Ludovicus Pius. Where all Biſhops and Prieſts be expreſly forbidden not to Excommunicate any man, before his cauſe was known and proved to be ſuch, as for the which the ancient Canons of the Church would have him to be Excommunicate. And if any ſhould otherwiſe proceed contrary to the ſame, then the Excommunicate perſon to be abſolved by the authority of an higher decree, and the Excommunicate to be ſequeſtred from the Communion, ſo long as ſhould ſeem convenient to him that had the execution thereof, as is expreſſed, 24. q. 3. De illicita. The ſame Juſtinian moreover in his Laws and Conſtitutions, how many things did he diſpoſe and ordain in Church-matters, as to have a determinate number of Church-men or Clerks in Churches, Conſt. 3. Alſo concerning Monaſteries and Monks, Conſt. 5. how Biſhops and Prieſts ſhould be ordained, Conſt. 6. concerning removing of Eccleſiaſtical perſons from one Church to another. Alſo concerning the conſtitution of the Churches in Africk. And that the holy myſteries ſhould not be done in private houſes: ſo that whoſoever ſhould attempt the contrary, ſhould be deprived, Conſt. 57. Moreover, concerning Clerks leaving their Churches, Conſt. 58. Alſo concerning the order and manner of Funerals Conſt. 59. And that Biſhops ſhould not keep from their Flock, Conſt. 67. The ſame Juſtinian granted to the Clergy of Conſtantinople the priviledge of the ſecular Court, in caſes only civil, and ſuch as touched not the diſturbance of the Biſhop: otherwiſe in all criminal Cauſes he left them to the judgment of the ſecular Court, Conſt. 83. He giveth alſo Laws and Decrees for breach of Matrimony, Conſt. 117. and in divers others places. And in his Conſt. 123. after the Doctrine of S. Paul, he commandeth all Biſhops and Prieſts to ſound out their ſervice, and to celebrate the myſteries, not after a ſecret manner, but with a loud voice, ſo as they might not only be heard, but alſo be underſtood of the faithful people, what was ſaid and done. Whereby it is to be gathered, that Divine Prayers and Service then, was in the vulgar Tongue.

And as the ſaid Juſtirian, and other Emperors in thoſe days had the Juriſdiction and Government over ſpiritual matters and perſons, the like examples alſo may be brought of other Kings in other Lands, who had no leſs authority in their Realms, than Emperours had in their Empire. As in France, Clodoveus the firſt chriſtened King at Orleance, cauſed a Council of thirty three Biſhops, where thirty three Canons were inſtituted concerning the government of the Church, within two hundred years after Chriſt: Ex primo tomo Concil. Carolus Magnus, beſide his other Laws and Edicts, political, called five Synods, one at Mentz, the ſecond at Rome, the third at Rhemes, the fourth at Cabilone, the fifth at Arelate, where ſundry Rites and Ordinances were given to the Clergy, about eight hundred and ten years after Chriſt. The ſame Carolus alſo decreed, that only the Canonical books of Scripture ſhould be read in the Church, and none other. Which before alſo was decreed Anno 417. in the third general Council of Carthage. Item, he exhorteth and chargeth Biſhops and Prieſts to Preach the Word, with a godly Injunction: Epiſcopi vero ut ſive per ſe, ſive per vicarios, pabulum verbi divini ſedulo populis annuncient. Quia, ut ait beatus Gregorius, iram contra ſe occulti judicis excitat ſacerdos, ſi ſine prædicationis ſonitu incedit. Et ut ipſi clerum ſibi commiſſum in ſobrietate & caſtitate nutriant, Superſtitiones quas quibuſdam in locis in exequiis mortuorum nonnulli faciunt, eradicent: that is, The Biſhops either by themſelves, or their Deputies, ſhall ſhew forth the food of Gods Word to the people with all diligence. For as Gregory ſaith, the Prieſt procureth againſt him the wrath of the ſecret Judge, which goeth without the ſound of preaching. And alſo that they bring up their Clergy to them committed, in ſoberneſs and chaſtity. The ſuperſtition which in certain places is uſed of ſome, about the Funerals of the dead, let them exterminate and pluck up by the roots, &c.

Moreover, inſtructing and informing the ſaid Biſhops and Prieſts in the office of preaching, willing them not to ſuffer any to ſain or preach to the people any new Doctrine of their own invention, and not agreeing to the Word of God, but that they themſelves both will preach ſuch things as lead to eternal life, and alſo that they ſet up other to do the ſame: and joyneth withal a godly exhortation. Ideo, dilectiſſimi, toto corde præparemus nos in ſcientia veritatis, & mox: Ut divina donante gratia verbum Dei currat & creſcat, & multiplicetur, in profectum Eccleſiæ Dei ſanctæ, & ſalutem animarum noſtrarum, & laudem, & gloriam nominis Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti. Pax prædicantibus, gratia obedientibus, gloria Domino noſtro Jeſu Chriſto, Amen. Furthermore, the ſaid Carolus in his Conſtitutions divideth the goods given to the Church &c. that in the more wealthy places, two parts ſhould go to the uſe of the poor, the third to the ſtipend of the Clergy. Otherwiſe in poorer places an equal diviſion to be made between the poverty and the Clergy, unleſs the gift had ſome ſpecial exception. Ex Anſegiſo, lib. 1. cap. 80. And in the ſame book a little after, cap. 83. the Author declareth, by the ſaid Carolus to be decreed, that no Eccleſiaſtical perſon or perſons from thenceforth ſhould preſume to take of any perſon, any ſuch gift or donation, whereby the Children or Kinſfolks of the ſaid Donor ſhould be defeated of their Inheritance duly to them belonging. Ludovicus Pius King of France, and after Emperour, was Son to the foreſaid Charles, who being joyned together with the ſaid Charles his father in the Empire, ordained alſo with his father ſundry Acts and Obſervances touching the government of the Church, as in the Author before alledged may appear. As firſt, that no entry ſhould be made into the Church by Simony: again, that Biſhops ſhould be ordained by the free election of the Clergy and of the people, without all reſpect of perſon or reward, only for the merit of life, and gift of heavenly Wiſdom.

Ludovicus Pius.

Ex Anſ. lib. 1. cap. 20.

Alſo the ſaid Kings and Emperours forbad that any freeman or Citizen ſhould enter the profeſſion of Monkery, without licence asked of the King before: and added a double cauſe wherefore. Firſt, for that many not for meer devotion, but for idleneſs, and avoiding the Kings Wars, do give themſelves to Religion: again, for that many be craftily circumvented and deluded by ſubtil covetous perſons ſeeking to get from that which they have, Lib. 1. cap. 114. ibidem. Item, that no young children or boys ſhould be ſhaven, or enter any Profeſſion without the will of their Parents. And no young Maidens ſhould take the vail or profeſſion of a Nun, before ſhe came to ſufficient diſcretion of years to diſcern and chooſe what they will follow. That none ſhould be entered or buried thenceforth within the Church: which alſo was decreed by Theodoſius and Valentinianus, forty years before them. Item, the ſaid Carolus, two and twenty years before this Emperour, enacted that Murtherers and ſuch as were guilty of death by the Law, ſhould have no ſanctuary by flying into the Church, &c. which alſo was decreed by Juſtinian three hundred years before this Carolus. *Ex novel. Moreover, the aforeſaid Ludovicus Pius, with his Son Clotharius (or as ſome call him, Lotharius) joyned with him, among other Eccleſiaſtical Sanctions, ordained a godly Law, for Lay-men to communicate the Sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord in theſe words: Ut ſi non frequentius, vel ter, laici homines communicent: niſi forte gravioribus quibuſdam criminibus impediantur: That Lay-men do communicate at leaſt thrice, if not oftener, except they be let percaſe by ſome more have hainous and grievous offences. Anſeg. lib. 2. cap. 43. Item, they enacted that no goods of the Church ſhould be alienated under the pain Leoninæ conſtitutionis. Unto this Lotharius, French King and Emperour, Pope Leo the fourth writeth that Romana lex, that is, the Roman Law, (meaning the Law of the French Emperours) as it hath hitherto ſtood in force: Ita & nunc ſuum robur proprumque vigorem obtineat, that is, So now it may continue ſtill in its vigour and ſtrength. Ino Carnotenſis, lib. 11. Decretorum. Ex Inno. Caruſenſis lib. decretorum.

The Pope pleadeth his cauſe at the Bar before the Emperor. 2 queſt. 6. Hoſti incontinenter. Ludovicus 9.

before whom the foreſaid Pope Leo was brought into judgment, and pleaded his cauſe of Treaſon, and there was before the Emperour quit and releaſed. Which declareth that Popes and Biſhops all this while were in ſubjection under their Kings and Emperours.

Moreover, deſcending yet to lower times. Anno 1228. Ludovicus the Ninth, called holy. Ludovike, made a Law againſt the peſtiferous Simony in the Church; alſo for the maintenance of the liberty of the Church of France, eſtabliſhed a Law or Decree, againſt the new Inventions, Reſervations, Preventions, and Exactions of the Court of Rome, called Pragmatica ſanctio, S. Ludovici, the which Sanction was alſo practiſed long after in the Kingdom of France againſt the Popes Collectors and under-Collectors, as appeareth by the Areſtum of the Council of Paris, Anno 1463. Ex Molinæo in Commentariis. Furthermore, King Philip le Bel. 1303. ſet forth a Law, called Philippina, wherein was forbidden any exaction of new tythes and firſt fruits, and other unaccuſtomed collections to be put upon the Church of France. Carolus the fifth, named Sapiens. Anno 1369. by a Law, commanded that no Biſhops nor Prelates, or their Officials within his Kingdom of France, ſhould execute any cenſure of ſuſpenſe, or Excommunication, at the Popes commandment, over or upon the Cities or Towns, Corporations, or Commons of his Realm. Ex regiſt. antiquarum conſtat chart. 26. Item Carolus the ſixth, Anno 1388. againſt the Cardinals and other Officials, and Collectors of the Pope, revoking again the power which he had given to them before provided by a Law, that the fruits and rents of Benefices, with other penſions, and Biſhops goods that departed, ſhould no more be exported by the Cardinals and the Popes collectors unto Rome, but ſhould be brought to the King, and ſo reſtored to them to whom they did rightly appertain.

Pragmatica ſanctio, S. Ludovici. Areſtum Senatus Pariſien. ex Molineo. Philippus Pulcher. Carolus Sapiens. Carolus 6.

The like alſo may be inferred and proved by the ſtories and examples of our Kings here in England, as King Offa, King Egbertus, Edgarus, Aluredus, Athelwoldus, Canutus, Edwardus, William the Conquerer, William Rufus, Henry the firſt, Henry the ſecond, till the time of King John and after. Whoſe dealing as well in Eccleſiaſtical caſes as Temporal, is a ſufficient demonſtration to prove what injury the Popes in theſe latter days have done unto the Emperours, their lawful Governors and Magiſtrates: in uſurping ſuch fulneſs of power and juriſdiction over them, to whom properly they owe ſubjection, contrary to the ſteps and example of the old Roman Biſhops their Anceſtors: and therefore have incurred the danger of a Premunire, worthy to be deprived. Although it is not to be denied, but that Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters and Servitors have their power alſo committed unto them, after their ſort, of the Lord: yet it becometh every man to know his own place and ſtanding, and there to keep him, wherein his own precinct doth pale him, and not raſhly to break out into other mens walks. As it is not lawful for a civil Magiſtrate to intermeddle with a Biſhops or a Preachers Function: ſo unſeemly and unorderly it is again, that Boniface the eighth ſhould have born before him the temporal Mace and naked Sword of the Emperour: or that any Pope ſhould bear a triple Crown, or take upon him like a Lord and King. Wherefore let every man conſider the compaſs and limitation of his charge, and exceed no further. The office of a Biſhop or ſervitor Eccleſiaſtical was in the old Law to offer ſacrifice, to burn incenſe, to pray for the people, to expound the Law, to miniſter in the Tabernacle, with which office it was not lawful for any Prince or man elſe to intermeddle: as we read how Joſias was puniſhed for offering incenſe, and another for touching the Ark: ſo now the office of Chriſtian Miniſters, is, to preach the Word, to miniſter the Sacraments, to pray, to bind and looſe, where cauſe urgently requireth, to judge the ſpiritual caſes, to publiſh and denounce free reconciliation and remiſſion in the name of Chriſt, to erect and comfort troubled Conſciences, with the rich grace of the Goſpel, to teach the people the true difference betwixt the Law and the Goſpel, whereof the one belongeth to ſuch as be not in Chriſt, and come not to him: the other pertaineth to the true believers in the Son of God: to admoniſh alſo the Magiſtrates erring or tranſgreſſing in their office, &c.

The office of the Eccleſiaſtical Miniſter.

And as theſe properly belong to the Function of the Eccleſiaſtical ſort: ſo hath the civil Governor or Magiſtrate again his proper charge and office to him aſſigned, which is, to ſee the adminiſtration of juſtice and judgment, to defend with power the right of the weak that ſuffer wrong, to defend from oppreſſion the poor oppreſſed, to miniſter with equity that which is right and equal to every man, to provide Laws good and godly, to ſee the execution of the ſame as cauſe moveth: eſpecially to ſee the Law of God maintained, to promote Chriſts Glory and Goſpel, in ſetting up and ſending out good Preachers, in maintaining the ſame, in providing Biſhops to be elected that be faithful, in removing or elſe correcting the ſame being faulty or negligent, in congregating the Clergy, when need is of any counſel or election, to hear their learning in cauſes propounded, and according to the truth learned, to direct his judgment in diſpoſing ſuch Rites and Ordinances for the Church, as make to edification, not to the deſtruction thereof: in conſerving the diſcipline of the Church, and ſetting all things in a congruous order. Briefly, the office of the civil Ruler and Magiſtrate, extendeth to miniſter juſtice and judgment in all Courts, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal: to have correction over all Tranſgreſſors, whether they be Lay-men or perſons Eccleſiaſtical. And finally, all ſuch things as belong to the moving of the Sword whatſoever, that is to ſay, all outward puniſhment is referred to the juriſdiction of the ſecular Magiſtrate, under whoſe ſubjection the Ordinance of God hath ſubjected all Orders and States of men.

The office of civil Rulers and Magiſtrates.

Here we have the witneſs alſo of Hormiſda, Biſhop of Rome, which being well weighed, maketh the matter plain, that Princes have to deal in ſpiritual cauſes alſo, not only in temporal: where the ſaid Hormiſda writeth to Epiphanius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople in this ſort: Clara cœleſtis miſericordiæ demonſtratio procedit, quando reges ſeculi cauſas de fide cum gubernatione politiæ conjungunt. &c. ex Act. v. univerſ. concil. Conſtantini ſecundi. Anno 528. And thus much and too much peradventure concerning the matter of juriſdiction, in which point this new Church of Rome hath ſwerved from the ancient Church of Rome which was, as is ſufficiently proved.

The third point wherein the Church of Rome is altered from the Church of Rome. The titles and ſtiles of the Biſhop of Rome.

THe third point wherein the Church of Rome hath broken, and is departed from the Church of Rome, is the form of ſtile and title annexed to the Biſhop of that See. As where he is called Pope, moſt holy Father, Vicar general, and Vicar of Chriſt, ſucceſſor of Peter, univerſal Biſhop, Prince of Prieſts, Head of the Church univerſal, Summus orbis Pontifex, Stupor mundi, head Biſhop of the World, the admiration of the World, neither God nor man, but a thing between both, &c. for all theſe terms be given him in Popiſh books. Albeit the name Pope, being a Greek name, derived of πάππας, which ſoundeth as much as Father in the Syracuſane Speech, may peradventure ſeem more tolerable, as which hath been uſed in the old time among Biſhops; for ſo Auſtin was called of the Council of Aphrick, Hierome of Boniface and others. Alſo Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage was called Papa 24. q. 1. cap. loquitur & diſt. 50. cap. De eo tamen. Item Clodoveus or (as Rhenanus calleth him) Ludovicus, firſt Chriſtian King of France, calleth a certain ſimpler Biſhop, Papam. Hierome alſo in his Epiſtle to Chromatius, calleth Valerianus by the name of Pope: and likewiſe writing to Euſtathius and Fabiola, he calleth Epiphanius, Beatum Papam. In the Apologies of Athanaſius, we read oftentimes that he was called Papa, and Archiepiſcopus. Ruffinus alſo lib. 2. cap. 26. calleth him Pontificem maximum. Alſo Aurelius Prefident in the ſixth Council of Carthage, was called of the ſaid Council Papa, ex cap. 4. vj. Concil. Carthag. And before this, Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome, writing to King Lucius, the firſt Chriſtian King in this Land, calleth him in his Epiſtle, the Vicar of Chriſt, &c. But that any of theſe terms were ſo peculiarly applied to the Biſhop of Rome, that other Biſhops were excluded from the ſame, or that any one Biſhop above the reſt had the name of Oecumenical, or univerſal, or head, to the derogation of other Biſhops, or with ſuch glory as is now annexed to the ſame: that is not to be found neither in Hiſtories of the old time, nor in any example of the Primitive Church, nor in the teſtimonies of ancient approved Doctors. Firſt, before the Council of Nice, it is evident by Pope Pius the ſecond, that there was no reſpect had to the Church of Rome, but every Church then was ruled by her own governance, till the year of our Lord, 340. Then followed the Council of Nice, wherein was decreed, that throughout the whole Univerſity of Chriſts Church, which was now far ſpread over all the world, certain Provinces or Precincts, to the number of four, were appointed, every one to have his head Church, and chief Biſhop, called them Metropolitan or Patriarch, to have the overſight of ſuch Churches as did lie about him. In the number of which Patriarchs or Metropolitans, the Biſhop of Rome had the firſt place, the Biſhop of Alexandria was the ſecond, the Biſhop of Antioch the third, the Biſhop of Hieruſalem was the fourth Patriarch. Afterward, in the number of theſe Patriarchs came in alſo the Biſhop of Conſtantinople in the room of the Biſhop of Antioch. So theſe four or five Metropolitans or Patriarchs, had their peculiar circuits and precincts to them peculiarly appointed, in ſuch ſort, as one of them ſhould not deal within an others precinct, and alſo that there ſhould be among them equality of honour, whereupon we read ſo oft in the decrees of the old counſels, τὰ ἴσα πρεσβεῖα τῶν θρόνων, καὶ τῆς τιμῆς, that is, Equal degree of Thrones, and of honour among Prieſts and Miniſters. Again, ſpeaking of the ſaid Patriarchs or Primats, we read in the ſecond and third chapter of the Council of Conſtantinople, ἐπισκόπους τοὺς ὑπερορίοις ἐκκλησίαις μὴ ἐπιέναι, μηδὲ συγχέειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας, that is, That Biſhops ſhould not invade the Dioceſſe of other Biſhops without their borders, nor confound together Churches, &c. Moreover, the old Doctors for the moſt and beſt part, do accord in one ſentence, that all Biſhops placed whereſoever in the Church of God, be Ejuſdem meriti & honoris & ſucceſſores Apoſtolorum, that is, To be of one merit, of like honour, and all to be ſucceſſors together of the Apoſtles. Alſo, he that is the Authour of the Book called Dionyſius Areopagita, calleth all the Biſhops ὁμοταγεῖς, καὶ ἰσοτίμους, that is, Of equal order, and of like honour, &c. All this while the Biſhop of Rome was a Patriarch, and a Metropolitan or Biſhop called of the firſt See, but no Oecumenical Biſhop, nor head of the univerſal Church, nor any ſuch matter. In ſo much, that he, with all other Biſhops, was debarred from that, by a plain decree of the Council of Carthage, Can. 39. in theſe words, ὥστε τῆς πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λέγεσθαι ἔξαρχον τῶν ἱερέων, ἢ ἄκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιοῦτόν τι ποτε; that is, That the Biſhop of the firſt Seat ſhall not be called the Prince of Prieſts, or the High Prieſt, or any ſuch thing,

Chriſts

The four Patriarchs appointed by the Council of Nice. Ex Concil. Nicen. Ex Concil. Conſtantinop. cap. 36.

Ex Concil. Carthag. Can. 39.

And leſt any here ſhould take occaſion of cavelling, to hear him called Biſhop of the firſt Seat, here is to be expounded what is meant by the firſt Seat, and wherefore he was ſo called: not for any dignity of the perſon, either of him which ſucceedeth, or of him whom he is ſaid to ſucceed, but only of the place wherein he ſitteth. This is plainly proved by the Council of Chalcedon, cap. 28. Wherein is manifeſtly declared the cauſe why the See of Rome among all other Patriarchal Sees is numbred for the firſt See by the ancient Fathers: For why, ſaith the Council, καὶ γὰρ θρόνῳ τῆς πρεσβυτέρας Ῥώμης, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην οἱ πατέρες εἰκότως ἀποδεδώκασι τὰ πρεσβεῖα; that is, For that our forefathers did worthily attribute the chief degree of honour to the See of old Rome, becauſe the principal reign or empery was in that City, &c. The ſame alſo is confirmed by Euſebius Cæſarienſis, declaring, Quod excellentia Romani Imperii extulit papatum Rom. pontificis ſupra alias Eccleſias; That the excellency of the Roman Empery did advance the Popedom of the Roman Biſhop above other Churches, &c. Ex Gab. Biel. Moreover, ſaith the ſaid Cæſarienſis; Nicena Synodus hoc contulit privilegium Rom. pontifici, ut ſicut Romanorum Rex Auguſtus præ cæteris appellatur, ita Rom. pontifex præ cæteris Epiſcopis Papa vocaretur. That is, The Council (ſaith he) of Nice gave this priviledge to the Biſhop of Rome, that like as the King of the Romans is named Emperor above all other Kings, ſo the Biſhop of the ſame City of Rome ſhould be called Pope above other Biſhops, &c. By theſe places hitherto alledged (and ſuch other, many more than be here alledged) it appeareth, that though theſe Titles of Superiority had been attributed to the Biſhop of Rome: yet it remaineth certain, that the ſaid Biſhop received that preferment, Jure non divino, ſed humano, by mans law, not by the Law of God. And ſo is the diſtinction of the Popes proved falſe, where is ſaid: Romanam Eccleſiam non a conſilio aliquo, ſed a divina voce primatum accepiſſe, That the Church of Rome took not his primacy by any Council, but only by the voice of God. And this is to be ſaid, although it were true that theſe titles and terms were ſo given to the Biſhop of Rome in the old time: yet how and by whom they were given, ye ſee. Now to try this matter, as joyning an iſſue with our Adverſaries, whether theſe foreſaid Titles of Soveraignty were applied in the old time of the primitive Church to the Biſhop of Rome, as to be called the Vicar general of Chriſt, the head of the whole Church, and univerſal Biſhop, remaineth to be proved. Whereunto this in my mind is to be anſwered. that albeit the Biſhops of Rome (of ſome peradventure) were ſo called by the names of higher preeminence) of that City, of ſome going about to pleaſe them, or to crave ſome help at their hands: yet that calling, 1. Was uſed then but of a few. 2. Neither was given to many. 3. Was rather given than ſought for, of the moſt. 4. Was not ſo given that it maketh or can make any general neceſſity of Law why every one is ſo bound to call them, as the Biſhop of Rome now ſeeketh to be taken and called, and that by neceſſity of Salvation, as the decree of Pope Boniface the eighth witneſſeth, where is ſaid, Quod ſit de neceſſitate ſalutis ut credatur primatus Eccleſiæ Rom. & ei ſubeſſe: That it ſtandeth upon neceſſity of ſalvation, to believe the primacy of the Church of Rome, and to be ſubject to the ſame, &c.

The Popes decree proved falſe.

1\. 2. 3. 4.

Boniface 8. Extravag. de majoritat. & obedient. cap. unam.

As touching therefore theſe titles and terms of preeminence aforeſaid, orderly to ſet forth and declare what Hiſtories of times do ſay in that matter, by the Grace of Chriſt. First, we will ſee what be the Titles the Biſhop of Rome doth take and challenge to himſelf, and what is the meaning of them. 2. When they firſt came in, whether in the primitive time or not, and by whom. 3. How they were firſt given to the Roman Biſhops; that is, whether of neceſſary duty, or voluntary devotion, whether commonly of the whole, or particularly of a few; and whether in reſpect of Peter, or in reſpect of the City, or elſe of the worthineſs of the Biſhop which there ſat. 4. And if the aforeſaid names were then given of certain Biſhops, unto the Biſhop of Rome: whether all the ſaid names were given or but certain, or what they were. 5. Or whether they were then received of all Biſhops of Rome, to whome they were given, or elſe refuſed of ſome. 6. And finally, whether they ought to have been refuſed being given, or not. Touching the diſcourſe of which matters, although it appertain to the profeſſion rather of Divines, than Hiſtorians, and would require a long and large debating: yet for ſo much as both in theſe, and divers other weighty Controverſies of divinity, the knowledge of times and Hiſtories muſt needs help Divines diſputing about the ſame, ſo much as the Grace of Chriſt ſhall aſſiſt me therein, I will joyn to the ſeeking out of truth ſuch help as I may.

1\. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6.

And firſt to begin with the Names and Titles now claimed and attributed to the See and Biſhop of Rome, and what they be, is ſufficiently declared above, that is, the Chief Prieſt of the World, The Prince of the Church, Biſhop Apoſtolical, The univerſal Head of the Church, The Head and Biſhop of the Univerſal Church, The Succeſſor of Peter, Moſt holy Pope, Vicar of God on Earth, Neither God nor man, but a mixt thing between both; The Patriarch or Metropolitan of the Church of Rome, The Biſhop of the firſt See, &c. Unto the which Titles or Stiles is annexed a triple Crown, a triple Croſſe, two croſſed Keys, a naked Sword, ſeven-fold Seals, in token of the ſeven-fold Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, he being carried pick-back upon mens ſhoulders, after the manner of the Heathen Kings, having all the Empire and the Emperor under his dominion: and that it is not convenient for any terrene Prince to Reign there, where he ſitteth, having the plenary fulneſs of power, as well of temporal things as ſpiritual things in his hands: that all things are his, and that all ſuch Princes as have given him any thing, have given him but his own, having at his will and pleaſure to preach Indulgences, and the Croſſe againſt Princes whatſoever: and that the Emperor and certain other Princes, ought to make to him confeſſion of ſubjection at their Coronation: having authority to depoſe, and that he De facto, hath depoſed Emperors and the King of France: alſo to abſolve the Subjects from their Allegiance to their Princes: whom Kings have ſerved for foot-men to lead his horſe and the Emperor to hold his ſtirrop; that he may and doth give power to Biſhops upon the bodies of men, and hath granted them to have Priſons; without whoſe Authority no general Council hath any force. And to whom Appellations in all manner of Cauſes may and ought to be made: That his

Decrees

Decrees be equal with the decrees of the Nicene Council, and are to be obſerved and taken in no leſs force than if they had been confirmed with the heavenly voice of Saint Peter himſelf. Ex fra. Barth. & aliis. Item, that the ſaid Biſhop of Rome hath the heavenly diſpoſition of things, and therefore may alter and change the nature of things, by applying the ſubſtance of one thing to another, cap. Quando de tranſl. Epiſc. tit. 7. Item, that he can of nothing make ſomething, and cauſe the ſentence, which before was none, to ſtand in effect: and may diſpenſe above the Law, and of injuſtice make juſtice, in correcting and changing Laws, for he hath the fulneſs of power. And again, diſt. 40. cap. Si Papa: If the Pope do lead with him innumerable Souls by flocks into Hell, yet no man muſt preſume to rebuke his faults in this World. Item, that it ſtandeth upon neceſſity of ſalvation to believe the primacy of the See of Rome, and to be ſubject to the ſame, &c.

Ex frat. Barth. & alib.

Cap. quando de tranſl. & epiſc. tit. 7.

Diſt. 40. cap. Si Papa.

These things thus declared, now let us ſee whether theſe names and titles, with the form and manner of this Authority and regality above rehearſed, were ever attributed to any in the primitive time of the Biſhop of Rome. For all theſe he doth challenge and claim unto him by old poſſeſſion from the time of Saint Peter. And here a queſtion is to be asked of our Adverſaries the Papiſts, Whether they will avouch all theſe aforeſaid titles, together with the whole form and tenour of regality to the ſame belonging as is afore touched, or not? If they will, let them come forth with their Allegations, which they never have done yet, nor ever ſhall be able. If they will not, or cannot avouch them altogether in manner as is ſpecified, then why doth the Biſhop claim them all together ſo ſtoutly, uſurp them ſo falſely, and obtrude them upon us ſo ſtrictly? Moreover if the ſaid our Adverſaries, being convicted by plain evidence of Hiſtory, and example of time, will yield unto us (as they muſt needs) in part, and not in the whole; let us come then to the particulars, and ſee what part of this regality they will defend, and derive from the ancient cuſtom of the primitive Church, (that is, from the firſt five hundred years, I mean after Chriſt,) Firſt, in the Council of Nice, which was the year of our Lord, 340. and in the ſixth Canon of the ſaid Council, we find it ſo decreed: that in every Province or Precinct ſome one Church, and Biſhop of the ſame, was appointed and ſet up to have the inſpection and regiment of other Churches about him, Secundum morem antiquum; that is, After the ancient cuſtom, as the words of the Council do purport: ſo that the Biſhop of Alexandria ſhould have power of Libya, and Pentapolis in Egypt, foraſmuch as the Biſhop of the City of Rome hath the like or ſame manner. And in like ſort alſo in Antioch and in other Countries; let every Church have his due honour, and conſequently that the Biſhop of Jeruſalem have alſo his due honour to him reſerved, ſo that ſuch order be kept, that the Metropolian Cities be not defrauded of their dignity which to them is due and proper, &c. In this Council find in the ſame Canon ſixth and ſeventh, where the Biſhops of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch are joyned together in one like manner of Dignity. Firſt, there appeareth no difference of honour to be meant therein. Secondly, forſomuch as in the ſaid two Canons after mention made of them, immediately followeth, that no Biſhop ſhould be made without conſent of their Metropolitans, yea and that the City alſo of Hieruſalem ſhould be under his Metropolitan, and that the Metropolitan ſhould have the full power to confirm every Biſhop made in his Province: therefore it may be well ſuſpected, that the third Epiſtle Decretal of Pope Anacletus, and of Pope Stephanus, with other more, are forged, wherein theſe Biſhops, and eſpecially the Biſhop of Rome, is exempted and diſſevered from the name of a Metropolitan or an Archbiſhop, to the name of a Patriarch or Primate: as appeareth in the decrees, Diſt. 22, cap. Sacroſancta. Wherefore as we muſt needs grant the Biſhop of Rome to be a Metropolitan or Archbiſhop by the Council of Nice; ſo we will not greatly ſtick in this alſo, to have him numbred with Patriarchs or Primats. Which title ſeemeth in the old time to be common to more Cities than to Rome, both by the Epiſtle of Anacletus, of Pope Stephanus, of Pope Julius and Leo, &c.

The Biſhop of Rome called Metropolitan, Archbiſhop, Patriarch, Primat.

After this followed a general Council in Africk, called the ſixth Council of Carthage, Anno 420. where were congregated two hundred and ſeventeen Biſhops, among whom was alſo Auguſtinus, Proſper, Oroſius, with divers other famous perſons. This Council continued the ſpace of five years, wherein was great contention about the Supremacy and Juriſdiction of Rome: the Biſhop whereof then was Zoſimus. This Zoſimus the Roman Biſhop had received the ſame time into the Communion of the Church without any examination, one that came to complain to him out of Africk, named Apiarius, a Prieſt whom Aurelius the Metropolitan with the Council of Africk had worthily excommunicated for his deteſtable conditions before. Upon this Zoſimus after that he had received and ſhewed ſuch favour to Apiarius, for that he did appeal to him, ſendeth to the Council his Meſſengers, to wit, Fauſtinus Biſhop of Potentine, and two Prieſts of the Church of Rome, named Philippus and Aſellus, with theſe four requeſts: Firſt, that Apiarius, whom he had abſolved might be received of them again, and that it might be lawful for Biſhops or Prieſts to appeal from the ſentence of their Metropolites, and alſo of the Council to the See of Rome.

Ex concilium tom. 1. in fœno ſynod. Carthag.

Secondly, that Biſhops ſhould not fail over importunely Ad comitatum. Thirdly, that if any Prieſt or Deacon were wrongfully Excommunicate by the Biſhops of their own Province, it ſhould be lawful for them to remove the hearing and judging of their cauſe to their neighbour Biſhops. Fourthly, that Urbanus their Biſhop, either ſhould be excommunicated, or elſe ſent up to Rome, unleſs he would correct thoſe things that were to be corrected, &c. For the approbation whereof, the ſaid Zoſimus alledged for him the words (as he pretended) taken out of Nicene Council. The Council of Carthage hearing this, and remembring no ſuch thing in the Council of Nice to be decreed, and yet not ſuſpecting the Biſhop of Rome, to dare wrongfully to falſifie the words of that Council, writeth again to Zoſimus, declaring that they never read to their remembrance, in their common Latin exemplar of the Nicene Council any ſuch Canon; yet notwithſtanding for quietneſs ſake, they would obſerve the ſame time till they might procure the Original Copies of that Council to be ſent to them from Conſtantinople, Alexandria, and from Antioch. In like effect afterward they wrote to Pope Boniface, which then ſucceeded Zoſimus. And thirdly alſo to Celeſtinus, which ſhortly after ſucceeded Boniface.

The Popes of Rome taken with the manner in falſifying the decree of Nicene Council.

In the mean time this foreſaid Council ſent their Legates, Marcellus and Innocentius to Atticus Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and to Cyrillus Patriarch of Alexandria, for the authentick Copies in Greek of Nicene Council, which being ſent unto them, and they finding in the true Originals no ſuch Canon, as the Biſhop of Rome had falſely forged, they wrote a ſharp and an handſome Letter to Celeſtinus Biſhop of Rome, calling him in the ſaid Letter by the way Domine frater: declaring to him, how they had perſued all the Copies of the Council of Nice, and could find no ſuch Canon as he and his Predeceſſors had falſely alledged, and therewithall reciting the ſixth Canon afore mentioned, declared how the decrees of the Nicene Council had committed all and ſingular perſons Eccleſiaſtical, as well Biſhops as other, unto the charge of their Metropolitans. Moreover expounding the ſame Decree, they ſhewed the reaſon thereof.

The Biſhop of Rome called Dominus frater, that is brother Biſhop.

Biſhops of Rome proved falſifiers of the Nicene Council.

Five reaſons why matters of Controverſie ought not to be had out of other Countries unto Rome.

1. For that (ſay they) the Fathers of that Council did well foreſee, to be moſt juſt and convenient, that Controverſies there be ended (in iiſdem locis) where they begin. 1.

2. For that it is not to be ſuppoſed contrary, but that the Grace of God will be as preſt and ready in one Province as in an other, to inſtruct his Miniſters both prudently to underſtand judgment, and conſtantly to maintain the ſame. 2.

3. For that there is no need to ſeek further to any Outlandiſh help, becauſe ſpecially that the party whoſoever is not contented with the determination of his Judges or Commiſſioners, may lawfully appeal either to the Provincial or to any general Council. 3.

4. That way to be better, than to run to any foreign Judge, it muſt needs be granted; becauſe it is not like that our God will inſpire his Juſtice and Truth of examining unto one Biſhop, and deny it unto a multitude congregated in a whole Council. 4.

5. Neither can it be, that any ſuch Outlandiſh judgment in hearing and determining cauſes, can ſtand perfect and upright, for that the neceſſary perſons of witneſſes, either for infirmity of Sex, of Age, of Sickneſs, or ſome other Impeach- 5.

Every Country to appeal firſt to his own Metropolitan, ſecondly to a Provincial or general Council.

Impeachment, are not be able to present, by whom the truth of the sentence should be directed. Wherefore as by these and other reasons they thought it not convenient from them to bring their matters over unto Rome: so neither was it to be found, said they, by any Council of the old Fathers decreed, that any Legats should be sent from Rome to them, for deciding of their matters. And therefore exhorted they the said Bishop of Rome, that he would not induce Fumosum typhum (or rather as I may call it) typhos seculi, in Ecclesiam Christi, quæ lucem simplicitatis & humilitatis præfert iis qui Deum diligunt: that is, That he would not induce the swelling pride of the world into the Church of Christ, which Church sheweth and giveth the light of simplicity and of humility to such as love God, &c. In these foresaid Letters moreover is signified, how the forenamed Malefactor Apiarius, whom the Bishop of Rome before had absolved and received to the Communion of the Church, was afterward found culpable, and therefore the Council proceeded against him, brought him to open confession of his faults, and so injoyned him due penance for his demerits, notwithstanding the absolution and inconsiderate clearing of the Bishop of Rome before proceeding.

Summary notes gathered out the Council of Carthage against the Pope.

1\. 1. In sum, out of this Council of Carthage these points are to be noted. First, how glad the Bishops of Rome were to receive such as came to them for succour.

2\. 2. What pride they took by the occasion thereof, thinking and seeking thereby to have all under their subjection.

3\. 3. To the intent to allure other to seek to them, how ready they were to release and quit this Apiarius as guiltless, which after was to be tried culpable by his own confession.

4\. 4. How contrary to the acts and doings of the Romish Bishop, this Council condemned him, whom the said Bishop of Rome before had absolved, little respecting the proceedings of the Romish Church.

5\. 5. How the Bishops of old time, have been falsifiers of ancient Councils and Writings, whereby it may be suspected, that they which shamed not to falsifie and corrupt the Council of Nice, muchless would they stick to abuse and falsifie the decretal Epistles and Writings of particular Bishops and Doctors for their own advantage, as no doubt they have done many one.

6\. 6. In this foresaid Council, whereat Augustine himself was present, and where Aurelius President of the same, was called Papa, the Bishop of Rome was called expresly in their Letters but Bishop of the City of Rome, and Dominus frater, that is, brother Lord Bishop.

7\. 7. The Dominion of this Roman Patriarch, in the said Council of Carthage, was cut so short, that neither it was permitted to them of Africk to appeal over the Sea to him, nor for him to send over his Legats to them for ending their Controversies. Whereby it may sufficiently appear, that the Bishop of Rome in those days was not at all admitted to be the chief of all other Bishops, nor the head of the universal Church of Christ in earth, &c.

8\. 8. We hear in this Council, five causes or reasons given, why it is not necessary nor yet convenient for all foreign causes to be brought to one universal Head or Judge, as is before recited.

9\. 9. Lastly, by the said Council of Carthage, we hear a vertuous exhortation to be given to the Bishop of Rome, that he would not induce into the meek and humble Church of Christ, the fuming and swelling pride of the World, as is before declared, &c. In this, or in some other Council of Carthage, it was moreover provided by express Law, and also specified in the Popes decrees, that no Bishop of the first Seat, should be called the Prince of Priests, or the chief Priest, or any such like thing; but only the Bishop of the first Seat, as followeth more in the said decree. Universalis autem, nec etiam Romanus Pontifex appelletur, that is, Be it enacted, that no Bishop, no not the Bishop of Rome, be called universal Bishop, &c. And thus much concerning this foresaid Council of Carthage.

Dist. 99 cap. fidei epis.

The highest title belonging to a Bishop, is to be called the Bishop of the first Seat.

Not long before this Council, was celebrated in Africk an other Council, called Synodus Milevitana, about the year of our Lord, 4[illegible]2. at the which Council also S. Augustine was present, where it was decreed under pain of Excommunication, that no Minister or Bishop should appeal over the Sea to the Bishop of Rome. Whereby it may appear that the Bishop of Rome all this space was not universally called by the term of Oecumenical or universal Bishop, but Bishop of the first Seat: so that if there were any preferment therein, it was in the reverence of the place, and not in the authority of the person. And yet it was not so in the place, that the place importeth the City of Rome only, but the first Seat then was called Metropolitan Church, as by the words of the Nicene Council, and other Constitutions more is to be seen, where the four Patriarchs were called πρῶτοι, or πρωτεύοντες, or προεστῶτες, as namely, by the words of the Council of Carthage may appear which be these: εἰ μὴ μετὰ ψηφίσματος τῆς πρώτης καθέδρας τῆς ἰδίας ἑκάστης χώρας ἐπισκόπου· τοῦτ' ἔστιν, εἰ μὴ ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ τοῦ πρωτεύοντος κατεξαίρετον λάβῃ. That is, except he have some special licence or exception, by the consent of the first Seat of the proper Bishop in every Country, that is, of him that is the primate in the said Country, &c. Also the words of the Can. 39. of the Council of Carthage, before touched, be these, ὥστε τῆς πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λέγεσθαι ἔξαρχον τῶν ἱερέων, ἢ ἄκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιοῦτόν τι ποτέ; that is, That the Bishop of the first Seat be not called Prince of Priests, or head Priest, or else any such like. Again, Anicetus the tenth Bishop of Rome, and Pope Stephan, and Pope Felix, making a difference between a Primate and Metropolitan, writeth thus: Let no Archbishops be called Primates, but only such as have the first Seat, &c. Thus it is made plain, how the Bishop of the first Seat, or first Bishop, or Primate is none other but he which was called Patriarch, and belonged not only to the Church of Rome, but to all such Cities and places whereas before among the Gentiles were Primi flamines, &c. dist. 80. cap. urbes & loca, & in illis. Where, by the way, is to be noted the repugnance or contrariety of such as craftily, but falsely have counterfeited the Popes decretal Epistles: which besides other great and many Conjectures also hereby may be gathered. For where Clement, Anacletus, Epi. 12. Anicetus and other, joyning together the office of Patriarchs and Primates, do divide the same from the order of Metropolitans, or Archbishops, alledging therein the constitution of the Apostles and their Successors, that is to be found false by the Canons of the Apostles, by the Council of Nice, and by the Council of Antioch, with other more. For in the Canons of the Apostles, where in every Canon almost, mention is made of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, no word is there touched either of any order above the Bishop, or lower than the Deacon; save only in the thirty three Canon, setting an order among Bishops, the Canon willeth the Bishop of every Nation to know their first or chief Bishop, and him to be taken for the Head of them: he saith not the Head of the Church, or Head of the world, but the Head of those Bishops. And where? not in Rome only, but plainly and expresly in every Nation, for so the words purport, τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἑκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον; that is, The Bishops of every Nation ought to know the first or chief among them, &c. Moreover, the Council of Antioch reciting the foresaid Canon word for word, expoundeth the matter plainly, in stead of τὸν πρῶτον, writing τὸν ἐν μητροπόλει προεστῶτα ἐπίσκοπον: which is as much to say as Metropolitan; and in the end of the said Canon, calleth him τὸν τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον, Id est, Metropolitanum, 6. q. 3. per singulas. Whereby it is concluded, that to be false, that Clement and Anacletus, and Anicetus be reported (but falsely) to put a difference between Primats or Patriarchs, and Metropolitans, or Archbishops: Whereas by sufficient authority it is to be proved, that in the old Church both Primats, first Bishops, Bishops of the first Seat, Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Bishops of the mother City, and Archbishops were all one. First, that Primats and Metropolitans were both one, is before declared by the Canons of the Apostles, and by the Council of Antioch aforesaid. Again, that Patriarchs and Archbishops were all one, it is evident Ex Novella Justiniani, cap. 23. where the said Constitution reciting the four Patriarchs (above mentioned) calleth them by the name of Archbishops. And a little after calleth the Patriarch of Constantinople, Archbishop, by these words: οἵτινες ὑπὸ τὸν μακαριώτατον ἀρχιεπίσκοπον Κωνσταντινουπόλεως, καὶ πατριάρχην εἰσίν· that is, Which be under the Archbishop and Patriarch of Constantinople. And after speaking more plainly in the matter, setteth an other order, divers from that of Clement, Anacletus, and Anicetus, in placing these aforeforesaid persons, first beginning with Bishops, then over them setteth the Metropolitan, and over him again the Archbishop, and there stayeth, making no further mention of any other above him: whose words be these, εἴπερ ἐπίσκοπος εἴη ὁ κατηγορούμενος, τὸν τούτου μητροπολίτην ἐξετάζειν τὰ λεγόμενα, εἰ δὲ μητροπολίτης εἴη, τὸν μακαριώτατον, ὑφ' ὃν τελεῖ. that is, if a Bishop be accused, the Metropolitan to have the examination of those things that are brought against him; if the Metropolitan be accused, then the Archbishop to have the hearing thereof, under whom he dwelleth and pertaineth, &c.

And in the same constitution moreover, εἰ δὲ καὶ παρὰ κληρικοῦ, ἢ ἄλλου οἱουδήποτε προσέλευσις κατὰ ἐπισκόπου γίνεται, πρῶτον ὁ μητροπολίτης τὸ πρᾶγμα διακρινέτω, καὶ εἴ τις τοῖς κρινομένοις ἀντείποι, ἐπὶ τὸν μακαριώτατον ἀρχιεπίσκοπον καὶ πατριάρχην τῆς διοικήσεως ἐκείνης ἀναφερέσθω τὸ πρᾶγμα, &c.

An item against the forged Epistles decretal.

In this Constitution of Justinian, although the Metropolitan be placed above the Bishop, and the Archbishop above the Metropolitan; yet notwithstanding by this is sufficiently confuted the forged Constitution of Clement, Anacletus, Anicetus, Stephanus, and Felix: who in their Epistles decretal, joyn together in one form and order, both Archbishop and Metropolitan, and above them both do place the Patriarch, and above the Patriarch the Apostolical See, to wit, the Bishop of Rome, as may appear in reading the first Epistle of Clement: In illis autem civitatibus, &c. The second Epistle of Anacletus art. 4. Provinciæ, dist. 99. cap. Nulli Archiepiscop. Also the Epistle of Pope Stephan the first, Art, 5. (where note by the way, that Gratianus referreth this place of the Epistle to Pope Lucius.) Item, the Epistle of Pope Felix the second, Art. 12. In all which foresaid Epistles, this order and difference of degrees is taken, that the first and principal place is given to Primates, or Patriarchs, the second to Metropolitans, or Archbishops, the third to Bishops, and finally above all these is extolled the Apostolical See of the Bishop of Rome, contrary to all that which before hath been alledged out of Justinian, the Council of Nice and of Antioch, &c. Whereby it may appear, that either Justinian in preferring Archbishops above Metropolitans, did not read these Epistles decretal, if they were unfeigned; or if they were forged, they which forged the said Epistles in their names, did not well advise that Justinian had written in this matter before.

Repugnance between the Institutions of Justinian, and the Epistles decretal.

Bishop, Metropolitan, Bishop of the first See, Primate, Patriarch, Archbishop, Chief Bishop; terms used in the primitive time of the Church.

Thus then these Titles above recited, as Bishop, Metropolitan, the Bishop of the first See, Primate, Patriarch, Archbishop; that is to say, chief Bishop, or head Bishop to other Bishops of his Province, we deny not but were in the old time applied, and might be applied to the Bishop of Rome, like as the same also were applied to other Patriarchs in other chief Cities and Provinces.

High Priest or high Priesthood.

As touching the name likewise of the High Priest, or high Priesthood, neither do I deny but that it hath been found in old Monuments and Records of ancient times: but in such wise and sort as it hath been common to Bishops indifferently, and not singularly attributed to any one Bishop or See. Whereof testimony we have out of the seventh general Council, Dist. 38. cap. Omnes, where the Bishops office is called Summum sacerdotium, The High Priesthood: in these words, Substantia summi sacerdotii nostri sunt eloquia divinitus tradita, i. vera divinarum scripturarum disciplina, &c.

Dist. 38. cap. Omnes, summus sacerdos, summum sacerdotium.

That is, the substance (say they) of our High Priesthood, is the word of discipline of holy Scriptures given us from above, &c.

And likewise the Council of Agatha maketh relation, De pontificibus in summo sacerdotio constitutis. Of Bishops set in the high Priesthood, meaning not of any one, but indefinitely and indifferently of whomsoever, 12. q. 3. cap. Pontifices. Also Fabianus Bishop of Rome, in the year of the Lord, 240. writing in general to his Brethren, and to all Bishops and Ministers Ecclesiastical, doth attribute to them the same title of Summum sacerdotium, in these words: Deus ergo, fratres, qui præordinavit vos, & omnes qui summo sacerdotio funguntur, &c. God which hath pre-ordained you Brethren, and all them which bear the Office of High Priesthood, 3. q. cap. 1. Deus ergo.

Ex Concil. Agathensi. 12. q. 3. cap. Pontifices.

3. q. cap. Deus ergo.

With like phrase of Speech Anacletus also in his second Epistle speaking of Bishops in general, calleth them Summos sacerdotes: Unde, inquit, liquet quod summi sacerdotes, i. Episcopi a Deo sunt judicandi, &c. The High Priest, that is, Bishops, saith he. And moreover in the same place he calleth them Apostles, and Successors of the Apostles, &c. So doth Innocentius the first, in the year of our Lord, 405. as appeareth Dist. 61. cap. Miserum. Item Zosimus Bishop of the said City of Rome, in the year of our Lord, 420. as witnesseth Dist. 59. cap. 1. who speaketh, De summo sacerdotio, that is, Of high Priesthood, not only of the Church of Rome, but of all other Churches. Urbanus the first, was Bishop of Rome in the year of Christ, 226. who in his writings alledged by Gratian, referreth the name and place Summi pontificis, of the high Bishop, not only to the Seat of Rome, but uniformly to every Bishop, as appeareth in the words of the Dist. 51. cap. Si officia, &c.

Ex Anaclet. epist. 2. 9. 7. cap. accusatio. Bishops called the Successors of the Apostles. Dist. 61. cap. Miserum. Dist. 59 c. 1.

Ex Urba. 1. dist. 51. cap. Si officia.

And thus much as touching the name or title of High Priest, or Supream Bishop. Which title as I do not deny to have been used in manner and form aforesaid: so do I deny this title and stile of Summus orbis Pontifex, as it is now used in Rome, to have been used, or usually received during all the primitive time of the Church, that is five hundred years after Christ: after the manner and sort I mean of that authority and glory, which in these days now is used and is given to the same: until the time of Phocas, the wicked Emperour, which was after the year of the Lord, 608. The which title as it is too glorious for any one Bishop in the Church of Christ to use: so is it not to be found in any of the approved and most ancient Writers of the Church; namely these, Cyprianus, Basilius, Fulgentius, Chrysostomus, Hieronymus, Ambrosius, Augustinus, Tertullianus: but rather written against by the same, especially of the last. And therefore not without cause it is written and testified of Erasmus, who speaking of the said name of Summus orbis Pontifex, denieth plainly the same to be heard of among the old Writers, whose words be these: Certe nomen hoc nondum illis temporibus erat auditum, quantum ex veterum omnium scriptis licet colligere, &c. lib. Epist. 3. Epist. 1. Art. 37. &c. as whosoever readeth the same Authors, shall find to be true.

Ex Erasm. epist. lib. 3. epist. 1. art. 73.

The like is to be affirmed also of other presumptuous titles of like ambition, as the Head of the universal Church, the Vicar of Christ in Earth, Prince of Priests, with such like: which all be new found terms, strange to the ears of the old primitive Writers and Councils, and not received openly and commonly before the time of Boniface the third, and Phocas the aforesaid.

Universalis Pontifex. Caput universalis Ecclesiæ, Christi in terris Vicarius, Princeps sacerdotum, &c.

Now remaineth the name of the Pope, which of his nature, and by his first origine, being a word of the Syracusan Speech called πάππας, and signifieth as much as Pater, Father, was then used and frequented of them in the old time, not so as proper only to the Bishop of Rome, but common and indifferent to all other Bishops or Personages, whosoever were of worthy excellency, as is partly before declared. But now contrarily, the generality of this name is so restrained and abused, that not only it is appropriate to the Bishop of Rome, but also distincteth and dissevereth the authority, and preeminence of that Bishop alone from all other Bishops, for which cause it is now worthily come into contempt and execrations. No less is to be rejected also the name of Universalis or Oecumenicus Pontifex, Summus orbis Episcopus, Caput universalis Ecclesiæ, Christi in terris Vicarius, Princeps sacerdotum, &c. All which terms and vocables, tending to the derogation of other Bishops and Patriarchs, as they were never received nor allowed in Rome (if we believe Gregory) during the time of the primitive Church, so now are worthily of us refused.

Papa.

Although it cannot be denied, but certain were in the primitive time which began privately to pretend that proud and wicked title of universal Bishop, as Menna, and especially Johannes Patriarch of Constantinople, who calling a Council at Constantinople, went about to stablish and ratifie and to dignifie his Throne by the consent of the Council, and the Emperor of Constantinople, and obtained the same; as appeareth in the fifth general Council of Constantinople, Act the first, where both Menna is named Oecumenicus Patriarcharum, and also Johannes in the said

How they began first at Constantinople, to take the name of universal Bishop.

ſaid Council is titled Oecumenicus Patriarcha: ex Concil. in general. 5. cap. Domino. Concerning the which title although it was then uſed in Conſtantinople through the ſufferance of the Emperors, being then willing to have their Imperial City advanced: yet notwithſtanding this foreſaid title, all this while, was not in the City of Rome. And in Conſtantinople it ſtood not then in force (Jure aliquo divino) but only by mans Law. And thirdly, it was then but only Verbalis titulus: having no true domination upon all other Churches, or any real ſubjection belonging to the ſame; For as much as neither the Biſhop of Rome, nor any of the Weſt Churches were ſubject or did acknowledge ſervice unto them, but rather did repugne the ſame: namely, Pelagius the ſecond, and Gregorius the firſt, both Biſhops at that time of Rome, which Pelagius writing to all Biſhops, ſaith plainly in theſe words, that no Patriarch ſhould take the name of univerſality at any time, becauſe that if any be called Univerſal, the name of Patriarch is derogate from all other. But let this be far, ſaith he, from all faithful men, to will to take that thing to him, whereby the honour of his brethren is diminiſhed. Wherefore the ſaid Pelagius chargeth all ſuch Biſhops, that none of them in their Letters will name any Patriarch to be univerſal, leſt he take from himſelf the honour due to him, while they give that which is not due to another. What can be more evident than theſe words of Pelagius, who was Biſhop of Rome next before Gregory, Anno 583? In like manner or more plainly, and more earneſtly writeth alſo Gregory of this matter in his Regiſter, proving and diſputing that no man ought to be called Univerſal Biſhop. Moreover, with ſharp words and rebukes, deteſting the ſame title, calling it new, fooliſh, proud, perverſe, wicked, prophane, and ſuch as to conſent unto it, is as much as to deny the Faith. He added further and ſaith, That Whoſoever goeth about to extol himſelf above other Biſhops, in ſo doing followeth the fact of Satan, to whom it was not ſufficient to be counted equal or like unto other Angels. In his Epiſtles how oft doth he repeat and declare the ſame to repugne directly againſt the Goſpel, and ancient decrees of Councils? affirming that none of his Predeceſſors did ever uſurp to himſelf that ſtile or title, and concludeth that whoſoever ſo doth, declareth himſelf to be a Forerunner of Antichriſt, &c. With this judgment of Gregory well agree alſo the words of Saint Auguſtine, lib. 3. cap. de baptiſmo, where reciting the words of Cyprian, he thus ſaith: Neque enim quiſquam noſtrum ſe Epiſcopum Epiſcoporum conſtituit, aut Tyrannico more ad obſequendi neceſſitatem collegas ſuos adigit, &c. that is, For none of us doth ever ſet himſelf to be Biſhop of Biſhops, or after a tyrannical manner doth ſubdue and bring under his Fellows unto the neceſſity of his obedience. &c. By theſe words of Cyprian, and Auguſtine, it is manifeſt that in their time was no Supremacy, or univerſal Title among Biſhops received, nor that any great reſpect was had to the Biſhop of Rome (as Pius the Second ſaith, Epiſt. 301.) before the Council of Nice. And after in that Council the ſaid Biſhop of Rome had no further authority to him limited, than only over his Province, and places ſuburbane, bordering about the City of Rome. Againſt whoſe Primacy divers Cities alſo did reſiſt long after that, as the Church of Ravenna, Mediolanenſis, and Aquilegienſis. Alſo the Greek Churches long reſiſted the ſame, ſo did the Churches of Aſia Rutenicæ, Moſcoviticæ, Valachicæ, and other more.

But to return again to Gregory, who confirming the Sentence of Pelagius his Predeceſſor above mentioned, had no ſmall Conflicts about this Title matter, both with the Patriarch, and with the Emperor of Conſtantinople, as witneſſeth Antonius, and other, &c. The Hiſtory is thus; After that John being made of a Monk Patriarch of Conſtantinople, by his flattery and hypocriſie, had obtained of Mauricius the Emperor to be extolled above other Biſhops, with the name of Univerſal Patriarch, and that he would write to Gregory then Biſhop of Rome, for his conſent concerning the ſame: Gregory abiding ſtill in his conſtancy, did ſet himſelf ſtoutly againſt that Antichriſtian Title, and would give no place. At the ſame time the Lombards had invaded the Country of Italy, and the City of Rome, the Emperor keeping then at Conſtantinople, and ſetting in Italy an Overſeer called Exarchus, to rule in Ravenna. Gregory perceiving the Emperor Mauricius to be diſpleaſed with him about the matter afore touched, writeth to Conſtantina the Empreſs, arguing and declaring in his Letters, that Preſumption and Pride of him to be univerſal Patriarch, was both againſt the rule of the Goſpel, and decrees of the Canons; namely, the ſixth Canon of the Nicene Council, and the novelty of that new found title to declare nothing elſe, but that the time of Antichriſt was near. Upon this, Mauricius the Emperor taking diſpleaſure with him, calleth home his Souldiers again from Italy, and inciteth the Lombards againſt the Romans; who with their King Agilulphus, thereupon contrary to their League made before, ſet upon the City of Rome and beſieged it a whole year together, Gregory yet notwithſtanding ſtill remaining in his former conſtancy. After theſe Afflictions thus overpaſt, Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, writeth to the ſaid Gregory in his Letters, naming him Univerſal Pope: unto whom Gregory refuſing the ſame, anſwereth again as followeth.

Ex Antonio tit. 12. c. 3.

The Letter of Gregory to the Patriarch of Alexandria.

The anſwer of Gregory to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria. Diſt. 99. cap. Eccl.

Behold: in the Preface of your Epiſtle directed to me, ye have uſed a word of a proud name, calling me Univerſal Pope, which I pray your Holineſs you will ceaſe hereafter to do, for that is derogated from you, whatſoever is attributed to another more than right and reaſon requireth. As for me I ſeek not mine advancement in words, but in manners: neither do I account that any Honour wherein the Honour of my Brethren I ſee to be hindred: for my Honour I take to be the Honour of the Univerſal Church: my Honour is the whole and perfect vigour of my Brethren. Then am I honoured when to no man is denied the due honour which to him belongeth. For if your Holineſs call me Univerſal Pope, in ſo doing you deny your ſelf to be that, which ye affirm me to be, Univerſal: but that God forbid. Let theſe words therefore go, which do nothing but puff up Vanity, and wound Charity, &c.

Gregory refuſeth the name of univerſal Pope.

It were too long here to infer all ſuch Letters and Epiſtles of his concerning this matter, written to the Emperor Mauricius and Conſtantina the Empreſs, but that ſhall more largely appear hereafter (Chriſt willing) in the body of the Hiſtory, when we come to the year and time of Gregory, which was well nigh ſix hundred years after Chriſt. In the mean ſeaſon this is ſufficient to declare, how the Church of Rome with the form and manner of their title of Univerſal Supremacy now uſed and maintained, hath utterly ſwerved from the ancient ſteps of the Primitive Church of Rome.

A ſophiſtical Cavillation upon the words of Pelagius and Gregory anſwered.

Now let us ſee what the Adverſary ſide hath to Object again for the title of their Univerſality, or rather Singularity. And firſt here cometh in a blind cavillation of a certain Sophiſter, who gloſſing upon the words of Pelagius above recited, laboureth to colour the plain Text with a ſubtile meaning, as though the ſenſe of the Canon were this, not to deny there the ſtate of Supremacy: Sed negari ibi aliquem poſſe eſſe Univerſalem Epiſcopum, ſub eo ſenſu duntaxat, quod eſſet cujuſque Eccleſiæ proprius rector, ita quod nullus alius eſſet Epiſcopus, &c. that is, But to deny there, that any may be Univerſal Biſhop after this ſenſe and meaning only, ſo that he ſhould be the proper Paſtor of every Church alone, and that there ſhould be no other Biſhop beſide himſelf, &c. Thus goeth this Sophiſter about to daſh out this Text, but he cannot ſo diſcharge the matter. For neither did John the Patriarch then ſeek any ſuch thing to be Biſhop and proper Paſtor of every Church alone; nor if he had, the Council of Chalcedon and the Emperor Juſtinian would never have agreed thereunto. Neither is it true, that this Gloſſer denieth Pelagius, here to forbid the Primacy or Supremacy of that Patriarch, which indeed is the only intent of Pelagius in that Canon; witneſſing as well other Hiſtoriographers, as namely, Anton. tit. 12. cap. 3. par. 13. and alſo the gloſs ordinary upon the ſame Canon, &c.

An objection of a certain late Engliſh Writer refuted.

Out of the ſame Fountain ſpringeth the like or very ſame reaſon of late renewed by a certain new ſtart Engliſh Clerk in theſe our days, who anſwering to the places of Gregory touching the ſaid matter, laboureth to avoid the clear authority of him, by a like blind cavillation, ſaying that John Biſhop of Conſtantinople, by this title of Univerſal Biſhop, underſtood himſelf only to be a Biſhop, and none elſe.

And

And that Gregory in reſiſting him, had none other meaning but the ſame. And to prove this to be the very meaning of Gregory, he reciteth the words of Gregory, written to the ſaid John Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople as followeth, Qui enim indignum te eſſe fateharis, ut Epiſcopus dici debuiſſes, ad hoc quandoque perductus es, ut deſpectis fratribus Epiſcopus appetas ſolus vocari; that is to ſay, For thou (John Biſhop of Conſtantinople) which ſometime didſt graunt thy ſelf unworthy the name of a Biſhop, art now come to this, that thou doſt ſeek to be called a Biſhop alone, &c. Upon this word Epiſcopus ſolus; this Gloſſer would ground a ſurmiſe, that Gregory did find fault with the Archbiſhop, not for any Primacy which he ſought for above other Biſhops, but only for that he coveted to be a Biſhop and Paſtor alone in every Church, in ſuch ſort, as there ſhould be no other Biſhop nor Paſtor elſe, but himſelf only. But as is ſaid, that was never the Archbiſhops ſeeking, nor the matter of Gregories reprehenſion. For the ſaid Biſhop of Conſtantinople went not about to be Biſhop alone (which was too much abſurd, and alſo impoſſible) but to be Univerſal alone: nor to take away the office from other, but the honour from other; not to depoſe them, but to deſpiſe them. And therefore ſaith Gregory, Ut deſpectis fratribus, not Depoſitis fratribus: ſo that this word Solus, here noteth a deſpiſing of other, not a depoſing of other, and imporeth a ſingularity in condition above other, and not the office or ſubſtance of miniſtration without other, that is to be univerſal among many, and not to be alone without any, nor to diminiſh the number of them, but only to increaſe the honour to himſelf: For the more evident probation whereof (although the thing it ſelf is ſo evident, that it needeth no proof) what can be more plain, than the words themſelves of Pelagius and Gregory? wherewith they charge him for running before his Brethren, for challenging Superiority above them, for diminiſhing their honour, by taking more honour than to him was due, for following the Angel of Pride in exalting himſelf, in admitting that to him, which the Biſhops of Rome and their Predeceſſors had refuſed, being offered to them before, &c. All which declare that he ſought not to thruſt out all other Biſhops out of their Churches, and to be Biſhop himſelf alone. For that was never offered to the Biſhops of Rome by the Council of Chalcedon, that they ſhould be Biſhops alone, and none other. Neither did Lucifer ſeek to have no more Angels in all Heaven but himſelf, but he to be above all other alone.

A place of Gregory examined.

Pelag. 2. Epiſt. 1.

Likewiſe the word Præcurrere, that is, To run before other, in the Epiſtle of Pelagius, declareth that John ſought not to be Biſhop alone, but Biſhop univerſal. We ſay not that a man runneth before another, when he runneth alone, and no man followeth him, that is not properly Præcurrere, but Solus currere. Moreover, in ſeeking to be Superior to other Biſhops, he ſeeketh not to take away other Biſhops, but to make other Biſhops inferior to him. For where no Inferior is, there can be no Superior, forſomuch as theſe together are Correlatives, and infer neceſſary reſpect mutually. And if it were true as this Gloſſer ſaith, that he had ſought to be Biſhop alone, how would that Council either have granted that unto him, or have offered it to the Biſhop of Rome before? or if they had, how could it be poſſible for him alone to ſerve all Churches, without any Fellow Biſhop to help him? And where this foreſaid Clerk ſtandeth ſo much upon the words of Saint Gregory: Solus Epiſcopus: Gregory therefore ſhall expound Gregory, and one Solus ſhall declare another. Wherefore if this Divine (whatſoever he be, Doctor or Batchelor) either knoweth not, or would learn, what (only Biſhop) meaneth in this place: another place of the ſaid Gregory may inſtruct him, where Gregory writing to Eulogius, Patriarch of Alexandria, giveth this reaſon why he refuſed the ſame title offered to him (which then was offered to the ſaid John Patriarch of Conſtantinople) ſaying, Quia videlicet ſi unus Patriarcha univerſalis dicitur, Patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur, ſed abſit hoc, &c. That is to ſay, For if one alone would be called a Patriarch univerſal, then ſhould the name of Patriarchs be derogated from all other, &c. Whereby two things are to be noted: Firſt, what thing it was which the Patriarch of Conſtantinople did ſeek, for Gregory here findeth no other fault, but with the ſame which was given to John, which was to be called Patriarch Univerſal. The ſecond thing to be noted, is the cauſe why Gregory did rebuke this title, both given to John, and offered to him: becauſe (ſaith he) if one take upon him the name of Univerſal Patriarch, then is the name Patriarch taken from the reſt. As who would ſay, If I would take upon me to be named Univerſal Patriarch, then ſhould there be no other Patriarch, but I ſhould be Biſhop Patriarch alone. And here conſeth in your Solus Epiſcopus, &c.

Ex Epiſt. Greg. 36. lib. 4.

Furthermore the ſame Gregory ſpeaking of the ſaid Solus, in another place by, ſeemeth to declare there, what he meaneth by this Solus here, in theſe words as follow, Ut & nulli ſubeſſe, & ſolus omnibus præeſſe videretur: that is to ſay, So that he would be ſubject to none, and would be chieftain to all other alone, &c. And ſo by this place may the other place be expounded, Ut ſolus Epiſcopus ſit is, qui ſolus inter Epiſcopos præeſſe appetat: that is, He that ſeeketh to be as Biſhop alone: who alone ſeeketh to be extolled above other Biſhops. But to be ſhort in a matter that needeth not many words: he that thus cavilleth upon this place Solus Epiſcopus in Gregory, muſt be deſired here not to take Solus alone, but joyn withall the word going before, which is, Deſpectis fratribus. By the which might ſeem ſufficiently declared what Gregory meant by Solus Epiſcopus, meaning, that to deſpiſe other Biſhops, and to diminiſh their honour, to ſet up his own, and to be ſubject to none, but to prefer himſelf inequally before all others, is as much as to be counted Biſhop alone. And thus much touching this Objection.

Another Objection of our Adverſaries is this; Although (ſay they) no Biſhop of Rome was ever called, or would be called by the name of Univerſal Biſhop, yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be Heads of the Univerſal Church. Their reaſon is this:

Another objection reſolved.

As S. Peter had the Charge of the whole Church (by the teſtimony of Gregory) committed unto him, although he were not called Univerſal Apoſtle.

So no more abſurd it is for the Pope to be called the head of the whole Church, and to have the Charge thereof, although he be not called Univerſal Biſhop, &c.

A double untruth in one Popiſh argument. Peter how he had charge and not charge of the Church.

Wherein is a double Untruth to be noted: firſt, in that they pretend Peter to be the Head, and to have the Charge of the whole Church: if we take here (Charge or Head) for Dominion or Maſterſhip upon or above the Church in all Caſes judiciary, both Spiritual and Temporal: for the words of the Scripture be plain, Non dominantes in clerum, 1 Pet. Vos autem non ſic, Luk. 22. that is, Not as Maſters over the Clergy, &c. But you not ſo, &c. Again, that the Church is greater, or rather the head of Peter, it is clear, 1 Cor. 3. All things are yours, whether it be Paul, or Apollo, or Cephas: either the world, death, or life, you be Chriſts, Chriſt is Gods, &c. In which words the Dignity of the Church no doubt is preferred above the Apoſtles, and above Cephas alſo. Moreover, as the dignity of the Wife is above the Servant, ſo muſt needs the honour and worthineſs of the Church (being the Spouſe of Chriſt) ſurmount the ſtate of Peter or other Apoſtles, which be but Servants to Chriſt and to the Church; yea, and though they were Princes of the Church, yet after the mind of Baldus, Magis attenditur perſona intellectualis, quam organica. Otherwiſe if by this word (Charge) he meant only the office and diligence of teaching; to that I anſwer, The ſame Lord that ſaid to Peter, Feed my ſheep, ſaid alſo to the other, Go and Preach this Goſpel to all Nations. And he that ſaid to Peter, Whatſoever thou looſeſt, ſaid alſo to the other, Whatſoever ye remit in the Earth. Moreover, if the matter go by preaching, Paul the Apoſtle laboured more therein, than ever did Peter by his own confeſſion, Plus laboravi; alſo ſuffered more for the ſame, Plus ſuſtinui; neither was his Doctrine leſs ſound. Yea, and in one point he went before Peter, and was Teacher and School-Maſter unto Peter, whereas Peter was by him juſtly corrected, Gal. 2. Furthermore, teaching is not always nor in all things a point of Maſterſhip, but ſometime a point of Service. As if a French-man ſhould be put to an Engliſh-man to teach him French, although he excelleth him in that kind of faculty: yet it followeth not therefore, that he hath fulneſs of power upon him, to appoint his Diet, to rule his Houſhold, to preſcribe his Laws, to ſtint his Lands, and ſuch other. Wherefore ſeeing in travel of Teaching, in pains of Preaching, in gifts of Tongues, in largeneſs of Commiſſion, in operation of Miracles, in grace of Vocation, in receiving the Holy Ghoſt, in vehemency of Torments, and death for Chriſts Name, the other Apoſtles were nothing inferior to The dignity of the Church above the Apoſtles.

Vide Baldum conſ. 169. lib. 3. ſecundum novam impreſſionem, & ſecund. ver. conſ. 359. lib. 1. Proofs and reaſons that there was no inequality of preeminence among the Apoſtles.

Office of teaching giveth no dominion further than the book.

Peter in no point excelleth the reſt of the Apoſtles.

Peter: why Peter then ſhould claim any ſpecial Prerogative above the reſt, I underſtand no cauſe. As indeed he never claimed any: but the Patrons of the Apoſtolical See do claim it for him, which he never claimed himſelf: neither if he were here, would no leſs abhor it with Soul and Conſcience than we do now: and yet our abhorring now is not for any malice of perſon, or any vantage to our ſelves, but only the vehemency of Truth, and Zeal to Chriſt and to his Congregation. Moreover, if theſe men would needs have Peter to be the Curate and Overſeer of the whole univerſal Church (which was too much for one man to take Charge of) and to be Prince of all other Apoſtles, then would I fain learn of them, what meaneth (Dextræ ſocietatis) the right hand of Society between Peter, Paul, and Barnabe, mentioned Gal. 2. What taking of hands is there between Subjects and their Prince, in way of fellowſhip? Or where fellowſhip is, what Maſterſhip is there? Or again, what ſtate of Maſterſhip is it like that Chriſt would give to Peter, who being indeed Maſter of all, took ſuch little Maſterſhip upon himſelf, and that not only in inward affection, but alſo in outward fact? Although I am not ignorant that Peter in divers places of the Goſpel hath his Commendation, neither do I deny Peter to be worthy of the ſame. But yet theſe words of Commendation give to him no ſtate of Superiority, or Juriſdiction upon all others, to have all under his Subjection. As if a School-Maſter ſhould have more ſpecial charge to ſome one of his Scholars for his riper towardneſs: yet this giveth him no fulneſs of Authority, or Power coactive upon the reſt, unleſs by ſpecial admiſſion he be deputed thereunto. Whereof, nothing can be gathered of Peter; for if it be true that S. Auguſtine ſaith, that ſuch things as were ſpoken to Peter, have no lightſome underſtanding, except they be referred to the Church, whereof Peter did bear a figure: then hath the perſon of Peter nothing to Claim by theſe words, but all redoundeth to the Church, which being meant by Peter, hath power by this reaſon, both over the perſon of Peter, and other perſons in the Lord.

Aug. in Pſal. 103.

But here ſtumbleth in an argument of our Adverſary again, which he in the margent of his Book calleth an invincible argument drawn out of the bowels of S. John Chryſoſtome, lib. 2. De Sacerd. Whereby he ſuppoſeth to have given a ſhrewd blow to Proteſtants, and to have gotten Hector's victory upon a certain Engliſh Priſoner taken in plain field, and of all ſuch as take his part. The Text only of Chryſoſtome he reciteth, but maketh no argument, albeit he maketh mention of an invincible argument in the margent. But becauſe he either wiſt not, or liſt not to ſhew his cunning therein, I will form that an argument for him which he would have done, but did not: and ſo will form it (the Lord willing) as he himſelf muſt of neceſſity be driven to do, if the matter ever come to the trial of act, and not to the trifling of words. Firſt, he taketh his Text out of Chryſoſtome, as followeth, For what cauſe, I pray you, did Chriſt ſhed his blood? Truly to redeem thoſe ſheep, whoſe Charge he committeth to Peter, and to Peters Succeſſors. Upon this place of Chryſoſtome, this Clerk taketh his medium, Chriſts ſuffering. His concluſion is, That all which Chriſt died for, were committed to Peter: wherefore the form of the argument muſt needs ſtand thus in the third figure:

Anſwer to an invincible argument proving by Chryſoſtome the whole Church to be committed to St. Peter.

Chryſoſt. lib. 2. de ſacerd.

A Popiſh perilous paralogiſme.

Chriſt ſuffered for all men:

Chriſt ſuffered for them whom he committed to Peter.

Ergo, All that Chriſt died for, were committed to Peter.

If this be the form of his inſoluble argument, as it ſeemeth to be, by the order of his reaſoning, and alſo muſt needs be, taking that medium, and making that concluſion as he doth, (for elſe in the firſt figue, and firſt mood, the Text of Chryſoſtome will not ſerve him) then muſt the form and violence of this inexpugnable argument be denied, for that it breaketh the rules of Logick, making his concluſion univerſal, which in that figure muſt needs be particular, either affirmative or negative. And ſo this argument invincible, falleth into one of theſe two ſtraits; either concluding thus, the form will not ſerve him, or concluding in another figure, the words of Chryſoſtome will not anſwer to his purpoſe, to prove that all the world was committed to Peter. Which Propoſition as it is ſtrange in Scripture: ſo neither is it the Propoſition of Chryſoſtome. And though it were, yet both without inconvenience might be granted of us, and being granted, ſerveth his purpoſe nothing, ſo long as the Propoſition is not exceptive, excluding other Apoſtles. For the words of Chryſoſtome do not ſo ſound, that the whole world was committed to Peter only, and to none other. Likewiſe then as it may be well affirmed of us, that the world was committed to Peter: ſo can it not be denied of them that the world was alſo committed to John, James, Bartholomew, Paul, Barnabe, and other all and ſingular Apoſtles. For he that ſaid to Peter, Feed my ſheep, ſaid alſo to all and ſingular his Apoſtles, Go into all the world and Preach, &c. Matth. ult. Moreover, for as much as this man collecteth out of Chryſoſtome, that the whole world was committed to Peter, how ſhall we then joyn this meaning of Chryſoſtome with Saint Paul, which ſaith that the Goſpel was committed to Peter over the Circumciſion, as was Paul over the Uncircumciſion? And here an anſwer to his doughty argument, both to the form, and to the matter thereof: albeit concerning the matter, here lacketh much to be ſaid more of Peters Succeſſors in the Text of Chryſoſtome. By the which Succeſſors is not meant the Biſhop of Rome only (as the Papiſts would bear us in hand) but all ſuch true and faithful Paſtors, whom the Lords calling ſendeth, and ſetteth over his Flock, whereſoever, or whatſoever they be. For as Peter beareth a Repreſentation of the Church, by the teſtimony of Auguſt. in Joan. tract. 124. Prefat. in Pſal. 108. ſo the Succeſſors of Peter be all faithful Paſtors and Overſeers of Chriſts Church, to whom Chriſt our Lord hath committed the Charge of his Flock. Wherefore they are not a little deceived, which looking upon the Rock only of the perſon, and not the Rock confeſſion (contrary to the rule of Hilary De trinit. lib. 6.) do tie the Apoſtleſhip or Rock of Peter to one only Biſhop, and the ſucceſſion of Peter to one only See of Rome: whereas this being a ſpiritual office, and not carnal, hath no ſuch carnal Race or Deſcent after any worldly or local underſtanding: but hath a more myſtical meaning, after a ſpiritual ſenſe of ſucceſſion, ſuch as Hierome ſpeaketh of, Epiſt. ad Evagrium. Omnes, inquit, Apoſtolorum ſucceſſores ſunt, &c. that is, All, (ſaith he) ſpeaking of Biſhops) be Succeſſors of the Apoſtles, &c.

The World was committed as well to the Apoſtles as to Peter.

Hierony. Epiſt. ad Evagrium.

Of like force and faſhion, and out of the ſame figure, the ſame Author patcheth moreover another argument, proving, that the Biſhop of Rome was tituled the head of Chriſts Church, in the Primitive time of the old Anceſtors, before the age of Gregory. His argument proceedeth thus, in the third figure:

Saint Peter was called by the ancient Fathers, head of Chriſts Church;

Saint Peter was Biſhop of Rome:

Ergo, The Biſhop of Rome was called Head of the Church in the old ancient time.

An argument of the Papiſts.

This argument expoſitory, being clouted up in the third figure, and concluding ſingularly, hath rather a ſhew of an argument, than maketh any neceſſary concluſion, ſtanding upon no mood in the ſaid figure, if the Author thereof were put to trial. Albeit to leave the form, and to come to the matter of the argument. Firſt, how well will he diſpatch himſelf of the major, and prove us that S. Peter although he were at Rome, and taught at Rome, and ſuffered at Rome: yet that he was Biſhop and proper Ordinary of that City and ſpecial See of Rome? As touching the allegation of Abdias, Oroſius, Ado, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, Optatus, Auguſtine brought forth for his moſt advantage, to prove his major: thus I anſwer concerning Oroſius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, and Auguſtine, that where they ſpeak of S. Peters Chair, or planting the Faith at Rome, ſtraightway this man argueth thereupon, that Peter was Biſhop of Rome. But that doth not clearly follow. For the office of the Apoſtles was to plant the Faith in all places, and in every Region, yet were they not Biſhops in every Region. And as for the Chair, as it is no difference eſſential that maketh a Biſhop (for ſo much as a Doctor may have a Chair, and yet be no Biſhop) ſo cannot he conclude by the Chair of Peter, that S. Peter was Biſhop of Rome. For all this proveth no further, but that Peter was at Rome, and there taught the faith of Chriſt, as Paul did alſo, and peradventure in a Chair likewiſe: yet we ſay not that Paul was therefore Biſhop of Rome: but that he was there as an Apoſtle of Chriſt, whether he taught there ſtanding on his feet, or ſitting in a Chair. In the Scripture commonly the Chair ſignifieth Doctrine or judgment, as ſitting alſo declareth ſuch as teach or judge, whether whether they sit in the Chair of Moses, or in the Chair of Pestilence. Planting likewise is a word Apostolical, and signifieth not only the office of a Bishop. Wherefore it is no good consequent, He sate, he taught, he planted at Rome, his chair and seat was at Rome; Ergo, he was Bishop of Rome. And thus much touching Orosius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine.

As for Abdias, Ado, Optatus, and such others, although we should have much wrong offered, and never should make an end, if we should be prest with the authority of every one that could or did move pen, in all the whole first age of the Church, to be our Judges in every Ecclesiastical matter: and much more wrong should have, if the Authors either corrupted, or counterfeited, should be laid unto us, speaking not in the same sense, or in the same tongue, or in the same time wherein they wrote; yet to help and to salve the authorities of these Authors so much as we may, I answer to their Allegations with this distinction of a Bishop, which is to be taken either generally, or specially. After the first, a Bishop is he to whomsoever the publick cure and charge of Souls is committed, without any limitation of place. And so the name of Bishop is co-incident with the office of Apostle, or any publick Pastor, Doctor, or Curate of the universal flock of Christ. And thus may Paul, Peter, or any other of the Apostles be called Bishops. So also is Christ himself by express word called ἐπίσκοπος and ποιμὴν, that is, Bishop and Pastor, 1 Pet. 2. And thus may Peter well be named a Bishop of these foresaid Authors after this manner of taking. But this publick and general Charge universally over the whole, without limitation, ceased after Christ and the Apostles. For then were Bishops by places and Provinces appointed, to have special Over-sight of some particular Flock or Province, and so to be Resident and Attendant only upon the same.

A double taking of the word Bishop.

Christ himself a Bishop.

The other diversity of this name Bishop, is to be taken after a more special sort, which is, when any person orderly called, is assigned namely and specially to some one certain place, City, or Province, whereunto he is only bound to imploy his office and charge, and no where else, according to the old Canons of the Apostles, and of the Council of Nice. And this Bishop differing from the other, is called Episcopus intitulatus, having his name of his City or Diocess. And thus we deny that Peter the Apostle was ever Bishop elected, installed, or intituled to the City of Rome: neither doth Optatus, Abdias, Ado, or Hierome affirm the same. And if Ado say that Peter was Bishop of Rome five and twenty years, until the last year of Nero, that is easily refuted both by the Scriptures and Histories: for so we understand by the Declaration of Saint Paul, Gal. 1. 2. that fourteen years after his Conversion, Saint Paul had Peter by the hand at Hierusalem.

Canon. Apo. 33. 14. 34. Con. Nice. ca. 15. Concil. Antioch. cap. 3. 13. Peters being at Rome.

Moreover, the said Paul in the foresaid Epistle witnesseth that the charge Apostolical was committed unto Peter over the circumcised, and so was he intituled. Also S. Paul writing to the Romans, in his manifold Salutations to them in Rome, maketh no mention there of S. Peter, which doubtless should not have been unremembred, if he had been then in Rome. Again, S. Peter dating his Epistle from Babylon, was not then belike at Rome.

Furthermore, Histories do Record, that Peter was at Pontus five years, then at Antioch seven years. How could he then be five and twenty years at Rome? Finally, where our Adversary alledging out of Ado, saith, that Saint Peter was there five and twenty years, until the last year of Nero: how can that stand, when Saint Paul suffering under Nero, was put to death the same day twelve month, that is, a whole year after Peter? &c. But especially how agreeth this with Scripture, that Christ should make Peter an Apostle universal to walk in all the world? Ite per universum orbem. Item, Eritis mihi testes usque ad fines terræ, &c. And our Papists would needs make him a sitting Bishop, and intitle him to Rome. How accord these, Apostolus and Episcopus, Ire and sedere, Omnes gentes and Roma together?

And thus have I resolved the first untruth of that Popish Demonstration before rehearsed, wherein they think to prove that as Peter, although he was not called Universal Apostle, yet was the head of the whole Church: so the Pope might, and hath had after him the Charge of the whole Church, although he was not called Universal Bishop in the old time, &c.

Now followeth the second untruth to be touched in the same argument, which is, that because Peter was the head of the Church: so therefore the Pope must also be the head of the Church, and was: albeit he was not called Universal Bishop a long time. But this we do deny, yea, the matter denieth it self by their own position; for being granted by them, that the title of Universal Bishop was not received at Rome, but refused to the time of Gregory: then must it necessarily be granted, that the Bishops of Rome before Saint Gregory, had not the Charge of the whole Church, neither could be admitted by that reason to be heads of the Church. For so much as there can be no head, but which is Universal to the whole Body, neither can any have charge of the whole, but he must needs be Universal to all and singular parts of that, whereof he hath the Charge. As in Sciences, whosoever hath knowledge and cunning in all the seven liberal Sciences, and all the parts thereof pertaining to liberal Knowledge, is said to be an universal learned man: so in office, to whomsoever the Publick Charge of all Churches doth appertain, how is he not to be called Bishop Universal? Now if before Saint Gregories time, the name of Universal Bishop was repealed in Rome: how then can the name be refused, and the definition of the name be admitted? Or else let our Adversaries tell us how they define an Universal Bishop, seeing this word Bishop is properly the name of office whereto is annexed Charge. Wherefore, if a Bishop be he which hath the charge of all Souls in his Diocess committed to him, and must render account for them all; then whose Charge extendeth to all and singular Churches, and must render account for every Christian soul within the whole world, to him cannot be denied the name of an Universal Bishop, having the office of an Universal Bishop. Or if he be not an universal Bishop, he cannot then have the Charge of the whole, that is, of all and singular Churches of Christ. For such is the rule of true definition: Cui convenit definitio, convenit & definitum, & contra: Cui adimitur definitio, eidem & definitum adimitur. Although this word Universal, in the Greek Writers signifieth that, which we in our vulgar English Tongue call Catholick; yet I suppose our Adversaries here, will not take Universal in that sense. For after that meaning, as we do not deny that the Bishops of Rome may be Universal Bishops, so neither can they deny but other Bishops may also be as Universal, that is, as Catholick as they. But such as more distinctly and School-like discuss this matter, define Universal or Catholick by three things; to wit, by time, place, and person. So that whatsoever extendeth it self to all times, all places and all persons, that is properly Universal or Catholick. And contrariwise, what thing is to be called Universal or Catholick, reacheth to all those three aforesaid, comprehending all places, times, and persons, and extendeth it self of his own nature to the same, or else it is not to be called properly Universal or Catholick. And thus three things there be, which most commonly we call Catholick or Universal: that is the Church, which is called the Catholick Church: Faith, which is called the Catholick Faith: a man whom also we call a man Catholick, because these three of their own nature and disposition (no contrary obstacle letting) extend themselves so to all, that no time, place, nor person is excluded. Which three conditions, if they altogether concur in the Charge of the Bishop of Rome, then is it an Universal Charge, and he an Universal Bishop: if not, then is his Charge neither Universal, nor he the Head of the Church, nor yet Universal Bishop. For how these three can be separated, I cannot see, except the Adversary part do prove it more evidently than they have done.

The second untruth of the argument above mentioned.

What is an Universal Bishop.

Regula definitionis. Cui convenit definitio, & definitum. Universal, defined by three things, time, place, and person.

Three things commonly called Catholick or Universal.

To have universal charge to be head of the universal Church, and to be universal Bishop are all co-incident together.

And thus much to the Objection of our Adversaries: arguing thus, that as Saint Peter being not called Universal Apostle, yet was the Head of the Universal Church: so the Pope, although he was not first called Universal Bishop, had, and might have the Charge of the whole Church, and was the universal Head of the same. The which Objection containing (as is said) a double untruth, our Adversaries, yet notwithstanding, do busie themselves greatly to fortifie by sundry Testimonies and Allegations, patched out of old and ancient Doctors, but specially out of Theodoretus, Ireneus, Ambrose and Augustine, proving by them, that the See of Rome having the Preeminence and Principality, hath been honoured above all other Churches. Whereupon the said adversary before minded, grounded this consequent.

Ireneus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Amb. de dign. gent. lib. 2. cap. 6. Aug. Epiſt. 162. An argument of the Papiſts. Anſwer.

Ireneus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine and Theodoretus affirm, that the Church of Rome is the chief of all other Churches.

Ergo, the Biſhop and Head of that Church is chief and Head over all Biſhops, and Head over all other Churches.

But this conſequence is to be denied, for that the excellency of the Church or place doth not always argue the excellency of the Miniſter or Biſhop, not yet neceſſarily doth cauſe the ſame. For in matters of the Church, which are ſpiritual, all preeminence ſtandeth upon ſpiritual and inward Gifts (Spiritualia enim ſpiritualibus comparantur,) as Faith, Piety, Learning and godly Knowledge, Zeal and Fervency in the Holy Ghoſt, Unity of Doctrine, &c. which Gifts many times may excel in a Church, where the Miniſter or Biſhop is inferior to Biſhops or Miniſters of other Churches. As the moſt famous School in a Realm, hath not alway the moſt famous School-Maſter, neither doth make him thereby moſt excellent in Learning above all others. So if our Adverſaries do mean by this Preeminence of the Church of Rome, ſuch inward Gifts of Doctrine, Faith, Unity and Peace of Religion; then ſay I, the excellency hereof doth not infer or argue the excellency of the Biſhop. And thus concerning the Principality of the Church of Rome, commended at that time of the Doctors, it may be true, and ſo well expounded one way. And thus do I grant the antecedent of this argument, and deny the conſequent. But here will our Adverſaries peradventure reply again and ſay, that the Principality of the Church of Rome which is commended by the Doctors, is not meant here ſo much by inward Gifts and Indowments belonging to a Chriſtian Church, as by outward Authority and Domination over other Churches. Whereto is to be anſwered: firſt, what neceſſity is there; or where did our Papiſts learn, to bring into the ſpiritual Church of Chriſt, this outward form of civil Regiment and Policy? that as the Roman Emperors in times paſt governed over all the world, ſo the Roman Biſhop muſt have his Monarchy upon the Univerſal Clergy, to make all other Churches to ſtoop under his Subjection. And where then be the words of our Saviour? Vos autem non ſic. If they hold their Affirmative Quod ſic. Where then is Chriſts Negative Non ſic? If they ſay, there muſt needs be diſtinction of degrees in the Church, and in this diſtinction of degrees, Superiotity muſt neceſſarily be granted for the outward Diſcipline of the Church, for directing matters, for quieting of Schiſms, for ſetting Orders, for commencing of Convocations and Councils, as need ſhall require, &c. Againſt this Superiority we ſtand not, and therefore we yield to our Superior Powers, Kings and Princes, our due Obedience, and to our lawful Governors under God of both Regiments, Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal. Alſo in the Eccleſiaſtical State, we take not away the diſtinction of ordinary degrees, ſuch as by the Scripture be appointed, or by the Primitive Church allowed, as Patriarchs, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Miniſters and Deacons, for of theſe four we ſpecially read as chief. In which four degrees, as we grant diverſity of Office, ſo we admit in the ſame alſo, diverſity of Dignity: neither denying that which is due to each degree, neither yet maintaining the ambition of any ſingular Perſon. For as we give to the Miniſter place above the Deacon, to the Biſhop above the Miniſter, to the Archbiſhop above the Biſhop: ſo we ſee no cauſe of inequality, why one Miniſter ſhould be above another Miniſter: one Biſhop in his degree above another Biſhop to deal in his Dioceſs, or one Archbiſhop above another Archbiſhop. And this is to keep an order duly and truely in the Church, according to the true nature and definition of order by the Authority of Auguſt. lib. de Civit. Dei. Where he thus defineth that which we call Order: Ordo eſt parium diſpariumque rerum ſua cuique loca tribuens diſpoſitio. Order (ſaith he) is a diſcretion or diſpoſition given to all things, according as they are matches, or not matches, proportionally to every one his own right and proper place.

Preeminence of a Church eſteemed after a double conſideration.

Objection. Outward preeminence belongeth unto outward Kingdoms, not to the Church of Chriſt.

The firſt anſwer to the Objection.

Non ſic. ſaith Chriſt: Quod ſic, ſaith the Pope. Objection. Anſwer. Superiority in the Church. Diſtinction of degrees in the Church. Diverſity of Dignities in degrees. Order kept in the Church, and what true order is.

Aug. lib. de Civ. Dei cap. 91. Order defined.

This definition of S. Auguſtine, ſtanding with the things before premiſed; now here joyneth the queſtion between us and the Papiſts, whether the Metropolitan Church of Rome, with the Archbiſhop of the ſame, ought to be preferred before other Metropolitan Churches and Archbiſhops, through univerſal Chriſtendom, or not? To the anſwer whereof, if the voice of Order might here be heard, it would ſay, Give to things that be matches and like, like honour; to things unlike, unlike honour, &c. Wherefore, ſeeing the See of Rome is a Patriarchal See appointed by the Primitive Church, and the Biſhop thereof and Archbiſhop limited within his own bordering Churches, which the Council of Nice calleth Suburbicas Eccleſias, as other Archbiſhops be: he ought therefore orderly to have the honour of an Archbiſhop (ordering himſelf thereafter) and ſuch outward Preeminence as to other Archbiſhops is due. More if he do require, he breaketh the rule of right Order, he falleth into preſumption, and doth wrong unto his Fellows: and they alſo do wrong unto themſelvess whoſoever they be, which feeding his humor of ambition, give more unto him than the foreſaid rule of Order doth require. For ſo much as they yield to him more than is his right, ſo much they take from themſelves, which is due to them. And the ſame is the cauſe, why both Gregory and Pelagius his Predeceſſor reprehendeth them, which gave to the Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, that which now the Biſhop of Rome claimeth to himſelf, charging them with the breach of Order in theſe words, Ne dum privatim aliquod daretur uni, honore debito Sacerdotes privarentur univerſi; that is, Leſt that while any ſingular thing is given to one perſon, all other Prieſts be deprived of their due honour. And for the like caſe, Pelagius exhorteth that no Prieſt do give to any one Archbiſhop, the name of Univerſal Biſhop, Ne ſibi debitum ſubtrahat, cum alteri honorem offert debitum; that is, Leſt (ſaith he) in ſo doing, he take from himſelf his due honour, while he yieldeth that which is not due to another. And alſo in the ſame Epiſtle; Quia ſi ſummus Patriarcha univerſalis dicitur, Patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur. For (ſaith he) if he be called the chief univerſal Patriarch, then is the name of Patriarch derogated from others, &c. Wherefore as is ſaid, ſeeing the Biſhop of Rome is an Archbiſhop, as others be, Order giveth that he ſhould have the Dignity which to Archbiſhops is due; whatſoever is added more, is derogation to the reſt. And thus much concerning diſtinction of degrees, and order in giving to every degree his place and honour.

Ex regiſtro Greg. lib. 4. Epiſt. 32.

Ex Epiſt. ad Pelagii 2. diſt. 99. cap. Nullus.

The ſecond reaſon and anſwer to the Objection before moved, is this, That being granted to the Papiſts, that the Doctors aforeſaid, ſpeaking of the Principality of the Church of Rome do mean not only of the inward Vertues of that Church, but alſo of the outward Authority and Juriſdiction of the ſame, above other Churches: yet the cauſe wherefore they did attribute ſo much to that Church, is to be expended, which was this, as before was alleged out of the Council of Chalcedon, Can. 28. διὰ τὸ βασιλεύουσαν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, that is, For the Rule and Empery which that City of Rome had then above other Cities; which cauſe being outward and carnal, was neither then cauſe ſufficient, and now ceaſing, importeth not to us the like effect, according as they ſay, Sublata cauſa tollitur effectus. So that by the reaſon thereof, the aforeſaid Principality of the Church of Rome, did not hold them Jure divino ſed humano. And as it holdeth by mans law, ſo by mans law may be repealed again.

The ſecond anſwer to the Objection before moved.

Ex Concilio Chalced. cap. 28.

Wherefore, be it admitted that both the Pope ſitteth and ſucceedeth in the Chair of Peter, and alſo that he is the Biſhop of the greateſt City in the world: yet it followeth not thereby that he ſhould have rule and Lordſhip over all other Biſhops and Churches of the world. For firſt touching the ſucceſſion of Peter, many things are to be conſidered:

Certain demands for the Papiſts to anſwer unto.

Firſt, Whether Peter ſate, and had his Chair in Rome, or not?

Secondly, Whether he ſate there as an Apoſtle, or as a Biſhop?

Thirdly, Whether the ſitting in the outward Seat of Peter maketh Succeſſors of Peter?

Fourthly, Whether he ſitteth in the Chair and Seat of Peter, which ſitteth not in the Doctrine of Peter?

Fifthly, Whether the Succeſſion of Peter maketh rather an Apoſtle than a Biſhop, and ſo ſhould we call the Pope the Apoſtle of Rome, and not the Biſhop of Rome?

Sixthly, Whether Eccleſiaſtical Functions ought to be eſteemed by ordinary ſucceſſion of place, or by Gods ſecret calling and ſending?

Seventhly and laſtly, Whether it ſtand by Scripture, any ſucceſſion at all to be pointed in Chriſts Church, or why more from Peter than from other Apoſtles?

All

All which Interrogatories being well diſcuſſed (which would ask a long Proceſs) it ſhould well appear what little hold the Pope hath to take this ſtate upon him, above all other Churches, as he doth. In the mean time, this one argument by the way may ſuffice, in ſtead of many, for our Adverſaries to anſwer to at their convenient leiſure. Which argument thus I form and frame in Cameſtres.

An argument proving the Popes of this latter Church of Rome not to be Succeſſors of Peter.

Ca- All the true Succeſſors of Peter ſit in the Chair of the Doctrine of Peter, and other Apoſtles uniformly:

me- No Popes of this latter Church of Rome ſit in the Chair of S. Peters and other Apoſtles Doctrine uniformly:

ſres. Ergo, No Popes of this latter Church of Rome be the true Succeſſors of Peter.

And when they have well peruſed the minor of this argument, and have well conferred together the Doctrine taught them of S. Peter, with the Doctrine taught now by the Popes, of juſtification, of a Chriſtian-man, of the office of the law, of the ſtrength and largeneſs of ſin, of mens Merits, of Free-will, of Works of ſupererogation, of ſetting up Images, of ſeven Sacraments, of auricular Confeſſion, of Satisfaction, of ſacrifice of the Maſs, of Communicating under one kind, of elevating and adoring the ſacramental Elements, of Latin Service, of Invocation, of prohibition of Meats and Marriage, of vowing Chaſtity of Sects and rules of divers Religions, of Indulgences and Pardons: alſo with their Doctrine taught now of Magiſtrates, of the fulneſs of Power and Regality of the See of Rome, with many other like to theſe, &c. then will I be glad to hear what they ſhall ſay to the Premiſes.

Secondly, If they would prove by the Allegation of the Doctors, Ireneus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, Theodoretus aforeſaid, the Biſhop of Rome to be the Chief of all Biſhops therefore, becauſe the City whereof he is Biſhop, is the chief and principal above all other Churches, that conſequent is to be denied. For it followeth not (taking as I ſay, the Principality of that Church to ſtand διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν, that is, upon the principal Dominion of that City) no more than this conſequent followeth.

London is the chief City in all England:

Ergo, the Biſhop of London is the chiefeſt of all Biſhops in this Realm.

Which argument were derogatory to the Archbiſhops both of Canterbury and York.

Yea, to grant yet more to our Adverſaries (which is all they can require) the mind of the aforeſaid Doctors, as Ireneus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, and Theodoretus, in giving Principality unto Rome, to have reſpect unto the vertue of ſucceſſion from Peter, and not unto the greatneſs of the City: yet notwithſtanding for all this their argument holdeth not, if it be rightly conſidered; to ſay,

A falſe conſequent of the Papiſts.

The Apoſtolical See of Rome, having ſucceſſion from Peter, with the Biſhops thereof, was chief then of all other Churches in the Primitive time of theſe Doctors.

Ergo, The Apoſtolical See of Rome, with the Biſhops thereof, having ſucceſſion from Peter, ought now to be chief of all other Churches in theſe our days.

Anſwer to the conſequent.

This conſequent might well follow, if the times were like, or if ſucceſſion which gave them the cauſe of Principality, were the ſame now, which was then. But now the time and ſucceſſion is not correſpondent, for then ſucceſſion in the time of theſe Doctors, was as well in Doctrine Apoſtolical, as in place Apoſtolical. Now, the ſucceſſion of Doctrine Apoſtolical hath long ceaſed in the See Apoſtolical: and nothing remaineth but only place, which is the leaſt matter of true Spiritual and Apoſtolical ſucceſſion. And thus much to the authority and teſtimony of theſe forenamed Doctors.

Succeſſion Apoſtolical double-wiſe: to be conſidered.

Beſides theſe Objections heretofore recited out of Ireneus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, and Theodoretus; our Adverſaries yet object and heap up againſt us moreover Examples of the Primitive time of the Church, Teſtimonies of general Councils, and Opinions of ancient Writers taken out of the Book of Councils, and Epiſtles decretal, whereby their intent is to prove the foreſaid terms (of the Head of the Church, Ruler of the Church, Chief of all other Prieſts) to be applied not only to Peter, but alſo to the Biſhop of Rome within the compaſs of the Primitive time. And here cometh in the Teſtimony cited of Vincentius Lirinenſis. Of the Epiſtle of Paſchaſius and his Fellows, writing to Leo from the Counſil of Chalcedon. The teſtimony alſo of Juſtinian the Emperor in his Codex; where Joannes then Pope, was called Caput omnium Eccleſiarum, Epiſt. inter claras, cap. De ſumma trinit. & fide cath. The teſtimony alſo of Athanaſius, with his Fellow Biſhops of Egypt, of Thebaida and Lybia, in their Epiſtles to Pope Marcus, Liberius, and Felix. Likewiſe the teſtimony of Jerome, In Præf. in 4. Evang. Item Ep. 42. tom. 1. Item Ep. 41. tom. 2. Of S. Ambroſe, 1. tom. 3. Of S. Auguſtine to Boniface. Ad Bonif. contra duas Epiſt. Palag. l. 1. c. 1. Item l. 2. de bapt. c. 1. Of Theodoretus in his Epiſtle to Pope Leo, Epiſt. commentar. in Pauli Ep. præfixa. Of Chryſoſtome, Epiſt. ad Innocentium, tom. 5. &c. By which Teſtimonies our Adverſaries would prove Saint Peter, and after him the Biſhop of Rome to be called and taken for Head of the Church, Chief Biſhop, Prince and Ruler of the whole Clergy. To all which Objections fully and exactly to anſwer in order, would require a whole Volume by it ſelf. In the mean time, leaving the reſt unto them, unto whom it doth more properly appertain, briefly with this own ſhort diſtinction I anſwer theſe and all ſuch other like places, where S. Peter with his Succeſſors are called Head of the Church, Chief of Biſhops, Prince of the Apoſtles, &c. In which places, this word Head, Chief, and Prince of the Apoſtles, may be taken two manner of ways to note either Dominion or elſe Commendation. For ſo we read ſometime Caput and Principes, to be words not of authority, but of excellency, whereby is declared the chiefeſt and worthieſt part among many parts, and not Poſſeſſor and Governor of the whole. Like as in the perſon of man, the Head is the Principal part of the whole Body, being indued with reaſon, and furniſhed with moſt excellent ſenſes, by the which the whole body of man is directed: ſo thereof is derived by a Metaphor, to what man or thing ſoever nature or condition hath given the greateſt excellency of Gifts and Properties above other parts or members, the ſame ſociety to be called of the ſaid Parties, Caput or Princeps, Head or Prince. And yet the ſame Head or Princes ſo called, hath not always Dominion or Juriſdiction of the reſt. So we call in our vulgar Speech, the Head or Chief men of the Pariſh, who for their Riches, Wiſdom, or Place, are moſt ſpecially noted: after like phraſe of Speech we call the head man of the Inqueſt, him that hath firſt Place: and yet neither they nor theſe have any Dominion or Juriſdiction upon the Reſidue. In a School the chiefeſt Schollar in Learning, is not therefore the Maſter or Governor of his Fellows. Neither hath M. Cicero any Title thereby to claim Subjection and Service of all other Orators, becauſe he is named Princeps Eloquentiæ; and goeth before them in that kind of phraſe. The ſame Cicero, lib. 1. offic. calleth Cratippum principem hujus ætatis Philoſophorum: as Homer may be alſo called Poetarum Princeps: and yet neither Philoſophers to Cratippus, nor Poets to Homer owe any thing elſe, but only fame and praiſe.

Teſtimonies alledged for the Principality of the Pope.

Anſwer by a diſtinction

Caput & Princeps have a double underſtanding.

How Peter is Princeps Apoſtolorum, Princeps Eloquentiæ, Cicero, Princeps Philoſophorum Cratippus.

And what if Saint Peter the bleſſed Apoſtle be called and counted by the old ancient Doctors, as Head and Prince of the Apoſtles, which is as much as Coryphæus Apoſtolorum, for his excellent Faith, for his Divine Confeſſion and ſingular Affection to the Lord Jeſus: yet what Intereſt or Charge either hath he to Challenge over the Apoſtles, or the Pope after him over all other Biſhops and the whole Church of Chriſt, although the Pope have the like excellency of Chriſts Faith which Peter had, as would God he had! As concerning theſe Allegations therefore out of the Doctors, two things are to be obſerved: firſt, that neither theſe Names and Titles, though they be given to Peter, do give him any State or Dominion over other Apoſtles: nor yet the ſucceſſion of him doth further any whit this celſitude and regality of the Pope to advance him above his Fellow Archbiſhops, as now he doth.

Petrus Princeps & Coryphæus Apoſtolorum.

And if our Adverſaries would needs provoke us to the numbering of Teſtimonies, and dividing the houſe (ſpeaking of the Writers and Councils of the Primitive Age) for theſe aforeſaid Teſtimonies alledged on their ſide: I could on the contrary part recite out of the witneſs of Doctors,

Doctors, out of the examples of Councils, and practices of Emperors, no leſs than ſixty voices, much more repugnant againſt their aſſertion, than there is for the Pope. The tractation whereof for this preſent I do referr, either to them that have more leiſure at this time to diſcourſe them, or elſe omit it to another time, if the good pleaſure of the Lord ſhall be to grant me further leiſure in another Book to treat thereof at large in ſuch order, as (if the Lord ſo grant) ſhall appear ſufficient matter, to prove by the Doctors, general Councils, examples and hiſtories of time, that the Biſhops of Rome, during the firſt five hundred years after Chriſt, although for the greatneſs of the Empire, were ſomewhat more magnified than the other, and therefore were ſought of many, and were flattered of ſome, and they themſelves divers did ſet forth themſelves more than they ſhould: yet by the common conſent of Churches were ſtopped of their purpoſe, ſo that by the conſention of the moſt part, within the compaſs of that age, the Biſhops of Rome had not this Regal ſtate of Title, Juriſdiction and fulneſs of power, which now they uſurp, but were taken as Archbiſhops of equal honour, of equal merit with other Archbiſhops and Rulers of the Church. And if any preferment was given unto them ſomething above the reſt, yet neither was it ſo given of all, nor of the moſt part: ſecondly, neither was it ſo given of them for any ſuch neceſſity of Gods Word. Aut jure aliquo divino, as which did ſo bind them thereunto, nor yet ſo much for the reſpect of Peter, and his ſucceſſion: as for certain other cauſes and reſpects, as may be gathered to the number of thirteen.

Thirteen cauſes of advancing of the See of Rome.

Of which, the firſt is the greatneſs of the City and Monarchy of Rome.

1.

2. The ſecond, is the authority of the Emperor Conſtantine the great, firſt of the Emperors converted to the Faith, and ruling in the ſame City, by whom the univerſal liberty of the Church was firſt promoted: and the cauſes of the Biſhops being then at variance, were committed partly to the Biſhop of Rome, partly to other Biſhops near by, to be decided, as appeareth, Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

3. The third was the Council of Nice, which confirmed the preeminence of that Church to have the overſight of the Churches bordering about it.

4. The fourth cauſe of advancing the Church of Rome, was the unquiet ſtate of the Greek Church, much troubled in thoſe days with Sects, Factions and Diſſentions, whereof we may read, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 15. Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 8.

5. The fifth, whenas Synods were called by other Metropolitans; then if it chanced the Biſhops of Rome to be abſent, and their ſentence being abſent to be required, by the occaſion thereof they began at length to take their ſentence for a Canon or rule Eccleſiaſtical, and thereby to refuſe other Synods, where their Decree or Sentence was not required.

6. Another cauſe was, that when any common matter was in hand at other places, whatſoever was done, commonly the manner was to write to the Roman Biſhop for his approbation in the ſame for publick unity and conſent to be had in Chriſts Church, as appeareth, Lib. 10. Epiſt. 78. Ambroſ. ad Theophyl.

7. Item, for that the teſtimony ſometimes of the Roman Biſhop was wont in thoſe days alſo to be deſired for admitting Teachers and Biſhops in other Churches, whereof we have example in Socrat. lib. 4. cap. 37.

8. Moreover, this was a great ſetting up of that Church, whenas their ſentence not only was required, but alſo received divers times of other Biſhops. And when Biſhops of other Provinces were at any diſſention among themſelves, they of their own accord appealed to the Biſhop of Rome, deſiring him to cite up both parties, and to have the hearing and deciding of the cauſe, as did Macarius and Heſychius ſend to Julius then Biſhop of Rome, &c.

9. Item, In that certain of the Arians returning from their Arianiſme, offered up and exhibited unto the Biſhops of Rome their libels of Repentance, and were of them received again, as Urſatius and Valens did to Julius, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 24.

10. The tenth cauſe was alſo, for that Gratianus the Emperor made a Law, that all men ſhould retaine that Religion which Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, and Peter Biſhop of Alexandria did hold, Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 4.

11. And alſo if it hapned the Biſhop of Rome to diſallow the ordering of any Miniſter or Miniſters, the Popes perceiving how diligent and ready they were to ſeek their favour, and to ſend up their meſſengers to Rome for their purgation, took thereby no little manner of exaltation, Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 23.

Beſides theſe aforeſaid, the Biſhops of Rome had alſo another artificial practice, that in ſending out their Letters abroad, as they did ſo many, in all their Epiſtles (if the Epiſtles be theirs, and not forged) ever they were harping of the greatneſs of their name, and of their Apoſtolick See, and of the primacy of Saint Peter, their Predeceſſor and Prince of all the Apoſtles, &c. And this they uſed in every Letter, whenſoever they wrote to any, as appeareth in all their Letters Decretal, namely, in the Letters of Miltiades, Marcellus and Marcus, &c.

Again, if any of the Eaſt Church directed any writing to them, wherein any ſignification was contained of never ſo little reverence given unto them (as learned men commonly uſe for modeſties ſake) that was taken by and by, and conſtrued for plain ſubjection and due obedience, as declareth the Letter of Damaſus, written to the Biſhops of the Eaſt Church beginning thus: Quod debitæ reverentiæ &c. In Engliſh thus: But that your charity yieldeth due reverence to the Apoſtolical See, you in ſo doing (dear children) do much for your ſelves, &c. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 9. whereas the Biſhops of the Eaſt Church notwithſtanding, had ſhewed little or no reverence in their Epiſtle to Pope Damaſus before.

Thus have ye the firſt and original grounds, by the means whereof, the Archbiſhops of the Romiſh See have atchieved to this their great Kingdom and celſitude over Chriſts Church, firſt beginning the myſtery of their iniquity by that which was modeſtly and voluntarily given them: afterward by uſe and cuſtome claiming it ambitiouſly unto them of duty and ſervice; and laſtly, holding faſt (as we ſee) that which once they had gotten into their poſſeſſion, ſo that now in no caſe they can abide the Birds to call home their feathers again, which they ſo long have uſurped.

This later Church of Rome differing from the firſt Church of Rome in form of government.

And thus much concerning the Life, Juriſdiction and Title of the Roman Biſhops: in all which (as is declared) they, and not we, have fallen from the Church of Rome. To theſe I might alſo joyn the manner of Government, wherein the ſaid Romiſh Biſhops have no leſs altered, both from the rule of Scripture, and from the ſteps of the true Church of Rome, which government as it hath been, and ought to be only ſpiritual, ſo hath the Biſhop of Rome uſed it of late years no otherwiſe than hath an earthly King or Prince governed his Realm and Dominions, with riches, glory, power, terror, outward ſtrength, force, priſon, death, execution, laws, policies, promoting his friends to dignities, revenging his affections, puniſhing and correcting faults againſt his perſon more than other offences againſt God committed, uſing and abuſing in all theſe things the Word of God for his pretext and cloke to work his worldly purpoſe withal: whereas indeed, the Word of God miniſtreth no ſuch power to ſpiritual perſons, but ſuch as is ſpiritual: according to the ſaying of the Apoſtle; Arma militiæ noſtræ non ſunt carnalia, ſed ſpiritualia, &c. The Armour and Artillery ſaith Saint Paul, of our warfare, is not carnal, but ſpiritual: ſuch as ſerve not againſt fleſh and blood, nor againſt the weak perſon of man; but againſt Satan, againſt the gates of Hell, and the profundities of the wicked power, &c.

How the Church of Chriſt ought to be governed.

Which Armour, as it is all ſpiritual, ſo ought they, which have the dealing thereof, to be likewiſe ſpiritual, well furniſhed with all ſuch gifts and graces of the Holy Ghoſt, meet for the governance of his ſpiritual Church: as with wiſdom and knowledge in the Scripture to inſtruct the ignorant: with inward intelligence and foreſight of the crafty cogitations and operations of Satan, with power of the Spirit to reſiſt the ſame: with practice and experience of temptations, to comfort ſuch as be afflicted and oppreſſed of Satan: with heavenly diſcretion to diſcern ſpirits, and truth from untruth: with judgment and knowledge of tongues and learning to convict error: with zeal of Gods glory, with fervency of prayer, with patience in perſecution: with a mind contented with all caſes and ſtates incident, with tears and compaſſion on other mens griefs: with ſtoutneſs and courage againſt proud and ſtout oppreſſors: with humility toward the poor and miſerable: with the counſel of the Lord Jeſus by his Word and Spirit to direct direct him in all things to be done: with ſtrength againſt ſin: with hatred of this world: with gift of faith: power of the keyes in ſpiritual cauſes: as to miniſter the Word, the Sacraments and Excommunication when the Word biddeth, that the ſpirit may be ſaved, and to reconcile again as cauſe requireth, &c. Theſe, and ſuch like are the matters wherein conſiſteth the ſinews and ſtrength of the Church, and for true governance of the ſame. But contrary to theſe aforeſaid both the Biſhop and Clergy of this later Church of Rome, proceeding in their adminiſtration and governance, as who under the name and pretence of Chriſt and his Word, have exerciſed of long time nothing elſe but a worldly dominion, ſeeking indeed their own glory, not the glory of Chriſt: riches of the world, not the lucre of ſouls: not feeding of the flock, but filling the purſe: revenging their own wrongs, but neglecting Gods glory: ſtriving againſt man only, and killing him; but not killing the vice, nor confuting the error of man: ſtrong againſt fleſh and blood, but weak againſt the Devil, ſtout againſt the ſimple, but meek againſt the mighty: briefly, doing almoſt all things prepoſterouſly, more like to ſecular Princes, than ſpiritual Paſtors of Chriſts flock, with outward forcement, and fear of puniſhment, with priſoning, famiſhing, hanging, racking, drowning, heading, ſlaying, murthering, and burning, and warring alſo: on the other ſide, with his riches and treaſures, with his guard and guardiance, with ſtrength of Men, with Court and Cardinals: with pomp and pride about them, with their triple Crown, with the naked Sword, with their ordinary ſucceſſion: with their laws and executions: their promotions and preferments: their biddings and commandings: threatnings and revengings, &c.

Prepoſterous government of the Church by the Pope.

In fine, to compaſe therefore the images of a worldly Kingdom, with this Kingdom of the Pope, there is no difference, ſave only, that this Kingdom of the Pope, under hypocriſie maketh a face of the ſpiritual ſword, which is the Word of God: but in very deed doth all things with the temporal ſword, that is, with outward forcement and coaction: differing nothing from civil and ſecular regiment in all properties and conditions, if it be well conſidered. For as in an earthly Kingdom, firſt there is a Prince or ſome chief Magiſtrate appointed, having dominion over his Nobles and Commons, containing all his Subjects under his ſtatutes and laws; with the which laws notwithſtanding he diſpenſeth at his pleaſure; under whom all other inferiour Magiſtrates have their order and place to them appointed to rule over the Subjects, and yet to be ſubject under him: ſo if the ſtate and form of the Pope be well conſidered, we ſhall ſee it altereth nothing from the ſame, but only in the names of the perſons. In civil government, all ſubjection is referred to one head ruler, whoſe authority ſurmounteth all the reſt, and keepeth the munder obedience: in like manner the government of the Popiſh Church is committed to one man, who as chief ſteward, over-ſeer, and ruler of Chriſts houſhold in his abſence, hath ſupreme power over all Churches to moderate and direct all the affairs thereof. But here ſtandeth the difference, in civil Policy he is called a King or Prince: here he is called a Pope.

A compariſon between the Kingdom of this World, and the Kingdom of the Pope.

The King hath next unto him his Dukes and Earls: the Popes Nobility ſtandeth in his Cardinals and Legats; who though they be no Dukes in name, yet in pomp and pride, will not only give check to them, but alſo mate to Kings themſelves, if they might be ſuffered, as did Theodorus, Lanfrancus, Anſelmus, Thomas Becket, and ſo would Thomas Woolſey have done, had not the King given him a neck to his mate betime. In Civil Policy next to Dukes and Earls followeth the order of Lords, Barons, Knights, Eſquires, Gentlemen, with Majors, Sheriffs, Conſtables, Bailiffs, Wardens, &c. The like race is to be ſeen alſo, although under other names, in the Popes policy: of Primats, Biſhops, Suffragans, Provoſts, Deans, Canons, Vicars, Archdeacons, Prieſts, Deacons, Subdeacons, Acolyths, Exorciſts, Lectors, Dore-keepers, Singſters, with other Clerks. And is in the other, Under Wardens cometh the order of Scavengers: ſo neither doth the Popes Monarchy lack his Chanel-rakers, to whom may well be compared that rablement of Abbats, Provincials, Priors, Monks, Friers, with their Covents, and Nunneries.

Secular Nobility compared with eccleſiaſtical nobility.

Civil magiſtrates compared with eccleſiaſtical.

Moreover, from Juſtices, Judges, Lawyers, Sergeants, Attorneys, which be neceſſary Officers in the Commonwealth, what differ the Popes Inquiſitors, Canoniſts, Doctors, and Batchelors of the Popes Law, Commiſſaries, Officials, Proctors, Promoters, with ſuch others, which ſerve no leſs in ſpiritual Court, and in the Conſiſtory, than the other aforeſaid do in temporal Court, or in Guildhal? Now whoſo liſt to compare the glory and magnificence of the one, with the glory of the other; alſo the power and ſtrength of the one regiment, with the power of the other; and ſo the riches of the one, with the riches of the other; I ſuppoſe he ſhall ſee no great odds between them both, taking the Popes Kingdom, as it hath ſtood in his full ruff, and yet doth ſtand where Churches are not reformed. As for ſubtilty and politick practice, there is no man that is indifferent that doubteth, or that hath his eyes that ſeeth not, that the Popes Hierarchy, in holding up their ſtate, far excelleth all the Kingdoms of worldly Princes, of whom all other may take example to learn.

Officers of the temporal court compared with the Officers of the ſpiritual Court.

Glory compared.

Power compared.

Riches compared.

Subtilty compared.

Thus in comparing the Popes regiment with civil governance, as they do little or nothing diſagree: ſo in comparing again the ſame with the order of Scriptures, or with the regiment that was in the old ancient Church of Rome, we ſhall ſee no reſemblance between them. As we read in the Apoſtles time, all the Armour of Chriſts Miniſters was ſpiritual and full of godly power againſt the ſpiritual enemies of our ſalvation, governing the Church then with peace, patience, humility, true knowledge of God, the ſword of the ſpirit, the ſhield of faith, the breſtplate of righteouſneſs, hearty charity, ſincere faith, and a good conſcience: ſo after the Apoſtles in the time of Ambroſe, by his own teſtimony it is to be underſtood, that the armour of Churchmen was then, Preces & lachrymæ, prayers and tears: where now the armor of the Popes Prieſthood is nothing elſe but Ignis & ferrum, fire and ſword, wherewith they keep all things under their ſubjection. And here cometh the enorm and horrible abuſe of excommunication, ſuſpenſion and interdiction in caſes frivolous, or worldly; and for ſuch things as for which the Civil Magiſtrate will not commit any Citizens to the ſtocks, the Popes cenſure will not ſtick to commit a Chriſtian to the Devil: not to ſpeak of their other uſurped dealings and doings in matters, that belong to the civil ſword, and be to them impertinent. As in puniſhing whoredom and adultery, in adminiſtration and probats of teſtaments, in bearing civil office, as Popes to be Senators of Rome, and Emperor alſo Sede vacante, Cardinals to be Captains in War, and Rulers of Regions: Biſhops to be Preſidents or Chancellors. Prieſts to be Stewards in great mens houſes, or Maſters of Mints, or Clerks of the Market, or Gardiners to Gentlemen, &c. All which here I overpaſs, referring them to the deeper conſideration of ſuch as have more leiſure to mark the order of their doings, and ſo to judge of the ſame with indifferency, according to the rule of truth taught in Gods Word, and publick examples of the ancient Church of Chriſt in the primitive time.

The diſference between the Popes regiment and the order of the primitive Church.

2 Cor. 10
Epheſ. 6.
1 Tim. 1.

The armor proper to Churchmen.

Horrible abuſe of excommunication in the Popes Church.

The Popes governing in matters to them not pertaining.

Thus having diſcourſed ſufficiently ſo much as concerneth the manner of life, title, juriſdiction and government of the Popes See (in all which points it is to be ſeen how this later Church of Rome hath receded from the true ancient Church of Rome) it now remaineth according to my promiſe, and order prefixed, conſequently to proceed to the fourth and laſt point, which is of Doctrine: wherein conſiſteth the chiefeſt matter that maketh with us and againſt them, in ſuch ſort as (their Doctrine ſtanding as it doth) neither are they to be reputed for true Catholicks, being altered ſo far from them: nor we other than Hereticks, if we ſhould now joyn with theſe. For the more trial whereof, let us examine the Doctrine and Rites of the ſaid Church of Rome now uſed, and compare the ſame with the teaching of the ancient Catholicks, to the intent that ſuch ſimple ſouls as have been hitherto, and yet are ſeduced by the falſe viſard and image of this pretenſed and baſtardly Church, perceiving what lieth within it, may be warned betime, either to eſchew the peril, if they liſt to be inſtructed; or if not, to blame none but themſelves for their own wilful deſtruction. And albeit I could here charge the new fangled Church of the Pope with ſeven or eight hainous crimes, as blaſphemy, idolatry, hereſie, ſuperſtition, abſurdity, vanity, cruelty and contrariety (in which it neither agreeth with the old learning of their fore-elders, nor yet with themſelves in ſundry points) yet after a more temperate ſort to paſs this matter with them,

The corrupt doctrine of the Popes church examined and detected.

The falſe image of the Popes Church.

No comfort nor salvation in the Popes doctrine now taught.

them these two things I will and dare boldly affirm, that in this Doctrine of the Pope now taught in the Church of Rome, is neither any consolation of Conscience, nor salvation of mans soul. For seeing there is no life nor souls health but only in Christ, nor any promise of salvation or comfort made, but only by faith in the son of God: what assurance can there be of perfect peace, life or salvation, where that which only maketh all, is least made of, and other things which make least are most esteemed? For to say the simple truth, what else is the whole course and body of the Popes law now set forth, but a doctrine of laws, a heap of ceremonies, a teaching of traditions, a meditation of merits, a foundation of new religions? all which confer not one jot to the justification of our souls before the terrible judgment of God.

The scope and summe of the Popes doctrine whither it tendeth.

And therefore as it may be truly said that this doctrine of the Pope is void of all true comfort and salvation: so likewise it seemeth that these, which addict themselves so devoutly to the Popes learning, were never earnestly afflicted in conscience, never humbled in spirit, nor broken in heart, never entred into any serious feeling of Gods judgment, nor ever felt the strength of the law and of death. For if they had, they should soon have seen their own weakness, and been driven to Christ; then should they have seen what a horrible thing it is to appear before God the Father, or once to think on him (as Luther saith) without Christ. And on the contrary side, then should they know what a glory, what a Kingdom, what liberty and life it were to be in Christ Jesus by faith, holding their inheritance, not with the bond-son of Agar, but with the free son of Sara: by promise, and not by the law; by grace, and not by works; by gift, and not by deserving: that God only might be praised, and not man.

Papists never lightly afflicted in conscience deeply.

An horrible thing to think of God without Christ. Luther.

And thus were the old Romans first taught by St. Paul writing to the Romans. The same did Cornelius the Roman, and first that was baptised of all the Gentiles, learn of St. Peter when he received the Holy Ghost, not by the deeds of the law, but only by hearing the faith of Jesus preached. And in the same Doctrine the said Church of the Romans many years continued, so long as they were in affliction. And in the same Doctrine the Bishop of Rome with his Romans now also should still remain, if they were such ancient Catholicks as they pretend, and would follow the old mother Church of Rome, and hold the first liquor wherewith they were first seasoned. But the sweet verdor and scent of that liquor and pleasant Must is now clean put out through other unsavoury infusions of the Popes thrusting in; so that almost no taste nor piece remaineth of all that primitive Doctrine, which St. Paul and other Apostles first planted among the Gentiles. And what marvel if the Romans now in so long tract of time have lost their first sap, seeing the Church of the Galatians then in the very time of St. Paul their Schoolmaster, he being amongst them, had not so soon turned his back a little, but they were all turned almost from the Doctrine of faith, and had much ado to be recovered again.

The right faith of the old Romans. Cornelius a Roman, first baptised of all the Gentiles.

The Church of Rome hath lost the liquor wherewith it was first seasoned.

The Galatians almost gone from faith in St. Pauls time.

Of this defection and falling from faith, St. Paul expresly foretelleth us in his letters both to the Thessalonians, and also to Timothy, where he sheweth, that a defection shall come, and that certain shall depart from the faith, attending to spirits of error, &c. *1 Tim.*4. and to know what errors these shall be, the circumstance plainly leadeth us to understand in the same place, where the said Apostle speaketh of marked consciences, forbidding men to marry, and to eat meats ordained of God to be taken with thanksgiving, for mans sustenance; most evidently, as with his finger, pointing out unto us the Church of Rome, which not in these points only, but also in all other conditions almost is utterly revolted from the pure original sincerity of that doctrine, which St. Paul planted in the Church of the Romans, and of all other Gentiles.

1 Tim.4.

The summe of St. Paul's Doctrine delivered to the Gentiles.

A brief sum of St. Pauls doctrine delivered to the Gentiles.

1. First, the doctrine of St. Paul ascribeth all our justification freely and meerly to faith only in Christ, as to the only means and cause immediate, whereby the merits of Christs Passion be applied unto us, without any other respect of work or works of the law whatsoever: and in this Doctrine, the Church of the Romans was first planted.

2. Secondly, the same Doctrine of St. Paul cutting off, and excluding all glory of mans deserving, stayeth only upon Gods promise and upon grace, not mans merits: upon mercy, not mans labouring or running: upon election and calling, not mans willing &c.

Salvation by mercy only, and not by merits.

3. Thirdly the same Doctrine casting down the strength of man and his Integra naturalia (as the Schools do term them) concludeth all flesh under sin, and maketh the same destitute of the glory of God.

All flesh concluded under sin.

4. Item, it maketh manifest difference between the Law and the Gospel, declaring the use and end of them to be divers: the one to kill, the other to quicken; the one to condemn, the other to justifie; the one to have an end and a time, the other to be perpetual, &c.

Difference between the Law and the Gospel.

5. Item, the same Doctrine of St. Paul, as it sheweth a difference between the Law and the Gospel; so it maketh no less difference between Justitia Dei, and Justicia propria; that is, the righteousness of God and the righteousness of Man, abhorring the one, that is, mans own righteousness, coming by the law and works; and imbracing the other which God imputeth freely and graciously to us for Christ his Sons sake, in whom we believe.

Justicia Dei Justicia propria.

6. Item, it wipeth away all traditions, and constitutions of men whatsoever, especially from binding of conscience, calling them beggerly elements of this world.

The righteousness of God, & the righteousness of man, how they differ in Scripture.

7. Likewise it rejecteth and wipeth away all curious subtilties, and superfluous speculations and knoweth nothing else but Christ only crucified, which is only the object whereunto our faith looketh.

A true Christian knoweth nothing but Christ crucified.

8. Furthermore as the same Doctrine of Saint Paul defineth all men to be transgressors by disobedience of one Adam, though they never touched the apple, they coming of his stock by nature; so doth it prove all men to be justified by the obedience of one, though they did not his obedience, they being likewise born of him by spiritual regeneration and faith.

All men condemned by one.

9. And therefore as all men coming of Adam be condemned originally, before they grow up to commit any sin against the Law: so all men regenerated by faith in Christ, be saved originally before they begin to do any good work of charity, or any other good deed.

All men saved by one.

10. Item, the Doctrine of St. Paul perpending the high glory of a Christian mans state in Christ Jesus by faith, first setteth him in a perfect peace with Almighty God, *Rom.*5. Secondly, exempteth him from all condemnation, *Rom.*8. Thirdly, it matcheth him with Angels; it equalleth him with Saints and fellow Citizens of Heaven; it numbreth him with the houshold of God; and inheriteth him with Jesus Christ himself, *Ephes.*2. Fourthly, it adopteth him from the state of a servant, to the state of the Son of God, crying Abba Father, *Gal.*4. Fifthly, it openeth to him a bold access and entrance to the high majesty and throne of grace, *Ephes.*2.*Heb.*4. Sixthly, it subjecteth all things under him, as ministers, yea the Apostles themselves in their highest office, death, life, things present, things to come, with the whole World besides, and assigneth him no spiritual head, but only Christ, saying, And you are Christs, and Christ is Gods, 1 *Cor.*3. Seventhly, it advanceth and setteth him in a spiritual liberty or freedom, above all terrours of spirit, rising either of Gods Law, or Mans Law, above all dreadful fears of sin, damnation, malediction, rejection, death, hell, or purgatory: above all servile bondage of ceremonies, mens precepts, traditions, superstitious vices, yokes, customs, or what else soever oppresseth and entangleth the spiritual freedom of a Conscience, which Christ hath set at liberty; and requireth moreover that we walk and stand stout in that liberty whereto we are brought with the free-son of Sara, and not suffer our selves any more to be clogged with any such servile bondage: that is to say, although we must be content to subject our bodies to all service, and to all men, yet must we not yield our spiritual consciences and souls as slaves and servants, to be subject to the fear or bondage of any terrene thing in this world, for so much as we are in that part made Lords and Princes over all things whatsoever can harm, or bind, or terrifie us, *Gal.*4. *Col.*2.

Original sin, original justice. Rom.5. Rom. 8. Ephes. 2. Itaq; jam non es servus sed filius. Gal. 4. Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. 1 Cor. 3. The glorious state of christian liberty and spiritual freedom in Christ Jesus. Gal. 4. Colos. 2.

11. Item, the right vein of Saint Pauls Doctrine putteth no difference nor observation in days and times, *Gal.*4. *Col.*2.

Days and times indifferent.

12. Item,

Meats indifferent with thanksgiving.

12. Item, it leaveth all meats to be indifferent, with thanksgiving, to ſerve the neceſſity of the body, and not the body to ſerve them, *Coloſſ.*2. 1 *Tim.*4.

Marriage lawful for all men.

13. Item, it permitteth Marriage without reſtraint or exception, lawful and alſo expedient for all men, having need thereof, 1 *Cor.*7.

One ſacrifice for ſin, and no more. Heb. 9.

14. Item, it admitteth no ſacrifice for ſin but the ſacrifice of Chriſt alone, and that done once for all with blood. For without blood there is no remiſſion of ſin, which is applied to us by faith only, and by nothing elſe, *Heb.*9.

The uſe of the holy Communion in ancient time of the primitive Church.

15. Item, as touching the holy Communion, by the Letters of Saint Paul to the *Corinth.*11. we underſtand, that the uſe then amongſt them was, to have the participation of the Bread called the Lords Body, and of the Cup called the Lords Blood, adminiſtred not at an Altar, but at a plain Board or Table, the Congregation there meeting together after the time of their Supper, where not the Miniſter alone did receive, and the other looked on; but the whole Congregation together did communicate with reverence and thankſgiving, nor lifting over the Prieſts head, nor worſhipping, nor kneeling, nor knocking their breaſts; but either ſitting at the Supper, or ſtanding after the Supper. According to which form the Muſcovites yet to this day, following the old Rite of the Country (although being drowned otherwiſe in much ſuperſtition) uſe to receive it after they be riſen from their Dinner, ſtanding. Experience whereof was ſeen here at London the firſt day of October, 1569.

No more Sacraments mentioned in St. Paul, but the Lords ſupper and Baptiſm.

16. Item, the ſaid Apoſtle, beſides the Sacramental Supper, maketh mention of Baptiſm, or waſhing of regeneration, although he himſelf baptiſed but few, 1 *Cor.*1. of the other Sacraments he maketh no mention.

17. Item, by the ſame Doctrine of St. Paul, no tongue is to be uſed in the Congregation, which is not known, and doth not edifie, 1 *Cor.*14.

The authority and office of the civil Magiſtrates.

18. Item, the Rule of Saint Paul's Doctrine ſubjecteth every creature under the obedience of Kings and Princes, and ordinary Magiſtrates, ordained of God to have the ſword and authority of publick Regiment, to order and diſpoſe in all things, not contrary to God, whatſoever pertaineth to the maintenance of the good, or to the correction of the evil: from whoſe Juriſdiction there is no exemption of vocations or perſons, whether they be Eccleſiaſtical or Political. And therefore to this office it appertaineth to preſerve peace, to ſet things in lawful order, to conſerve Chriſtian Diſcipline in the Church of Chriſt, to remove offences, to bridle the diſobedient, to provide and procure wholeſome and faithful teachers over the people, to maintain learning, and ſet up Schools, to have overſight not only of the People, but alſo of all Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters, to ſee every one to do his duty, and to remove or puniſh ſuch as be negligent: alſo to call Councils and Synods, and to provide that the Church Goods be faithfully diſpenſed by the hands of true dealers, to the ſuſtentation of the Church, of true Teachers, and to the publick neceſſity of the poor, &c.

The office and authority of Biſhops how far it doth extend.

19. Furthermore, by St. Paul's Doctrine, the Miniſters and ſuperintendents of Chriſts Church have their authority and armour likewiſe to them limited, which armour is only ſpiritual and not carnal, whereby they fight not againſt fleſh and blood, but againſt the power of darkneſs, error and ſin; againſt the ſpiritual ſeduction and craftineſs in heavenly things, againſt the works and proceedings of Satan the Prince of this World, in comforting weak Conſciences againſt the terrors of the Devil and deſperation, and finally againſt every cogitation lifted up againſt Chriſt, to ſubdue every celſitude to the ſubjection and power of Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God.

Another brief recapitulation of the ſame.

Another brief recapitulation of St. Paul's doctrine reduced to five points.

BRiefly to reduce the whole Doctrine of St. Paul into a compendious ſum, it conſiſteth chiefly in theſe five points:

1. Firſt, in ſetting forth the grace, great love and good will, and free promiſes of God the Father in Chriſt Jeſus his Son to mankind, which ſo loved the World, that he hath given his own Son for the redemption thereof, John 3. 16. Which gave his Son to die for us being his enemies, *Rom.*5. Which hath quickned us being dead in ſin, *Epheſ.*2. Which ſo mercifully hath reconciled the World to himſelf by his Son, and alſo by his Embaſſadors deſireth us to be reconciled unto him, 2 *Cor.*5. Who hath given his own Son to be Sin for us, 2 *Cor.*5. To be accurſed for us, Gal. 3. Which by firm promiſe hath aſſured us of our inheritance, *Rom.*4. Which not by the works of righteouſneſs that we have done, but of his own mercy hath ſaved us by the waſhing of Regeneration, *Tit.*3.

The great mercy of God in Chriſt. Galat. 3. 2 Cor. 5. Rom. 5. Titus 3.

2. The ſecond point conſiſteth in preaching and expreſſing the glorious and triumphant majeſty of Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God, and the excellency of his glory; who being once dead in the infirmity of fleſh, roſe again with power, and aſcending up with majeſty, hath led away captivity captive, *Eph.*4. ſitteth and reigneth in glory on the right hand of God in heavenly things above all principates and poteſtates, powers and dominations, and above every name that is named, not only in this World, but alſo in the world to come, *Epheſ.*1. At whoſe name every knee is to bend both in heaven and in earth, and under the earth, and every tongue to confeſs our Lord Chriſt Jeſus to the glory of God the Father, *Phil.*2. In whom and by whom all things are made both in heaven and earth, things viſible and inviſible, whether they be thrones or dominations, or principates or poteſtates, all are by him and for him created, and he is before all, and all things conſiſt in him who is the head of his body the Church, the beginning and firſt born from the dead, in whom dwelleth all fullneſs, *Col.*1. To whom the Father hath given all judgment, and judgeth no man himſelf any more, John 5. To whom the Father hath given all things to his hands, John 13. To whom the Father hath given power of all fleſh, John 17. To whom all power is given in heaven and earth, Mathult. In whom all the promiſes of God are Eſt & Amen, 2 *Cor.*1.

The glory and majeſty of Chriſt Jeſus ſet forth by St. Paul. Epheſ. 4. Phil. 2. Coloſ. 1. John. 5. John 13. John 17. Math.ult. 2 Cor. 1.

3. Thirdly, he declareth the vertue of his Croſs and Paſſion, and what exceeding benefits proceed to us by the ſame. By whoſe blood we have redemption and remiſſion of our ſins, Epheſ. 1. By whoſe ſtripes we are made whole, *Eſay.*53. By whoſe Croſs all things are pacified, both in heaven and in earth, *Col.*1. By whoſe death we are reconciled, *Rom.*5. Who hath deſtroyed death, and brought life to light, 1 *Tim.*1. Who by death hath deſtroyed him which had the power of death, that is, the Devil, and hath delivered them which lived under fear of death all their life in bondage, *Heb.*2. By whoſe obedience we are made juſt: by whoſe righteouſneſs we are juſtified to life, Rom. 5. By whoſe curſe we are bleſſed, and delivered from the malediction of the Law, *Gal.*3. By whoſe blood we that once were far of, are made near unto God, *Epheſ.*5. Who in one body hath reconciled both Jews and Gentiles unto God, *Epheſ.*2. Who by his fleſh hath taken away the diviſion and ſeparation between God and us, aboliſhing the law which was ſet againſt us in precepts and decrees, Epheſ. 2. Who is our peace, our advocate, and propitiation for the ſins of the whole world, 1 John 2. Who was made accurſed, and ſin for us, that we might be the righteouſneſs of God in him, 2 *Cor.*5. Who is made of God for us, our wiſdom, and righteouſneſs, and ſanctification, and redemption, 1 *Cor.*1. By whom we have boldneſs and entrance with all confidence through faith in him, Epheſ. 3. Who forgiveth all our ſins, and hath torn in pieces the obligation or hand-writing, which was againſt us in the law of commandments, and hath crucified it upon the Croſs, and utterly hath diſpatched and aboliſhed the ſame, and hath ſpoiled principates and poteſtates, as in an open ſhew of conqueſt, triumphing over them openly in himſelf, *Col.*2. Who juſtifieth the wicked by faith, *Rom.*4. In whom we are made full and compleat, *Col.*2. &c.

The third branch. The vertue and effect of Chriſts death, and what exceeding benefits proceed thereof.

4. The fourth branch is, to teach us and inform us, to whom theſe benefits of Chriſts Paſſion and Victory do appertain, by what means the ſame is applied and redoundeth unto us; which means is only one, that is, only faith in Chriſt Jeſus, and no other thing. Which faith it pleaſeth Almighty God to accept for righteouſneſs. And this righteouſneſs it is, which only ſtandeth before God, and none other, as we are plainly taught by the Scriptures, and eſpecially by the Doctrine of St. Paul. Which righteouſneſs thus riſing of faith in Chriſt, St. Paul calleth the righteouſneſs of God, where he ſpeaketh of himſelf, utterly refuſing the other righteouſneſs which is of the law, that he might be found in him, not having his own righteouſneſs which is of the law, but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which is of faith, Phil. 3. Again, the ſaid Apoſtle writing of the Jews, which ſought for righteouſneſs and found it not; and alſo of the Gentiles, which ſought not for it, and yet found it, ſheweth the reaſon why: Becauſe (ſaith he) the one ſought it by works and the Law, and not knowing the righteouſneſs of God, and ſeeking to ſet up their own righteouſneß, did not ſubmit themſelves to the righteouſneß which is of God. The other, which were the Gentiles, and ſought not for it, obtained righteouſneſs, that righteouſneſs which is of faith, &c. Rom. 9. Alſo in another place of the ſame Epiſtle, Saint Paul writing of this righteouſneſs which cometh of faith, calleth it the righteouſneſs of God, in theſe words: Whom God (ſaith he) hath ſet up for a propitiation by faith in his blood, whereby to make manifeſt the righteouſneß which is of himſelf in tolerating our ſins, &c. Rom. 3. By the which righteouſneſs it is evident that St. Paul meaneth the righteouſneſs of faith, which Almighty God now revealeth and maketh manifeſt by preaching of the Goſpel. Wilt thou ſee yet more plainly this righteouſneſs of God, how it is taken in St. Paul, for the righteouſneſs of faith, and therefore is called the righteouſneſs of God, becauſe it is imputed only of God to faith, and not deſerved of man? In the ſame Epiſtle to the Romans and in the third Chapter aforeſaid, his words be manifeſt: The righteouſneß of God (ſaith he) is by faith of Jeſus Chriſt, in all, and upon all that do believe, &c.

A leſſon out of St. Paul's Doctrine, of all Chriſtians to be obſerved.

Wherefore whoſoever ſtudieth to be accepted with God, and to be found righteous in his ſight, let him learn diligently by the Doctrine of St. Paul to make a difference and a ſeparation, as far as from Heaven to Earth, between theſe two, that is, between the righteouſneſs of works, and righteouſneſs of faith: and in any wiſe beware he bring no other means for his Juſtification, or remiſſion of his ſins, but only faith apprehending the body or perſon of Chriſt Jeſus crucified. For as there is no way into the houſe but by the door, ſo is there no coming to God but by Chriſt alone, which is by faith. And as the mortal body, without bodily ſuſtenance of bread and drink, cannot but periſh; ſo the ſpiritual ſoul of man hath no other refreſhing but only by faith in the body and blood of Chriſt, whereby to be ſaved. With this faith the idolatrous Gentiles apprehended Jeſus Chriſt, and received thereby righteouſneſs. Cornelius (the firſt baptiſed Roman) ſo ſoon as he heard Peter preach Chriſt, received ſtraightway the Holy Ghoſt. Peter himſelf confeſſed, and for his confeſſion had the Keys of Heaven, Mat. 16. Zacheus received the perſon of Chriſt into his houſe, and withal received ſalvation both to him and his whole houſhold, Luke 19. What a ſinner was Mary, which had no leſs in her than ſeven Devils, and yet becauſe ſhe ſet her heart and affection upon that perſon, many ſins were forgiven her? Luke 7. The right hand Thief, how far was he from all works of the Law, and yet by Faith entred he juſtified into Paradiſe the ſame day with Chriſt? Luke 23. In like manner although the poor Publican came to the Church with leſs holineſs after the Law, yet went he home to his houſe more juſtified than the Phariſee with all his works, and all by reaſon of faith, Luke 18. The Parable of the Prodigal Son which was loſt, yet revived again; alſo of the loſt groat, and of the loſt ſheep which went aſtray and was found again: what do theſe declare, but that which is loſt by the Law to be recovered by faith and grace? And how oft do we read in the Goſpels? Thy faith hath ſaved thee, &c. Jeſus ſeeing their belief, &c. He that believeth in me, I will raiſe him up in the laſt day, &c. Believe alſo in me, &c. He that believeth in me hath everlaſting life, &c. Without me ye can do nothing, &c. He that is in me, &c. He that loveth me, &c. He that heareth me, &c. He that abideth in me, &c. He that receiveth me, &c. Unleß ye eat my fleſh, and drink my blood, &c. That they may receive remiſſion of ſins by their faith in me, &c. Acts 26. To him all the Prophets give witneß, to have remiſſion of ſins, whoſoever believeth in his Name, &c. Acts 10. He that believeth and is baptiſed, Mat. ult. He that believeth in me ſhall do the works that I do, and greater than theſe, &c.

The Writings of St. Paul full of the name of Chriſt Jeſus.

And likewiſe in the writings of St. Paul, how often do we hear the name of Chriſt almoſt in every third or fourth line, where he ſtill repeateth: In Chriſto Jeſu, per Chriſtum Jeſum per Jeſum Chriſtum Dominum noſtrum &c. Qui credunt in ipſo, &c. Omnes qui credunt in eo, &c. Credentes in illo, in eum, credentes illi, in nomen ejus, in nomine Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti. &c. Believe (ſaith St. Paul to the Jaylor) in the Lord Jeſus, and thou ſhalt be ſaved and thy whole houſe, &c. Acts 16.

Belief only in Chriſt juſtifieth. Acts 16.

Thus then thou ſeeſt, as the Paſſion of Chriſt is only the efficient or perſonal cauſe immediate of our ſalvation: ſo is Faith only the inſtrumental or mean cauſe that maketh the merits of Chriſt to us available. For as the paſſion of Chriſt ſerveth to none but ſuch as do believe; ſo neither doth faith (as it is only a bare quality or action in mans mind) it ſelf juſtifie, unleſs it be directed to the body of Chriſt crucified as to his object, of whom it receiveth all his vertue. And therefore theſe two muſt always joyntly concur together, faith, and Chriſt Jeſus crucified. As for example, when the Children of Iſrael were bid of Moſes to look up to the brazen Serpent; neither could the Serpent have helped them, except they had looked up, nor yet their looking upward have profited them, unleſs they had directed their eyes upon the ſaid Serpent as the only object ſet up to the ſame purpoſe for them to behold. So our Faith in like caſe directed to the body of Jeſus our Savior, is the only means whereby Chriſts merits are applied unto us, and we now juſtified before God, according to the Doctrine of St. Paul (who in expreſs words deeming to us what this faith is, and how it juſtifieth) ſaith: If thou ſhalt confeß with thy mouth the Lord Jeſus, and believe with thy heart that God raiſed him from death, thou ſhalt be ſaved, &c. Rom. 10. Beſides this, what action or quality ſoever is in man, either hope, charity, or any other kind of faith and believing, be it never ſo true, except it apprehend this object (which is) the body of Chriſt the Son of God, it ſerveth not to juſtification. And that is the cauſe why we add this particle (only) to faith, and ſay that only faith in Chriſt juſtifieth us, to exclude all other actions, qualities, gifts, or works of man, from the cauſe of juſtifying; for ſo much as there is no other knowledge nor gift given of God to Man, be it never ſo excellent, that can ſtand before the judgment of God unto Juſtification, or whereunto any promiſe of ſalvation is annexed; but only this faith looking up to the Brazen Serpent, that is, to the body of Chriſt Jeſus for us crucified.

The perſonal cauſe of Salvation. The inſtrumental cauſe.

How faith juſtifieth. Chriſt the only object of faith which juſtifieth.

Example of the braſen Serpent.

What faith is by S. Paul. Rom. 10.

Faith only.

As for Example, when the Turk ſaith, that he believeth in one living God that made Heaven and Earth, his belief therein is true, yet it juſtifieth him not, becauſe he ſaileth the right object, which is Chriſt. So when the Jew ſaith, that he believeth in one God maker of Heaven and Earth, and believeth alſo the ſame God to be omnipotent, merciful, juſt, and true of promiſe, and that he hath elected the ſeed of Abraham: true it is that he believeth, and yet all this ſerveth him not, becauſe Chriſt the Son of God is not joyned withal. And though the ſaid Jew ſhould be never ſo devout in his prayers, or charitable in almes, or preciſe in keeping the Law, and believe never ſo ſtedfaſtly that he is elect to be ſaved; yet he is never the nearer to ſalvation for all this, ſo long as his faith is not grounded upon the head corner ſtone, which is the perſon and body of Jeſus Chriſt the true Savior. After like ſort it may be ſaid of the Papiſt, when he ſaith, that he is baptiſed, and believeth in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, three Perſons, and one God, and alſo confeſſeth Jeſus Chriſt to be the Son of God, which died for our ſins, and roſe again for our righteouſneſs, &c. his belief therein is true, and indeed would ſave him, if he did ſtay his ſalvation in this faith, and upon Chriſt his Savior only, according to the promiſe and grace of God, and go no further. But that he doth not: for neither doth he admit Chriſt only to be his perfect Savior without the help of the Patrons, Heads, Advocates, and Mediators, nor yet permitteth his faith in Chriſt only to be the means of his Juſtification, but ſetteth up other by-means, as Hope, Charity, Sacrifice of the Maſs, Confeſſion, Penance, Satisfaction, Merits and Pardons, ſuppoſing thereby to work his Juſtification before God, contrary to the word of promiſe, to the Goſpel of Grace, and to the Doctrine of Saint Paul, whereof we ſhall ſee more (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Divers ſorts of believing. The Turks faith. The Jews faith.

Every truth may be believed, but the believing of every truth ſaveth not.

The Papiſts faith.

Only.

Hope and charity be no parts of our juſtification, nor cauſes to make the merits of Chriſt ours.

And thus much of the true cauſes of our Juſtification after the Doctrine of Saint Paul. Concerning which cauſes this diſtinction furthermore by the way is to be added, that as touching the original cauſes of our ſalvation, which be

The cauſes of our ſalvation diſtinguiſhed.

divers and ſundry, ſome are external, and without us; ſome are internal, and within us. Of the external cauſes which are without us, the firſt and principal is the mercy and grace of God. Of this followeth Predeſtination and Election. Then cometh Vocation. The laſt and next cauſe to us is the death and bloodſhed of Chriſt, whereby we are redeemed, and all theſe be external cauſes, becauſe they are without us. Of internal cauſes that be in man through the gift of God, there is but one, and no more in Scripture appointed, that is our faith in Chriſt, which is the gift of God in us. Beſides this, there is no gift of God given to man, vertue, work, merit, nor any thing elſe, that is any part or cauſe of ſalvation, but only this gift of faith, to believe in Chriſt Jeſus. And this is the cauſe why we hold that faith only juſtifieth, meaning that amongſt all the works, deeds, actions, labours and operations, whatſoever man doth or can do, there is nothing in man that worketh ſalvation, but only his faith given to him of God to believe in Chriſt his Son, following therein the trade of St. Pauls teaching: who in preciſe words ſo aſcribeth juſtification to faith, that he excludeth all other actions of man, and works of the law. And therefore in the ſame Epiſtle to the Romans, St. Paul reaſoning of the glory of juſtifying, asketh this queſtion, how this glory is excluded; whether by the law of works? And concludeth no: aſcribing only the glory thereof to the law of faith, and conſequently upon the ſame he inferreth: Colligimus enim juſtificari hominem per fidem ſine operibus legis: We hold that a man is juſtified by faith without the deeds of the law.

Grace and mercy. Election. Vocation. Chriſts paſſion.

Chriſtian faith.

The meaning and cauſe why faith only juſtifieth.

All works of man excluded from the glory of juſtifying.

And how then can that be accounted for any part of our Juſtification, which St. Paul utterly debarreth and excludeth in that behalf? Of which like excluſives, and negatives the whole courſe of St. Pauls Doctrine is full, where he ſtill concludeth; Sine operibus, abſque operibus legis, non ex operibus, Dei donum eſt; ſecundum miſericordiam; non ex operibus, ne quis glorietur. Epheſ. 2. Non ex operibus juſticiæ quæ fecimus nos, ſed ſecundum propoſitum ſuum & gratiam, &c. Tit. 3. Non ſecundum opera noſtra, &c. Tim. 1. That is to ſay, It is the gift of God, not of works, that no man ſhould glory, &c. Not of the works of righteouſneſs, which we have done, but of his own mercy, &c. Not after our works, but after his own purpoſe and grace which is given to us, &c. Again, Gal. 2. Non juſtificatur homo ex operibus, &c. That is, A man is not juſtified by works, &c. Item, Ei qui non operatur, credenti autem in eum qui juſtificat impium, fides imputatur ad juſticiam, &c. Rom. 4. To him that worketh not, but believeth in him which juſtifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed for righteouſneſs, &c. By theſe excluſives and negatives in St. Pauls Doctrine, what doth he elſe mean, but utterly to ſeclude all kind of mans merits, and works of the law from the office and dignity of juſtifying? And although he expreſſeth not the word, Only: yet upon his excluſives, and negatives, this exceptive muſt needs be inferred. For in all Logick the conſequence is neceſſary and formal, as, One man is ſuffered to come into the houſe, and no perſon elſe is ſuffered but one: Ergo one man only is ſuffered to enter into the houſe. And thus much concerning faith in Chriſt proved to be the only mean, or inſtrumental, or conditional cauſe of our ſalvation, and no other beſides the ſame alone, by the doctrine of S. Paul taught to the ancient Romans.

5. The fifth branch, which I note in Saint Paul's Doctrine, is this: that after he hath thus eſtabliſhed us in certainty of our ſalvation through faith in Chriſt, then after that, he exhorteth us vehemently and with all inſtance to good works, ſhewing the true uſe and end to good works: which is, Firſt, to ſhew our obedience and dutiful ſervice (as we may) unto God, who hath done ſo great things for us. Secondly, to relieve our neighbours with our charity and kindneſs, as God hath been kind to us his enemies. Thirdly, to ſtir up others by our example to praiſe God, to embrace the ſame Religion, and to do the like. For requiſite it is, that as God hath been ſo merciful to us and gracious in eternal gifts, we ſhould be merciful likewiſe to other in temporal commodities. And ſeeing it hath pleaſed him of his fatherly goodneſs (of our parts ſo little deſerved) to call us to ſo high a vocation, to give the blood of his Son for us, to forgive us all our ſins, to deliver us from this preſent wicked world, to make us Citizens of Heaven, yea his Children, more than Servants: little then can we do, and well may we think thoſe benefits ill beſtowed, if we forgive not our neighbours, and ſhew not ſomething again worthy that holy calling wherewith he hath called us, in mortifying our worldly luſts here, and ſtudying after heavenly things: and finally, if we being provoked with ſuch love and kindneſs, render not again ſome love for love, ſome kindneſs for kindneſs, ſeeking how to walk in the ſteps which he hath prepared for us to walk in, ſerving him (ſo much as we may) in holineſs and righteouſneſs all the days of our life. And though our obedience ſhall always be imperfect, do the beſt we can: yet reaſon would that ſome obedience we ſhould ſhew, as loving Children to ſuch a loving father.

The fifth branch.

The true uſe and end of good works.

And this is the cauſe why St. Paul is ſo vehement and urgent to call upon good works, not that works ſhould juſtifie, but that we being juſtified ſo mercifully and tenderly through his grace, ſhould not abuſe his grace in vain, but endeavour our ſelves to our uttermoſt to render our ſervice again to him, in ſuch converſation of life as may moſt make to his glory, and profit of our neighbour. And though the words of our Saviour ſeem in ſome places to attribute to our obedience and charity here in earth, great rewards in heaven, that is of his own free grace and goodneſs ſo to impute ſmall matters for great deſerts, and not for us to claim any meed thereby or thank at his hand, as by any worthineſs of our doings: no more than the ſervant can, who when he cometh from the Plough and ſerving the Cattel in the field, ſerveth firſt his Maſter at home and waiteth upon his Table: the Maſter is not bound (ſaith Chriſt) to thank his Servant therefore, and bid him ſit down: So you (ſaith he) when you have done that is commanded you, ſay ye are unprofitable ſervants; ye have done but what your bound duty was to do, Luke. 17.

Good works juſtifie not but follow the juſtified.

Luke 17.

Again, here alſo is to be underſtood, that where ſuch rewards be aſcribed unto mens deeds, it is not for the worthineſs of the deed it ſelf, but for the faith of the doer, which faith maketh the work to be good in Gods ſight: for elſe if an Infidel ſhould do the ſame work that the Chriſtian doth, it were nothing but meer ſin before God. In that therefore the Chriſtian mans work is accepted be it never ſo ſmall (as to give a Cup of cold water) the ſame is only for his faith ſake that doth it, and not for the work which is done. Whereby again we may learn how faith only doth juſtifie a man, and that three manner of ways.

Faith juſtifieth three manner of ways.

Firſt, it juſtifieth the perſon in making him accepted, and the Child of God by regeneration, before he begin to do any good work.

Secondly, it juſtifieth a man from ſin, in procuring remiſſion and forgiveneſs of the ſame.

Thirdly, it juſtifieth the good deeds and works of man, not only in bringing forth good fruits, but alſo in making the ſame works to be good and acceptable in the ſight of God, which otherwiſe were impure and execrable in his ſight.

The office therefore of faith and works is divers, and muſt not be confounded. Faith firſt goeth before, and regenerateth a man to God, and juſtifieth him in the ſight of God, both in covering his ill deeds, and making his good deeds acceptable to God, climbing up to Heaven, and there wreſtling with God and his judgment for righteouſneſs, for ſalvation, and for everlaſting life. Works and Charity follow faith, and are exerciſed here upon the earth, and glory only before Man, but not before God, in ſhewing forth obedience both to God and to Man. Further than this our good works do not reach, nor have any thing to do in the judgment of God touching ſalvation. I ſpeak of our good works (as St. Paul ſpeaketh, Rom. 7.) as they be ours and imperfect. For elſe if our works could be perfect according to the perfection of the law, as Chriſt wrought them in the perfection of his fleſh; that is, if we could perfect them; then as it is ſaid: Qui fecerit ea, vivet in eis. But now ſeeing the imbecillity of our fleſh cannot attain thereto, it followeth thereof that all glory of juſtifying is taken from works, and transferred only to faith.

The office of faith, and the office of the Law compared together.

The works of man be imperfect, and therefore have nothing to do with juſtification.

And thus much concerning the principal contents of St. Paul's Doctrine: wherein the Church of the ancient Romans was firſt grounded and planted, and ſo continued in the ſame, or at leaſt did not much alter, during the primitive ſtate of the Church. Likewiſe the ſame form of Doctrine the later Romans alſo that followed ſhould have maintained, and not have fallen away for any mans preaching, but hold him accurſed, yea if he were an Apoſtle or Angel from Heaven, teaching any other Doctrine beſides that inſtitution which they have received, *Gal.*1. for ſo were they warned before by the Apoſtle St.Paul to do. And yet notwithſtanding all this forewarning and diligent inſtruction of this bleſſed Apoſtle of the Gentiles, what a defection of faith is fallen among the Gentiles, eſpecially among the Romans, whereof the ſaid Apoſtle alſo foretold them ſo long before, fore-prophecying: *That the day of the Lord ſhall not come, except there come a defection before, and that the man of ſin ſhould be revealed, the proud adverſary of God, &c. Theſ.*2. meaning (no doubt) by this defection, a departing and a falling from that faith which the Holy Ghoſt had then planted by his Miniſtry among the Gentiles, as we ſee it now come to paſs in the Church of Rome. Which Church is ſo gone from the faith that St. Paul taught, that if he were now alive, and ſaw theſe Decrees and Decretals of the Biſhop of Rome, theſe heaps of ceremonies and traditions, theſe Maſs-books, theſe Porteſes, theſe Feſtivals and Legends, theſe Proceſſionals, Hymns, and Sequences, theſe Beads and Graduals, and the manner of their Invocation, their Canons, Cenſures, and later Councils, ſuch ſwarms of ſuperſtitious Monks and Friers, ſuch Sects, and ſo many divers Religions, the teſtament of St. Francis, the rule of St. Benedict, of St. Bridget, of St. Anthony, &c. the intricate ſubtilties and labyrinths of the Schoolmen, the infinite caſes and diſtinctions of the Canoniſts, the Sermons in Churches, the aſſertions in Schools, the glory of the Pope, the pride of the Clergy, the cruelty of perſecuting Prelats with their Officials and Promoters: he would ſay this were not a defection, but rather a plain deſtruction, and a ruine of faith; neither that this were any true Church of Chriſt, but a new found Religion, or Paganiſme rather, brought in under the ſhadow of Chriſtianity, wherein remaineth almoſt nothing elſe but the name only of Chriſt, and the outward form of his Religion, the true vein and effect whereof is utterly decayed; as to them which liſt to examine all the parts of this new Romiſh Religion may ſoon appear.

Gal. 1. — Defection of Faith in the Church of Rome. — A view of the Popes catholick Church. — Theſſ. 2. — The Church of Rome degenerated again almoſt to new Paganiſm.

For ſave only that they pretend the ſolemn form and words of the Creed, and are baptiſed, confeſſing the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: as touching all other points and true ſincerity of the Chriſtian Faith, which they outwardly profeſs, they are utterly degenerated from that which S.Paul and the Word of God firſt had taught them.

First, they confeſs the Father in Word, but his Will in his Word expreſſed they renounce; his grace they acknowledge not, his benefits and promiſes given unto us in his Son they receive not, the vigor of his Law they feel not, the terror of his judgments earneſtly they fear not, his commandments they obſerve by traditions and commandments of their own.

The Popes Church only in words Catholick, in deed heatheniſh.

Likewiſe the name of Chriſt his Son in word they confeſs, but his office in deed they deface and diminiſh; his glory they ſeek not, but under his name they do ſeek their own; the power of his blood and paſſion they know not, or elſe diſſemble it, whom neither they admit to be the Head of his Church alone, nor Saviour alone, nor to be our only Patron and Advocate, but match him with our Lady, and other Patrons, ſo that every Pariſh almoſt in Chriſtendom hath his peculiar Patron beſides Chriſt to hold by.

In like manner they confeſs the name of the Holy Ghoſt, but God himſelf knoweth how far they are from the comfort, knowledge and taſte of the Holy Ghoſt; as well may appear by their Councils, by their expounding of Scripture, by their ſuperſtitious ceremonies, by their outward worſhipping and idolatrous Invocation to ſtocks and ſtones, and to dead creatures, by their ſcrupulous obſervation of days, times, places, numbers and geſtures: and no leſs alſo by their Doctrine, which defraudeth the poor hearts of ſimple Chriſtians of their due conſolation, joy and liberty in the Holy Ghoſt, and keepeth them ſtill in a ſervile bondage, and a doubtful incertainty of their ſalvation, contrary to the working of the Holy Spirit of God.

The Religion of the Popes Church proceedeth contrary to the working of the Holy Ghoſt.

And thus the Church of Rome, pretending only the name of Chriſt and of his Religion, is ſo far altered from the truth of that which it pretendeth, that under the name of Chriſt, it perſecuteth both Chriſt and his Religion: working more harm to the Church of Chriſt, than ever did the open Tyrants and perſecuting Emperors among the Heathen: not much unlike herein to the old Synagogue of the Scribes and Phariſes, who under the name of God crucified the Son of God, and under pretence of the Law, fought againſt the Goſpel, and under the title of Abraham's children, perſecuted the Children of Abraham. And as they bragging ſo highly of the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, did indeed deſtroy the true Temple of the Lord: right ſo theſe pretended Catholicks in theſe days, after they have raiſed up a Catholick Church of their own, and have armed the ſame with laws, and have gathered unto them a power of Prieſts, Prelats, Abbots, Priors, & religious men, of Cardinals, and alſo of ſecular Princes to take their part; now under the name of the Catholick Church they perſecute the true Catholick Church, and colouring their proceeding ſtill with In nomine Domini, moſt cruelly put them to death which die Pro nomine Domini; condemning them for Hereticks, Schiſmaticks, and Rebels, not which deny any part of the Creed, which they themſelves profeſs, nor ſuch whom they can convince by any Scripture; but only ſuch, which will not joyn with their errors and hereſies, contrary to the honour of God, and truth of his Word.

The old Phariſes and the later Church of the Romans compared together.

The Popes Church under the name of the Catholick Church perſecuteth the true Catholick Church of Chriſt.

And leſt any ſhould think this, that we here proteſt againſt the corrupt errors and manifold deformities of this later church of Rome, to proceed of any rancour or affection, rather than grounded upon neceſſary cauſes, and demonſtrations evident, my purpoſe is (by the Lords leave) to take herein ſome little pains, as I have collected a little before the ſum and contents of St. Paul's Doctrine, wherewith the old Church of Rome was firſt ſeaſoned and acquainted, ſo now as in a like ſummary table to deſcry the particular branches and contents of the Popes Doctrine now ſet forth, to the intent that all true Chriſtian Readers, comparing the one with the other, may diſcern what great alteration there is between the Church of Rome that now is, and the Church of Rome that then was planted by the Apoſtles in the Primitive time. And to the end to open unto the ſimple Reader ſome way whereby he may the better judge in ſuch matters of Doctrine, and not be deceived in diſcerning truth from error; firſt we will propound certain principles of general poſitions, as infallible rules or truths of the Scripture, whereby all other Doctrines and Opinions of Men being tried and examined, as with the touchſtone, may the more eaſily be judged whether they be true or contrary, and whether they make againſt the Scripture, or no.

Theſe Principles and infallible Rules of the Scripture, as no man can deny: ſo if they be granted, the Doctrine then of the Popes Church muſt needs be found not to be Catholick, but rather full of errors and hereſies, as in the ſequel following remaineth more expreſly and particularly by the Grace of Chriſt to be convinced.

Here followeth a ſummary collection of the Errors, Hereſies, and Abſurdities, contained in the Popes Doctrine, contrary to the Rules of Gods Word, and the firſt Inſtitution of the Church of Rome.

Of Faith and Juſtification.

The errors, hereſies and abſurdities in the Popes doctrine.

FIrſt as touching the only means and inſtrumental cauſe of our Juſtification, whereby the merits of Chriſts Paſſion be applied to us and made ours, ye heard before how Saint Paul aſcribeth the ſame only to faith; as appeareth by all his Letters, eſpecially to the Romans. Where he excluding all kind of works, aſcribeth all our ſalvation, juſtification, righteouſneſs, reconciliation and peace with God only unto faith in Chriſt. Contrary to which Doctrine, the Pope and his Church hath ſet up divers and ſundry other means of their own deviſing whereby the merits of Chriſts Paſſion (they ſay) are applied to us and made ours, to the putting away of ſins, and for our juſtification, as hope, charity, ſacrifice of the Maſs, auricular confeſſion, ſatisfaction, merits of Saints, and holy Orders, the Popes Pardons, &c. So that Chriſts ſacrifice, ſtripes, and ſuffering, by this teaching doth not heal us, nor is beneficial to us, though we believe never ſo well, unleſs we add alſo theſe works and merits above recited. Which if it be true, then it is falſe that Eſay the Prophet doth promiſe: Chap. 53. In his ſtripes we are all made whole, &c. This error and hereſie of the Church of Rome, though it ſeem at firſt ſight to the natural reaſon of man to be but of ſmall importance; yet if it be earneſtly conſidered, it is in very deed the moſt pernicious hereſie that ever almoſt crept into the Church, upon the which, as the only foundation, all or the moſt part of all the errors, abſurdities and inconveniences of the Popes Church are grounded. For this being once admitted, that a man is not juſtified by his faith in Chriſt alone, but that other means muſt be ſought by our own working and merits to apply the merits of Chriſts Paſſion unto us; then is there neither any certainty left of our ſalvation, nor end in ſetting up new means and merits of our own deviſing for remiſſion of ſins. Neither hath there been any hereſie that either hath rebelled more

The means of applying Chriſts merits unto us by the popes doctrine.

The taking away of this article of faith only to juſtifie, is the root of great inconvenience in Chriſts Church.

No hereſie to be compared to the hereſie of Papiſts.

preſumptuouſly againſt the high Majeſty of God the Father, nor more pernitiouſly hath injured the ſouls of the ſimple, than this Doctrine.

The firſt inconvenience

Firſt of all, it ſubverteth the will and teſtament of God. For where Almighty God of mercy hath given us his Son to die for us, and with him hath given out his full promiſe, that whoſoever believeth upon him, ſhould be ſaved by their faith, and aſſigneth none other condition, either of the Law, or any of works, but only of faith, to be the means between his Son and us: theſe men take upon them to alter this Teſtament that God hath ſet, and adjoyn other conditions, which the Lord in his Word never appointed nor knew. To whom the words of Hierom may be well applied upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians, ſpeaking of ſuch: Qui de Evangelio Chriſti faciunt homins Evangelium, vel quod pejus eſt, Diaboli &c. That is, Which make of the Goſpel of Chriſt the goſpel of Men, or rather the goſpel of the Devil, &c.

No condition limited of God to Man for ſalvation but one.

Hierom. in Epiſt. ad Gal. cap. 1.

The ſecond inconvenience.

What hurt cometh into the Church by taking away the article of juſtification.

Secondly, whereas the Chriſtian Reader in the Goſpel, reading of the great grace and ſweet promiſes of God given to mankind in Chriſt his Son, might thereby take much comfort of ſoul, and be at reſt and peace with the Lord his God: there cometh in the peſtiferous Doctrine of theſe Hereticks, wherewith they obſcure this free grace of God to choke the ſweet comforts of man in the Holy Ghoſt, and oppreſs Chriſtian liberty, and bring us into ſpiritual bondage.

The third inconvenience.

Thirdly, as in this their impious Doctrine they ſhew themſelves manifeſt enemies to Gods Grace: ſo are they no leſs injurious to Chriſtian Men, whom they leave in a doubtful diſtruſt of Gods favour and of their ſalvation, contrary to the Word and Will of God, and right inſtitution of the Apoſtolick Doctrine. And whereas our new Schoolmen of late, to maintain the ſaid wicked point of Doctrine, do object unto us that we rather leave mens conſcience uncertain, forſomuch as, if life (ſay they) were not a due reward, it were uncertain: and now forſomuch as due debt is certain, and mercy or favour is uncertain, therefore (ſay they) we leaving mens conſciences to the mercy of God, do leave them in a doubtful uncertainty of their ſalvation. To this I anſwer, that due debt, if it be proved by the Law duly deſerved, muſt be certain. But if the Law ſhall prove it unperfect, or unſufficiently due, then it is not certain, neither can there be any thing duly claimed. Now as touching mercy, ſo long as it remaineth ſecret in the Princes will, and not known to his Subjects, ſo long it is uncertain. But when this mercy ſhall be openly publiſhed by Proclamation, ratified by promiſe, conferred by will and teſtament, eſtabliſhed in blood, and ſealed with Sacraments, then this mercy remaineth no more doubtful, but ought firmly to be believed of every true faithful ſubject. And therefore Saint Paul to eſtabliſh our hearts in this aſſurance, and to anſwer to this doubt, in his Epiſtle to the Romans, doth teach us, ſaying: And therefore of faith, that after Grace the promiſe might be firm and ſure to the whole ſeed of Abraham, &c. Rom. 4. Meaning hereby, that works have nothing to do in this caſe of juſtifying, and noteth the reaſon why. For then our ſalvation ſhould ſtand in a doubtful wavering, becauſe in working we are never certain whether our deſerts be perfect and ſufficient in Gods judgment or no. And therefore (ſaith Saint Paul) to the intent our ſalvation ſhould be out of all doubt and certain, it ſtandeth not of works in deſerving, but of faith in apprehending, and of Gods free grace in promiſing.

Objection of the Papiſts anſwered

The Papiſts do teach the mercy of God to be uncertain.

Mercy of God made certain by his promiſes.

Salvation ſtandeth ſure and certain by Gods promiſe.

The place of Saint Paul Rom. 4. expounded.

The fourth inconvenience.

Fourthly, as in this their ſiniſter Doctrine they break this principle of Chriſtian Religion, which ſaith that a man is juſtified by faith without works, ſo again it breaketh another principle above rehearſed. For this Rule being granted, that nothing is to be added to Gods Word, nor taken from it; then have theſe men done wickedly in adding (as they do) to Gods Word. For where the Word of God limiteth to our juſtification no condition but faith: Believe (ſaith he) in the Lord Jeſus, and thou ſhalt be ſaved. and thy whole houſe, &c. Acts 16. theſe juſticiaries do add thereto divers and ſundry other conditions beſides, and ſuch as the word alſo preciſely excludeth, as Hope, Charity, the Sacrifice of the Maſs, the work of the Prieſt, Ex opere operato, Auricular Confeſſion, Satisfaction, meritorious deeds, &c. And thus much concerning the Doctrine of Faith and Juſtification. Whereby it may appear to what horrible blindneſs and blaſphemy the Church of Rome is now fallen, where this kind of Doctrine is not only ſuffered, but alſo publickly profeſſed, which ſpeaking againſt faith, thus blaſphemouſly dare ſay: Fides illa qua quis firmiter credit, & certo ſtatuit propter Chriſtum ſibi remiſſa eſſe peccata, ſeſeque poſſeſſurum vitam æternam, non fides eſt, ſed temeritas; non ſpiritus ſancti perſuaſio, ſed humanæ audaciæ præſumptio. That is, That faith wherewith a man firmly believeth, and certainly aſſureth himſelf, that for Chriſts ſake his ſins be forgiven him, and that he ſhall poſſeß eternal life, is not faith, but raſhneß; not the perſwaſion of the Holy Ghoſt, but preſumption of a mans boldneß.

Of Works and the Law.

The firſt error of the Papiſts, touching good works.

AS touching the Doctrine of good works, and the Law, what the teaching of Saint Paul was to the Romans, ye heard before. Who although he excludeth good works from the office of juſtifying, yet excludeth he them not from the practice and converſation of Chriſtian life, but moſt earneſtly calleth upon all faithful believers in Chriſt, to walk worthy their vocation, to lay down their old converſation, to give their members ſervants of righteouſneſs, to offer their bodies up to God a lively ſacrifice, &c. The like example of whoſe teaching, if the Churches now reformed do not follow, let their ſermons, their preachings, writings, exhortings and lives alſo bear record. Who although they cannot ſay with Chriſt, Which of you can blame me of ſin? yet they may ſay to the adverſaries, Whoſoever of you is without fault, caſt the firſt ſtone of reproach againſt us. Wherefore Hoſius, Pighius, with their fellows do them open wrong, and ſlanderouſly belie them in comparing them in this behalf to Aetius, Eunomius, and other Hereticks called Anomei, who taking the good ſentences of Saint Paul, did abuſe the ſame to filthy licence of the fleſh, and corruption of wicked life, &c.

Hoſius in 2. tom. confeſſionis, cap. 1.

But to let theſe ſlanders paſs, now what the errors be of the Church of Rome touching this part of Doctrine, remaineth to be declared. Whoſe error firſt ſtandeth in this, that they, miſunderſtanding the definition of good works, do call good works, not ſuch as properly are commanded by the Law of God, but ſuch as are agreeable to the Popes law; as building of Abbies and Churches, giving to the High Altar, founding of Trentals, finding of Chanteries, gilding of Images, hearing of Maſſes, going on Pilgrimage, fighting for the Holy Croſs, keeping of Vows, entring to Orders, faſting of Vigils, creeping to the Croſs, praying to Saints, &c. All which are not only reputed for good works, but ſo preferred alſo before all other works, that to theſe is given pardon from the Pope, double and tripleſold, more than to any other good work of Charity commanded in the Law of Almighty God.

The ſecond error of the Papiſts in the doctrine of good works.

Another error alſo may be noted in the Papiſts, touching the efficient or formal cauſe of good works. For albeit they all confeſs in their Books, that Gratia Dei gratis data is the chief and principal cauſe thereof, and worketh in us Juſtitiam primam (as they call it) yet the good works after regeneration they refer to other ſubordinate cauſes, under God, as to free-will, or to Habitum virtutis, or Ad integra naturalia, and nothing at all to faith, when as faith only next under God is the root and fountain of all well doing: as in the fruits of a good tree, albeit the Planter or the Husbandman be the principal agent thereof, and ſome cauſe alſo may be in the good ground; yet the next and immediate cauſe is the root that maketh the tree fruitful. In like manner, the grace of God in a ſoft and repentant mollified heart, planteth the gift of faith. Faith as a good root cannot lie dead or unoccupied, but ſpringeth forth, and maketh both the tree fruitful, and alſo the fruit thereof to be good, which otherwiſe had no acceptation nor goodneſs in them, were it not for the goodneſs of the root from whence they ſpring; So St. Paul, although he had certain works in him, ſuch as they were, before his converſion: yet had he no good works before the Grace of Chriſt had rooted faith in him. So Mary Magdalene the ſinner, and Zachæus the Publican. So all the Nations of the Gentiles began to bring forth fruit, and eſpecially good fruit, when they began to be ingrafted in Chriſt, and to receive the root of his faith, whoſe fruits before that, were all damnable and unſavoury. As touching the cauſe therefore of good works, there is no other in man but faith, whoſe office as it is to juſtifie us in Heaven, ſo the nature of it is here in earth to work by love, as the root worketh by the Sap. For as a man ſeeth and feeleth by faith the Love and Grace of God toward him in Chriſt his Son: ſo beginneth he to love again both God and man, and to do for his neighbour as God hath done to him. And hereof properly ſpringeth the running fountain of all good works and deeds of Charity.

Faith the root and cauſe of good works.

Works are not to be called good, but by reaſon of faith.

The office of faith to juſtifie.

The effect of faith to bring forth good works.

Fides per dilectionem operans. Gal. 5.

Thirdly, as they err in the cauſe of good works, ſo do they err much more in the end of the Law, and of good works: for where S. Paul teacheth the Law to be given to this uſe and end: to convict our tranſgreſſions, to prove us ſinners, to ſhew and condemn our infirmity, and to drive us to Chriſt: they take and apply no other end to the Law, but to make us perfect, to keep us from wrath, and to make us juſt before God. And likewiſe where St. Paul proveth all our good works to be imperfect, and utterly ſecludeth them from the end of juſtifying: they contrariwiſe do teach, as though the end of good works were to merit remiſſion of ſins, to ſatisfie unto God, to deſerve Grace, to redeem ſouls from Purgatory, and that by them the perſon of the regenerate man doth pleaſe God, and is made juſt before God. For ſo they teach moſt wickedly and horribly, ſaying, that Chriſt ſuffered for original ſin, or ſins going before Baptiſm; but the actual ſins, which follow after Baptiſm, muſt be done away by mens merits. And ſo they aſſign to Chriſt the beginning of ſalvation, or obtaining the firſt grace (as they call it) but the perfection or conſummation of grace they give to works and our own ſtrength. Neither can they in any caſe abide, that we be juſtified freely by the mercy of God through faith only apprehending the merits of Chriſt. Howbeit neither do all Papiſts in this their error agree in one. For ſome make diſtinction, and ſay, that we are juſtified by Chriſt Principaliter, id eſt, principally: Et minus principaliter, id eſt, leſs principally, by the dignity of our own deeds, contrary to the eighth principle before mentioned. Others hold that we are made righteous before God, not by our works that go before faith, but by our vertues that follow after. Some again do thus expound the ſaying of St. Paul, We are juſtified by faith: that is (ſay they) by faith, preparing us, or ſetting us in a good way to be juſtified. Others expound it by the figure Synecdoche, that is, by faith conjoyned together with other vertues: Others thus: By faith, that is, being formed with charity, &c. Thus all theſe do derogate from the benefit of Chriſt, and attribute unto works a great or the greateſt part of our juſtification, directly againſt the true vein of St. Paul's Doctrine, and firſt inſtitution of the ancient Church of Rome, and againſt all the principles of Holy Scripture.

The third error of the Papiſts, touching the end of the Law and good works.

Tho Aquin. Hoſius in 2. tom confeſs. cap. 1.

The divers opinions of the catholick Papiſts, how faith juſtifieth.

The Popes doctrine againſt the principles of Scripture.

Furthermore, as touching the ſaid Doctrine of the Law and good works, they err in miſunderſtanding the nature of the Law and works. For where S. Paul diſputeth that the Law is ſpiritual, and requireth of us perfect obedience of the whole power of man, which we being carnal, are never able to accompliſh: they affirm otherwiſe, that the Law doth require but only outward obedience of man, and therewith is contented. And this obedience (they ſay) man is not only able to perform, but alſo to do more and greater things than the Law requireth. Whereof riſe the works of Supererogation, contrary to the ſixth and eighth principles above ſpecified. Alſo there be (ſay they) among other, certain works of the Law, which pertain not to all men, but are Conſilia, Counſels, luſt for perfect men, as matter for them to merit by, and theſe they call Opera perfectionis, or Opera indebita, adding alſo unto theſe new devices, to ſerve God after their own traditions beſides the Word of God; as Monaſtical Vows, wilful poverty, difference of meats and garments, Pilgrimage to Relicks and Saints, worſhipping of the dead, ſuperſtitious ceremonies, roſaries, &c. with ſuch like; and theſe they call works of perfection, which they prefer before the other commanded in the Law of God. Inſomuch that in compariſon of theſe, the other neceſſary duties commanded and commended by the Word of God (as to bear office in the Commonwealth, to live in the godly ſtate of matrimony, to ſuſtain the office of a ſervant in a houſe) are contemned, and accounted as prophane in compariſon of theſe, contrary to the tenth principle above mentioned.

Of Sin.

Erroneous Doctrine of the later Church of Rome concerning ſin.

OF Sin likewiſe they teach not rightly, nor after the inſtitution of the Apoſtles, and the ancient Church of Rome, while they conſider not the deepneſs and largeneſs of ſin, ſuppoſing it ſtill to be nothing elſe but the inward actions with conſent of will, or the outward, ſuch as are againſt will: whereas the ſtrength of ſin extendeth not only to theſe, but alſo comprehendeth the blindneſs and ignorance of the mind, lack of knowledge and true fear of God, the untowardneſs of mans mind to God-ward, the privy rebellion of the heart againſt the Law of God, the undelighting will of man to God and his Word. The ſenſe of fleſh St. Paul alſo calleth an enemy againſt God, and feeleth in himſelf, that is, in his fleſh, nothing dwelling but Original ſin what it is?

As touching alſo original ſin, wherein we are born, which is the deſtruction of original juſtice, and of Gods image in us (remaining in us, and bringing forth in us wicked cogitations, affections, and motions of naughtineſs againſt the Law of God, and never ceaſing ſo long as man liveth) this original ſin the Popes Doctrine doth not deny, but yet doth much extenuate the ſame, and holdeth that this inward concupiſence, and vitious affections not burſting out in us with conſent of will, are no mortal nor damnable ſin, but only Fomes peccati: and ſay moreover, that this Concupiſcentia in us is no depravation of the higher, but only of the lower parts of man being a thing ἀδιάφορον, indifferent, and no leſs natural in us, than is the appetite to eat and drink, and that the ſame is left to remain in the Saints after Baptiſm, to be to them occaſion of more merriting, &c.

Of Penance or Repentance.

False doctrine of the later Church of Rome touching Penance.

OF Penance, this later Lateran Church of Rome of late hath made a Sacrament (contrary to the fourth principle before) which Penance, ſay they, ſtandeth of three parts, contrition, confeſſion and ſatisfaction canonical. Contrition (as they teach) may be had by ſtrength of free-will, without the Law and the Holy Ghoſt, Per Actus elicitos, through mans own action and endeavour. Which contrition firſt muſt be ſufficient, and ſo it meriteth remiſſion of ſin. In confeſſion they require a full rehearſal of all ſins, whereby the Prieſt knowing the crimes, may miniſter ſatisfaction accordingly. And this rehearſing of ſins, Ex opere operato, deſerveth remiſſion, contrary to the fourteenth principle before. Satisfactions they call Opera indebita, injoyned by the ghoſtly Father. And this ſatisfaction (ſay they) taketh away and changeth eternal puniſhment into temporal pains, which pains alſo it doth mitigate. And again, theſe ſatisfactions may be taken away by the Popes indulgence, &c.

Contrition. Confeſſion.

Satisfaction.

True Doctrine of repentance by the Scripture. Parts of repentance. 1. Contrition. 2. Faith. 3. New obedience.

This unſavoury and Heatheniſh Doctrine of Penance far differeth from the true teaching of Holy Scripture: By the which teaching, repentance properly containeth theſe three parts, contrition, faith and new life. Contrition is called in Scripture the ſorrow of heart, riſing upon the conſiderarion of ſin committed and of the anger of God provoked, which ſorrow driveth a man to Chriſt for ſuccour: whereupon riſeth faith. Faith bringeth afterward amendment or newneſs of life, which we call new obedience, working fruits worthy of repentance.

Difference between the Law and the Goſpel.

The blind ignorance of the Popes Church in not diſtinguiſhing the Law from the Goſpel.

AS there is nothing more neceſſary and comfortable for troubled Conſciences, than to be well inſtructed in the difference between the Law and the Goſpel: ſo is the Church of Rome much to blame in this behalf, becauſe it confoundeth together thoſe two, being in nature ſo divers and contrary one from another; as threatnings with promiſes, things temporal with things eternal, ſorrowful things with glad tidings, death with life, bondage with freedom. &c. Teaching the people that whatſoever the Law ſaith, the Goſpel confirmeth; and whatſoever the Goſpel ſaith, the ſame is agreeable to the Law, and ſo make they no difference between Moſes and Chriſt; ſave only that Moſes (they ſay) was the giver of the old law, Chriſt is the giver of the new and a more perfect Law. And thus imagine they the Goſpel to be nothing elſe but a new law given by Chriſt, binding to the promiſes thereof the condition of our doings and deſervings, no otherwiſe than to the old law. And ſo divide they the whole law after this diſtinction, into three parts, to wit, the law of Nature, the law of Moſes, and the law of Chriſt. And as for the Goſpel (they ſay) it is revealed for no other cauſe, but to ſhew to the world more perfect precepts, and councels, than were in the old law: to the fulfilling whereof they attribute juſtification, and ſo leave the poor conſciences of men in perpetual doubt, and induce other manifold errours; bringing the people into a falſe opinion of Chriſt, as though he were not a remedy againſt the law, but came as another Moſes, to give a new law to the world.

Papiſts make the Goſpel a new law.

Papiſts divide the law into the law of Nature, the law of Moſes, and the law of Chriſt.

The Popes Church blind in the office of Chriſt.

Furthermore, as they make no difference between the nature of the law, and the nature of the Goſpel, confounding Moſes and Chriſt together: ſo neither do they diſtinguiſh or diſcern the time of the law, and the time of the Goſpel aſunder. For where St. Paul bringeth in the law to be a Schoolmaſter, and limiteth him his time unto Chriſt, and ſaith that Chriſt is the end of the law, that is, whereas the law ceaſeth, there Chriſt beginneth, and where Chriſt beginneth there the law endeth: they contrary make the law to have no end nor ceaſing, but give to it immortal life and kingdom equal with Chriſt, ſo that Chriſt and the Law together do reign over the ſoul and conſcience of man. Which is untrue: For either Chriſt muſt give place and the law ſtand; or the law (the condemnation and malediction of the law I mean) muſt end, and Chriſt reign. For both theſe, Chriſt and the law, grace and malediction cannot reign and govern together. But Chriſt the Son of God, which once died, can die no more but muſt reign for ever. Wherefore the law with his ſtrength, ſting and curſe, muſt needs ceaſe and have an end. And this is it that S. Paul ſpeaking of the triumph of Chriſt ſaith, that he Aſcending up led away captivity captive, and hath ſet man at liberty; not at liberty to live as fleſh luſteth, neither hath freed him from the uſe and exerciſe of the law, but from the dominion and power of the law, ſo that, There is now no condemnation to them that be in Chriſt Jeſus, which walk not after the fleſh, &c. Rom. 8. And in another place S. Paul ſpeaking of the ſame power and dominion of the law, ſaith, that Chriſt had taken the obligation written againſt us in decrees, and hath nailed it upon the Croſs triumphing over all, &c. So that as the Kingdom of Chriſt firſt began upon the Croſs; even ſo upon the ſame Croſs, and at the ſame time the Kingdom of the law expired, and the malediction of the law was ſo crucified upon the Croſs, that it ſhall never riſe again, to have any power againſt them that be in Chriſt Jeſus. For like as if a woman be diſcharged from her firſt husband being dead, and hath married another man, the firſt husband hath no more power over her: even ſo we now being eſpouſed unto Chriſt our ſecond husband, are diſcharged utterly from our firſt husband the law, and (as St. Paul in another place ſaith) Are no more under the law, that is, under the dominion and malediction of the law, but under grace, that is, under perpetual remiſſion of ſins, committed not only before our Baptiſm, but as well alſo after Baptiſm, and during all our life long. For therein properly conſiſteth the grace of God, in not imputing ſin to us, ſo often as the repenting ſinner riſing up by faith, flieth unto Chriſt, and apprehendeth Gods mercy and remiſſion promiſed in him, according to the teſtimony both of the Pſalm. Bleſſed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no ſin, &c. and alſo of all the Prophets, Which (as Saint Peter ſaith) give record to him, that through his name, all that believe in him ſhall receive remiſſion of their ſins, &c. Act. 10. Which being ſo, as it cannot be denied, then what need theſe private and extraordinary remiſſions to be brought into the Church by auricular confeſſion, by meritorious deeds, and by the Popes pardons? For if there be no condemnation but by the Law, and if this Law it ſelf which was the firſt husband, be captived, crucified, aboliſhed and departed, what condemnation then can there be to them that be in Chriſt Jeſus, or by whom ſhould it come? If there be no condemnation, but a free and general deliverance for all men, once gotten by the Victory of Chriſt from the penalty of the Law: what needeth then any particular remiſſion of ſins at ſundry times to be ſought at the Prieſts hands or the Popes pardons? He that hath a general pardon, needeth no particular. If remedy for ſin be general and perpetual, once gotten, for ever to all them that be in Chriſt Jeſus, what needeth any other remedy by auricular confeſſion? If it be not general and perpetual, how then is it true that St. Paul ſaith, The Law is crucified, and condemnation aboliſhed? Or how ſtandeth redemption perpetual and general, if remiſſion be not general? For what is redemption elſe, but remiſſion of ſin, or ſins bought out? Or what elſe to kill the Law, but to diſcharge us from condemnation for ever? He that delivereth his friend for a time out of his enemies hand doth him a pleaſure: but he that killeth the enemy once out of the way, giveth perpetual ſafety. So if remiſſion of ſins by Chriſt were for ſome ſins, and not for all, the Law then muſt needs live ſtill. But now the killing and crucifying of the Law importeth full remiſſion and abſolute, and our ſafety to be perpetual. But here, perchaſe, will be objected of ſome: How ſtandeth remiſſion of ſins certain and perpetual, ſeeing new offences being daily committed, do daily require new remiſſion? Hereto I anſwer: Albeit ſins do daily grow, whereby we have need daily to deſire God to Forgive our treſpaſſes, &c. Yet notwithſtanding the cauſe of our remiſſion ſtandeth ever one and perpetual, neither is the ſame to be repeated any more, nor any other cauſe to be fought beſides that alone. This cauſe is the body of Chriſt ſacrificed once upon the Croſs for all ſins that either have been or ſhall be committed. Beſide this cauſe there is no other, neither confeſſion, nor mens pardons that remitteth ſins.

The Law crucified by Chriſt, what it meaneth.

Objection.

Anſwer.

The cauſe of remiſſion ever one and perpetual.

Furthermore, as the cauſe is one and ever perpetual, which worketh remiſſion of ſins unto us: ſo is the promiſe of God ever one, once made, and ſtandeth perpetual, that offereth the ſame to the faith of the repenting ſinner. And becauſe the ſaid promiſe of God is always ſure and cannot fail, which offereth remiſſion to all them that believe in Chriſt, being limited neither to time nor number, therefore we may boldly conclude, that what time ſoever a repenting ſinner believeth, and by faith applieth to him the ſacrifice of Chriſt, he hath by Gods own promiſe, remiſſion of his ſins, whether they were done before, or after Baptiſm.

The promiſe of remiſſion ever perpetual.

Remiſſion of ſins freely promiſed without limitation of time or number.

And moreover, for ſo much as the ſaid promiſe of God offereth remiſſion to the repentant ſinner, by no other means nor condition, but only one, that is, by faith in Chriſt: therefore excluding all other means and conditions of mans working, we ſay, that what repenting ſinner ſoever believeth in Chriſt, hath already in himſelf (and needeth not to ſeek to any Prieſt) perpetual aſſurance of remiſſion, not for this time or that time only, but for ever and a day. For the promiſe ſaith not, He that believeth in Chriſt ſhall be pardoned this time, ſo he ſin no more: neither doth it ſay, that the Law is ſtaid, or the ſentence reprived, but ſaith plainly that the Law with her condemnation and ſentence it ſelf, is condemned and hanged up, and ſhall never riſe again to them that be in Chriſt Jeſus: and promiſeth indeterminately, without limitation, remiſſion of ſins, To all that Acts 10. believe in his name, &c. Act. 10 And likewiſe in another place, the Scripture ſpeaking abſolutely, ſaith, Sin ſhall not prevail over you, and addeth the reaſon why, ſaying, Becauſe ye are not under the Law, but under Rom. 6. Grace, Rom. 6. Adding this leſſon withal (as followeth in the ſame place) Not that ſinners ſhould ſin more therefore, becauſe they are under grace, but only that weak infirmities might be relieved, broken conſciences comforted, and repenting ſinners holpen from deſperation, to the praiſe of Gods glory. For as God forgiveth not ſinners, becauſe they ſhould ſin, ſo neither doth infirmity of falling diminiſh the grace of Chriſt, but rather doth illuſtrate the ſame, as it is written, My ſtrength is made perfect in infirmity, 2 Cor. 12. And again, Where Sin aboundeth, 2 Cor. 12. there Grace ſuperaboundeth alſo.

The means whereby remiſſion is promiſed is only faith.

The words of promiſe free and abſolute.

Mans Infirmity impaireth not the Grace of Chriſt, but augmenteth it.

Rom. 5. In remiſſion of ſins therefore, theſe four things muſt concur together: firſt the cauſe that worketh (which is the ſacrifice of Chriſts body), ſecondly, the promiſe that offereth, thirdly, faith that apprehendeth, fourthly, the repenting ſinner that receiveth. And although ſins daily do grow, which daily provoke us to crave remiſſion: yet as touching the cauſe that worketh remiſſion of our daily ſins, and the means which apprehend and apply the ſaid cauſe unto us, they remain always one and perpetual: beſides which no other cauſe nor means is to be fought of man. So that to them that be repenting ſinners, and be in Chriſt Jeſus, there is no law to condemn them, though they have deſerved condemnation: but they are under a perpetual Kingdom, and a Heaven full of Grace, and remiſſion to cover their ſins, and not to impute their iniquities, through the promiſe of God in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord.

Four things concur in remiſſion of ſins.

And therefore wicked and impious is the doctrine of them, firſt, which ſeek any other cauſe of remiſſion, than only the blood of our Saviour: ſecondly, which aſſign any other means to apply the bloodſhedding of Chriſt unto us, beſides only faith: thirdly and eſpecially, which ſo limit and reſtrain the eternal priviledge of Chriſts paſſion, as though it ſerved but only for ſins done without and before faith, and that the reſt after Baptiſm committed, muſt be done away by confeſſion, pardons, and ſatisfactory deeds. And all this riſeth becauſe the true nature of the Law and the Goſpel is not known, nor the difference rightly conſidered between the times of the one and of the other. Neither again do they make any diſtinction between the malediction of the Law and uſe of the Law. And therefore whenſoever they hear us ſpeak of the Law (meaning the malediction of the Law) to be aboliſhed, thereupon they maliciouſly ſlander us as though we ſpake againſt the good exerciſes of the Law, and give liberty of fleſh to carnal men to live as they liſt. Whereof more ſhall be ſaid (by the Lords grace) as place and time ſhall hereafter require.

The Popes errour touching remiſſion of ſins detected.

What inconvenience riſeth for lack of diſtinction between the Law and the Goſpel.

Of Free-will.

COncerning Free-will, as it may peradventure in ſome caſe be admitted, that men without Grace may do ſome outward functions of the Law, and keep ſome outward obſervances or traditions: ſo as touching things ſpiritual and appertaining to ſalvation, the ſtrength of man being not regenerate by grace, is ſo infirm and impotent, that he can perform no thing, neither in doing well nor willing well. Who, after he be regenerated by Grace, may work and do well, but yet in ſuch ſort that ſtill remaineth, notwithſtanding, a great imperfection of fleſh, and a perpetual repugnance between the fleſh and ſpirit. And thus was the original Church of the ancient Romans firſt inſtructed. From whom ſee now how far this later Church of Rome hath degenerated, which holdeth and affirmeth, that men without grace may perform the obedience of the Law, and prepare themſelves to grace by working, ſo that thoſe works may be meritorious, and of congruity obtain grace. Which grace once obtained, then men may (ſay they) perfectly perform the full obedience of the Law, and accompliſh thoſe ſpiritual actions and works which God requireth, and ſo thoſe works of condignity, deſerve everlaſting life. As for the infirmity which ſtill remaineth in nature, that they nothing regard nor once ſpeak of.

Erroneous doctrine of the Papiſts concerning free-will.

Of Invocation and Adoration.

OVer and beſides theſe uncatholick and almoſt unchriſtian abſurdities and defections from the Apoſtolical faith above ſpecified, let us conſider the manner of their invocation, not to God alone, as they ſhould; but to dead men, ſaying: that Saints are to be called upon, Tanquam mediatores interceſſionis, As Mediators of interceſſion: Chriſtum vero tanquam mediatorem ſalutis. And Chriſt as the Mediator of ſalvation: And affirm moreover, that Chriſt was a Mediator only in time of his paſſion. Which is repugnant to the words of S. Paul, writing to the old Romans, chap. 8. where he ſpeaking of the interceſſion of Chriſt: Which is (ſaith he) on the right hand of God, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us, &c. And if Chriſt be a mediator of ſalvation: what needeth then any other interceſſion of Saints for our ſutes? For ſalvation being once had, what can we require more? Or what lacketh he more to be obtained of the Saints, which is ſure to be ſaved only by Chriſt? And then in their Catholick devotions, why do they teach us thus to pray to the bleſſed Virgin: Salva omnes qui te glorificant, that is, Save all them that glorifie thee, &c. if ſalvation belong only to Chriſt? unleſs they ſtudy of purpoſe to ſeem contrary to themſelves.

False doctrine concerning Invocation.

Mediator of interceſſion.

Mediator of ſalvation.

Chriſt a continual mediator by the doctrine of St. Paul. Rom. 8.

Chriſt only being our mediator of ſalvation, what needeth any other mediation of Saints.

Salvation falſly attributed to the bleſſed Virgin.

Hitherto alſo pertaineth the worſhipping of relikes, and the falſe adoration of Sacraments, that is, the outward ſigns of the things ſignified, contrary to the ſeventh Principle before. Add to this alſo the prophanation of the Lords Supper

Idolatrous adoration of relikes and Sacraments.

Prophanation of the Lords Supper.

False merits ting by Masses.

Supper, contrary to the use for which it was ordained, in reserving it after the Communion ministred, in setting it to sale for money, and falsly perswading both themselves and others, that the Priest doth merit both to himself that saith, and to him that heareth, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu utentis, &c. that is, Only by the mere doing of the work, though the party that useth the same hath no motion in him.

Of Sacraments, Baptism, and the Lords Supper.

False Doctrine touching Sacraments.

AS touching Sacraments, their Doctrine likewise is corrupt and erroneous.

The number

1. First, They err falsely in the number. For where the Institution of Christ ordaineth but two, they (contrary to the fourth Principle above prefixed) have added to the Prescription of the Lords Word, five other Sacraments.

Cause final.

2. Secondly, In the cause final they err. For where the Word hath ordained those Sacraments to excite our faith, and to give us admonitions of spiritual things: they contrariwise do teach that the Sacraments do not only stir up faith, but also that they avail and are effectual without faith, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu utentis, &c. As is to be found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Catharinus, and others more.

The operation.

3. Thirdly, In the operation and effect of the Sacraments they fail, where they contrary to the mind of the Scriptures do say, that they give Grace, and not only do signifie, but also contain and exhibit that which they signifie, to wit, Grace and Salvation.

The application of Sacraments.

4. Fourthly, They err also in Application, applying their Sacraments both to the quick and the dead, to them also that be absent, to remission of sins, and releasing of pain, &c.

Errors and abuses of Baptism.

In the Sacrament of Baptism they are to be reproved, not only for adding to the simple words of Christs Institution divers other new-found Rites and Phantasies of men: but also where the use of the old Church of Rome was only to baptize men; they baptize also Bells, and apply the words of Baptism to water, fire, candels, stocks and stones, &c.

Baptising of Bells.

False Doctrine of the Popes Church concerning the Lords Supper.

But especially in the Supper of the Lord their Doctrine most filthily swerveth from the right mind of the Scripture, all order, reason and fashion; most worthy to be exploded out of all Christian Churches. Touching the which Sacrament, the first Error is their Idolatrous abuse by worshipping, adoring, censing, knocking and kneeling unto it, in reserving also and carrying the same about in pomp and procession in Towns and Fields. Secondly, also in the substance thereof their teaching is monstrous, leaving there no substance of Bread and Wine to remain, but only the real Body and Blood of Christ, putting no difference between calling and making. Because Christ called Bread his Body, therefore say they, he made it his Body, and so of a wholesome Sacrament, make a perilous Idol: and that which the old Church of Rome did ever take to be a mystery, they turn into a blind mist of meer accidents to bleer the peoples eyes, making them believe they see that they see not: and not to see that which they see, and to worship a thing made, for their Maker, a Creature for their Creator: and that which was threshed out of a wheaten Sheaf, they set up in the Church, and worship for a Saviour: and when they have worshipped him, then they offer him to his Father: and when they have offered him, then they eat him up, or else close him fast in a pit, where if he corrupt and putrifie before he be eaten, then they burn him to powder and ashes. And notwithstanding they know well by Scriptures, that the Body of Christ can never corrupt and putrifie: yet for all this corruption, will they needs make it the body of Christ, and burn all them which believe not that which is against true Christian belief.

Idolatry committed to the Sacrament.

The Sacrament turned to an Idol.

Changing, worshipping, offering, eating, burning the body of Christ in the Sacrament of the altar.

Of Matrimony.

Absurdities and Errors of the Popes Church touching Matrimony.

WHat order and rule Saint Paul hath set for marriage in his Epistle to the Corinthians it is manifest: where, as he preferreth single life in such as have the gift of Continence, before the married estate: so again, in such as have not the gift, he preferreth the coupled life before the other: willing every such one to have his wife: Because of Fornication. Furthermore, how the said Apostle alloweth a Bishop to be the Husband of one wife (so he exceed not to the manner of the Jews, which were permitted to have many) and how vehemently he reproveth them that restrain marriage, his Letters to Timothy do record. Moreover, what degrees be permitted by the Law of God to marry, in the Book of Leviticus is to be seen, Chapter eighteen. Also how Children ought not to marry without consent of their Parents by manifest Examples of the Scriptures it is notorious.

1 Cor. 7. 1 Tim. 3. 1 Tim. 4. Lev. 18.

Contrary to these Ordinances of the Scripture, the new Catholicks of the Popes Church, first do repute and call marriage a state of Imperfection, and prefer single life, be it never so impure, before the same, pretending that where the one repleniseth the Earth, the other filleth Heaven. Furthermore, as good as the third part of Christendom, if it be no more, both Men and Women, they keep through co-acted Vows from marriage, having no respect whether they have the gift or no. Ministers and Priests such as are found to have wives, not only they remove out of place, but also pronounce Sentence of death upon them, and account their Children for Bastards and illegitimate: Again, as good as the third part of the year they exempt and suspend from liberty of marriage. Degrees of Copulation forbidden they extend further than ever did the Law of God, even to the fifth or sixth degree. Which degree notwithstanding they release again when they list for money. Over and besides all this, they have added a new-found Prohibition of spiritual Kindred, that is, that such as have been Gossips, or Godfathers and Godmothers together in Christening another mans Child, must not by their Law marry together. Briefly and finally in this Doctrine and Cases of Matrimony, they gain and rake to themselves much money from the people, they augment horrible Sodomitry, they nourish wicked Adultery and much Fornication, they fill the world with Offensions and Bastards, and give great occasion of murthering Infants.

Single life, be it never so impure, preferred before Matrimony.

The third part of Christendom stopt by the Popes Law to marry.

The Popes Doctrine against Priests marriage, and their Children.

The third part of the year exempted from marriage.

Marriage within the fifth or sixth degree, by the Popes Law.

Gossips inhibited to marry by the Popes Law.

What inconveniences come by restraining of marriage.

Of Magistrates and civil Government.

YE heard before what Rules and Lessons Saint Paul gave to the old Romans concerning Magistrates, to whose Authority he would have all humane Creatures to be subjected, and how they are the Ministers of God, having the Sword given unto them, wherewith they ought to repress false Doctrine and Idolatry, and maintain that which is true and right, Rom. 13. Now let us survey a little the Popes proceedings, and mark how far he transgresseth in this, as he doth in all other points almost from true Christianity.

The corrupt Doctrine of the Popes Church concerning civil Rulers and Magistrates.

Rom. 13.

1. First, The Pope with all his Clergy exempt themselves from all Obedience civil.

2. They arrogate to themselves Authority to Ordain and Constitute, without all leave or knowledge of the ordinary Magistrate.

3. Yea they take upon them to depose and set up Rulers and Magistrates, whom they list.

Of Purgatory.

THe Paradoxes, or rather the Fantasies of the later Church of Rome concerning Purgatory, be monstrous, neither old nor Apostolical.

The Fantasies and antics of the Popes Church concerning Purgatory.

1. First (say they) There is a Purgatory, where Souls do burn in fire after this life.

2. The pain of Purgatory differeth nothing from the pains of Hell, but only that it hath an end; the pains of Hell have none.

3. The painful suffering of this fire fretteth and scowreth away the sins before committed in the body.

4. The time in these pains indureth in some longer, in some less, according as their sins deserve.

Ex Thom. Mono & alijs.

5. After which time of their pains being expired, then the mercy of God doth translate them to Heavenly bliss, which the body of Christ hath bought for them.

6. The pains of Purgatory be so great, that if all the Beggers of the World were seen on the one side, and but one Soul of Purgatory on the other side, the whole World would pity more that one, than all the others.

7. The whole time of punishment in this Purgatory must continue so long, till the fire have clean fretted and scowred away the rusty spots of every sinful Soul there burning, unless there come some release.

8. Helps

8. Helps and releaſes that may ſhorten the time of their Purgation, by the Popes Pardons and Indulgences, Sacrifice of the Altar, Dirges, and Trentals, Prayer, Faſting, meritorious Deeds out of the Treaſure-Houſe of the Church, Alms and Charitable Deeds of the living, in ſatisfying Gods Juſtice for them, &c.

9. Lack of belief of Purgatory bringeth to Hell.

Manifeſt defection of the Popes Church from the old Faith of Rome.

Many other falſe Errors and great Deformities, Hereſies, Abſurdities, Vanities, and Follies, beſides their blaſphemous Raylings, and Contumelies, may be noted in the ſaid latter Church of Rome, wherein they have made manifeſt defection from the old Faith of Rome, as in depriving the Church of one kind of the Sacrament, in taking from the people the knowledge and reading of Gods Word, in praying and ſpeaking to the people, and adminiſtring Sacraments in a Tongue unknown, in miſtaking the Authority of the Keys, in their unwritten Verities, in making the Authority of the Scripture inſufficient, in untrue judgment of the Church, and the wrong Notes of the ſame in the Supremacy of the See of Rome, in their wrong Opinions of Antichriſt.

Contrariety between the Religion of Chriſt and of the Pope briefly noted.

But becauſe theſe, with all other parts of Doctrine, are more copiouſly and at large comprehended in other Books both in Latin and Engliſh, ſet forth in theſe our days: I ſhall not need further herein to travel, eſpecially ſeeing the contrariety between the Popes Church and the Church of Chriſt, between the Doctrine of the one, and the Doctrine of the other, is ſo evident, that he is blind that ſeeth it not, and hath no hands almoſt that feeleth it not.

Chriſts Doctrine is wholely ſpiritual.

For (briefly in one note to comprehend, that which may ſuffice for all) whereas the Doctrine of Chriſt is altogether Spiritual, conſiſting wholly in Spirit and Verity, and requireth no outward thing to make a true Chriſtian man but only Baptiſm (which is the outward profeſſion of Faith) and receiving the Lords Supper: Let us now examine the whole Religion of this latter Church of Rome, and we ſhall find it, from top to toe, to conſiſt in nothing elſe but altogether in outward and ceremonial Exerciſes; as outward Confeſſion, Abſolution at the Prieſts hand, outward Sacrifice of the Maſs, buying of Pardons, purchaſing of Obits, externe worſhipping of Images and Reliques, Pilgrimage to this place or that, building of Churches, founding of Monaſteries, outward Works of the Law, outward Geſtures, Garments, Colours, choice of Meats, difference of Times and Places, peculiar Rites and Obſervances, ſet Prayers, and number of Prayers preſcribed, faſting of Vigils, keeping of Holidays, coming to Church, hearing of Service, extern ſucceſſion of Biſhops, and of Peters See, extern Form and Notes of the Church, &c. So that by this Religion to make a true Chriſtian and a good Catholick, there is no working of the Holy Ghoſt almoſt required. As for example, to make this matter more demonſtrable, let us here define a Chriſtian-man after the Popes making: whereby we may ſee the better what is to be judged of the Scope of his Doctrine.

No outward thing is required in Chriſts Doctrine to make a Chriſtian man, but only Baptiſm and the Lords Supper.

All doctrine of the Popes conſiſteth only in outward things

A Chriſtian man after the Popes making defined.

A Chriſtian man defined after the Popes Doctrine.

After the Popes Catholick Religion, a true Chriſtian man is thus defined: firſt, to be baptized in the Latin-Tongue (where the Godfathers profeſs they cannot tell what) then confirmed by the Biſhop: the Mother of the Child to be purified; after he be grown in years, then to come to the Church, to keep his Faſting-days, to faſt the Lent, to come under Benedicite; that is, to be confeſſed of the Prieſt, to do his Penance, at Eaſter to take his Rites, to hear Maſs and Divine Service, to ſee up Candles before Images, to creep to the Croſs, to take holy bread and holy water, to go on proceſſion, to carry his Palms and Candle, and to take Aſhes, to faſt the Ember-days, Rogation-days, and Vigils, to keep the Holidays, to pay his Tythes and Offering-days, to go on Pilgrimage, to buy Pardons, to worſhip his Maker over the Prieſts head, to receive the Pope for his Supream Head, and to obey his Laws, to receive Saint Nicholas Clerkes, to have his Beads, and to give to the high Altar, to take Orders if he will be a Prieſt, to ſay his Mattens, to ſing his Maſs, to lift up fair, to keep his vow, and not to marry, when he is ſick to be anneled and take the Rites of the Holy Church, to be buried in the Church-yard, to be rung for, to be ſung for, to be buried in a Fryers Coole, to find a Soul-Prieſt, &c.

Corporal exerciſe profiteth to ſmall profit.

All which Points being obſerved, who can deny but this is a devout man, and a perfect Chriſtian Catholick, and ſure to be ſaved, as a true faithful Child of the holy Mother-Church?

Now look upon this definition, and tell me (good Reader) what Faith or Spirit, or what working of the Holy Ghoſt in all this Doctrine is to be required. The Grace of our Lord Jeſus give the true light of his Goſpel to ſhine in our Hearts. Amen.

Ζὼν τῷ Χριστῷ.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Acts and Monuments,

CONTAINING

The three hundred Years next after CHRIST, with the Ten Perſecutions of the Primitive Church.

THeſe things before premiſed, having thus hitherto prepared the way unto our ſtory, let us now (by the grace and ſpeed of Chriſt our Lord) enter into the matter: that as we have heretofore ſet forth in a general deſcription the whole ſtate as well of the primitive as of the later times of this Church of Rome: ſo now conſequently we may diſcourſe in particular ſort the acts and doings of every age, by it ſelf, in ſuch order as is before prefixed.

1. Firſt, To declare of the ſuffering time of the Church, which containeth about the time of three hundred years after Chriſt.

2. Secondly, The flouriſhing and growing time of the ſame, containing other three hundred years.

3. Thirdly, The declining time of the Church, and of true Religion, other three hundred years.

4. Fourthly, Of the time of Antichriſt, reigning and raging in the Church, ſince the looſing of Satan.

5. Laſtly, Of the reforming time of Chriſts Church, in theſe later three hundred years.

In the tractation of all which things our chief purpoſe and endeavour ſhall be (ſo near as the Lord will give us Grace) not ſo much to intermeddle with outward Affairs of Princes, or matters civil (except ſometime for example of life) as ſpecially minding (by the help of the Lord) to proſecute ſuch things which to the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate of the Church are appertaining: as firſt to intreat of the ſtabliſhing of Chriſtian Faith, then of the Perſecutions of Tyrants, the Conſtancy and Patience of Gods Saints, the firſt Converſion of Chriſtian Realms to the Faith of Chriſt, namely, of this Realm of England and Scotland: firſt beginning with King Lucius, and ſo forward following the order of our Engliſh Kings here in this Land, to declare the Maintenance of true Doctrine, the falſe practiſe of Prelates, the creeping in of Superſtition and Hypocriſie, the manifold Aſſaults, Wars and Tumults of the Princes of this World againſt the people of God. Wherein may appear the wonderful Operation of Chriſts mighty Hand, ever working in his Church, and never ceaſing to defend the ſame againſt his Enemies, according to the verity of his own Word, promiſing to be with his Church while the World ſhall ſtand, ſo as by the proceſs of this ſtory may well be proved, and will be teſtified in the Sequel thereof.

Two things in this hiſtory chiefly to be noted.

In the tractation of all which things two ſpecial Points I chiefly commend to the Reader, as moſt requiſite and neceſſary for every Chriſtian man to obſerve and to note for his own experience and profit; as firſt the diſpoſition and nature of this World; ſecondly, the nature and condition of the Kindgom of Chriſt; the vanity of the one, and ſtabliſhment of the other; the unproſperous and unquiet ſtate of the one, ruled by mans Violence and Wiſdom, and the happy ſucceſs of the other ever ruled by Gods Bleſſing and Providence; the wrath and revenging hand of God in the one, and his mercy upon the other. The World I call all ſuch as be without or againſt Chriſt, either by ignorance not knowing him, or by Heatheniſh life not following him, or by violence reſiſting him. On the other ſide, the Kingdom of Chriſt in this World, I take to be all them which belong to the Faith of Chriſt, and here take his part in this world againſt the world: the number of whom although it be much ſmaller than the other, and always lightly is hated and moleſted of the World, yet it is the number, which the Lord peculiarly doth bleſs and proſper, and ever will. And this number of Chriſts Subjects is it, which we call the viſible Church here in Earth. Which viſible Church, having in it ſelf a difference of two ſorts of people, ſo is it to be divided in two parts, of which the one ſtandeth of ſuch as be of outward Profeſſion only, the other which by Election inwardly are joyned to Chriſt: the firſt in words and lips ſeem to honour Chriſt, and are in the viſible Church only, but not in the Church inviſible, and partake the outward Sacraments of Chriſt, but not the inward bleſſing of Chriſt. The other are both in the viſible and alſo in the inviſible Church of Chriſt, which not in words only and outward profeſſion, but alſo in heart do truly ſerve and honour Chriſt, partaking not only the Sacraments, but alſo the heavenly Bleſſings and Grace of Chriſt.

The World.

The Kingdom of Chriſt in this world.

The viſible Church.

The Church of Chriſt divided in two ſorts of people.

And many times it happeneth, that as between the World and the Kingdom of Chriſt there is a continual repugnance: ſo between theſe two parts of this viſible Church aforeſaid oft times groweth great Variance and mortal Perſecution, inſomuch that ſometime the true Church of Chriſt hath no greater Enemies, than of their own Profeſſion and Company, as happened not only in the time of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but alſo from time to time almoſt continually, Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 1. but eſpecially in theſe later days of the Church under the Perſecution of Antichriſt and his Retinue, as by the reading of this Volume more manifeſtly hereafter may appear.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 1.

At the firſt Preaching of Chriſt, and coming of the Goſpel, who ſhould rather have known and received him, than the Phariſees and Scribes of that people, which had his Law? And yet who perſecuted and rejected him more than they themſelves? What followed? They in refuſing Chriſt to be their King, and chooſing rather to be ſubject unto Cæſar, were by the ſaid their own Cæſar at length deſtroyed; when as Chriſts Subjects the ſame time eſcaped the danger. Whereby it is to be learned, what a dangerous thing it is to refuſe the Goſpel of God, when it is ſo gently offered.

Gods puniſhment for refuſing the Goſpel.

The like example of Gods wrathful puniſhment is to be noted no leſs in the Romans alſo themſelves. For when Tiberius Cæſar, having received by Letters from Pontius Pilate of the doings of Chriſt, of his Miracles, Reſurrection and Aſcenſion into Heaven, and how he was received as God of many, was himſelf alſo moved with belief of the ſame, and did conſer thereof with the whole Senate of Rome, to have Chriſt adored as God: they not agreeing thereunto refuſed him, becauſe that contrary to the Law of the Romans he was conſecrated (ſaid they) for God before the the Senate of Rome had ſo decreed and approved him, &c.' Tertul. Apol. cap. 5. Thus the vain Senate following rather the Law of man, than of God, and which were contented with the Emperor to Reign over them, and were not contented with the meek King of Glory, the Son of God to be their King; were after much like ſort to the Jews ſcourged and intrapped for their unjuſt refuſing, by the ſame way which they themſelves did prefer. For as they preferred the Emperor, and rejected Chriſt: ſo the juſt permiſſion of God did ſtir up their own Emperors againſt them in ſuch ſort, that both the Senators themſelves were almoſt all devoured, and the whole City moſt horribly afflicted for the ſpace almoſt of three hundred years together. For firſt the ſame Tiberius, which for a great part of his Reign was a moderate and a tolerable Prince, afterward was to them a ſharp and heavy Tyrant, who neither favoured his own Mother, nor ſpared his own Nephews, nor the Princes of the City, ſuch as were his own Counſellors, of whom to the number of twenty he left not paſt two or three alive, and ſo cruel was he to the City, that as the ſtory recordeth, Nullus a pœna hominum ceſſabat dies, ne religioſus quidem ac ſacer. Suetonius reporteth him to be ſo ſtern of nature, and tyrannical, that in time of his Reign, very many were accuſed, and condemned with their Wives and Children, Maids alſo firſt defloured, then put to death. In one day he recordeth twenty perſons to be drawn to the place of Execution. By whom alſo, through the juſt puniſhment of God, Pilate, under whom Chriſt was crucified, was apprehended and accuſed at Rome, depoſed, then baniſhed to the Town of Lions, and at length did ſlay himſelf. Neither did Herod and Caiaphas long eſcape, of whom more followeth hereafter. Agrippa alſo by him was caſt into Priſon, albeit afterward he was reſtored. In the Reign of Tiberius, the Lord Jeſus the Son of God, in the four and thirtieth year of his Age, which was the ſeventeenth of this Emperor, by the malice of the Jews ſuffered his bleſſed Paſſion for the conquering of ſin, death, and Satan the Prince of this World, and roſe again the third day. After whoſe bleſſed Paſſion and Reſurrection, this foreſaid Tiberius Nero (otherwiſe called Biberius Mero) lived ſix years, during which time no Perſecution was yet ſtirring in Rome againſt the Chriſtians, through the Commandment of the Emperor.

The Senate and City of Rome plagued for refuſing of Chriſt.

{Anno 34.}

Saint Paul converted.

In the Reign alſo of this Emperor, and the year which was the next after the Paſſion of our Saviour, or ſomewhat more, Saint Paul was converted to the Faith. After the death of Tiberius, when he had reigned three and twenty years, ſucceeded C. Cæſar Caligula, Claudius Nero, and Domitius Nero: which three were likewiſe ſuch Scourges to the Senate and people of Rome, that the firſt not only took other mens Wives violently from them, but alſo defloured three of his own Siſters, and afterward baniſhed them. So wicked he was, that he commanded himſelf to be worſhipped as God, and Temples to be erected in his Name, and uſed to ſit in the Temple among the gods, requiring his Images to be ſet up in all Temples, and alſo in the Temple at Hieruſalem; which cauſed great diſturbance among the Jews, and then began the Abomination of Deſolation to be ſet up in the holy place, ſpoken of in the Goſpel. His cruel condition, or elſe diſpleaſure was ſuch towards the Romans, that he wiſhed that all the people of Rome had but one Neck, that he at his pleaſure might deſtroy ſuch a multitude. By this ſaid Caligula, Herod the Murtherer of John Baptiſt, and Condemner of Chriſt, was condemned to perpetual Baniſhment, where he died miſerably. Caiaphas alſo, which wickedly ſate upon Chriſt, was the ſame time removed from the High Prieſts room, and Jonathan ſet in his place. The raging fierceneſs of this Caligula incenſed againſt the Romans had not thus ceaſed, had not he been cut off by the hands of a Tribune and other Gentlemen, which ſlew him in the fourth year of his Reign. After whoſe death were found in his Cloſet two little Libels, one called a Sword, the other the Dagger: in the which Libels were contained the Names of thoſe Senators and Noblemen of Rome, whom he had purpoſed to put to death. Beſides this Sword and Dagger, there was found alſo a Coffer, wherein divers kinds of Poiſon were kept in Glaſſes and Veſſels for the purpoſe, to deſtroy a wonderful number of people, which Poiſons, afterward being thrown into the Sea, deſtroyed a great number of Fiſh. *Gotfri. But that which this Caligula had only conceived, the ſame did the other Two which came after, bring to paſs; Claudius Nero, who reigned thirteen years with no little cruelty; but eſpecially the third of theſe Neroes, called Domitius Nero, which ſucceeding after Claudius, reigned fourteen years, with ſuch fury and tyranny, that he ſlew the moſt part of the Senators, and deſtroyed the whole Order of Knighthood in Rome. So prodigious a Monſter of nature was he, more like a Beaſt, yea rather a Devil than a man, that he ſeemed to be born to the deſtruction of men. Such was his monſtrous Uncleanneſs, that he abſtained not from his own Mother, his natural Siſter, nor from any degree of Kindred. Such was his wretched cruelty, that he cauſed to be put to death his Mother, his Brother in Law, his Siſter, his Wife great with child, all his Inſtructors, Seneca and Lucan, with divers more of his own Kindred and Conſanguinity. Moreover, he commanded Rome to be ſet on fire in twelve places, and ſo continued it ſix days and ſeven nights in burning, while that he to ſee the example how Troy burned, ſung the verſes of Homer. And to avoid the Infamy thereof, he laid the fault upon the Chriſtian-men, and cauſed them to be perſecuted. And ſo continued this miſerable Emperor in his Reign fourteen years, till at laſt the Senate proclaiming him a publick Enemy unto Mankind, condemned him to be drawn through the City, and to be whipped to death. For the fear whereof, he flying the hands of his Enemies, in the night fled to a Manor of his Servants in the Countrey, where he was forced to ſlay himſelf, complaining that he had then neither Friend nor Enemy left that would do ſo much for him. In the latter end of this Domitius Nero, Peter and Paul were put to death for the Teſtimony and Faith of Chriſt. Anno 69.

The horrible wickedneſs and cruelty of Nero.

Peter and Paul ſuffered for Chriſt. {Anno 69.}

Thus ye ſee, which is worthy to be marked, how the juſt Scourge and heavy Indignation of God from time to time ever followeth there, and how all things there go to ruine, neither doth any thing well proſper, where Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God is contemned, and not received; as by theſe Examples may appear, both of Romans which not only were thus conſumed and plagued by their own Emperors, but alſo by Civil Wars, whereof three hapned in two years at Rome, after the death of Nero, and other Caſualties (as in Sueton is teſtified) ſo that in the days of Tiberius aforeſaid, five thouſand Romans were hurt and ſlain at one time by the fall of a Theater. And alſo moſt eſpecially by the deſtruction of the Jews, which about this ſame time in the year threeſcore and thirteen, and forty years after the Paſſion of Chriſt, and the third year after the ſuffering of Saint Peter and Paul, were deſtroyed by Titus and Veſpaſian his Father (who ſucceeded after Nero in the Empire) to the number of eleven hundred thouſand, beſides them which Veſpaſian ſlew in ſubduing the Country of Galilee, over and beſide them alſo which were ſold and ſent into Egypt and other Provinces to vile ſlavery, to the number of ſeventeen thouſand. Two thouſand were brought with Titus in his triumph; of which, part he gave to be devoured of the wild Beaſts, part otherwiſe moſt cruelly were ſlain. By whoſe caſe all Nations and Realms may take example, what it is to reject the Viſitation of Gods verity being ſent, and much more to perſecute them which be ſent of God for their Salvation.

The deſtruction of the Jews.

A note for all Realms to mark.

And as this wrathful Vengeance of God thus hath been ſhewed upon this rebellious people, both of the Jews and of the Romans, for their contempt of Chriſt, whom God ſo puniſhed by their own Emperors: ſo neither the Emperors themſelves, for perſecuting Chriſt in his members, eſcaped without their juſt reward. For among ſo many Emperors which put ſo many Chriſtian Martyrs to death, during the ſpace of theſe firſt three hundred years, few or none of them eſcaped either not ſlain themſelves, or by ſome miſerable end or other worthily revenged. Firſt, of the poyſoning of Tiberius, and of the ſlaughter of the other three Neroes after him, ſufficiently is declared before. After Nero, Domitius Galba within ſeven months was ſlain by Otho. And ſo did Otho afterward ſlay himſelf, being overcome by Vitellius. And was not Vitellius ſhortly after drawn through the City of Rome, and after he was tormented was thrown into Tiber? Titus a good Emperor is thought to be poyſoned of Domitian his Brother. The ſaid Domitian, after he had been a Perſecutor of the Chriſtians, was ſlain in his Chamber, not without the con-

Moreover, after that Severus was ſlain here in England (and lieth at York) did not his Son Baſſianus ſlay his Brother Geta, and he after ſlain of Martialis? Macrinus with his Son Diadumenus were both ſlain of their own Souldiers. After whom Heliogabalus, that monſtrous bellipanch, was of his own people ſlain, and drawn through the City and caſt into Tiber. Alexander Severus that worthy and learned Emperor, which ſaid he would not feed his Servants doing nothing with the bowels of the Common wealth, although in life and vertues he was much unlike other Emperors, yet proved the like end, being ſlain at Mentz with his godly Mother Mammea, by Maximinus, whom the Emperor before of a muletor had advanced to great Dignities. The which Maximinus alſo after three years was ſlain himſelf of his Souldiers. What ſhould I ſpeak of Maximus and Balbinus in like ſort both ſlain in Rome? Of Gordian ſlain by Philip: of Philip the firſt chriſtened Emperor, ſlain, or rather martyred for the ſame cauſe: of wicked Decius drowned, and his Son ſlain the ſame time in battel, of Gallus and Voluſianus his Son, Emperors after Decius, both ſlain by Conſpiracy of Aemilianus, who roſe againſt them both in War, and within three months after was ſlain himſelf? Next to Aemilianus ſucceeded Valerianus and Galienus his Son, of whom Valerianus (who was a Perſecutor of the Chriſtians) was taken Priſoner of the Perſians, and there made a riding Fool of Sapores their King, who uſed him for a ſtool to leap upon his Horſe, while his Son Galienus ſleeping at Rome, either would not, or could not once proffer to revenge his Fathers Ignominy. For after the taking of Valerian, ſo many Emperors roſe up as were Provinces in the Roman Monarchy. At length Galienus alſo was killed by Aureolus which warred againſt him. It were too long here to ſpeak of Aurelianus another Perſecutor, ſlain of his Secretary; of Tacitus and Florinus his Brother, of whom the firſt reigned ſix months, and was ſlain at Pontus; the other reigned two months, and was murdered at Tarſis: of Probus, who although a good civil Emperor, yet was he deſtroyed by his Souldiers. After whom Carus the next Emperor was ſlain by Lightning. Next to Carus followed the impious and wicked Perſecutor Diocleſian, with his fellows Maximian, Valerius, Maximinus, Maxentius, and Licinius, under whom all at one time (during the time of Diocleſian) the greateſt and moſt grievous Perſecution was moved againſt the Chriſtians ten years together. Of which, Diocleſian and Maximian depoſed themſelves from the Empire. Galerius the chiefeſt Miniſter of the Perſecution, after his terrible Perſecutions, fell into a wonderful Sickneſs, having ſuch a Sore riſen in the nether part of his belly, which conſumed his Privy-members, and ſo did ſwarm with Worms, that being curable neither by Surgery nor Phyſick, he confeſſed that it happened for his cruelty towards the Chriſtians, and ſo called in his Proclamations againſt them. Notwithſtanding he not able to ſuſtain (as ſome ſay) the ſtink of his Sore ſlew himſelf. Maximinus in his War, being tormented with pain in his guts there died. Maxentius was vanquiſhed by Conſtantine, and drowned in Tiber. Licinius likewiſe, being overcome by the ſaid Conſtantine the Great, was depoſed from his Empire, and afterward ſlain of his Souldiers. But on the other ſide, after the time of Conſtantine, when as the Faith of Chriſt was received into the Imperial Seat, we read of no Emperor after the like ſort deſtroyed or moleſted, except it were Julianus or Baſilius (which expelled one Zeno, and was afterward expelled himſelf) or Valens. Beſide theſe we read of no Emperor to come to ruine and decay, as the others before mentioned. Ex lib. hiſt. tripart.

And thus have we in brief ſum collected out of the Chronicles the unquiet and miſerable ſtate of the Emperors of Rome, until the time of Chriſtian Conſtantine, with the Examples, no leſs terrible than manifeſt, of Gods ſevere Juſtice upon them, for their contemptuous refuſing and perſecuting the Faith and Name of Chriſt their Lord.

Moreover, in much like ſort and condition, if leiſure of time or haſte of matter would ſuffer me a little to digreſs unto more lower times, and to come more near home, the like Examples I could alſo infer of this our Country of England, concerning the terrible Plagues of God againſt the churliſh and unthankful refuſing or abuſing the benefit of his truth. Firſt, we read how that God ſtirred up Gildas to Preach to the old Britans, and to exhort them unto Repentance and Amendment of Life, and afore to warn them of Plagues to come if they repented not. What availeth it? Gildas was laughed to ſcorn, and taken for a falſe Prophet, and a malicious Preacher. The Britans with luſty Courages, whoriſh Faces, and unrepentant Hearts went forth to ſin, and to offend the Lord their God. What followed? God ſent in their Enemies on every ſide and deſtroyed them, and gave the Land to other Nations. Not many years paſt, God ſeeing Idolatry, Superſtition, Hypocriſie, and wicked living uſed in this Realm, raiſed up that godly learned man John Wickliffe, to Preach unto our Fathers Repentance, and to exhort them to amend their lives, to forſake their Papiſtry and Idolatry, their Hypocriſie and Superſtition, and to walk in the fear of God. His Exhortations were not regarded, he with his Sermons was deſpiſed, his Books and he himſelf after his death were burnt. What followed? They ſlew their right King, and ſet up three wrong Kings on a row, under whom all the Noble blood was ſlain up, and half the Commons thereto, what in France, and with their own Sword in fighting among themſelves for the Crown; and the Cities and Towns were decayed, and the Land brought half to a Wilderneſs, in reſpect of that it was before. O extream Plagues of Gods Vengeance! Since that time even of late years, God, once again having Pity of this Realm of England, raiſed up his Prophets; namely, William Tindall, Thomas Bilney, John Frith, Doctor Barnes, Jerome Garret, Anthony Perſon, with divers others, which both with their Writings and Sermons earneſtly laboured to call us unto Repentance, that by this means the fierce Wrath of God might be turned away from us. But how were they intreated? How were their painful Labours regarded? They themſelves were condemned and burnt as Hereticks, and their Books condemned and burnt as heretical. The time ſhall come, ſaith Chriſt, that whoſoever killeth you, will think that he doth God high good Service. Whether any thing ſince that time hath chanced to this Realm worthy the name of a Plague, let the godly wiſe judge. If God hath deferred his Puniſhment, or forgiven us theſe our wicked Deeds, as I truſt he hath, let us not therefore be proud and high minded, but moſt humbly thank Him for his tender Mercies, and beware of the like ungodly Enterpriſes hereafter. Neither is it here any need to ſpeak of theſe our lower and later times, which have been in King Henries and King Edwards days, ſeeing the memory thereof is yet freſh and cannot be forgotten. But let this paſs, of this I am ſure, that God yet once again is come on Viſitation to this Church of England, yea and that more lovingly and beneficially than ever he did before. For in this Viſitation he hath redreſſed many Abuſes, and cleanſed his Church of much Ungodlineſs and Superſtition, and made it a glorious Church, if it be compared to the old form and ſtate. And now how grateful Receivers we be, with what heart, ſtudy, and reverence we embrace that which he hath given, that I refer either to them that ſee our Fruits, or to the Sequel, which peradventure will declare it. But this by the way of digreſſion. Now to regreſs again to the ſtate of the firſt former times. It remaineth, that as I have ſet forth the Juſtice of God upon theſe Roman Perſecutors: ſo now we declare their Perſecutions raiſed up againſt the People and Servants of Chriſt, within the ſpace of three hundred years after Chriſt. Which Perſecutions in number commonly are counted to be Ten, beſides their Perſecutions firſt moved by the Jews in Hieruſalem and other places againſt the Apoſtles. In the which, firſt Saint Stephen the Deacon was put to death, with divers others more, in the ſame rage of time either ſlain or caſt into Priſon. how that not long after the ſtoning of Stephen, King Herod ſtretched forth his hand, to take and afflict certain of the Congregation: among whom James was one, whom he ſlew with the Sword, &c. Of this James, Euſebius alſo inferreth mention, alledging Clement, thus writing a memorable ſtory of him. This James (ſaith Clement) when he was brought to the Tribunal Seat, he that brought him (and was the cauſe of his trouble) ſeeing him to be condemned, and that he ſhould ſuffer death: as he went to the Execution, he being moved therewith in Heart and Conſcience, confeſſed himſelf alſo of his own accord to be a Chriſtian. And ſo were they led forth together, where in the way he deſired of James to forgive him that he had done. After that James had a little paused with himſelf upon the matter, turning to him; Peace (ſaith he) be to thee Brother, and kiſſed him; and both were beheaded together, in the year of our Lord thirty and ſix.

Simon called Cananeus, which was Brother to Jude above mentioned, and to James the younger, which all were the Sons of Mary Cleophas, and of Alpheus, was Biſhop of Hieruſalem after James, and was crucified in a City of Egypt in the time of Trajanus the Emperor, as Dorotheus recordeth. But Abdias writeth, that he with his Brother Jude were both ſlain by a tumult of the people in Suanir a City of Parſidis.

Of Andrew the Apoſtle and Brother to Peter thus writeth Hierome in his Book De Catalogo Scriptorum Eccleſ. Andrew the Brother of Peter (in the time and Reign of Veſpaſianus, as our Anceſtors have reported) did Preach in the fourſcore year of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to the Scythians, Sogdians, to the Saxons, and in a City which is called Anguſtia, where the Ethiopians do now inhabit. He was buried in Patris a City of Achaia, being crucified of Egeas the Governor of the Edeſſians. Hitherto writeth Hierome, although in the number of years he ſeemeth a little to miſs: for Veſpaſianus reached not to the fourſcore year after Chriſt. But Bernard in his ſecond Sermon, and Saint Cyprian in his Book De duplici Martyrio, do make mention of the Confeſſion and Martyrdom of this bleſſed Apoſtle; whereof partly out of theſe, partly out of other credible Writers we have collected after this manner: that, When as Andrew being Converſant in a City of Achaia called Patris, through his diligent Preaching had brought many to the Faith of Chriſt: Egeas the Governor knowing this, reſorted thither, to the intent he might conſtrain as many as did believe Chriſt to be God, by the whole conſent of the Senate, to do ſacrifice unto the Idols, and ſo give divine honour unto them. Andrew thinking good at the beginning to reſiſt the wicked counſel, and the doings of Egeas, went unto him, ſaying to this effect unto him; that, It behoved him which was Judge of men, firſt to know his Judge which dwelleth in Heaven, and then to worſhip him being known, and ſo in worſhipping the true God, to revoke his mind from falſe gods and blind Idols. Theſe words ſpake Andrew to the Conſul.

Andrew the Apoſtle crucified for the Goſpel. Ex Hieronymo in Catalogo ſcrip. Eccleſ. Ex Cypriano lib. de duplici martyrio, ex Bernardo ſerm. 2. de ſanct. Andrea.

The Words of Andrew to the Conſul.

But he greatly therewith diſcontented, demanded of him, Whether he was the ſame Andrew that did overthrow the Temple of the gods, and perſwaded men of that Superſtitious Sect, which the Romans of late had commanded to be aboliſhed and rejected. Andrew did plainly affirm, That the Princes of the Romans did not underſtand the Truth, and that the Son of God, coming from Heaven into the World for mans ſake, hath taught and declared how thoſe Idols, whom they ſo honoured as gods, were not only not gods, but alſo moſt cruel Devils, Enemies to Mankind, teaching the people nothing elſe but that wherewith God is offended, and being offended, turneth away and regardeth them not; and ſo by the wicked ſervice of the Devil, they do fall headlong into all wickedneſs, and after their departing, nothing remaineth unto them, but their evil deeds.

The fervency of Andrew againſt Idolatry.

But the Proconſul eſteeming theſe things to be as vain, eſpecially ſeeing the Jews (as he ſaid) had crucified Chriſt before, therefore charged and commanded Andrew not to Teach and Preach ſuch things any more; or if he did, that he ſhould be faſtened to the Croſs with all ſpeed.

Andrew abiding in his former mind very conſtant, anſwered thus concerning the puniſhment which he threatened, He would not have preached the honour and glory of the Croſs, if he had feared the death of the Croſs. Whereupon Sentence of Condemnation was pronounced, that Andrew teaching and enterprizing a new Sect, and taking away the Religion of their gods, ought to be crucified. Andrew coming to the place, and ſeeing a far off the Croſs prepared, did change neither countenance nor colour, as the imbecillity of mortal men is wont to do, neither did his blood ſhrink, neither did he fail in his ſpeech, his body fainted not, neither was his mind moleſted, his underſtanding did not fail him, as it is the manner of men to do, but out of the abundance of his heart his mouth did ſpeak, and fervent Charity did appear in his words as kindled ſparks; he ſaid, O Croſs, moſt welcome and long looked for; with a willing mind joyfully and deſirouſly I come to thee, being the Scholar of [illegible] which did hang on thee: becauſe I have been always thy [illegible] lover, and have coveted to embrace thee. So being crucified, he yielded up the ghoſt and fell on ſleep, the day before the Kalends of December.

The conſtant faith of Andrew to the end.

The Croſs herein is not taken for the material Croſs, but for the manner of death upon the Croſs, which death was to him welcome.

Of

Of James the Brother of the Lord, thus we read in the ſtory of Clement and Egeſippus.

James Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

AFter that Feſtus had ſent the Apoſtle Paul to Rome after his Appellation made at Ceſarea, and that the Jews by the means thereof had loſt their hope of performing their malicious Vow againſt him conceived, they fell upon James the Brother of our Lord, who was Biſhop at Jeruſalem, againſt whom they being bent with like malice, brought him forth before them, and required him to deny before all the people the Faith of Chriſt. But he, otherwiſe than they all looked for, freely and with a greater conſtancy before all the multitude confeſſed Jeſus to be the Son of God, our Saviour, and our Lord. Whereupon, they not being able to abide the teſtimony of this man any longer, becauſe he was thought to be the juſteſt among them all, for the highneſs of Divine Wiſdom and Godlineſs, which in living he declared; they killed him, finding the more opportunity to accompliſh their miſchief, becauſe the Kingdom the ſame time was vacant. For Feſtus being dead in Jewry, the Adminiſtration of that Province was deſtitute of a Ruler, and a Deputy. But after what manner James was killed, the words of Clement do declare, which writeth that he was caſt down from the Pinacle of the Temple, and being ſmitten with the Inſtrument of a Fuller, was ſlain: but Egeſippus, which lived in the time next after the Apoſtles, deſcribeth the cauſe diligently in his fifth Commentary, after this manner as followeth:

Ex Clemente. Ex Egeſippo in Commentario.

James the Brother of our Lord took in hand to govern the Church after the Apoſtles, being counted of all men from the time of our Lord to be a juſt and perfect man. Many and divers other Jameſes there were beſide him, but this was born holy from his mothers Womb, he drunk no Wine nor any ſtrong Drink, neither did he eat any living Creature, the Razor never came upon his head, he was not anointed with Oil, neither did he uſe Bath, to him only was it lawful to enter into the holy place, neither was he clothed with woollen Cloth, but with Silk, and he only entred into the Temple, falling upon his Knees, asking remiſſion for the people, ſo that his Knees by oft kneeling loſt the ſenſe of feeling, bing benummed and hardened like the knees of a Camel. He was (for worſhipping God, and craving forgiveneſs for the people,) called juſt, and for the excellency of his juſt life named Oblias, which (if you do interpret it) is the ſafeguard and juſtice of the people, as the Prophets declare of him: therefore when as many of the Hereticks which were among the people asked him what manner of door Jeſus ſhould be, he anſwered, That he was the Saviour. Whereof ſome do believe him to be Jeſus Chriſt; but the aforeſaid Hereticks neither believe the Reſurrection, neither that any ſhall come, which ſhall render unto every man according to his works, but as many as believe, they believed for James his cauſe. Whenas many therefore of the Princes did believe, there was a tumult made of the Scribes, Jews, and Phariſees, ſaying, Is is dangerous left that all the people do look for this Jeſus, as for Chriſt. Therefore they gathered themſelves together, and ſaid to James, We beſeech thee reſtrain the people, for they believe in Jeſus, as though he were Chriſt; we pray thee perſwade them all which come unto the Feaſt of the Paſſover of Jeſus; for we are all obedient unto thee, and all the people do teſtifie of thee that thou art juſt, neither that thou doſt accept the perſon of any man; therefore perſwade the people that they be not deceived in Jeſus, and all the people and we will obey thee: therefore ſtand upon the Pillar of the Temple, that thou mayſt be ſeen from above, and that thy words may be perceived of all the people, for to this Paſſover all the Tribes do come with all the Country. And thus the forenamed Scribes and Phariſees did ſet James upon the Battlements of the Church, and they cried unto him and ſaid, Thou juſt man, whom all we ought to obey, becauſe this people is led after Jeſus, which is crucified, tell what is the door of Jeſus crucified. And he anſwered with a great voice, What do you ask me of Jeſus the Son of Man, ſeeing that he ſitteth on the right hand of God in Heaven, and ſhall come in the Clouds of the Sky? But when many were perſwaded of this, they glorified God upon the witneſs of James, and ſaid, Oſanna in the higheſt to the Son of David. Then the Scribes and the Phariſees ſaid among themſelves, We have done evil, that we have cauſed ſuch a Teſtimony of Jeſus, but let us go up, and let us take him, that they, being compelled with fear, may deny that Faith. And they cried out, ſaying, O, O, this juſt man alſo is ſeduced; and they fulfilled that Scripture which is ſpoken of in Eſay, Let us take away the juſt man, becauſe he is not profitable for us, wherefore let them eat the fruits of their works. Therefore they went up to throw down the juſt man, and ſaid among themſelves, Let us ſtone this juſt man James; and they took him to ſmite him with ſtones, for he was not yet dead when he was caſt down. But he turning, fell down upon his knees, ſaying, O Lord God, Father, I beſeech thee to forgive them, for they know not what they do.

Apoc. 14.

Eſay 5.

But when they had ſmitten him with ſtones, one of the Prieſts of the Children of Rechas, the Son of Charobim, ſpake to them the teſtimony which is in Jeremy the Prophet, Leave off, what do ye? The juſt man prayeth for you. And one of thoſe which were preſent took a Fullers Inſtrument, wherewith they did uſe to beat and purge Cloth, and ſmote the juſt man on his head, and ſo he finiſhed his Martyrdom, and they buried him in the ſame place, and his Pillar abideth ſtill by the Temple. He was a true teſtimony to the Jews and the Gentiles. And ſhortly after, Veſpaſianus the Emperor deſtroying the Land of Jewry, brought them into Captivity. Theſe things being thus written at large of Egeſippus, do well agree to thoſe which Clement did write of him. This James was ſo notable a man, that for his juſtice he was had in honour of all men, inſomuch that the wiſe men of the Jews, ſhortly after his Martyrdom, did impute the cauſe of the betieging of Jeruſalem, and other Calamities which hapned unto them, to no other cauſe, but unto the violence and injury done to this man. Alſo Joſephus hath not left this out of his hiſtory, where he ſpeaketh of him after this manner: Theſe things ſo chanced unto the Jews for a vengeance, becauſe of that juſt man James, which was the Brother of Jeſus, whom they called Chriſt, for the Jews killed him, although he was a righteous man.

Luk. 23.

Joſeph. lib. 10.

The ſame Joſephus declareth his death in the ſame Book and Chapter, ſaying, Cæſar hearing of the death of Feſtus ſent Albinus the Lieutenant into Jewry: but Ananus the younger being Biſhop and of the Sect of the Saducees, truſting that he had obtained a convenient time, ſeeing that Feſtus was dead, and Albinus entred on his journey, he called a Council, and calling many unto him, among whom was James, by name the Brother of Jeſus which is called Chriſt, he ſtoned them, accuſing them as Breakers of the Law.

Whereby it appeareth, that many other beſides James alſo at the ſame were martyred and put to death among the Jews, for the Faith of Chriſt.

A Deſcription of the ten firſt Perſecutions in the Primitive Church, with a lively Portraiture of the variety of their Torments.

The ten firſt Perſecutions in the Primitive Church.

THeſe things being thus declared for the Martyrdom of the Apoſtles, and the Perſecution of the Jews: now let us (by the Grace of Chriſt our Lord) comprehend with like brevity, the Perſecutions raiſed by the Romans againſt the Chriſtians in the Primitive Age of the Church during the ſpace of three hundred years, till the coming of godly Conſtantine, which Perſecutions are reckoned of Euſebius, and by the moſt part of Writers, to the number of ten moſt ſpecial.

The ſundry tormentes of the holy Martyrs in the Primitive Church.

Wherein marvellous it is to ſee and read the numbers incredible of Chriſtian Innocents that were ſlain and tormented, ſome one way, ſome another, as Rabanus ſaith and ſaith truly, Alii ferro peremti: Alii flammis exuſti; alii flagris verberati; Alii vectibus perforati; Alii cruciati patibulo; Alii demerſi pelagi periculo; Alii vivi decoriati; Alii vinculis mancipati; Alii linguis privati; Alii lapidibus obruti; Alii frigore afflicti; Alii fame cruciati; Alii truncatis manibus, aliiq; cæſis membris, ſpectaculum contumeliæ nudi propter nomen Domini portantes, &c. that is, Some ſlain with Sword; Some burnt with fire; Some with Whips ſcourged; Some ſtabbed with Forks of Iron; Some faſtned to the Croſs or Gibbet; Some drowned in the Sea; Some their Skins pluckt off; Some their Tongues cut off; Some ſtoned to death; Some killed with cold; Some ſtarved with hunger; Some their hands cut off, or otherwiſe diſmembred, have been ſo left naked to the open ſhame of the world, &c. Whereof Auguſtine alſo in his Book De civit. 22. cap. 6. thus ſaith, Ligabantur, includebantur, cædebantur, torquebantur, urebantur, laniabantur, trucidabantur, multiplicabantur, non pugnantes pro ſalute, ſed ſalutem contemnentes pro ſervatore. Whoſe kinds of Puniſhments, although they were divers, yet the manner of conſtancy in all theſe Martyrs was one. And yet notwithſtanding the ſharpneſs of theſe ſo many and ſundry Torments, and like cruelneſs of the Tormentors, yet ſuch was the number of theſe conſtant Saints that ſuffered, or rather ſuch was the power of the Lord in his Saints, that as Hierome in his Epiſtle to Cromatius and Heliodorus, ſaith, Nullus eſſet dies qui non ultra quinque millium numerum martyrum reperiri poſſet aſcriptus, excepto die calendarum Januarii; that is, There is no day in the whole year, unto which the number of five thouſand Martyrs cannot be aſcribed, except only the firſt day of January.

The firſt Perſecution.

I. The firſt Perſecution. Anno 67. Euſtor. Eccl. lib. 2. cap. 24, 25, 26.

THe firſt of theſe ten Perſecutions was ſtirred up by Nero Domitius, the ſixth Emperor before mentioned, about the year of our Lord threeſcore and ſeven. The tyrannous Rage of which Emperor was ſo fierce againſt the Chriſtians (as Euſebius recordeth) Uſque adeo ut videres repletas humanis corporibus civitates, jacentes mortuos ſimul cum parvulis ſenes, fœminarumque abſque ulla ſexus reverentia nudata in publico rejectaque ſtarent cadavera; that is, Inſomuch that a man might then ſee Cities lie full of mens bodies, the old there lying together with the young, and the dead bodies of women caſt out naked, without all reverence of that Sex in the open ſtreets, &c. Likewiſe Oroſius writing of the ſaid Nero, ſaith, That he was the firſt which in Rome did raiſe up Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and not only in Rome, but alſo through all the Provinces thereof, thinking to aboliſh and to deſtroy the whole name of Chriſtians in all places, &c. Whereunto accordeth moreover the teſtimony of Hierome upon Daniel, ſaying, That many there were of the Chriſtians in thoſe days, which ſeeing the filthy Abominations and intolerable Cruelty of Nero, thought that he ſhould be Antichriſt.

Oroſius, li. 7.

Nero thought to be Antichriſt.

S. Peter the Apoſtle crucified at Rome.

In this Perſecution, among many other Saints, the bleſſed Apoſtle Peter was condemned to death, and crucified, as ſome do write, at Rome; albeit other ſome, and not without cauſe, do doubt thereof: concerning whoſe life and hiſtory, becauſe it is ſufficiently deſcribed in the Text of the Goſpel, and in the Acts of Saint Luke 4. 5. 12. I need not here to make any great repetition thereof. As touching the cauſe and manner of his death, divers there be which make relation, as Hierome, Egeſippus, Euſebius, Abdias, and others, although they do not all preciſely agree in the time. The words of Hierome be theſe, Simon Peter the Son of Jona, of the Province of Galilee, and of the Town of Bethſaida, the Brother of Andrew, &c. After he had been Biſhop of the Church of Antioch, and had preached to the diſperſion of them that believed, of the Circumciſion, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Aſia, and Bithinia, in the ſecond year of Claudius the Emperor (which was about the year of our Lord forty and four) came to Rome to withſtand Simon Magus, and there kept the Prieſtly Chair the ſpace of five and twenty years, until the laſt year of the aforeſaid Nero, which was the fourteenth year of his Reign, of whom he was crucified, his Head being down, and his Feet upward, himſelf ſo requiring, becauſe he was (he ſaid) unworthy to be crucified after the ſame form and manner as the Lord was, &c. Egeſippus proſecuting this matter ſomething more at large, and Abdias alſo (if any authority is to be given to his Book, who following not only the ſenſe, but alſo the very form of words of Egeſippus in this Hiſtory, ſeemeth to be extracted out of him, and of other Authors) ſaith, That Simon Magus being then a great man with Nero, and his Preſident and Keeper of his life, was required upon a time to be preſent at the raiſing up of a certain Noble young man in Rome of Nero's kindred lately departed: whereas Peter alſo was deſired to come to the reviving of the ſaid Perſonage. But when Magus in the preſence of Peter could not do it, then Peter calling upon the Name of the Lord Jeſus, did raiſe him up, and reſtored him to his Mother, whereby the eſtimation of Simon Magus began greatly to decay and to be deteſted in Rome. Not long after the ſaid Magus threatned the Romans that he would leave the City, and in their ſight fly away from them into Heaven. So the day being appointed, Magus taking his wings in the Mount Capitolinus, began to fly in the Air: but Peter by the Power of the Lord Jeſus brought him down with his wings headlong to the ground, by the which fall, his legs and joynts were broken, and he thereupon died. Then Nero, ſorrowing for the death of him, ſought matter againſt Peter to put him to death. Which, when the people perceived, they intreated Peter with much ado that he would fly the City. Peter, through their importunity at length perſwaded, prepared himſelf to avoid. But coming to the Gate, he ſaw the Lord Chriſt come to meet him, to whom he worſhipping, ſaid, Lord, Whither doſt thou go? To whom he anſwered and ſaid, I am come again to be crucified. By this Peter perceiving his ſuffering to be underſtood, returned back into the City again, and ſo was he crucified in manner as is before declared. And this out of Egeſippus.

Euſebius moveover writing of the death not only of Peter, but alſo of his Wife, affirmeth, that Peter ſeeing his wife going to her Martyrdom (belike as he was yet hanging upon the Croſs) was greatly joyous and glad thereof, who crying unto her with a loud voice, and calling her by her name, Bad her remember the Lord Jeſus. Such was then (ſaith Euſebius) the bleſſed bond of marriage among the Saints of God. And thus much of Peter.

Euſeb. lib. 3. hiſt. Eccleſ. cap. 30.

Peter put to death for Chriſt.

The words of Peter to his wife, going to death.

Paul the Apoſtle, which before was called Saul, after his great travel and unſpeakable Labours in promoting the Goſpel of Chriſt, ſuffered alſo in this firſt Perſecution under Nero, and was beheaded. Of whom thus writeth Hierom in his Book, De viris illuſtribus. Paul, otherwiſe called Saul, one of the Apoſtles, yet out of the number of the twelve, was of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of a Town of Jewry called Giſcalis, which Town being taken of the Romans, he with his Parents, fled to Tharſus, a Town of Cilicia; afterward was ſent up by his Parents to Jeruſalem, and there brought up in the knowledge of the Law, at the feet of Gamaliel, and was a doer of the death of Stephen. And when he had received Letters from the High Prieſt to perſecute the Chriſtians, by the way going to Damaſcus, he was ſtrucken down of the Lords Glory, and of a Perſecutor was made a Profeſſor, an Apoſtle, a Martyr, a witneſs of the Goſpel, and a Veſſel of Election.

Paul the Apoſtle.

Ex Hieronymo lib. de viris illuſtribus.

Saul brought up under Gamaliel, a Perſecutor.

Among his other manifold Labours and travels in ſpreading the Doctrine of Chriſt, he won Sergius Paulus the Proconſul of Cyprus, to the Faith of Chriſt, whereupon he took his name, as ſome ſuppoſe, turned from Saulus to Paulus. After he had paſſed through divers places and Countries in his laborious Peregrinations, he took to him Barnabas, and went up to Jeruſalem to Peter, James and John, where he was Ordained and ſent out with Barnabas to Preach unto the Gentiles.

Saulus turned to Paulus.

Paul ſent to the Gentiles.

And becauſe it is in the Acts of the Apoſtles ſufficiently comprehended, concerning the admirable Converſion, and Converſation of this moſt worthy Apoſtle, that which remaineth of the reſt of his Hiſtory, I will here add, how the ſaid Apoſtle Paul, the five and twentieth year after the Paſſion of the Lord, in the ſecond year of Nero, at what time Feſtus ruled in Jewry, was ſent up in bonds to Rome, where he remaining in his free Hoſtery two years together, diſputed daily againſt the Jews, proving Chriſt to be come. And here is to be noted, that after his firſt Anſwer, or Purgation there made at Rome, the Emperor Nero, not yet fully confirmed in his Empire, and yet not burſting out into thoſe miſchiefs which Hiſtories report of him, he was at that time by Nero diſcharged, and diſmiſſed to Preach the Goſpel in the Weſt parts, and about the Coaſts of Italy, as he himſelf writing unto Timothy, afterward in his ſecond Apprehenſion, in his ſecond Epiſtle witneſſeth, ſaying, In my firſt Purgation no man ſtood with me, but did all forſake me, the Lord lay it not to their Charge: but the Lord ſtood with me, and did comfort me, that the preaching of his Word might proceed by me, and that all the Gentiles might hear and be taught; and I was deli- vered out of the Lions mouth, &c. In which place by the Lion, he plainly meaneth Nero. And afterwards likewiſe he ſaith, I was delivered from the mouth of the Lion, &c. And again, The Lord hath delivered me out from all evil works, and hath ſaved me unto his heavenly Kingdom, &c. ſpeaking this, becauſe he perceived then the time of his Martyrdom to be near at hand. For in the ſame Epiſtle before, he ſaith, I am now offered up, and the time of my diſſolution draweth on.

Thus then, this worthy Preacher and Meſſenger of the Lord, in the fourteenth year of Nero, and the ſame day in which Peter was crucified (although not in the ſame year, as ſome write, but in the next year following) was beheaded at Rome for the teſtimony of Chriſt, and was buried in the way of Oſtia, the ſeven and thirtieth year after the Paſſion of the Lord. He wrote nine Epiſtles to ſeven Churches, to the Romans one, to the Corinthians two, to the Galathians one, to the Epheſians one, to the Philippians one, to the Coloſſians one, to the Theſſalonians two. Moreover he wrote to his Diſciples, to Timothy two, to Titus one, to Philemon one.

The Epiſtles of S. Paul to ſeven Churches.

The Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

The Epiſtle which beareth the title to the Hebrews, is not thought to be his, for the difference of the ſtile and phraſe, but either judged to be written of Timothy, as Tertullian ſuppoſeth, or of S. Luke, as others think; or elſe of Clement afterward Biſhop of Rome, who, as they ſay, was adjoyned with Paul, and compiling together his ſayings and ſentences, did phraſe them in his ſtile and manner. Or elſe as ſome do judge, becauſe S. Paul wrote unto the Hebrews, for the odiouſneſs of his name among that people, therefore he diſſembled, and confeſſed not his name in the firſt entry of his ſalutation, contrary to his accuſtomed condition. And as he wrote to the Hebrews, he being an Hebrew, ſo he wrote in Hebrew; that is, his own Tongue more eloquently. And that is thought to be the cauſe why it differeth from his other Epiſtles, and is after a more eloquent manner tranſlated into the Greek, than his other Epiſtles be. Some alſo read the Epiſtle written to Laodicea, but that is exploded of all men. Thus much Hierome.

The Epiſtle to Laodicea.

As touching the time and order of the death and Martyrdom of Saint Paul, as Euſebius, Hierome, Maximus, and other Authors do but briefly paſs it over: ſo Abdias (if his Book be of any ſubſtantial authority) ſpeaking more largely of the ſame, doth ſay, That after the crucifying of Peter, and the ruine of Simon Magus, Paul yet remaining in free Cuſtody, was diſmiſſed and delivered at that time from Martyrdom by Gods permiſſion, that all the Gentiles might be repleniſhed with preaching of the Goſpel by him.

Paul declareth his Doctrine to the Emperor.

The ſum of Paul's Doctrine.

And the ſame Abdias proceeding in his ſtory, declareth moreover, that as Paul was thus occupied at Rome, he was accuſed to the Emperor, not only for teaching new Doctrine, but alſo for ſtirring up Sedition againſt the Empire. For this he being called before Nero, and demanded to ſhew the order and manner of his Doctrine, there declared what his Doctrine was, To teach all men Peace and Charity, how to love one another, how to prevent one another in honour; Rich men not to be puffed up in pride, nor to put their truſt in their treaſures, but in the living God; Mean men to be contented with food and rayment, and with their preſent ſtate; Poor men to rejoyce in their poverty with hope; Fathers to bring up their Children in the fear of God; Children to obey their Parents; Husbands to love their Wives; Wives to be ſubject to their Husbands; Citizens and Subjects to give their Tribute unto Cæſar, and to be ſubject to their Magiſtrates; Maſters to be courteous, not churliſh to their Servants; Servants to deal faithfully with their Maſters: and this to be the ſum of his teaching. Which his Doctrine he received not of men, nor by men, but by Jeſus Chriſt, and the Father of Glory, which ſpake to him from Heaven, the Lord Jeſus ſaying to him, That he ſhould go and preach his Name, and that he would be with him, and would be the Spirit of life to all that believed in him, and that whatſoever he did or ſaid, he would juſtifie it, &c. After that Paul had thus declared unto the Emperor, ſhortly after, ſentence of death was pronounced againſt him, that he ſhould be beheaded. Unto whoſe Execution then Nero ſent two of his Eſquires, Ferega and Parthemius, to bring him word of his death. They coming to Paul, inſtructing then the people, deſired him to pray for them, that they might believe. Who told them, that ſhortly after they ſhould believe, and be baptized at his Sepulchre (as Abdias writeth.) This done, the Souldiers came and led him out of the City to the place of Execution, where he after his prayers made, gave his Neck to the Sword. Abdias reporteth, that as his head was ſtricken off, inſtead of blood iſſued out white Milk, and that at laying down his head, he ſigned himſelf with the ſign of a Croſs in his Forehead: but this being found in no other Hiſtory, Abdias ſeemeth either to add of his own, or elſe to borrow out of the Legend, as he doth many other things beſide, whereof more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) hereafter. Although the ſame miracle of Milk flowing out of his neck, is referred alſo unto Ambroſe, who in his Sermon threeſcore and eight (if it be not counterfeited) ſeemeth to affirm the ſame. Of the time and year when the bleſſed Apoſtles did ſuffer, Hiſtories do not all agree. They that follow the common opinion, and the Popes decrees, ſay, That both Peter and Paul ſuffered both in one day, and in one year: which opinion ſeemeth to be taken out of Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth. Hierome in his Book De viris illuſtr. affirmeth, that they both ſuffered in one day, but he expreſſeth not the year. So doth Iſidorus and Euſebius. Simon Metaphraſtes bringeth in the opinion of ſome, which think that Paul ſuffered not with Peter, but after Peter, Prudentius, in his Periſtephano, noteth, that they both were put to death upon the ſame day, but not in the ſame year, and ſaith, that Paul followed Peter a year after.

A legend miracle.

The ſtory of Abdias ſuſpected.

Hiſtories do vary about the time of their Martyrdom.

If this be true Prudentius recordeth of Paul to ſuffer under Nero, and the year after Peter, then it is falſe which Hierome before teſtifieth, Peter to ſuffer the laſt year of Nero.

Abdias, above mentioned, recordeth, that Paul ſuffered two years after Peter. Moreover, if it be true which Abdias ſaith, that after the crucifying of Peter, Paul remained in his fair Cuſtody at Rome, mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, which was as Hierome witneſſeth, the third or fourth year of Nero, then muſt it be ten years betwixt the Martyrdom of Peter and of Paul, foraſmuch as it is by all Writers confeſſed, that Paul ſuffered the fourteenth year, which was the laſt year of Nero. And ſo Abdias ſeemeth neither to agree with other Authors, nor with himſelf. And thus much of the firſt Perſecution.

The ſecond Perſecution.

The ſecond Perſecution { Anno 69.

THe firſt Roman Perſecution beginning under Nero, as is aforeſaid, ceaſed under Veſpaſianus, who gave ſome reſt to the poor Chriſtians. After whoſe Reign was moved, not long after, the ſecond Perſecution, by the Emperor Domitian, Brother of Titus. Of whom Euſebius and Oroſius ſo write, that he firſt beginning mildly, afterward did ſo far outrage in Pride intolerable, that he commanded himſelf to be worſhipped as God, and that Images of Gold and Silver in his honour ſhould be ſet up in Capitolio. The chiefeſt Nobles of the Senators, either upon envy, or for their Goods, he cauſed to be put to death, ſome openly, and ſome he ſent into baniſhment, there cauſing them to be ſlain privily.

Ex Oroſio. lib. 7.

The tyranny and intemperance of Domitian

And as his Tyranny was unmeaſurable, ſo the intemperancy of his life was no leſs. He put to death all the Nephews of Juda, called the Lords Brother, and cauſed to be ſought out and to be ſlain all that could be found of the ſtock of David (as Veſpaſian alſo did before him) for fear, leſt he were yet to come of the Houſe of David, which ſhould enjoy the Kingdom. In the time of this Perſecutor, Simeon, Biſhop of Jeruſalem, after other torments, was crucified to death, whom Juſtus afterward ſucceeded in that Biſhoprick.

Simeon Biſhop of Jeruſalem crucified.

John the Evangeliſt.

In this Perſecution, John the Apoſtle and Evangeliſt, was exiled by the ſaid Domitianus into Pathmos. Of whom divers and ſundry memorable Acts be reported in ſundry Chronicles. As firſt, how he was put in a Veſſel of boyling Oil, by the Proconſul of Epheſus. The Legend and Perionius ſay, It was done at Rome. Iſidorus alſo writing of him, and comprehending many things in few words, declareth, that he turned certain places of wood into gold, and ſtones by the Sea ſide into margarites, to ſatisfie the deſire of two, whom he had before perſwaded to renounce their riches: and afterward they repenting that for worldly treaſure they had loſt Heaven, for their ſakes again he changed the ſame into their former ſubſtance. Alſo how he raiſed up a Widow and a certain young man from death to life. How he drank poyſon and it hurt him not, raiſing alſo to life two which had drank the ſame before. Theſe and ſuch other Miracles, although they may be true, and are found in Iſidorus, and other Writers more, yet becauſe they are no {Anno 97.} John baniſhed. John releaſed out of baniſhment.

Articles of our Chriſtian Belief, I let them paſs, and only content my ſelf with that which I read in Euſebius, declaring of him in this wiſe, That in the fourteenth year after Nero, in the ſecond Perſecution, in the days of Domitian, John was baniſhed into Pathmos for the teſtimony of the Word, in the year fourſcore and ſeventeen. And after the death of the aforeſaid Domitian, he being ſlain, and his Acts repealed by the Senate, John was again releaſed under Pertinax the Emperor, and came to Epheſus in the year one hundred. Where he continued until the time of Trajanus, and there governed the Churches in Aſia, where alſo he wrote his Goſpel, and ſo lived till the year after the Paſſion of our Lord, threeſcore and eight, which was the year of his age, one hundred and twenty.

Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 23.

Moreover, in the aforeſaid Eccleſiaſtical ſtory of Euſebius, we read, that John the Apoſtle and Evangeliſt, whom the Lord did love, was in Aſia, where he being returned out of Pathmos, after the death of Domitian, governed the Churches and Congregations. Irenæus in his ſecond Book thus writeth: And of him all the Elders do witneſs, which were with John the Diſciple of the Lord in Aſia, that he ſpake and wrote theſe things, &c. for there he continued with them unto the time of Trajanus, &c. Alſo the ſaid Irenæus, lib. 3. Hypotheſ. in like words declareth, ſaying, The Church of the Epheſians being firſt founded by Paul, afterward being confirmed of John (who continued in the ſame City unto the time of Trajanus the Emperor) is a true witneſs of this Apoſtolical tradition, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus moreover noteth both the time of this holy Apoſtle, and alſo addeth to the ſame a certain Hiſtory of him, not unworthy to be remembred of ſuch which delight in things honeſt and profitable. Of the which Hiſtory Sozomenus alſo in his Commentaries maketh mention. The words of the Author ſetting forth this Hiſtory be theſe, Hear a Fable, and not a Fable, but a true Report, which is told us of John the Apoſtle, delivered and commended to our remembrance. After the death of the Tyrant, when John was returned to Epheſus, from the Iſle of Pathmos, he was deſired to reſort to the places bordering near unto him, partly to conſtitute Biſhops, partly to diſpoſe the cauſes and matters of the Church, partly to Ordain and ſet ſuch of the Clergy in Office, whom the Holy Ghoſt ſhould elect. Whereupon, when he was come to a certain City not far off, the name of which alſo many do yet remember, and had among other things comforted the Brethren, he looking more earneſtly upon him which was the chief Biſhop among them, beheld a young man mighty in body, and of beautiful countenance, and of a fervent mind: I commend this man (ſaith he) to thee with great diligence, in witneſs here of Chriſt and of the Church.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

A notable Hiſtory of John the Evangeliſt.

When the Biſhop had received of him this Charge, and had promiſed his faithful diligence therein: again, the ſecond time John ſpake unto him, and deſired him in like manner and conteſtation as before. This done, John returned again to Epheſus. The Biſhop receiving the young man, commended and committed to his charge, brought him home, kept him, and nouriſhed him, and at length alſo did illuminate (that is) he baptized him, and in ſhort time through his diligence brought him into ſuch order and towardneſs, that he committed unto him the overſight of a certain Cure in the Lords behalf. The young man thus having more his liberty, it chanced that certain of his Companions and old Familiars being idle, diſſolute and accuſtomed of old time to wickedneſs, did joyn in company with him, who firſt brought him to ſumptuous and riotous Banquets; then incited him forth with them in the night to rob and ſteal, after that he was allured by them unto greater miſchief and wickedneſs. Wherein by cuſtom of time, by little and little, he being more practiſed, and being of a good wit, and a ſtout courage, like unto a wild or unbroken Horſe, leaving the right way, and running at large without bridle, was carried headlong to the profundity of all miſorder and outrage. And thus, being paſt all hope of Grace, utterly forgetting and rejecting the wholeſome Doctrine of Salvation, which he had learned before, began to ſet his mind upon no ſmall matters. And for as much as he was entred ſo far in the way of perdition, he cared not how further he proceeded in the ſame. And ſo aſſociating unto him the company of his Companions, and fellow Thieves, took upon him to be as Head and Captain among them, in committing all kind of Murder and Felony.

What wicked company doth.

In the mean time it chanced that of neceſſity John was ſent for to thoſe quarters again, and came. The cauſes being decided, and his buſineſs ended for the which he came, by the way meeting with the Biſhop afore ſpecified, he requireth of him the pledge, which in the witneſs of Chriſt and of the Congregation then preſent he left in his hands to keep. The Biſhop ſomething amazed at the words of John, ſuppoſing he had meant of ſome money committed to his cuſtody, which he had not received, (and yet durſt not miſtruſt John, nor contrary his words) could not tell what to anſwer. Then John perceiving his doubting, and uttering his mind more plainly: The young man (ſaith he) and the Soul of our Brother committed to your cuſtody, I do require. Then the Biſhop with a loud voice ſorrowing and weeping ſaid, He is dead. To whom John ſaid, How, and by what death? The other ſaid, He is dead to God, for he is become an evil man, and pernitious, to be brief, a Theif: and now he doth frequent this Mountain with a company of Villains and Thieves like unto himſelf againſt the Church. But the Apoſtle rent his Garments, and with a great lamentation ſaid, I have left a good keeper of my Brothers ſoul; get me a Horſe, and let me have a Guid withme; which being done, his Horſe and Man procured, he haſted from the Church as much as he could, and coming to the ſame place was taken of Thieves that watched. But he, neither flying nor refuſing, ſaid, I came for this ſame cauſe hither, lead me, ſaid he, to your Captain. So he being brought, the Captain all armed, fiercely began to look upon him; and eſt-ſoons coming to the knowledge of him, was ſtrucken with confuſion and ſhame, and began to fly. But the old man followed him as much as he might, forgetting his age, and crying, My Son, why doſt thou fly from thy Father? an armed man from one naked, a young man from an old man? have pity on me, my Son, and fear not; for there is yet hope of Salvation; I will make anſwer for thee unto Chriſt, I will die for thee if need be; as Chriſt hath died for us, I will give my life for thee; believe me, Chriſt hath ſent me. He hearing theſe things, firſt, as in a maze ſtood ſtill, and therewith his courage was abated. After that he had caſt down his weapons, by and by he trembled, yea, and wept bitterly: and coming to the old man, imbraced him, and ſpake unto him with weeping (as well as he could) being even then baptized afreſh with tears, only his right hand being hid and covered. Then the Apoſtle after that he had promiſed and firmly aſcertained him that he ſhould obtain remiſſion of our Saviour, and alſo prayed, falling down upon his knees, and kiſſed his murthering right hand, which for ſhame he durſt not ſhew before, as now purged through repentance, brought him to the Congregation. And when he had prayed for him with continual prayer and daily faſtings, and had comforted and confirmed his mind with many Sentences, went not from him (as the Author reporteth) before he had reſtored him to the Congregation again, and made him a great example and trial of Regeneration, and a token of the viſible Reſurrection.

A notable Leſſon for all Miniſters to ſeek again their loſt ſheep.

O unſpeakable love ſhewed out to a wicked ſinner.

Moreover, the aforeſaid Irenæus in lib. 3. cap. 3. and Euſebius, lib. 3. cap. 28. and lib. 4. cap. 14. proſecuting the Hiſtory of John, declare in theſe words, ſaying, That there were certain which heard Polycarpus ſay, that John the Diſciple of our Lord going into Epheſus to be waſhed, ſeeing Cerinthus within, he leaped out of the Bath unbathed, becauſe he feared the Bath ſhould have fallen, ſeeing that Cerinthus an Enemy to the Truth was within. Such fear had the Apoſtles (ſaith Irenæus) that they would not communicate a word with them that adulterate the truth.

An example of the godly to fly the company of the wicked.

And foraſmuch as we are here in hand with the ſtory of John the bleſſed Evangeliſt, here cometh in matter and occaſion not given by him, but taken of others, of a great doubt and difficulty, ſuch as hath occupied all the Catholick, ſubtil, illuminate, and ſeraphical Doctors of the Popes Catholick Church, theſe five hundred years. The difficulty is this, That for ſo much as auricular confeſſion hath been, and is yet received in the Popes Catholick Church for an holy and neceſſary Sacrament, extending univerſally to all and ſingular Creatures Chriſtian: here then ariſeth a queſtion, Who was our Ladies Confeſſor, or ghoſtly Father? But that is decreed and confeſſed with full conſent of all the Catholicks to be Saint John. Whoſoever denieth, or doubteth of this, is ſtraightways Ipſo facto an Heretick. This then ſo determined, ariſeth another queſtion or doubt, that ſeeing our Lady was without all original ſin, and alſo alſo actual or mortal: what need then had ſhee of any Confeſſor? Or what ſhould ſhe confeſs unto him? for if ſhe had confeſſed any ſin, when ſhe had none; then had ſhe made her ſelf a lyar, and ſo had ſinned indeed. Here therefore (gentle Reader) in this perplexity theſe our illuminate Doctors ſtand in need of thine aid to help at a pinch. Magnus Albertus the great Divine, denieth not, but that ſhe indeed, though moſt pure, yet was confeſſed to her ghoſtly Father, to keep the obſervance of the Law, appointed for ſuch as had that need, which ſhe had not. And therefore (ſaith he) neceſſary it was that ſhe ſhould confeſs with mouth. But then here is to be asked, What did ſhe ſay in her confeſſion, when ſhe had nothing to confeſs? To this Albertus anſwereth again, and telleth us plainly what ſhe ſaid in her confeſſion, which was this, That ſhe had received that great Grace, not Ex condigno; that is, Not of any dignity of her own, but yet notwithſtanding of congruity. And this was it (ſaith Albert) that ſhe ſaid in her confeſſion. Albert. cap. 74. Super Evang. Miſſus eſt, &c

Solution. Albert. ſuper Evangelium Miſſus eſt. Another queſtion with the ſolution.

S. Thomas par 3. quæſt 27. art. 5.

Moreover, to help this caſe out of all doubt, cometh in famous Thomas of Watring, and thus looſeth the knot, much after like effect, ſaying, That as Chriſt, although he did owe nothing to the Law, yet notwithſtanding received Circumciſion, to give to others example of Humility and Obedience: in like manner would our Lady ſhew her ſelf obedient to the obſervance of the Law, albeit there was no cauſe why ſhe had any need thereof. And thus haſt thou (gentle Reader) this doubtful queſtion moved and ſoluted, to the intent I would reveal to thee ſome part of the deep Divinity of our Catholick Maſters, that have ruled and governed the Church in theſe their late Popiſh days.

Flavia the daughter of a Conſul, baniſhed for the teſtimony of Chriſt. Ex Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 19.

But breaking off this matter, I return again where we left; that is, to this foreſaid ſecond Perſecution under Domitianus. In which Perſecution, beſides theſe afore mentioned, and many other innumerable godly Martyrs, ſuffering for the like teſtimony of the Lord Jeſus, was Flavia the Daughter of Flavius Clemens, one of the Roman Conſuls, which Flavia, with many others was baniſhed out of Rome, into the Iſle Pontia, for the teſtimony of the Lord Jeſus, by the Emperour Domitianus, Euſeb. lib. 3.

The Emperor maketh inquiry for all that were of Davids ſtock. Davids ſtock feared of the Emperors.

This Domitianus feared the coming of Chriſt as Herod did, and therefore commanded them to be killed which were of the Stock of David in Jewry. There were remaining alive at that time certain of the Lords kindred, which were the Nephews of Jude, that was called the Lords Brother after the fleſh. Theſe, when the Lieutenant of Jewry had brought up to Domitian to be ſlain, the Emperor demanded of them, Whether they were of the Stock of David? Which when they had granted, he asked again, what poſſeſſions, and what ſubſtance they had? They anſwered, That they both had no more between them in all, but nine and thirty acres of ground, and how they got their living, and ſuſtained their Families with the hard labours of their hands, ſhewing forth their hands unto the Emperor, being hard and rough, worn with labours, to witneſs that to be true which they had ſpoken: Then the Emperor inquiring of them concerning the Kingdom of Chriſt, what manner of Kingdom it was, how, and when it ſhould appear? They anſwered, That his Kingdom was no worldly nor terrene thing, but an Heavenly and Angelical Kingdom, and that it ſhould appear in the conſummation and end of the World, what time he coming in Glory, ſhould judge the quick and the dead, and render to every one according to his deſervings. Domitian the Emperor hearing this (as the ſaying is) did not condemn them; but deſpiſing them as vile perſons let them go, and alſo ſtaid the Perſecution then moved againſt the Chriſtians. They, being thus diſcharged and diſmiſſed, afterward had the government of Churches, being taken for Martyrs, and as of the Lords ſtock, and ſo continued in good peace till the time of Trajanus. Hæc Egeſip. & Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 20.

Two Nephews of Jude the Lords Brother preſerved.

The Kingdom of Chriſt not of this World.

The cauſes why the Emperors and Senate of Rome did ſo rage againſt the Chriſtians.

The Kingdom of Chriſt feared of the Romans.

By this ſtory here cited, may appear, what were the cauſes why the Emperors of the Roman Monarchy did ſo perſecute the Chriſtians: which cauſes were chiefly theſe, Fear and Hatred. Firſt, Fear, for that the Emperors and Senate of blind Ignorance, not knowing the manner of Chriſts Kingdom, feared and miſdoubted leſt the ſame would ſubvert their Empery, (like as the Pope thinketh now that this Goſpel will overthrow his Kingdom of Majeſty) and therefore ſought they all means poſſible, how, by death and all kinds of torments, utterly to extinguiſh the name and memory of the Chriſtians. And thereupon ſeemeth to ſpring the old Law of the Roman Senate: Non debere demitti Chriſtianos, qui ſemel ad tribunal veniſſent, niſi propoſitum mutent; that is, that the Chriſtians ſhould not be let go, which were once brought to the Judgment-Seat, except they changed their purpoſe, &c. Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 21.

The Kingdom of Chriſt hated of Roman Princes

Secondly, Hatred, partly for that this world, of his own natural condition, hath ever hated and maliced the people of God, from the firſt beginning of the world. Partly again, for that the Chriſtians being of a contrary nature and Religion, ſerving only the true living God, deſpiſed their falſe gods, ſpake againſt their Idolatrous worſhippings, and many times ſtopped the Power of Satan, working in their Idols: And therefore Satan the Prince of this world, ſtirred up the Roman Princes and blind Idolaters to bear the more hatred and ſpite againſt them.

Upon theſe cauſes, and ſuch like, roſe up theſe malicious Slanders, falſe Surmiſes, infamous Lies, and ſlanderous Accuſations of the Heathen Idolaters againſt the Chriſtian Servants of God, which incited the Princes of this world the more to perſecute them: for what Crimes ſoever malice could invent, or raſh ſuſpition could miniſter, that was imputed to the Chriſtians; as that they were a people inceſtuous, that in the night in their concourſes, putting out their Candles, they ran together in all filthy manner, that they killed their own Children, that they uſed to eat mans fleſh, that they were ſeditious and rebellious, that they would not ſwear by the Fortune and Proſperity of Cæſar, that they would not adore the Image of Cæſar in the Market place, that they were pernicious to the Empery of Rome. Briefly, whatſoever miſhappened to the City or Provinces of Rome, either Famine, Peſtilence, Earthquake, Wars, Wonders, unſeaſonableneſs of weather, or what other evils ſoever happened, it was imputed to the Chriſtians, as Juſtinus recordeth. Over and beſide all theſe, a great occaſion that ſtirred up the Emperors againſt the Chriſtians, came by one Publius Tarquinius the chief Prelate of the Idolatrous Sacrifices, and Mamertinus the chief Governor of the City in the time of Trajanus; who partly with money, partly with ſiniſter and peſtilent Counſel, partly with infamous Accuſations (as witneſſeth Nauclerus) incenſed the mind of the Emperor ſo much againſt Gods people.

Falſe Accuſations and ſlanders againſt the Chriſtians. Ex apol. Juſtin. Martyr.

Publius Tarquinius and Mamertinus Perſecutors.

Alſo among theſe other cauſes aboveſaid, crept in ſome piece of covetouſneſs withall (as in all other things it doth) in that the wicked Promoters and Accuſers for lucre ſake, to have the Poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians, were the more ready to accuſe them to have the ſpoil of their goods.

Thus haſt thou (Chriſtian Reader) firſt, the cauſes declared of theſe Perſecutions; ſecondly, the cruel law of their Condemnation; thirdly, now hear more what was the form of Inquiſition, which was (as is witneſſed in the ſecond Apology of Juſtinus) to this effect; that they ſhould ſwear to declare the truth, whether they were in very deed Chriſtians or not: and if they confeſſed, then by the law the ſentence of death proceeded. Juſt. Apol. 2.

Ex Juſt. Mart. in 2. Apolog.

The form of Inquiſition againſt the Chriſtians in the old time.

Neither yet were theſe Tyrants and Organs of Satan thus contented with death only, to bereave the life from the body. The kinds of death were divers, and no leſs horrible than divers. Whatſoever the cruelneſs of mans invention could deviſe for the puniſhment of mans body, was practiſed againſt the Chriſtians, as partly I have mentioned before, and more appeareth by the Epiſtle ſent from the Brethren of France, hereafter following. Crafty trains, Outcries of Enemies, Impriſonment, Stripes and Scourgings, Drawings, Tearings, Stonings, Plates of Iron laid unto them burning hot, deep Dungeons, Racks, ſtrangling in Priſons, the teeth of wild Beaſts, Gridirons, Gibbets and Gallows, toſſing upon the horns of Bulls: moreover, when they were thus killed, their bodies were laid in heaps, and Dogs there left to keep them, that no man might come to bury them, neither would any prayer obtain them to be interred and buried. Ex Epiſtola fratrum Viennenſium ac Lugdunenſium, &c.

The cruelty of Tyrants in killing of Chriſtian men.

Ex Epiſt. fratrum Viennenſium & Lugdunenſium, ad fratres per Aſiam & Phrygiam ſcripta.

And yet notwithſtanding for all theſe continual Perſecutions, and horrible Puniſhments, the Church of the Chriſtians daily increaſed, deeply rooted in the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, and of men apoſtolical, and watered plenteouſly with the blood of Saints, as ſaith Niceph. lib. 3. Whereof let us hear the worthy teſtimony of Juſtinus Martyr in his Dialogue with Tryphens. And that none (ſaith he) can terrifie or remove us which believe in Jeſus, by this

Ex Nicephoro. li. 3. c. 22.

Ex Juſt. Martyr. in Dialogorum Tryphon.

it daily appeareth, for when we are ſlain, crucified, caſt to wild Beaſts, into the fire, or given to other Torments, yet we go not from our Confeſſion: but contrary, the more cruelty and ſlaughter is wrought againſt us, the more they be that come to Piety and Faith by the Name of Jeſus: no otherwiſe than if a man cut the Vine-Tree, the better the Branches grow. For the Vine-Tree, planted by God and Chriſt our Saviour, is his people. Hæc Juſt.

The Church increaſeth by Perſecution.

¶ To comprehend the names and number of all the Martyrs that ſuffered in all theſe ten Perſecutions (which are innumerable) as it is unpoſſible, ſo it is hard in ſuch a variety and diverſity of matter to keep ſuch a perfect order and courſe of years and times, that either ſome be not left out, or that every one be reduced into his right place, eſpecially ſeeing the Authors themſelves, whom in this preſent Work we follow, do diverſly diſagree both in the times, in the names, and alſo in the kind of Martyrdom of them that ſuffered. As for example, where the common reading and opinion of the Church and Epiſtles decretal do take Anacletus to ſucceed after Clement, next before Euariſtus: contrary, Euſebius lib. 3. & lib. 5. cap. 6. making no mention of Cletus, but of Anacletus, ſaith, That Euraſtius ſucceeded next to Clement. Likewiſe Ruffinus and Epiphanius, ſpeaking nothing of Anacletus, make mention of Linus, and of Cletus, next before Clement, but ſay nothing of Anacletus: whereby it may appear that Cletus and Anacletus were both one. Sabellicus Aenead. 7. lib. 2. ſpeaking of Linus and of Cletus, ſaith, that they were ordained helpers under Peter, while he laboured in his Apoſtleſhip abroad, and ſo ſaith alſo Marianus Scotus: contrary, Irenæus, lib. 3. contra hæreſ. ſpeaketh of Anacletus, making no mention of Cletus. Whereby it may appear by the way, what credit is to be given to the decretal Epiſtles, whom all the later Hiſtories of the Pope his Church do follow in this behalf, &c. Moreover, where Antoninus, Vincentius, Jacobus In ſupplemento, Simoneta, Aloiſius, with others, declare of Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, Euariſtus, Alexander, Biſhops of Rome, that that they died Martyrs: Euſebius, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory writing of them maketh thereof no mention.

Diſagreement in Authors touching the lives and times of Martyrs.

Linus Biſhop of Rome.

Cletus and Anacletus both one.

Clement a Biſhop counted a Martyr.

And firſt as touching Clement (whom Marianus Scotus calleth the firſt Biſhop of Rome after Peter) they ſay that he was ſent out into baniſhment of Trajanus, beyond Ponticus, with two thouſand Chriſtians, where he opened a well-ſpring to them which in the Wilderneſs were condemned to the Mines. Afterward being accuſed to the Emperor, he was thrown into the Sea with a millſtone faſtened about his neck, and not long after, his body was caſt up and buried (as Platina ſaith) at the place where the Well was made. Some ſay it was found firſt in the days of Pope Nicholas the firſt, Faſcicul. tempor. But foraſmuch as I find of his Martyrdom no firm relation in the ancient Authors, but only in ſuch new Writers of later times, which are wont to paint out the lives and hiſtories of good men, with fained additions of forged Miracles, therefore I count the fame of leſs credit, as I do alſo certain decretal Epiſtles, untruly (as may ſeem) aſcribed and intituled to his name. Euſebius in his third Book, writing of Clement, giveth no more of him, but thus, After he had governed the Church of Rome nine years, the ſaid Clement left the ſucceſſion thereof to Euariſtus.

The lives of Martyrs painted out with fained Miracles.

Euariſtus Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

Of which Euariſtus next Biſhop of Rome, thus we find in Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Peter and Paul (ſaith he) committed the Charge of that Church to Linus: after whom came Anacletus, then ſucceeded Clemens, next to Clemens followed Euariſtus, after whom came Alexander, and then Sixtus the ſixth Biſhop of Rome after the Apoſtles: after Sixtus ſate Teleſphorus, then Higinus, then Pius, then Anicetus. And when Soter took the place after him, then the twelfth Biſhop of Rome was Eleutherius. Thus after Clement followed (as is ſaid) Euariſtus in the ſecond or third year of Trajanus, as ſaith Euſebius; or as Nicephorus ſaith, the fourth year of the ſaid Emperor. But howſoever the count of years ſtandeth, little or nothing remaineth of the Acts and Monuments either of this, or of other Biſhops of Rome in thoſe days. Whereby it may appear that no great account was then made of Roman Biſhops in thoſe days, whoſe Acts and Deeds were then either ſo lightly reputed, or ſo ſlenderly committed to Hiſtory. Notwithſtanding, certain decretal Epiſtles are remaining, or rather thruſt upon us in their names, containing in them little ſubſtance of any Doctrine, but altogether ſtuffed with Laws, Injunctions, and ſtately Decrees, little to the purpoſe, and leſs ſavouring of the nature of that time then preſent. Amongſt whom alſo are numbred the two Epiſtles of this Euariſtus.

The decretal Epiſtles.

And when he had given theſe Orders, and had made ſix Prieſts, two Deacons, and five Biſhops in ſundry places (ſaith the ſtory) he ſuffered Martyrdom. But what kind of death, for what cauſe he ſuffered, what conſtancy he ſhewed, what was the order or converſation of his life, is nothing touched, and ſeemeth therefore the more to be doubted that which our new Hiſtories do ſay: becauſe the old ancient Writers have no remembrance thereof, which otherwiſe would not have paſſed ſuch things over in ſilence, if they had been true. Again, neither do the Authors fully agree in the time of his Martyrdom, which Nauclerus witneſſeth to be in the laſt year of Trajanus: but Platina thinketh rather that he ſuffered under Hadrianus, Faſcicul. temporum referreth it to the third year of Hadrian; Volateranus to the beginning of the Reign of Hadrian. Contrary, Euſebius coming near to the ſimple truth (as ſeemeth) doth affirm that Euariſtus ſucceeded Clement in the third year of Trajanus, and ſo giving to him nine years, it ſhould follow thereby that Euariſtus deceaſed the twelfth year of Trajanus.

Nauclerus gen. 4. Platina. Volateran. Antropol. li. 22. Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 24.

After whom ſucceeded next Alexander in the Government of that Church, of whoſe time and death the like diſcrepance is among the Writers. Marianus Scotus ſaith he was the fourth Biſhop from Peter: but that could not be. Some ſay he was the ſixth, and ſome the ſeventh: but they likewiſe were deceived; for the moſt part all do grant Sixtus to be the ſixth: Damaſus affirmeth, that he was in the Reign of Trajan. And how can that be? when the ſaid Damaſus affirmed before that Euariſtus his Predeceſſor ſuffered in the laſt year of Trajan, and then the Biſhoprick ſtood at leaſt a month void: except he mean that the ſaid Alexander ſucceeded Euariſtus in the laſt year of Trajanus. But then how can that ſtand with Bede and Marianus Scotus? which ſay that he ſuffered under Trajanus, or with Otho Friſingenſis; which ſaith he ſuffered the fourth year of Hadrian, when he had been Biſhop ten years by the general conſent of moſt Writers?

Alexander Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

Authors diſagree.

They which write of the deeds and doings of this bleſſed Biſhop, as Bergomenſis, Antoninus, Equilinus, and ſuch as follow them, declare that he had converted a great part of the Senators to the Faith of Chriſt, amongſt whom was Hermes a great man in Rome, whoſe Son being dead Alexander raiſed again to life, and likewiſe reſtored ſight to his Maid being blind. Hadrian the Emperor then abſent, hearing this, ſent word to Aurelianus Governor of Rome, to apprehend Alexander, with Euentius and Theodulus, otherwiſe called Theodorus, as Platina ſaith, his two Deacons, and Hermes, and to commit them to ward with Quirinus the Tribune: which being done, as their ſtory recordeth, Alexander, incloſed in a divers Priſon from Hermes, notwithſtanding, by the guiding of an Angel through three doors with three locks a piece, was brought with Candle-light to the lodging of Hermes; and ſo returning to the Priſon again cured the Daughter of Quirinus his Keeper, named Balbina, by reaſon whereof the ſaid Quirinus, with his whole Houſhold, were all baptized, and ſuffered alſo for the Faith of Chriſt.

Alexander, Euentius, Theodulus, Hermes with his Houſhold, Quirinus with his Houſhold, Martyrs.

Thus then (ſaith the ſtory) about the ſecond year of Hadrian, Aurelianus the Ruler took Alexander the Biſhop, with Hermes, his Wife, Children, and his whole Houſhold, to the number of one thouſand two hundred and fifty, and threw them in Priſon. And not long after the ſaid Alexander, with Euentius his Deacon, and Hermes, and the reſt were burned in a Fornace. Theodulus another Deacon of Alexander, ſeeing and rebuking the cruelty of the Tyrant, ſuffered alſo the ſame Martyrdom.

Quirinus alſo the ſame time (as ſaith Antoninus) having firſt his Tongue cut out, then his hands and feet, afterward was beheaded and caſt to the dogs. Equilinus ſaith, that he was beheaded and caſt into Tiber in the Reign of the Emperor Claudius; but that cannot be: albeit Platina maketh relation but only of Alexander with his two Deacons aforeſaid, declaring moreover, that in the time of this Biſhop, Saphira of Antioch, and Sabina a Roman ſuffered Martyrdom.

Ex Platina in vita Alexandri.

Saphira and Sabina martyrs. Ex Florilego.

Florilegus,

Florilegus, the Author of Flores hiſtoriarum, affirmeth, that Alexander Biſhop of Rome was beheaded ſeven miles out of Rome (where he lieth buried) in the year one hundred and five; but that agreeth not with the Chronicles above recited. Euſebius recordeth of him no more, but that in the third year of Hadrian, he ended his life and office, after he had been Biſhop ten years.

Divers Miracles are reported of this Alexander, in the Canon Legends, and lives of Saints; which as I deny not, but they may be true, ſo becauſe I cannot avouch them by any grave teſtimony of ancient Writers, therefore I dare not affirm them, but do refer them to the Authors and Patrons thereof, where they are found. Notwithſtanding, whatſoever is to be thought of his Miracles, this is to be affirmed and not doubted, but that he was a godly and vertuous Biſhop.

The ordinances of Anarius. Diſt 93. cap. Diaconi.

And as I ſay of his Miracles, the like judgment alſo I have of the Ordinances, both of him and of Euariſtus his Predeceſſor, teſtified in the Popes Decrees by Gratianus, as Diſt. 93. cap. Diaconi, where is ſaid that Euariſtus divided divers Titles in the City of Rome to the Prieſts, alſo ordained in every City ſeven Deacons to aſſociate and aſſiſt the Biſhop in his preaching, both for his defence, and for the witneſs of truth. Notwithſtanding, if probable conjectures might ſtand againſt the authority of Gratianus and his decrees, here might be doubted whether this abſolute ordination of Prieſts was firſt forbidden by Euariſtus, and whether the intitulation of Prieſts was firſt by him brought in or not: wherein an inſtance may be given to the contrary, that this intitulation ſeemeth to take his firſt beginning at the Council of Chalcedon, and of Pope Urban in the Council of Placentia. In the which Council of Chalcedon the words of the Canon (making no mention of Euariſtus at all) do expreſly forbid, that any Eccleſiaſtical perſon either Prieſt or Deacon ſhould be ordained abſolutely; otherwiſe the impoſition of hands, without ſome proper title of the party ordained, to ſtand void and fruſtrate, &c. And likewiſe Urbanus in the Council of Placentia doth decree the ſame, alledging no name of Euariſtus, but the ſtatutes of former Councils.

Ex Diſt. 70. cap. Nemi-nem.

Ibidem cap. Sanctorum.

Moreover, in the time of Euariſtus, the Church then being under terrible Perſecutions, was divided into no peculiar Pariſhes or Cures whereby any title might riſe, but was ſcattered rather in corners and deſerts, where they could beſt hide themſelve. And as the Church of Rome in thoſe days was not divided into ſeveral Pariſhes or Cures (as I ſuppoſe) ſo neither was then any ſuch open or ſolemn preaching in Churches, that the aſſiſtance or teſtimony of ſeven Deacons either could avail among the multitude of the heathen, or elſe needed amongſt the Chriſtian ſecret Congregations. Again, the conſtitution of ſeven Deacons ſeemeth rather to ſpring out of the Council of Neoceſarea long after Euariſtus, where it was appointed that in every City, were it never ſo ſmall, there ſhould be ſeven Deacons after the rule. And this rule the ſaid Council taketh out of the book of the Acts of the Apoſtles, making no word or mention of Euariſtus at all, Diſt. 93. But But theſe (as is ſaid) be but only conjectures, not denying that which is commonly received, but only ſhewing what may be doubted in their Epiſtles Decretal.

Ex diſt. 93. cap. Diaconi.

The inſtitutions of Alexander. Holy water firſt invented. De conſecrat diſt. 3.

More unlike it ſeemeth to be true that is recorded and reported of Alexander, whereof we read, De conſecr. diſt. 2. that he ſhould be the firſt founder and finder of holy water mixt with ſalt, to purge and ſanctifie them upon whom it is ſprinkled. The words of the diſt. be theſe: Aquam ſale conſperſam in populis benedicimus, ut ea cuncti aſperſi ſanctificentur & purificentur, quod omnibus ſacerdotibus faciendum eſſe mandamus, &c. that is, We bleſs water mixt with ſalt among the people, that all men being ſprinkled therewith may be ſanctified and purified; and this we command all Prieſts to do, &c.

The opinion is alſo, but how true I have not to affirm, that by him firſt was ordained water to be mixt with Wine in the Chalice.

The Third Perſecution.

The third Perſecution of the Church. { Anno 100. }

BEtween the ſecond Roman Perſecution and the third, was but one year, under the Emperor Nerva, after whom ſucceeded Trajanus: and after him followed the third Perſecution. So the ſecond and the third are noted of ſome to be both one, having no more difference but one year between them. This Trajanus, if we look well upon his Politick and Civil Governance, (might ſeem, in compariſon of others) a right worthy and commendable Prince, much familiar with inferiors, and ſo behaving himſelf toward his ſubjects, as he himſelf would have the Prince to be to him, if he himſelf were a Subject. Alſo he was noted to be a great obſerver of Juſtice, inſomuch that when he ordained any Pretor, giving to him the Sword, he would bid him uſe the ſword againſt his enemies in juſt cauſes: and if he himſelf did otherwiſe than juſtice, to uſe then his power againſt him alſo. But for all theſe Vertues, toward Chriſtian Religion he was impious and cruel, who cauſed the third Perſecution of the Church. In the which Perſecution Pliny the ſecond, a man learned and famous, ſeeing the lamentable ſlaughter of Chriſtians, and moved therewith to pity, wrote to Trajanus of the pitiful perſecution: certifying him that there were many thouſands of them daily put to death, of which none did any thing contrary to the Roman laws worthy perſecution: ſaving that they uſed to gather together in the morning before day, and ſing Hymns to a certain God whom they worſhipped, called Chriſt. In all other their ordinances they were godly and honeſt. Whereby the Perſecution by commandment of the Emperor was greatly ſtayed and diminiſhed. The Form and Copy of which Epiſtle of Pliny I thought here not inconvenient to ſet down, as followeth.

Plinius ſecundus wrote to Trajan to ſtop the perſecution.

The Epiſtle of Pliny, an Heathen Philoſopher, to Trajan the Emperor.

The Epiſtle of Pliny to Trajanus.

IT is my property and manner (my Sovereign) to make relation of all thoſe things unto you wherein I doubt. For who can better, either correct my ſlackneſs, or inſtruct mine ignorance, than you? I was never yet preſent my ſelf at the examination and execution of theſe Chriſtians; and therefore what puniſhment is to be adminiſtred, and how far, or how to proceed in ſuch inquiſitions, I am plain ignorant, not able to reſolve in the matter whether any difference is to be had in age and perſon, whether the young and tender ought to be with like cruelty intreated as the elder and ſtronger, whether repentance may have any pardon, or whether it may profit him or not, to deny, which hath been a Chriſtian, whether the name only of Chriſtians without other offences, or whether the offences joyned with the name of a Chriſtian ought to be puniſhed. In the mean ſeaſon, as touching ſuch Chriſtians as have been preſented unto me, I have kept this order. I have enquired the ſecond and third time of them, whether they were Chriſtians, menacing them with fear of puniſhment; and ſuch as did perſevere, I commanded to execution. For thus I thought, that whatſoever their profeſſion was, yet their ſtubbornneſs and obſtinacy ought to be puniſhed. Whether they were alſo of the ſame madneſs; whom, becauſe they were Citizens of Rome, I thought to ſend them back again to the City. Afterward, in further proceſs and handling of this matter, as the Sect did further ſpread, ſo the more caſes did thereof enſue.

There was a Libel offered to me bearing no name, wherein were contained the names of many which denied themſelves to be Chriſtians, contented to do Sacrifice with Incenſe and Wine to the Gods, and to your Image (which Image I for that purpoſe cauſed to be brought) and to blaſpheme Chriſt: whereunto none ſuch as were true Chriſtians indeed could be compelled, and thoſe I did diſcharge and let go. Other ſome confeſſed that they had been Chriſtians, but afterward denied the ſame, &c. affirming unto me the whole ſum of that ſect or errour to conſiſt in this, that they were wont at certain times appointed, to convent before day, and to ſing certain Hymns to one Chriſt their God, and to confederate among themſelves, to abſtain from all Theft, Murder, and Adultery, to keep their faith, and to defraud no man: which done, then

Two Maidens racked for Christ.

In the truth whereof to be further certified whether it were so or not, I caused two Maidens to be laid on the Rack, and with torments to be examined of the same. But finding no other thing in them, but only lewd and immoderate superstition, I thought to surcease of further inquiry, till time that I might be further advertised in the matter from you; for so the matter seemed unto me worthy and needful of advisement, especially for the great number of those that were in danger of your statute. For very many there were of all ages and states, both Men and Women, which then were, and more are like hereafter to incur the same peril of condemnation. For that infection hath crept not only in Citys, but Villages also and Boroughs about, which seemeth that it may be stayed and reformed. For as much as we see in many places that the Temples of our Gods, which were wont to be desolate, begin now to be frequented, and that they bring Sacrifices from every part to be sold, which before very few were found willing to buy. Whereby it may easily be conjectured, what multitudes of Men may be amended, if space and time be given them, wherein they may be reclaimed.

The Epistle of Trajanus to Pliny.

The answer of Trajan to Plinys letter

THe Act and Statute, my Secundus, concerning the causes of the Christians, which ye ought to follow, ye have rightly executed. For no such general Law can be comprehended. Let them not be sought for, but if they be brought and convicted, then let them suffer execution: so notwithstanding, that whosoever shall deny himself to be a Christian; and do it unfeignedly in open audience, and do Sacrifice to our Gods, howsoever he hath been suspected before, let him be released, upon promise of amendment. Such Libels as have no names, suffice not to any just crime or accusation; for that should give both an evil president, neither doth it agree with the example of our time.

Tertullian writing upon this Letter of Trajanus above prefixed, thus saith, O Sentence of a confused necessity; he would not have them to be sought for as men innocent, and yet causes them to be punished as persons guilty. And thus the rage of that Persecution ceased for a time, although notwithstanding many naughty disposed men and cruel officers there were, which upon false pretence to accomplish their wicked minds, ceased not to afflict the Christians in divers Provinces: and especially if any occasion were given never so little for the enemies to take hold of, or if any commotion were raised in the Provinces abroad, by and by the fault was laid upon the Christians. As in Hierusalem after that the Emperor Trajanus had sent down his commandment, that whosoever could be found of the stock of David, he should be enquired out and put to death: Upon this Egesippus writing, saith, that certain Sectaries there were of the Jewish Nation, that accused Simeon the Bishop then of Hierusalem and Son of Cleophas, to come of the stock of David, and that he was a Christian. Of the which his accusers it happened also (saith the said Egesippus) that certain of them likewise were apprehended and taken to be of the stock of David, and so right justly were put to execution themselves which sought the destruction of others. As concerning Simeon the blessed Bishop, the foresaid Egesippus thus writeth, that Simeon the Lords Nephew, when he was accused to Attalus the Proconsul, by the malicious Sect of the Jews, to be of the Line of David, and to be a Christian, was scourged, during the space of many days together, being of age an hundred and twenty years. In which his Martyrdom he endured so constant, that both the Consul and all the multitude did marvel to see him of that age so constantly to suffer, and so at last being crucified, finished his course in the Lord, for whom he suffered, as partly before also is recorded.

The stock of David feared and enquired for of the Roman Emperors.

Phocas Bishop of Pontus Martyr.

In this Persecution of Trajanus above specified (which Trajanus next followed after Nerva) besides the other afore mentioned, also suffered Phocas Bishop of Pontus, whom Trajanus, because he would not do Sacrifice to Neptunus, caused to be cast into a hot lime-kilne, and afterward to be put into a scalding Bath, where the constant godly Martyr, in the testimony of Christ, ended his life, or rather entred into life. Anton. Equil. Fascic. temporum.

In the same Persecution suffered also Sulpitius and Servilianus, two Romans; whose Wives are said to be Euphrosina and Theodora, whom Sabina did convert to the Faith of Christ, and after were also martyred. Of which Sabina, Jacobus Philippus, Author of the Book called Supplementum, reporteth that, in the Mount of Laventine in Rome, she was beheaded of Clepidus the Governour, in the days of Hadrian. Under whom also suffered Seraphia a Virgin of Antioch, as Hermannus witnesseth.

The forenamed Authors Antoninus and Equilius make mention moreover of Nereus and Achilleus, who, in this Persecution of Trajan, had the Crown of Martyrdom, being put to death at Rome. Eusebius in his fourth book, cap. 26. maketh mention of one Sagaris, who about the same time suffered Martyrdom in Asia, Servilius Paulus being then Proconsul in that Province.

Nereus and Achilleus Martyrs.

Sagaris Martyr.

In this Persecution, beside many others, suffered the blessed Martyr of Christ Ignatius, who unto this day is had in famous reverence among very many. This Ignatius was appointed to the Bishoprick of Antioch next after Peter in succession. Some do say, that he being sent from Syria to Rome, because he professed Christ, was given to the Wild beasts to be devoured. It is also said of him, that when he passed through Asia, being under the most strict custody of his Guarders, he strengthened and confirmed the Parishes through all the Cities as he went, both with his exhortations and preaching of the Word of God: and admonished them especially and before all other things, to beware and shun those Heresies risen up and sprung newly among them, and that they should cleave and stick fast to the tradition of the Apostles; which he, for their better safeguard, being about to denounce or put in writing, thought it a thing very necessary to travel in. And thus when he came to Smyrna, where Polycarpus was, he wrote one Epistle to the Congregation of Ephesus, wherein he made mention of Onesimus their Pastor, and another he wrote to the Congregation of Magnesia, being at Meandre; wherein also he forgetteth not Dama their Bishop. Also another he wrote to the Congregation of Trallis, the Governour of which City at that time he noteth to be one Polybius. Unto which Congregation he made an exhortation, lest they refusing Martyrdom, should lose the hope that they desired.

Onesimus Pastor at Ephesus.

The words of Ignatius strict having of Ignatius.

But it shall be very requisite that I alledge somewhat thereof to the declaration of this matter. He wrote therefore, as the words lie, in this sort. From Syria (saith he) even till I came to Rome, had I a battel with Beasts, as well by Sea as Land, both day and night, being bound in the midst of ten cruel Libards, (that is, the Company or Band of the Souldiers) which, the more benefits that they received at my hands, became so much the worse unto me. But I, being exercised, and now well acquainted with their injuries, am taught every day more and more; but hereby am I not yet justified. And would to God I were once come to the Beasts, which are prepared for me, which also I wish with gaping mouths were ready to come upon me, whom also I will provoke that they without delay may devour me, and forbear me nothing at all, as those whom before they have not touched or hurt for fear! And if they will not unless they be provoked, I will then inforce them against my self. Pardon me I pray you. How much beneficial it is to me, I know. Now begin I to be a Scholar; I force or esteem no visible things, nor yet invisible things, so that I may get or obtain Christ Jesus. Let the Fire, the Gallows, the devouring of Wild-beasts, the breaking of bones, the pulling asunder of my members, the bruising or pressing of my whole body, and the torments of the Devil or Hell it self come upon me, so that I may win Christ Jesus.

The notable constancy and burning zeal to Christ in this blessed Martyr to be marked.

And these things wrote he from the foresaid City unto the Congregations which we have recited. And when he was even now judged to be thrown to the beasts, he spake, for the burning desire that he had to suffer, what time he heard the Lions roaring: I am the Wheat or Grain (saith he) of Christ, I shall be ground with the teeth of Wild Beasts, that I may be found pure bread. He suffered in the eleventh year of Trajan the Emperor. Hæc Eusebius & Hieronym.

Ignatius devoured of Wild beasts.

Besides

Beſides this godly Ignatius, many thouſands alſo were put to death in the ſame Perſecution, as appeareth by the letter of Plinius ſecundus above recited, written unto the Emperor. Hierome in his Book intituled De viris illuſtribus maketh mention of one Publius Biſhop of Athens, who for the faith of Chriſt, the ſame time during this Perſecution, was put to death and martyred.

Ex Hieron. lib. De viris illuſtribus. Publius Biſhop of Athens martyr.

Hadrian Emperor.

NExt after this Trajanus ſucceeded Hadrian the Emperor, under whom ſuffered Alexander the Biſhop of Rome, with his two Deacons Euentius and Theodorus: alſo Hermes and Quirinus with their families, as late before was declared.

Zenon with 10000 martyrs ſlain for Chriſt. Ex Henr. de Erfordia & alijs.

It is ſignified moreover in the Hiſtories, that in the time of this Hadrian, Zenon a Noble Man of Rome with ten thouſand two hundred and three were ſlain for Chriſt. Henricus de Erfordia, and *Bergomenſis lib.*8. make mention of ten thouſand in the days of this Hadrian to be crucified in the Mount Hararat, crowned with Crowns of thorne, and thruſt into the ſides with ſharp darts, after the example of the Lords Paſſion, whoſe Captains (as Antoninus and Vincentius in ſpec. hiſtor. declare) were Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, and Carcerius, &c. Whether this ſtory be the ſame with the other above of Zenon or not, it is doubted. As touching the Miracles done, and the ſpeaking of the Angel, I refer the certainty thereof to Vincentius, and ſuch other like Authors, where more things ſeem to be told than to be true.

Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, Carcerius, with ten thouſand Martyrs.

Euſtachius with his Wife and Children martyred for Chriſt.

There was one Euſtachius a Captain, whom Trajanus in time paſt had ſent out to War againſt the Barbarians. After he had by Gods grace valiantly ſubdued his enemies, and now was returning home with Victory; Hadrian for joy meeting him in his journey to bring him home with Triumph, by the way firſt would do Sacrifice to Apollo for the Victory gotten, willing alſo Euſtachius to do the ſame with him. But when Euſtachius could by no means thereto be enforced, being brought to Rome, there with his Wife and Children he ſuffered Martyrdom under the foreſaid Adrian. It were a long proceſs here to recite all the Miracles contained or rather ſuſpected in this ſtory of this Euſtachius concerning his Converſion and Death. How the Crucifix appeared to him between the Horns of an Hart. Of the ſaving of his Wife from the Shipmen. Of one of his Sons ſaved from the Lion, the other ſaved from the Wolf. Of their miraculous preſervation from the Wild-beaſts, from the torments of fire mentioned in Bergomenſis, Vincentius, and others. All which as I find them in no ancient Records, ſo I leave them to their Authors, and compilers of the Legends.

Fauſtinus and Jobita, Calocerius, Martyrs.

We read alſo of Fauſtinus and Jobita Citizens of the City of Brixia, which ſuffered Martyrdom with like grievous torments. At the ſight whereof one Calocerius, ſeeing their ſo great patience in ſo great torments, cried out with theſe Words; Vere magnus Deus Chriſtianorum: that is, Verily great is the God of Chriſtians: Which Words being heard, forthwith he was apprehended, and being brought to the place of their Execution, was made partaker of their Martyrdom. Ex Ant. Equilin.

Eleutherius with his Mother Anthia martyrs Ex Niceph. & ex Onom.

The Hiſtory of Nicephorus maketh mention of Anthia a godly Woman, who committed her Son Eleutherius to Anicetus Biſhop of Rome, to be brought up in the Doctrine of Chriſtian Faith, who afterwards being Biſhop in Apulia was there beheaded with his foreſaid Mother Anthia. Onomaſt.

Juſtus and Paſtor brethren and Martyrs.

Juſtus alſo and Paſtor two brethren, with like Martyrdom ended their lives in a City of Spain, called Complutum, under the ſaid Adrian the Emperor.

Symphoriſſa with her ſeven children martyred.

Likewiſe Symphoriſſa the wife of Getulus the Martyr, with her 7 Children, is ſaid about the ſame time to ſuffer: who firſt was much and often beaten and ſcourged, afterwards was hanged up by the hair of her head; at laſt having an huge ſtone faſtened unto her, was thrown headlong into the River, and after that her ſeven Children in like manner, with ſundry and divers kinds of puniſhment diverſly martyred by the Tyrant.

Sophia with her three children martyred.

The ſtory of M. Hermannus, and Antoninus, and others, report of Sophia, with her three children alſo; alſo of Seraphia and Sabina, to ſuffer under the ſaid Emperor, about the year of our Lord, one hundred and thirty.

As concerning Alexander Biſhop of Rome, with his two Deacons, alſo with Hermes, Quirinus, Saphira and Sabina, ſome Writers, as Bede, and Marianus Scotus record that they ſuffered under Trajanus. Others again, as Otto, Friſingenſis with like more, report that they ſuffered in the fourth year of this Emperor Adrian, but of theſe Martyrs ſufficiently hath been ſaid before.

While Adrian the Emperor was at Athens, he purpoſed to viſit the Country of Eluſina, and ſo did: where he ſacrificing to the Gentiles Gods, after the manner of the Grecians, had given free leave and liberty, whoſoever would, to perſecute the Chriſtians. Whereupon Quadratus a man of no leſs excellent zeal, than of famous learning, being then Biſhop of Athens, and Diſciple of the Apoſtles, or at leaſt ſucceeding incontinent the age of the Apoſtles, and following after Publius (who a little before was martyred for the teſtimony of Chriſt) did offer up and exhibite unto Adrian the Emperor a learned and excellent Apology in the defence of the Chriſtian Religion. Wherein he declared the Chriſtians, without all juſt cauſe or deſert to be ſo cruelly intreated and perſecuted, &c. The like alſo did Ariſtides another no leſs excellent Philoſopher in Athens, who for his ſingular learning and eloquence, being notified to the Emperor, and coming to his preſence, there made before him an eloquent Oration. Moreover, he did exhibit unto the ſaid Emperor a memorable Apology for the Chriſtians, ſo full of learning and eloquence, that as Hierome ſaith, it was a ſpectacle and admiration to men in his time, that loved to ſee Wit and Learning. Over and beſides theſe, there was alſo another named Serenus Granius a man of great Nobility, who likewiſe did write very pithy and grave Letters to Adrian the Emperor, ſhewing and declaring therein that it was conſonant with no right nor reaſon, for the blood of innocents to be given to the rage and fury of the people, and ſo to be condemned for no fault, only for the Name and Sect that they followed.

Quadratus Biſhop of Athens offereth an Apology of Chriſtian Doctrine.

Ariſtides, a Philoſopher of Athens, defendeth before the Emperor the religion of Chriſt.

Serenus Granius a defender of Chriſtian religion. *Euſ. l.*4. *c.*8.

Thus the goodneſs of God being moved with the prayers and conſtant labour of theſe ſo excellent men, ſo turned the heart of the Emperor, that he being better informed concerning the order and profeſſion of the Chriſtians, became more favourable unto them. And immediately upon the ſame directed his Letters to Minutius Fundanus (as is partly before mentioned) Proconſul of Aſia, willing him from henceforth to exerciſe no more ſuch extremity againſt the Chriſtians, as to condemn any of them, having no other crime objected againſt them, but only their name. The Copy of which his Letter, becauſe that Juſtin in his Apology doth alledge it; I thought therefore to expreſs the ſame in his own words, as followeth.

The Emperor writeth for the Chriſtians.

The Letter of Adrian the Emperor to Minutius Fundanus.

The Letter of Adrian the Emperor to Fundanus the Proconſul.

I Have received an Epiſtle written unto me from Serenus Granius, our right worthy and welbeloved, whoſe Office you do now execute. Therefore I think it not good to leave this matter without further adviſement and circumſpection to paſs, leſt our Subjects be moleſted, and malicious Sycophants boldned and ſupported in their evil. Wherefore if the Subjects of our Provinces do bring forth any accuſation before the Judge againſt the Chriſtians, and can prove the thing they object againſt them, let them do the ſame and no more, and otherwiſe for the name only, not to impeach them, nor to cry out againſt them. For ſo, more convenient it is, that, if any man will be an accuſer, you take the accuſation quietly, and judge upon the ſame. Therefore, if any ſhall accuſe the Chriſtians, and complain of them as Malefactors, doing contrary to the law, then give you judgment according to the quality of the crime. But notwithſtanding whoſoever upon ſpite and maliciouſneſs ſhall commence or cavil againſt them, ſee you correct and puniſh that man for his unordinate and malicious dealing.

Reſpit from Perſecution.

Thus by the merciful providence of God, ſome more quiet and reſt was given to the Church, although Hermannus thinketh theſe halcion days did not very long continue, but that the Emperor changing his Edict, began to renew again Perſecution of Gods People, albeit this ſoundeth not to be ſo by the words of Melito in his Apology to Antoninus hereafter enſuing. In the mean time

this

The ſecond deſtruction of the Jews. Jeruſalem reedified and inlarged.

this is certain, that in the days of this Adrian, the Jews rebelled again and ſpoiled the Country of Paleſtin. Againſt whom the Emperor ſent Julius Severus, who overthrew in Jewry fifty Caſtles, and burnt and deſtroyed nine hundred and fourſcore Villages and Towns, and ſlew of the Jews fifty thouſand; with Famine, Sickneſs, Sword and Fire, Juda was almoſt deſolate. But at length Adrian the Emperor, which otherwiſe was named Ælius, repaired and enlarged the City again of Jeruſalem, which was called after his name Æliopolis, or Ælia Capitolina, the inhabitance whereof he granted only to the Gentiles, and to the Chriſtians, forbidding the Jews utterly to enter into the City.

Some write that the place where Chriſt was crucified was taken into the Walls. Jeruſalem called by a new name Æliopolis.

Antoninus Pius Emperor. { Anno 140.

After the death of Adrian who died by bleeding at the Noſe, ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, about the year of our Lord, one hundred and forty, and reigned twenty and three years, who for his clemency and modeſt behaviour, had the name of Pius, and is for the ſame in Hiſtories commended. His ſaying was, that he had rather ſave one Citizen, than deſtroy a thouſand of his adverſaries. At the beginning of his Reign, ſuch was the ſtate of the Church, as Adrian his Predeceſſor had left it, as in which, although there was no Edict ſet forth to perſecute the Chriſtians, yet the tumultuous rage of the Heathen multitude for the cauſes above ſpecified, did not ceaſe to diſquiet and afflict the quiet people of God, imputing and aſcribing to the Chriſtians whatſoever misfortune happened contrary unto their deſires: moreover, inventing againſt them all falſe crimes, and contumelies whereof to accuſe them. By reaſon whereof, divers there were in ſundry places much moleſted, and ſome put to death: albeit, as it is to be ſuppoſed, not by the conſent of the Emperor, who of nature was ſo mild and gentle, that either he raiſed up no Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, or elſe he ſoon ſtayed the ſame being moved. As well may appear by his Letter ſent down to the Countries of Aſia, the tenor whereof here inſueth.

The Epiſtle of Antoninus Pius, to the Commons of Aſia.

The Letter of Antoninus Pius to the Commons of Aſia.

EMperor and Cæſar, Aurelius Antoninus Auguſtus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune eleven times, Conſul thrice, unto the Commons of Aſia greeting. I am very certain that the Gods have a care of this, that they which be ſuch, ſhall be known, and not lie hid. For they do puniſh them that will not worſhip them more than you, which ſo ſore vex and trouble them, confirming thereby the opinion which they have conceived, and do conceive of you, that is, to be wicked men. For this is their joy and deſire, that when they are accuſed, rather they covet to die for their God, than to live. Whereby they are Victorers, and do overcome you, giving rather their lives, than to be obedient to you, in doing that which you require of them. And here it ſhall not be inconvenient to advertiſe you of the Earthquakes, which have and do happen among us, that when at the ſight of them you tremble and are afraid, then you may confer your caſe with them. For they upon a ſure confidence of their God, are bold and fearleſs, much more than you: who in all the time of this your ignorance, both do worſhip other Gods, and neglect the Religion of immortality, and ſuch Chriſtians as worſhip him, them you do drive out, and perſecute them unto death. Of theſe and ſuch like matters many Preſidents of our Provinces did write to our Father of famous memory heretofore. To whom he directed his anſwer again, willing them in no caſe to moleſt the Chriſtians, except they were found in ſome treſpaſs prejudicial againſt the Empire of Rome. And to me alſo many there be, which write ſignifying their mind in like manner. To whom I have anſwered again, to the ſame effect and manner as my Father did. Wherefore if any hereafter ſhall offer any vexation or trouble to ſuch, having no other cauſe, but only for that they are ſuch, let him that is appeached, be releaſed and diſcharged free, yea although he be found to be ſuch (that is a Chriſtian) and let the accuſer ſuſtain the puniſhment, &c.

A notable argument of the Emperor to prove the good Conſcience of Chriſtians, and the falſe conſcience of the Heathen.

He meaneth Adrian which adopted this Antoninus of his ſon in law to be his ſon and heir. O noble Edict.

This godly Edict of the Emperor was proclaimed at Epheſus, in the publick Aſſembly of all Aſia, whereof Melito alſo Biſhop of Sardis, who flouriſhed in the ſame time, maketh mention in his Apology written in defence of our Doctrine to M. Antoninus Verus, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall appear. By this means then the Tempeſt or Perſecution in thoſe days began to be appeaſed, through the merciful Providence of God, which would not have his Church utterly to be overthrown, though hardly yet to grow.

The fourth Perſecution.

M. Antoninus Verus Emperor. { Anno 162.

AFter the deceaſe of the foreſaid quiet and mild Prince Aurelius Antoninus Pius (who among all other Emperors of that time made the moſt quiet end) followed his Son M. Antoninus Verus, with Lucius his brother, about the year of our Lord one hundred threeſcore and two, a man of nature more ſtern and ſevere. And although in ſtudy of Philoſophy, and in Civil Government no leſs commendable: yet toward the Chriſtians ſharp and fierce, by whom was moved the fourth Perſecution after Nero. In whoſe time a great number of them which truly profeſſed Chriſt, ſuffered moſt cruel torments and puniſhments both in Aſia and France. In the number of whom was Polycarpus, the worthy Biſhop of Smyrna, who in the great rage of this Perſecution in Aſia, among many other moſt conſtant Saints was alſo martyred. Of whoſe end and Martyrdom I thought it here not unexpedient to commit to Hiſtory, ſo much as Euſebius declareth to be taken out of a certain Letter or Epiſtle, written by them of his own Church to the brethren of Pontus: the tenor of which Epiſtle here followeth.

Polycarpus the bleſſed Martyr, Biſhop of Smyrna.

Ex Euſeb. hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4 cap. 15. Hieron. in catalogo.

The Congregation which is at Smyrna, to the Congregation which is at Philomilium, and to all the Congregations throughout Pontus, mercy to you, peace and the love of God our Father, and of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be multiplied, Amen. We have written unto you brethren of thoſe men which have ſuffered Martyrdom, and of bleſſed Polycarpus which hath ended and appeaſed this Perſecution as it were, by the ſhedding his own blood. And in the ſame Epiſtle before they enter into further matter of Polycarpus, they diſcourſe of other Martyrs, deſcribing what patience they abode and ſhewed in ſuffernig their torments: which was ſo great and admirable (ſaith the Epiſtle) that the lookers on were amazed, ſeeing and beholding how they were ſo ſcourged and whipped, that the inward Veins and Arteries appeared, yea, even ſo much that the very intrails of their bodies, their bowels and members were ſeen, and after that, were ſet upon ſharp ſhells taken out of the Sea, edged and ſharp, and certain nails and thorns for the Martyrs to go upon, which were ſharpened and pointed, called Obeliſci. Thus ſuffered they all kind of puniſhment and torment that might be deviſed: and laſtly, were thrown unto the wild beaſts to be devoured. But eſpecially in the aforeſaid Epiſtle, mention is made of one Germanicus, how he moſt worthily perſevered and overcame, by the grace of God, that fear of death which is ingraffed in the common nature of all men, whoſe notable patience and ſufferance was ſo notable, that the whole multitude wondring at this beloved Martyr of God, for this his ſo bold conſtancy, and alſo for the ſingular ſtrength and vertue proceeding of the whole multitude of the Chriſtians, began ſuddenly to cry with a loud voice, ſaying, Deſtroy the wicked men, let Polycarpus be ſought for. And whilſt a great uprore and tumult began thus to be raiſed upon thoſe cries, a certain Phrygian named Quintus, lately come out of Phrygia, ſeeing and abhorring the wild beaſts, and the fierce rage of them, of an over-light mind betrayed his own ſafety. For ſo the ſame Letter of him doth report, that he, not reverently, but more malipertly than was requiſite, together with others ruſhed into the Judgment place, and ſo being taken, was made a manifeſt example to all the beholders, that no man ought raſhly and unreverently with ſuch boldneſs to thruſt in himſelf, to intermeddle in matters wherewith he hath not to do.

Twelve martyrs in Aſia.

The cruel and beaſtly handling of the chriſtian martyrs.

The ſingular patience and conſtancy of the Chriſtians.

Germanicus a moſt conſtant Martyr.

Quintus a Phrygian too hardy and bold.

But now we will ſurceaſe to ſpeak more of them, and return to Polycarpus, of whom the foreſaid Letter conſequently declareth as followeth: How that in the beginning, when he heard of theſe things was nothing at all afraid nor diſquieted in mind, but purpoſed to have tarried ſtill in the City, till being perſwaded by the intreaty of them that were about him (which deſired him inſtantly that he would convey himſelf away) hid himſelf in a Grange or Village not far off from the City, and there abiding with a few more in his company, did nothing elſe (night nor day) but abode in ſupplication, wherein he made his humble petition tition for the obtaining of peace unto all the Congregations throughout the World, for that was his accuſtomed manner ſo to do. And as he was thus making his prayers three days before he was apprehended, in a Viſion by night he ſaw the bed ſet on Fire under his Head, and ſuddenly to be conſumed. And when he awaked, he told by and by, and expounded unto them that were preſent his Viſion, and told them before what thing ſhould come to paſs, that is, how that in the fire he ſhould loſe his life for Chriſts cauſe.

Polycarpus flieth Perſecution.

Polycarpus prayeth for the Church.

Polycarpus hath a Viſion of his burning.

It is further mentioned, that when they were hard at hand, which ſo narrowly ſought for him, that he was inforced for the affection and love of his brethren to fly into another Village, to which place notwithſtanding within a little while after the purſuers came, and when they had taken a couple of children that dwelt thereabouts, they ſo beat one of them with Whips, that by the bewraying or confeſſion of him they were brought unto the Inn where Polycarpus was. And they ſay that the purſuers making no great haſte to enter, found him in the uppermoſt place of the houſe, from whence he might have eſcaped into other houſes, if he would; but this he would not do, ſaying, The will of God be done. Furthermore, when he knew that they were come, as the ſaid Hiſtory ſheweth, he came down, and ſpake unto them with a chearful and pleaſant countenance, ſo that it was a wonder to ſee thoſe which awhile agone knew not the man, now beholding and viewing his comely age, and his grave and conſtant countenance, lamented that they had ſo much imployed their labour, that ſo aged a man ſhould be apprehended. To conclude, he commanded that ſtraightway without any delay the Table ſhould be laid for them, and perſwaded them that they would eat and dine well, and required of them boldly, that he might have an hours reſpite to make his prayers. Which thing, after it was granted, he aroſe and went to pray, ſo being repleniſhed with the grace of God, that they which were preſent, and hearing the prayers that he made, were aſtonied at it, and now many of them were ſorry that ſo honeſt and godly an aged man ſhould be put to death.

Polycarpus purſued and taken.

Polycarpus might eſcape and would not.

Polycarpus prayeth to prayer.

After this the aforeſaid Epiſtle or Letter, proſecuting the Hiſtory, addeth more, as followeth: After he had made an end of his prayers, and had called to his remembrance all thoſe things which ever happened unto him, and to the univerſal Catholick Church throughout all the world (whether they were ſmall or great, glorious or elſe inglorious) and that the hour was now come, in which they ought to ſet forward, they ſet him upon an Aſs, and brought him to the City upon a Solemn Feaſt day. And there met him Irenarchus Herodes, and his father Nicetes; which cauſing him to come up into the Chariot where they ſate, perſwaded him, and ſaid, What hurt I pray thee, ſhall come thereof to thee, if thou ſay (by the way of ſalutation) My Lord Ceſar, and do Sacrifice, and thus to ſave thy ſelf? But he at the beginning made them none anſwer, till that when they inforced him to ſpeak, he ſaid, I will not do as ye counſel me I ſhould. When as they ſaw he could not be perſwaded, they gave him very rough language, and of purpoſe moleſted him, that in going down the Chariot from them, he might hurt or break his Legs. But he forcing very light of the matter, as though he had felt no hurt, went merrily and diligently forward, making haſte unto the place appointed. And when there was ſuch uproar in the place of execution, that he could not be heard but of very few, there came a voice from Heaven to Polycarpus, as he was going into the Stage or appointed place of Judgment, ſaying: Be of good cheer, Polycarpus, and play the man. No man there was which ſaw him that ſpake, but very many of us heard his voice. And when he was brought in, there was a great noiſe made by them which underſtood that Polycarpus was apprehended. The Proconſul asked him when he was come, whether his name was Polycarpus or not? And when he ſaid, yea it was, he gave him counſel to deny his name, and ſaid unto him, Be good unto thy ſelf, and favour thine old age; and many other ſuch like words which they accuſtome to ſpeak; Swear, ſaith he, by the Emperors good fortune, look upon this matter, ſay thou with us: Deſtroy theſe naughty men. Then Polycarpus beholding with conſtant countenance the whole multitude which was in the place appointed, and giving a great ſigh, looked up to Heaven, ſaying: Thou, thou it is that wilt deſtroy theſe wicked men. And the Proconſul thus being earneſtly in hand with him, ſaid: Take thine Oath, and I will diſcharge thee, defie Chriſt. Polycarpus anſwered, Fourſcore and ſix years have I been his ſervant, yet in all his time hath he not ſo much as once hurt me: how then may I ſpeak evil of my King and ſovereign Lord, which hath thus preſerved me? Then the Proconſul again inforced him and ſaid: Swear thou, I adviſe thee, by Ceſar's Proſperity. Polycarpus replieth, If thou require of me this, fond word of vain boaſting, feigning not to know (as thou ſayeſt) who I am, I do thee to wit that I am a Chriſtian: and if thou deſire to know the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, appoint a day, and thou ſhalt hear. Perſwade the people unto this, ſaid the Proconſul. Truly, ſaith Polycarpus, I have thought it my part thus to ſay unto you, for ſo much as we are commanded to give unto the Governors and Powers ordained of God, the honour meet and due to them, and not hurtful unto us: but as for thoſe, I do judge them unworthy to purge my ſelf unto them. Hereupon the Proconſul ſtood up; I have, ſaith he, Wild-Beaſts to whom I will throw thee, unleſs thou take a better way. Whereunto Polycarpus anſwered, Let them come, we have determined with our ſelves, that we will not by repentance turn us from the better way to the worſe, but rather convenient it is, that a man turn from things that be evil, unto that which is good and juſt. Again, ſaith the Proconſul, I will tame thee with fire, if that thou ſet not by the wild beaſts, nor yet repent. Then ſaid Polycarpus, You threaten me with fire, which ſhall burn for the ſpace of an hour, and ſhall be within a little while after put out and extinguiſhed; but thou knoweſt not the fire of the judgment that is to come, and of everlaſting puniſhment, which is reſerved for the wicked and ungodly. But why make you all theſe delays? Give me what death ſoever ye liſt. Theſe, and many other ſuch like things being by him ſpoken, he was repleniſhed with joy and boldneſs, and his countenance appeared ſo full of grace and favour, that not only he was not troubled with thoſe things which the Proconſul ſpake unto him, but contrarily, the Proconſul himſelf began to be amazed, and ſent for the Crier, which in the middle of the ſtage was commanded to cry three times; Polycarpus hath confeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian: which words of the Crier were no ſooner ſpoken, but all the whole multitude both of Gentiles and Jews inhabiting at Smyrna, with a vehement rage, and loud voice cried; This is that Doctor or Teacher of Aſia, the Father of the Chriſtians, and the deſtroyer of our Gods, which hath inſtructed a great number, that our Gods are not to be worſhipped: and after this they cried unto Philip the Governor of Aſia, and required him that he would let looſe the Lion to Polycarpus. To whom he made anſwer, that he might not ſo do, becauſe he had already his prey. Then they cried again all together with one voice, that he would burn Polycarpus alive. For it was requiſite that the Viſion, which he ſaw as concerning his Pillow or Bolſter, ſhould be fulfilled: which when he had ſeen burnt, as he was in his prayer, he turned himſelf unto the faithful ſort which were with him, ſaying, by the way of Prophecy, it will ſo come, that I ſhall be burned alive. And the Proconſul had no ſooner ſpoken, but it was out of hand performed. For why? the multitude by and by brought out of their Shops, Workhouſes and Barns, wood and other dry matter for that purpoſe, and eſpecially the Jews were moſt ſerviceable for that matter, after their wonted manner.

Polycarpus refuſeth to do ſacrifice.

Polycarpus comforted by a voice from Heaven.

Polycarpus allured to change his name, and would not conſent.

A faithful ſervant of Chriſt his Lord.

Polycarpus ready to give a reaſon of his doctrine.

Polycarpus obedient to higher powers.

Polycarpus threatned with wild beaſts.

And thus the Pile being laid, and when he had now put off his garments and undone his girdle, and was about to pull off his ſhoos, which he had not done before, for that all the faithful ſort among themſelves ſtrived (as it were) who ſhould firſt touch his body at their farewell, becauſe for the good converſation of his life, even from his younger age, he was had in great eſtimation of all men: Therefore ſtraightway thoſe inſtruments which are requiſite to ſuch a Bone-fire, were brought unto him, and when they would have nailed him to the Stake with Iron Hoops, he ſaid, let me alone as I am, for he that hath given me ſtrength to ſuffer and abide the fire, ſhall alſo give power, that without this your proviſion of Nails, I ſhall abide, and not ſtir in the midſt of this fire or pile of Wood. Which thing when they heard, they did not nail him, but bound him. Therefore when his hands were bound behind him, even as the chiefeſt Ram taken out of the Flock, he was ſacrificed as an acceptable burnt offering to God, ſaying, O Father of thy well-beloved and bleſſed Son Jeſus Chriſt, by whom we have attained the knowledge of thee, the God of Angels and Powers, and of every creature, and of all juſt men which live before

An example of brotherly love.

The willing mind of Polycarpus to ſuffer.

His prayer before his death.

before thee, I give thee thanks that thou hast vouchsafed to grant me this day that I may have my part among the number of the Martyrs in the Cup of Christ, unto the resurrection of eternal life, both of body and soul, through the operation of thy Holy Spirit; among whom I shall this day be received into thy sight for an acceptable sacrifice: and as thou hast prepared and revealed the same before this time, so thou hast accomplished the same, O thou most true God, which canst not lie. Wherefore I in like case for all things praise thee, and bless thee, and glorifie thee by our everlasting Bishop, Jesus Christ, to whom be glory evermore, Amen.

The thanksgiving of Polycarpus.

And as soon as he had ended this word Amen. and finished his prayer, the tormentors began to kindle the fire, and as the flame flushed out vehemently, we, to whom it was given to discern the same, saw a marvellous matter, which were also to this purpose preserved. that we might shew the same to others. For the fire being made like unto a roof or vault of a house, and after the manner of a shipmans sail, filled with wind, compassed about the body of the Martyr, as with a certain Wall, and he, in the middle of the same. not as flesh that burned, but as gold and silver when it is tried in the fire. And surely we smelt a savour so sweet, as if myrrh or some other precious balm had given a sent. At the last, when those wicked persons saw that his body could not be consumed by fire, they commanded one of the tormentors to come unto him, and thrust him through with his sword. Which being done, so great a quantity of blood ran out of his body, that the fire was quenched therewith, and the whole multitude marvelled that there was so much diversity between the infidels and the elect. of whom this Polycarpus was one, being a disciple of the Apostles, and a prophetical instructor of our times, and Bishop of the Catholick Church of Smyrna: for what word soever he spake, both it was and shall be accomplished. But the subtil and envious adversary when he saw the worthiness of his Martyrdom, and that his conversation even from his younger years could not be reproved, and that he was adorned with the Crown of Martyrdom and had now obtained that incomparable benefit. gave in charge that we should not take and divide his body, for fear lest the remnants of the dead corps should be taken away, and so worshipped of the people. Whereupon divers whispered Nicera the father of Herod, and his brother Dalces in the ear, to admonish the Proconsul, that in no case he should deliver his body, lest (saith he) they leave Christ, and begin to worship him. And this spake they, because the Jews had given them secret warning, and provoked them thereunto; who also watched us, that we should not take him out of the fire: not being ignorant how that we meant at no time to forsake Christ, which gave his life for the salvation of the whole world (as many I mean as are elected to salvation by him) neither yet that we could worship any other. For why? him we worship as the Son of God, but the Martyrs do we love as Disciples of the Lord (and that worthily) for their abundant love towards their King and Master, of whom we also desire and wish to be companions, and to be made his Disciples. When therefore the Centurion saw and perceived the labour of the Jews; the corps being laid abroad, they burnt the same, as was their manner to do.

A Miracle shewed.

An example of much cruelty.

The Jews enemies always to the Christians.

Mark that he saith, we love them, and worship them not.

Twelve Martyrs put to death in Smyrna.

Thus good Polycarpus with twelve others that came from Philadelphia suffered Martyrdom at Smyrna; which Polycarpus specially above the rest is had in memory, so that he in all places among the Gentiles is most famous. And this was the end of this worthy Disciple of the Apostles; whose History the brethren of the Congregation of Smyrna have written in this their Epistle, as is above recited.

Ex Irenæo lib.3 cap. 3. Euseb. lib. cap. 14.

Ireneus in his 3d. Book against Heresies, the 3d. Chap. and Eusebius in his 4th. Book and 14th. Chapter of his Ecclesiastical History, reporteth this worthy saying of Polycarpus: This Polycarpus (saith he) meeting at a certain time Marcion the Heretick, who said to him; Dost thou not know me? made answer, I know that thou art the first begotten of Satan. So little fear what evil might ensue thereof, had the Disciples of the Apostles, that they would not speak to them whom they knew to be the deprayers of the verity, even as S. Paul saith, The Heretick after the first and second admonition, shun and avoid, knowing, that he which is such a one, is perverse or froward, and damneth himself. This most holy Confessor and Martyr of Christ. Polycarpus, suffered death in the fourth Persecution after Nero, when Marcus Antoninus, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus reigned, in the year of our Lord 167, as Ursperg affirmeth, in the year 170, as Eusebius witnesseth in his Chronicles, the seventh before the Kalends of February.

{Anno 167.}

Of Germanicus mention is made above in the story of Polycarpus, of whom writeth Eusebius lib.4.cap.15. noting him to be a young man, and most constantly to persevere in the profession of Christs Doctrine: whom when the Proconsul went to perswade to remember his age, and to favour himself being in the flower of his age, he would not be allured; but constantly and boldly. and of his own accord incited and provoked the wild beasts to come upon him. and to devour him, to be delivered more speedily out of this wretched life. Hæc Euseb. an.170.

Germanicus. Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 15. Hist. Eccles.

The old age of Polycarp.

Thus have you heard out of the Epistle of the brethren of Smyrna, the whole order and life of Polycarpus: whereby it may appear that he was a very aged man, who had served Christ eighty six years since the first knowledge of him, and served also in the Ministery about the space of 70 years. This Polycarpus was the Scholar and Hearer of John the Evangelist. and was placed by the said John in Smyrna. Of him also Ignatius maketh mention in his Epistle which he wrote in his journey to Rome, going toward his Martyrdom, and commendeth to him the government of his Church at Antioch, whereby it appeareth that Polycarpus was then in the Ministery. Likewise Ireneus writeth of the said Polycarpus after this manner: He always taught (said he) those things which he learned of the Apostles (leaving them to the Church) and are only true. Whereunto also all the Churches that be in Asia, and all they which succeeded after Polycarpus to this day bear witness. And the same Ireneus witnesseth also that the said Polycarpus wrote an Epistle to the Philippians. which whether it be the same that is now extant and read in the name of Polycarpus, it is doubted of some: notwithstanding in the said Epistle divers things are found very wholesome and Apostolick: as where he teacheth of Christ, of Judgment and of the Resurrection. Also he writeth of faith very worthily, thus declaring. that by Grace we are saved. and not by works, but in the will of God by Jesus Christ.

Polycarpus was the Scholar of John.

Ireneus lib. 3. cap. 1.

The Epistle of Polycarpus to the Philippians.

Justification by faith.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 20. Ireneus conversant with Polycarpus.

In Eusebius we read in like manner a part of an Epistle written by Ireneus to Florinus, wherein is declared. how that the said Ireneus being yet young, was with Polycarpus in Asia; at what time he saw and well remembred what Polycarpus did, and the place where he sate teaching. his whole order of life and proportion of his body, with the sermons and words which he said to the People. And furthermore, he perfectly remembred, how that the said Polycarpus often times reported unto him those things which he learned and heard them speak of the Lord his doings, power and doctrine, who heard the word of life with their own ears, all which were more constant and agreeable to the Holy Scripture. This, with much more, hath Ireneus concerning Polycarpus.

Polycarpus conversant with the Apostles.

Hierome also writing of the same Polycarpus, hath, how he was in great estimation throughout all Asia, for that he was Scholar to the Apostles, and to them which did see, and were conversant with Christ himself: whereby it is to be conjectured, his authority to be much, not only with them of his own Church, but with all other Churches about him.

The authority of Polycarpus in the Churches of Asia.

Polycarpus came to Rome.

Over and besides, it is witnessed by the said Ireneus, that Polycarpus came to Rome in the time of Anicetus Bishop of Rome, about the year of our Lord one hundred fifty and seven in the Reign of Antoninus Pius, whose cause of his coming thither appeareth to be about the controversie of Easter day: wherein the Asians and the Romans something disagreed among themselves. And therefore the said Polycarpus, in the behalf of the brethren and Church of Asia, took his long journey thither, to come and confer with Anicetus. Whereof writeth also Nicephorus lib.4. declaring, that Polycarpus and Anicetus something varied in opinions and judgment about that matter, and that notwithstanding, yet both friendly communicated either with the other, in so much that Anicetus in his Church gave place to Polycarpus to minister the Communion and Sacrament of the Lords Supper for honour sake. Which may be a notable testimony now to us, that the doctrine concerning the free use and liberty of Ceremonies, was at that time retained in the Church without any offence of stomach, or breach of Christian peace in the Church.

Polycarpus conferreth with Anicetus.

The East Church and Roman Church differ about Easter day.

Ex Niceph. l. 4. cap. 39.

Difference of ceremonies caused no breach of charity in the primitive Church.

This Polycarpus (as is above mentioned) suffered his Martyrdom even in his own Church at Smyrna, where he had laboured so many years in planting of the Gospel of Christ.

Chriſt, which was about the year of our Lord, an hundred threeſcore and ten, as Euſebius reckoneth in his Chronicle, and in the ſeventh year of Antoninus Verus his Reign, whereby it appeareth that Socrates in Hiſtoria tripartita was much deceived, ſaying, That Polycarpus ſuffered in the time of Gordianus.

Socrates deceived in his Hiſtoria tripartita.

Ex Euſeb. 4. cap. 17.

In this fourth Perſecution, beſides Polycarpus and others mentioned before, we read alſo in Euſebius of divers others, who at the ſame time likewiſe did ſuffer at Smyrna.

Metrodorus. Pionius.

Over and beſides, in the ſame Perſecution ſuffered moreover Metrodorus a Miniſter, who was given to the fire, and ſo conſumed. Another was worthy Pionius, which after much boldneſs of ſpeech, with his Apologies exhibited, and his Sermons made to the people in the defence of Chriſtian Faith, and after much relieving and comforting of ſuch as were in Priſons, and otherwiſe diſcomforted, at laſt was put to cruel Torments and Affliction, then given likewiſe to the fire, and ſo finiſhed his bleſſed Martyrdom.

Carpus, Papilus, Agathonica, Martyrs.

After theſe alſo ſuffered Carpus, Papilus, and Agathonica, a woman, who after their moſt conſtant and worthy Confeſſions, were put to death at Pergamopolis in Aſia, witneſſing Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 7.

And as theſe ſuffered in Aſia, ſo in Rome ſuffered Felicitas with her ſeven Children, who under this M. Antoninus Verus ſuſtained alſo the cruelty of this Perſecution. The names of whoſe Children Bergomenſis and other Hiſtories do thus recite, Januarius, Felix, Philip, Silvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis. Of whom her firſt and eldeſt Son Januarius, after he was whipped and ſcourged with Rods, was preſt to death with leaden weights. Felix and Philip had their brains beaten out with mawls. Silvanus was caſt down headlong, and had his Neck broken. Furthermore, Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis, were beheaded. Laſt of all, Felicitas the Mother (otherwiſe than the accuſtomed manner was for ſuch as had born Children) was ſlain with the Sword, Ex Supplem.

In the rage of this fourth Perſecution, under the Reign of Antoninus Pius, ſuffered alſo good Juſtinus, a man in Learning and Philoſophy excellent, and a great Defender of Chriſtian Religion, who firſt exhibited unto the Emperor, and to the Senate, a Book or Apology in the defence of the Chriſtians, and afterward himſelf alſo died a Martyr. Of whom in the Hiſtory of Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 16. it is thus recorded, that about what time, or a little before that Polycarpus with divers other Saints ſuffered Martyrdom in Pergamopolis a City of Aſia, this Juſtinus (as is aforeſaid) preſented a Book in defence of our Doctrine to the Emperor, to wit, unto Antoninus, and to the Senate. After which he was alſo crowned with like Martyrdom unto thoſe, whom he in his Book had defended, through the malicious means and crafty circumvention of Creſcens.

Juſtinus Martyr. Ex Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 16.

Creſcens a Philoſopher procurer of the death of Juſtinus.

This Creſcens was a Philoſopher, conforming his life and manners to the Cynical Sect, whom becauſe this Juſtinus had reproved in open audience, and had born away the victory of the truth which he defended; he therefore, as much as in him lay, did work and procure unto him this Crown of Martyrdom. And this did alſo Juſtin himſelf a Philoſopher, no leſs famous by his Profeſſion, foreſee and declare in his foreſaid Apology, telling almoſt all thoſe things beforehand which ſhould happen unto him, by theſe words, ſaying, And I look after this good turn, that I be ſlain going by the way, either of ſome of thoſe whom I have named, and to have my brains beaten out with a Bat, or elſe of Creſcens, whom I cannot call a Philoſopher, but rather a vain Boaſter. For it is not convenient to call him a Philoſopher, which openly profeſſeth things to him unknown, and whereof he hath no skill, ſaying and reporting of us, that the Chriſtians be ungodly and irreligious, and all to pleaſe and flatter them which are ſeduced by Error.

Creſcens a railing Philoſopher, and a malicious railer.

For whether he objecteth againſt us the Doctrine of the Chriſtians which he hath not read, yet is he very malicious, and worſe than the unlearned Idiots, who for the moſt part uſe not to diſpute, or judge of things they know not, and to bear witneſs of the ſame. Or put the caſe that he had read it, yet underſtandeth he not the majeſty of the matters therein contained: or, if peradventure he underſtandeth them, and doth it for this purpoſe, that he would not be counted as one of them; then is he ſo much the more wicked and malicious, and the bondſlave of vile and beaſtly both fame and fear. For this I teſtifie of him, giving you truly to underſtand, that for a truth, which I declare unto you, how that I have appoſed him, and have put unto him many queſtions, whereby I know and perceive, that he underſtandeth nothing. But if ſo be that this our Diſputation with him hath not come unto your ears, I am ready to communicate unto you again thoſe queſtions which I demanded of him, which things ſhall not be unfit for your Princely honour to hear. But if ye know and underſtand both what things I have examined him of, as alſo what anſwer he hath made, it ſhall be apparent unto you, that he is altogether ignorant of our Doctrine and Learning; or elſe if he knoweth the ſame, he dare not utter it for fear of his Auditors; which thing, as I ſaid before, is a proof that he is no Philoſopher, but a ſlave to vain glory, which maketh none account of that, which his own Maſter Socrates had in ſo great eſtimation. And thus much of Juſtine, out of Juſtine himſelf.

Creſcens proved an unlearned Philoſopher.

Now, to verifie that which Juſtine here of himſelf doth Propheſie, That Creſcens would and did procure his death: Tacianus (a man brought up of a Child in the Inſtitutions of the Gentiles, and obtained in the ſame not a little fame, and which alſo left behind him many good Monuments and Commentaries) writeth in his Book againſt the Gentiles in this ſort, And Juſtine (ſaith he) that moſt excellent learned man, full well ſpake and uttered his mind, that the afore recited men were like unto Thieves or Liers by the High-way ſide. And in the ſaid Book ſpeaking afterward of certain Philoſophers, the ſaid Tacianus inferreth thus, Creſcens therefore (ſaith he) when he came firſt into that great City, paſſed all others in the vicious love of Children, and was very much given to covetouſneſs; and where he taught that men ought not to regard death, he himſelf doth fear death, and he did all his endeavour to oppreſs Juſtine with death, as with the moſt greateſt evil that was, and all becauſe that Juſtine, ſpeaking truth, reproved the Philoſophers to be men only for the Belly, and deceivers: and this was the cauſe of Juſtines Martyrdom. Hieronie in his Eccleſiaſtical Catalogue thus writeth, Juſtine, when in the City of Rome he had his Diſputations, and had reproved Creſcens the Cynick for a great Blaſphemer of the Chriſtians, for a Belly-god, and a man fearing death, and alſo a follower of luſt and lechery; at laſt by his endeavour and Conſpiracy was accuſed to be a Chriſtian, and for Chriſt ſhed his blood in the year of our Lord one hundred fifty and four, under Marcus Antoninus, as the Chronicles do witneſs; Abbas Urſpergenſis, and Euſebius in his Chronicle, in the thirteenth year of the Emperor Antoninus.

Among theſe above recited, is alſo to be numbred Praxedis, a bleſſed Virgin, the Daughter of a Citizen of Rome, who in the time of Anicetus there Biſhop, was ſo brought up in the Doctrine of Chriſt, and ſo affected to his Religion, that ſhe, with her ſiſter Potentiana, beſtowed all her Patrimony upon the relieving of poor Chriſtians, giving all her time to faſting and prayer, and to the burying of the bodies of the Martys. And after ſhe had made free all her Family with her Servants after the death of her ſiſter, ſhe alſo departed, and was buried in peace.

Praxedis, Patricia and Chriſtian Virgins.

Under the ſame Antoninus alſo ſuffered Ptolomeus and Lucius for the Confeſſion of Chriſt, in a City of Egypt, called Alexandrina, whoſe Hiſtory, becauſe it is deſcribed in the Apology of Juſtinus Martyr, I thought therefore ſo to ſet forth the ſame, as it is alledged in Euſebius, declaring the manner and occaſion thereof, Lib. 4. cap. 17. in words and effect as followeth, &c.

Ptolomeus Lucius, Martyrs. Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

There was (ſaith he) a certain Woman married unto a Husband, who was given much to laſciviouſneſs, whereunto ſhe her ſelf in times paſt was alſo addicted. But ſhe afterward being inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion, became chaſt her ſelf, and alſo perſwaded her Husband to live chaſtly; oftentimes telling him, that it was written in the Precepts of the Chriſtians, that they ſhould be puniſhed eternally which lived not chaſtly and juſtly in this life. But he ſtill continuing in his filthineſs, thereby cauſed his Wife to eſtrange her ſelf from his company. For why? the Woman thought it not convenient to continue in her Husbands company, which contemning the law of Nature, ſought otherwiſe to ſatisfie his filthy appetite. Therefore ſhe was purpoſed to be divorced from him. But her

A ſlave of fame and fear.

Neighbours and Kinſfolk provoked her, by promiſing his amendment, to keep company again with him, and ſo ſhe did. But he after this took his Journey into Alexandria, and when it was ſhewed her, that there he lived more licentiouſly than at any time before, for that ſhe would not be counted partaker of his inceſtuous life, by coupling her ſelf any longer with him, ſhe gave him a Letter of Divorce, and ſo departed from him. Then her Husband, who ought rather to have rejoyced to have ſo honeſt and chaſt a Wife, which not only would not commit any diſhoneſt thing her ſelf, but alſo could not abide any lewd or miſordered behaviour in her Husband, and that by this her ſeparation ſhe went about to reclaim him from his inceſt and wickedneſs to better amendment of life: he, in recompence to his Wife again, accuſed her to be a Chriſtian, which at that time was no leſs than death. Whereupon ſhe, being in great peril and danger, delivered up unto the Emperor (as Juſtinus in his Apology writing to the Emperor himſelf declareth) a ſupplication, deſiring and craving of his Majeſty, firſt, to grant her ſo much licence as to ſet her Family in order, and that done, afterward to come again and make anſwer to all that might or ſhould be laid againſt her: whereunto the Emperor condeſcended. Then her Husband ſeeing that he could have no advantage againſt her, deviſed with himſelf, how he might bring Ptolomeus (which was her Inſtructor in the Faith of Chriſt) in trouble and accuſation: uſing the means of a certain Centurion, who was his very friend, whom he perſwaded to examine Ptolomeus, whether he were a Chriſtian or not. Ptolomeus (as one that loved the truth, and not thinking good to hide his Profeſſion) confeſſed no leſs then to the Examiner, openly declaring that he had (as truth was) taught and profeſſed the verity of Chriſtian Doctrine. For who ſo denieth himſelf to be that he is, either condemneth in denying the thing that he is, or maketh himſelf unworthy of that, the Confeſſion whereof he flyeth, which thing is never found in a true and ſincere Chriſtian. Thus then he being brought before Urbicius the Judge, and by him condemned to ſuffer: one Lucius being alſo a Chriſtian, ſtanding by, and ſeeing the wrong Judgment, and hatty Sentence of the Judge, ſaid to Urbicius, What reaſon I pray you or equity is this, that this man who neither is Adulterer, nor Fornicator, nor Homicide, nor Felon; neither hath committed any ſuch Crime, wherewith he may be charged, is thus condemned only for his Name and Confeſſion of a Chriſtian? This Condemnation, and this manner of Judgments (O Urbicius) are neither ſeemly for the vertuous Emperor, nor to the Philoſopher his Son, nor yet for the Eſtate of his Senate of Rome.

The boldneſs and chriſtian conſtancy of Lucius.

Which words being heard, Urbicius making no further Examination of the matter, ſaid unto Lucius, Me thinketh thou art alſo a Chriſtian. And when Lucius had given him to underſtand that he was alſo a Chriſtian, the Judge without further delay, commanded him to be had away to the place of Execution. To whom he anſwered, I thank you with all my heart, that you releaſe me from moſt wicked Governors, and ſend me unto my good and moſt loving Father, being alſo the King of all Gods. And in like manner the third man alſo, coming unto him, and uſing the like liberty of Speech, had alſo the like ſentence of Death and Condemnation, and was crowned alſo with the ſame Crown of Martyrdom. And thus much out of the Apology of Juſtinus, by the which ſtory it may appear not to be true that Gratianus attributeth unto Higinus, Biſhop of Rome, the deciding of Cauſes Matrimonial, ſeeing that in Juſtinus time (who was in the ſame age of Higinus) the divorcement of this Woman in this Hiſtory above touched, was not decided by any Eccleſiaſtical Law, or brought before any Biſhop, but was brought before an Heathen Prince, and determined by the Law Civil.

Henricus de Erfordia recordeth out of the Martyrology of Iſuardus, of one Concordus a Miniſter of the City of Spolet, who in the Reign of this Antoninus Verus, becauſe he would not Sacrifice unto Jupiter, but did ſpit in the face of the Idol, after divers and ſundry Puniſhments ſuſtained, at laſt with the Sword was beheaded. Vincentius in his tenth Book, Chap. 108. reciteth a long ſtory of his Acts and Life, whereof ſome part perhaps may ſeem tolerable. But this verily appeareth to be falſe and fabulous, concerning the water flowing beſides his Sepulchre in the forenamed City of Spolet, unto the which water was given (ſaith Vincentius) by the vertue of him, for whoſe Name he ſuffered, to reſtore ſight to the blind, to heal the ſick, and to caſt out Devils, &c. Which kind of vertue to open the eyes of the blind, and to expel Devils, neither doth God give to any Creature of water, neither is it like that Concordus the bleſſed Martyr did or would require any ſuch thing at the hands of God.

Iſuardus and Bede, Vincentius and Henricus de Erfordia, with other Authors more, make relation of divers other Martyrs that by ſundry kinds of Torments were put to death, under the aforeſaid Antoninus Verus: the names of whom be Symmetrius, Florellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipodus, Victor, Corona, Marcellus, Valerianus. The cauſe of whoſe Martyrdom was the reprehending of Idolatry, and becauſe at the Emperors Commandment they would not ſacrifice to Idols. Many ſorts of Puniſhments and Miracles are told of them: but at length the end of them all is this, that they were beheaded. Whereby it may be the more ſuſpected, the Hiſtories of theſe Writers not to be certain or true, as well touching theſe as alſo other Martyrs, as may appear in Vincentius, in Petrus de Natalibus, and other Authors of like ſort. A little before, mention was made of Symphoriſſa, otherwiſe named Symphoroſa, Wife of Getulus, with her ſeven Sons. This Getulus or Getulius was a Miniſter or Teacher (as witneſſeth Martyrol. Adonis) in the City of Tiber, which Getulus, with Cerealis, Amantius, and Primitivus, by the Commandment of Adrian were condemned to the fire, wherein they were martyred and put to death. The names moveover of the ſeven Sons of this Symphoroſa, I find to be Creſcens, Julianus, Nemeſius, Primitivus, Juſtinus, Statteus, and Eugenius, whom the Chronicle of Ado declareth to be put to death at the Commandment of Adrian, being faſtened to ſeven Stakes, and ſo racked up with a pully, and at laſt were thruſt thorow, Creſcens in the Neck, Julianus in the Breaſt, Nemeſius in the Heart, Primitivus about the Navil, Juſtinus cut in every joynt of his body, Statteus run thorow with Spears, Eugenius cut aſunder from the Breaſt to the lower parts, and then caſt into a deep Pit, having the name by the Idolatrous Prieſts, entituled, Ad ſeptem Biothanatos. After the Martyrdom of whom alſo Symphoroſa the Mother did likewiſe ſuffer, as is before declared.

Under the ſaid Antoninus Verus, and in the ſame Perſecution, which raged not in Rome and Aſia only, but in other Countries alſo, ſuffered the glorious and moſt conſtant Martyrs of Lions and Vienna, two Cities in France, giving to Chriſt a glorious Teſtimony, and to all Chriſtian men a Spectacle or Example of ſingular Conſtancy and Fortitude in Chriſt our Saviour. The Hiſtory of whom, becauſe it is written and ſet forth by their own Churches, where they did ſuffer, mentioned in Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 2. I thought here to expreſs the ſame in the form and effect of their own words, as there is to be ſeen. The title of which their Epiſtle written to the Brethren of Aſia and Phrygia thus beginneth.

A Letter of the brethren of France to the brethren of Aſia.

THe greatneſs of this our Tribulation, the furious rage of the Gentiles againſt us, and the torments which the bleſſed Martyrs ſuffered, neither can we in words, nor yet in writing exactly, as they deſerve, ſet forth. For the Adverſary with all his force, gave his endeavour to the working of ſuch Preparatives, as he himſelf liſted, againſt his tyrannous coming, and in every place practiſed he and inſtructed his Miniſters, how in moſt ſpiteful manner to ſet them againſt the Servants of God: ſo that not only in our Houſes, Shops and Markets, we were reſtrained, but alſo were univerſally commanded, that none (ſo hardly) ſhould be ſeen in any place. But God hath always mercy in ſtore, and took out of their hands ſuch as were weak amongſt them, and other ſome did he ſet up as firm and immoveable Pillars, which by ſufferance were able to abide all violent force, and valiantly to withſtand the Enemy, enduring all their opprobrious puniſhment they could deviſe: to conclude, they fought this battel for that intent to come unto Chriſt, eſteeming their great troubles but as light: thereby ſhewing that all that may be ſuffered in this preſent life, is not able to countervail the great Glory which ſhall be ſhewed upon us after this life. And firſt they patiently ſuffered whatſoever the multitude of frantick people running upon head did unto them, as Railings, Scourgings, Drawings and Halings, flinging of Stones, Impriſonings, and what other thing ſoever the rage of the multitude is wont to uſe and practiſe againſt their profeſſed Enemies. Then afterward they being led into the Market-place, and there judged of the Captain and reſt of the Potentates of the City, after their confeſſion made openly before the multitude, were commanded again to priſon, until the return of their chief Governor. After this they being brought before him, and he uſing all extremity that poſſibly he might againſt them: One Vetius Epagathus, one of the Brethren, repleniſhed with fervent Zeal, both towards God and his Brethren, (whoſe Converſation, although he were a young man,) was counted as perfect as was the life of Zachary the Prieſt. For he walked diligently in all the Commandments and Juſtifications of the Lord, and in all Obedience towards his Brethren, blameleſs. He having within him the fervent zeal of Love, and Spirit of God, could not ſuffer that wicked Judgment which was given upon the Chriſtians; but being vehemently diſpleaſed, deſired that the Judge would hear the excuſe which he was minded to make in the behalf of the Chriſtians, in whom (ſaith he) is no impiety found. But the people cried again to thoſe that were aſſiſtants with the chief Juſtice, that it might not be ſo (for indeed, he was a Nobleman born) neither did the Juſtice grant him his lawful requeſt, but only asked him, Whether he himſelf was a Chriſtian or not? And he immediately with a loud and bold voice anſwered and ſaid, I am a Chriſtian. And thus was he received into the Fellowſhip of the Martyrs, and called the Advocate of the Chriſtians. And he having the Spirit of God more plentifully in time, than had Zachary, the abundance thereof he declared, in that he gave his life in the defence of his Brethren, being a true Diſciple of Chriſt, following the Lamb whereſoever he goeth.

The ſtoutneſs of a godly young man.

By this mans example, the reſt of the Martyrs were the more animated to Martyrdom, and made more joyous with all courage of mind to accompliſh the ſame. Some other there were unready and not ſo well prepared, and as yet weak, not well able to bear the vehemency of ſo great a conflict; of whom ten there were in number that fainted, miniſtring to us much heavineſs and lamentation. Who by their example cauſed the reſt, which were not yet apprehended, to be leſs willing thereunto. Then were we all for the variableneſs of confeſſion not a little aſtonied: not that we feared the puniſhment intended againſt us, but rather as having reſpect to the end, and fearing leſt any ſhould fall. Every day there were apprehended ſuch as were worthy to fulfil the number of them which were fallen: in ſo much that of two Churches, ſuch as were chiefeſt, and which were the principal Governors of our Churches, were apprehended. With theſe alſo certain of the Ethnicks, being our Men-ſervants, were apprehended (for ſo the Governor commanded, that all of us in general without any reſpect ſhould be taken) which Servants be overcome by Satan, and fearing the Torments which they ſaw the Saints to ſuffer, being alſo compelled thereunto by the means of the Souldiers, ſained againſt us that we kept the Feaſtings of Thieſtes, and Inceſt of Oedipus, and many ſuch other Crimes, which are neither to be remembred, nor named of us, nor yet to be thought that ever any man would commit the like.

The fainting of certain weak Chriſtians.

Falſe ſlanders againſt the Chriſtians.

The rage of the Heathen againſt the Chriſtians

Theſe things being now bruted abroad, every man began to ſhew cruelty againſt us, inſomuch that thoſe which before for familiarity-ſake were more gentle towards us, now vehemently diſdained us, and waxed mad againſt us. And thus was now fulfilled that which was ſpoken by Chriſt, ſaying, The time will come, that whoſoever killeth you, ſhall think that he doth God great good ſervice. Then ſuffered the Martyrs of God ſuch bitter Perſecution as is paſſing to be told: Satan ſtill ſhooting at this mark, to make them to utter ſome blaſphemy by all means poſſible. Marvelous therefore was the rage both of the people and Prince, eſpecially againſt one Sanctus, which was Deacon of the Congregation of Vienna, and againſt Maturus, being but a little before baptized, but yet a worthy Souldier of Chriſt, and alſo againſt Attalus, being born in Pergama, which was the Foundation and Pillar of that Congregation, and alſo againſt Blandina: by whom Chriſt ſheweth thoſe things, which the World eſteemed vile and abject, to be glorious in Gods ſight, for the very love which in heart and deed they bare unto him, not in outward face only. For when all we were afraid, and ſpecially her Miſtreſs in the fleſh, who alſo was her ſelf one of the number of the aforeſaid Martyrs, leſt haply for the weakneſs of body ſhe would not ſtand ſtrongly to her Confeſſion, the foreſaid Blandina was ſo repleniſhed with ſtrength and boldneſs, that they which had the tormenting of her by courſe, from morning to night, for very wearineſs gave over, and fell down, and were themſelves overcome, confeſſing that they could do no more againſt her, and marveled that yet ſhe lived, having her body ſo torn and rent: and teſtified that any one of thoſe torments alone, without any more, had been enough to have pluckt the life from her body. But that bleſſed Woman, fighting this worthy battel, became ſtronger and ſtronger, and as often as ſhe ſpake theſe words (I am a Chriſtian, neither have we committed any evil) it was to her a marvelous comfort & boldning to abide the torments.

The cruel handling and great patience of Blandina.

Sanctus alſo, another of the Martyrs, who in the midſt of his torments endured more pains than the nature of a man might away with, at what time the wicked ſuppoſed to have heard him utter ſome blaſphemous words, for the greatneſs and intolerableneſs of his torments and pains that he was in, abode notwithſtanding in ſuch conſtancy of mind, that neither he told them his name, nor what Country-man he was, nor in what City brought up, neither whether he was a Free-man or a Servant: but unto every queſtion that was asked him, he anſwered in the Latin Tongue, I am a Chriſtian, and this was all that he confeſſed both of his Name, City, Kindred, and all other things in the place of Execution: neither yet could the Gentiles get any more of him: whereupon both the Governor and Tormentors were the more vehemently bent againſt him. And when they had nothing to vex him withall, they clapped plates of braſs red hot to the moſt tendreſt parts of his body, wherewith his body indeed being ſcorched, yet he never ſhrunk for the matter, but was bold and conſtant in his Confeſſion, being ſtrengthened and moiſtened with the Fountain of lively water, flowing out of Chriſts ſide. Truly his body was a ſufficient witneſs what torments he ſuffered: for it was all drawn together and moſt pitifully wounded and ſcorched, ſo that it had therewith loſt the proper ſhape of a man, in whoſe ſuffering Chriſt obtained unſpeakable Glory, for that he overcame his Adverſaries, and, to the inſtruction of others, declared that nothing elſe is terrible, or ought to be feared where the love of God is, and nothing grievous wherein the Glory of Chriſt is manifeſted.

Sanctus a Martyr.

The notable conſtancy of Sanctus.

The cruel torments of Sanctus.

And when thoſe wicked men began after a certain time again to torment the Martyr, and hoped well to bring it to paſs, that either they ſhould overcome him in cauſing him to recant, by reiterating his torments, now when his body was ſo ſore and ſwollen, that he might not ſuffer a man to touch him with his hand, or elſe, that he died under their hands, yet that thereby they ſhould ſtrike ſuch fear into the hearts of the reſt, as to cauſe them to deny Chriſt: they were not only diſappointed herein, but alſo contrary to the expectation of men, his body was in the later puniſhment and torments ſuppled and reſtored, and took the firſt ſhape and uſe of the members of the ſame, ſo that the ſame his ſecond torment was by the Grace of Chriſt (inſtead of puniſhment) a ſafe Medicine.

A miraculous working of God.

Alſo Satan now thinking to have ſetled himſelf in the heart of one Biblides, being one of them which had denied Chriſt, and thinking to have cauſed her, being a weak and feeble woman in Faith, to have damned her Soul, in blaſpheming the Name of God, brought her to the place of Execution: enforcing to wreſt ſome wicked thing out of the mouth of the Chriſtians. But ſhe in the middle of her torments, returning to her ſelf, and waked as it were out of her dead ſleep by that temporal pain, called to her remembrance the pains of Hell fire, and againſt all mens expectations reviled the Tormentors, ſaying, How ſhould we Chriſtians eat young Infants (as ye reported of us) for whom it is not lawful to eat the blood of any Beaſt?

Biblides an holy Martyr.

Upon that, ſo ſoon as ſhe had confeſſed her ſelf to be a Chriſtian, ſhe was martyred with the reſt. Thus when Chriſt had ended thoſe tyrannical Torments, by the patience and ſufferance of our Saints, the Devil yet invented other Engins and Inſtruments. For when the Chriſtians were caſt into priſon, they were ſhut up in dark and ugly dungeons, and were drawn by the feet in a Rack or Engine made for that purpoſe, even unto the fifth hole. And many other ſuch puniſhments ſuffered they, which the furious Miniſters, ſtirred up with deviliſh fury, are wont to put men unto: ſo that very many of them were ſtrangled and killed in priſons, whom the Lord in this manner would have to enjoy everlaſting life, and ſet forth his Glory. And ſurely theſe good men were ſo pitifully tormented, that if they had had all the helps and medicines in the world, it was thought impoſſible for them to live, and to be reſtored. And thus they remaining in priſon, deſtitute of all humane help, were ſo ſtrengthened of the Lord, and both in body and mind confirmed that they comforted and ſtirred up the minds of the reſt: the younger ſort of them, which were later apprehended, and put in priſon, whoſe bodies had not yet felt the laſh of the Whip, were not able to endure the ſharpneſs of their impriſonment, but died for the ſame.

Eculei. ad quintum foramen.

Divers Martyrs ſtrangled in priſon.

Other Martyrs died in priſon.

The bleſſed Photinus, who was Deacon to the Biſhop of Lions, about fourſcore and nine years old, and a very feeble or weak man, and could ſcarcely draw breath for the imbecillity of his body: yet was he of a lively courage and ſpirit, and for the great deſire he had of Martyrdom, when he was brought unto the Judgment-Seat, although his body was feeble and weak, both becauſe of his old age, and alſo through ſickneſs, yet was his Soul or life preſerved to this purpoſe, that by the ſame Chriſt might triumph and be glorified. He, being by the Souldiers brought to the place of Judgment, many Citizens and men of great ability following him, and the whole multitude crying upon him diverſly, as though he had been Chriſt himſelf, gave a good teſtimony. For being demanded of the chief Ruler, what was the Chriſtian mans God? He anſwered, If thou be worthy to know thou ſhalt know. He, being with theſe words ſomewhat near touched, cauſed him to be very ſore beaten. For thoſe that ſtood next him, did him all the ſpite and diſpleaſure that they could both with hand and foot, having no regard at all to his old age or white hairs. And they which were further off, whatſoever came next to hand, they threw at him, and every man thought that he did very wickedly refrain, that withheld his hand from doing the like. For by this means they thought that they did revenge the quarrel of their gods. Photinus now, even as it were gaſping after life, was thrown into priſon, and within two days after died.

Photinus a bleſſed Martyr.

The rage of the people againſt Photinus.

And here is the mighty Providence of God, and the unſpeakable mercy of Jeſus Chriſt declared, which providence, being aſſured amongſt a fraternity, is never deſtitute of the aid of Jeſus Chriſt. For thoſe which in their firſt Perſecution denied Chriſt, they alſo were put in priſon, and made partakers of the others affliction. Neither yet did it any whit at all at that time help them that had denied Chriſt, but they which confeſſed him were impriſoned as Chriſtians, neither was there any other Crime objected againſt them; but the other ſort taken like Homicides and wicked Doers, were laid hand on, and had double more puniſhment than the others had. Theſe men were refreſhed with the joy of Martyrdom, the hope of Gods Promiſes, the love towards Chriſt, and the Spirit of God: the others, their Conciences accuſed them, and that very ſore, inſomuch that by their gate, their Countenances bewraied unto the reſt their guilty Conſciences. For the Chriſtians went forth having chearful Countenances, very much adorned with Glory and Grace, inſomuch that the very Bonds wherewith they were tied, ſet them out as men in ſeemly Apparel, and like as Brides when they be decked in gorgeous and gay Garments, and therewithal ſavoured as of the redolent ſmell of Chriſt, ſo that it might be ſuppoſed them to be anointed with ſome ſweet Balm: whereas the others were doubtful and ſad, abject, ill favoured, filled with all ſhame, and furthermore reviled of the Gentiles themſelves, as wretches degenerate having the Crime of Homicide, and deſtitute of the moſt precious, glorious, and lively Calling of the Chriſtian name. And truly by theſe ſights the reſt were confirmed, and being apprehended, confeſſed Chriſt without any ſtaggering, not having ſo much as the thought of any ſuch deviliſh mind of denial. And in the ſame Epiſtle of the foreſaid Brethren of France, writing to the Brethren of Aſia, it followeth in this manner: After theſe things done, the Martyrdom of theſe holy Saints was divided diverſly into divers kinds and forms, as the offering to God the Father a Garland decked with divers and ſundry kinds of colours and flowers. For it ſo behoved the worthy Champions of God, after they had ſuffered divers kinds of torments, and ſo won a triumphant Victory, to obtain great reward of Immortality.

The comfort of the godly ſtanding to their Confeſſion. The deniers of their confeſſion comfortleſs, and notwithſtanding puniſhed.

Then Maturus, Blandina, and Attalus were brought together to the common Scaffold, there in the face of the people to be caſt and devoured of the Beaſts. And Maturus, with Sanctus, being brought the ſecond time to the Scaffold, ſuffered again all kind of torments, as though hitherto they had ſuffered nothing at all: yea rather the Adverſary being oftentimes put to the worſt, they as ſtriving for the Crown, ſuffered again more ſcourgings, the tearing of wild Beaſts, and what thing elſe ſoever the frantick people on every ſide cryed for and willed. And above all the reſt they brought an Iron Chair, in the which their bodies being ſet, were ſo fried and ſcorched, as on a Grid-Iron fried on the coals, and filled with the ſavour of the frying all the people that ſtood by. And yet for all that the torments ceaſed not, but waxed more fierce and mad againſt them, labouring to overcome the patience of the Saints. Notwithſtanding all this, they could not get out of Sanctus mouth any other thing but the confeſſion which at the beginning he declared. And thus theſe holy men, after they had long continued alive in this their moſt horrible conflict, at the length were ſlain, being made all that whole day a ſpectacle unto the world, in place and in ſtead of the games and ſights which were wont to be exhibited to the people. And thus much concerning Maturus and Sanctus.

The ſpiteful handling of Gods people.

Maturus and Sanctus martyred.

Now concerning Blandina, ſhe being faſtned upon ſtake, was caſt to the ravening Beaſts to be devoured; which thing was not done without the determinate will of God: to this end, that while ſhe ſeemed to hang as it were upon a Croſs, by the ferventneſs of her prayer ſhe might comfort the reſt of the Saints, as beholding their Chriſt with their bodily eyes, which in that Agony ſuffered for them all; and that all which believe in him, and ſuffer for the Glory of Chriſt, might be aſſured to live with him for ever. And when they ſaw that no Beaſt would come near her thus hanging, they took her down from the Tree, and caſt her again into priſon till another time, that ſhe, having the victory of many battels, might triumph over that ugly Serpent the Devil, and that ſhe being a weak and ſilly woman, and not regarded, armed with Chriſt the invincible Conqueror, might incourage her Brethren, and by the enduring of this battel might win a Crown of Incorruptible Glory.

Blandina brought forth again.

Now to Attalus; who, being alſo required and called for of the people to puniſhment already prepared (for his Conſcience ſake) cometh forth to the ſight. For he being worthily exerciſed in the Chriſtian Profeſſion, was always a witneſs and a maintainer of our Doctrine. Therefore when the preſs of people was about the Scaffold, and the table carried before him, wherein was written in the Roman Tongue, This is Attalus the Chriſtian: then the people were in a marvellous rage againſt him. But the Governor, underſtanding that he was a Roman, commanded him again to priſon, with the reſt of his Priſon-Fellows: whereof he wrote to the Emperor, and waited for anſwer what his pleaſure herein was. The Priſoners were not idle in the mean ſeaſon, nor unprofitable to their Brethren, but by their patience the unſpeakable mercy of Chriſt ſhined out. For thoſe which were dead before were now revived by them that lived, and they which were Martyrs profited them which were none, and the Church did much rejoyce, as receiving them again alive, whom ſhe had loſt before as dead. For many of them, which before had denied, now by their denial were reſtored and ſtirred up, and learned to be Confeſſors. And now being revived and ſtrengthened, and taſting the ſweetneſs of him which deſireth not the death of a Sinner, but is merciful to the Penitent, came of their own accord to the Judgment-Seat again, that they might be examined of the Judge. And for that the Emperor had written back again to him, that all the Confeſſors ſhould be puniſhed, and the others let go, and that Seſſions or Sizes were now begun, which, for the multitude that had repair thither out of every quarter, was marvelous great: he cauſed all the the holy Martyrs to be brought

brought thither, that the multitude might behold them, and once again examined them; and as many of them as he thought had the Roman freedom he beheaded, the reſidue he gave to the Beaſts to be devoured. And truly Chriſt was much glorified by thoſe which a little before had denied him, which again, contrary to the expectation of the Infidels, confeſſed him even unto the death. For they were examined apart from the reſt, becauſe of their delivery; which being found confeſſors, were joyned to the company of the Martyrs, and had with them their part. But there were then ſome abroad which had no Faith at all, neither yet ſo much as the feeling of the Wedding Garment, nor any cogitation at all of the fear of God, but blaſphemed his ways by the lewd converſation of their life, even ſuch as were the Children of damnation. All the reſidue joyned themſelves to the Congregation: which when they were examined, one Alexander a Phrygian born, and a Phyſitian which had dwelt long in France, and known almoſt of all, for the love he had to God, and boldneſs of ſpeaking (neither was he void of the Apoſtolical love) one Alexander, I ſay, ſtanding ſomewhat near to the Bar, by ſigns and becks perſwaded ſuch as were examined, to confeſs Chriſt: ſo that by his countenance ſometime rejoycing, ſome other while ſorrowing, he was deſcried of the ſtanders by. The people not taking in good part to ſee thoſe which now recanted by and by again to ſtick to their firſt Confeſſion, they cried out againſt Alexander as one that was the cauſe of all this matter. And when he was inforced by the Judge, and demanded what Religion he was of? he anſwered, I am a Chriſtian. He had no ſooner ſpoken the word, but he was judged to the Beaſts of them to be devoured.

Alexander the Phrygian martyred.

The next day following, Attalus, of whom I made mention a little before, and Alexander, were brought forth together. For the Governor granting Attalus unto the people, he was baited again of the Beaſts. When theſe men were brought to the Scaffold, and had taken a taſte of all the Inſtruments that there were prepared for their Execution, and had ſuffered the greateſt Agony they could put them to, they were alſo at the length ſlain: of whom Alexander never gave ſo much as a ſigh, nor held his peace, but from the bottom of his heart praiſed and prayed to the Lord. But Attalus, when he was ſet in the Iron Chair, and began to fry, and the frying ſavour of his burning body began to ſmell, he ſpake to the multitude in the Roman Language; Behold (ſaith he) this which you do is to eat mans fleſh; for we neither eat men, nor yet commit any other wickedneſs. And being demanded what was the name of their God? Our God (ſaith he) hath no ſuch name as men have. Then ſaid they, Now let us ſee whether your God can help you, and take you out of our hands or not.

The worthy patience and conſtancy of Attalus.

After this being the laſt day of the Spectacle, Blandina again, and one Ponticus, a Child of fifteen years old was brought forth, and this was every day, to the intent that they ſeeing the puniſhment of their Fellows might be compelled thereby to ſwear by their Idols. But becauſe they conſtantly abode in their purpoſe, and defied their Idols, the whole multitude was in a rage with them, neither ſparing the age of the Child, nor favouring the Sex of the woman, but put them to all the puniſhment and pain they could deviſe, and often times inforced them to ſwear, and yet were not able to compel them thereunto. For Ponticus, being ſo animated of his ſiſter as the Ethnicks ſtanding by did ſee, after that he had ſuffered all torments and pains gave up the ghoſt. This bleſſed Blandina therefore being the laſt that ſuffered, after ſhe had like a worthy Mother given exhortations unto her Children, and had ſent them before as Conquerors to their heavenly King, and had called to her remembrance all their battels and conflicts, ſo much rejoyced of her Childrens death, and ſo haſtned her own, as though ſhe had been bidden to a Bridal, and not in caſe to be thrown to the wild Beaſts. After this her pitiful whipping, her delivery to the Beaſts, and her torments upon the Grid-Iron, at the length ſhe was put in a Net, and thrown to the wild Bull; and when ſhe had been ſufficiently gored and wounded with the horns of the ſame Beaſt, and felt nothing of all that chanced to her, for the great hope and conſolation ſhe had in Chriſt and heavenly things, was thus ſlain, inſomuch that the very Heathen men themſelves confeſſed that there was never a woman put to death of them that ſuffered ſo much as this woman did. Neither yet was their furious cruelty thus aſſwaged againſt the Chriſtians.

For the cruel barbarous people, like wild Beaſts, when they be moved, knew not when the time was to make an end, but invented new and ſundry torments every day againſt our bodies. Neither yet did it content them when they had put the Chriſtians to death, for that they wanted the ſenſe of men: for which cauſe both the Magiſtrate and people were vexed at the very hearts, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which ſaith, He that is wicked, let him be wicked ſtill: and he that is juſt, let him be more juſt. For thoſe which in their Priſons they ſtrangled, they threw after to the dogs, ſetting keepers both day and night to watch them, that they ſhould not be buried, and bringing forth the remnant of their bones and bodies, ſome half burned, ſome left of the wild Beaſts, and ſome all to be mangled, alſo bringing forth heads of others which were cut off, and in like manner commitied by them to the charge of the keepers to ſee them remain unburied. Apoc. 20.

The Gentiles grinded and gnaſhed at the Chriſtians with their teeth, ſeeking which way they might amplifie their puniſhment: ſome other flouted and mocked them, extolling their Idols, attributing unto them the cauſe of this cruelty and vengeance ſhewed to us. Such as were of the meeker ſort, and ſeemed to be moved with ſome pity, did hit us in the teeth, ſaying, Where is your God that you ſo much boaſt of? and what helpeth this your Religion for which you give your lives? Theſe were the ſundry paſſions and affects of the Gentiles, but the Chriſtians in the mean while were in great heavineſs, that they might not bury the bodies and relicks of the holy Martyrs. Neither could the dark night ſerve them to that purpoſe, nor any intreaty nor waging them with money, which were appointed for watch-men: but they ſo narrowly looked unto the matter, as though they ſhould have gotten great benefit and profit thereby.

Thus were the bodies of the Martyrs made a wondring ſtock, and lay ſix days in the open ſtreets; at length they burned them, and threw their aſhes into the river of Rodes, ſo that there might appear no remnant of them upon the earth. And this did they as though they had been able to have pulled God out of his Seat, and to have let the regeneration of the Saints, and taken from them the hope of the Reſurrection, whereof they being perſwaded (ſaid they) bring in this new and ſtrange Religion, and ſet thus light by death and puniſhment. Atque hæc ex Epiſtola Viennenſium, &c.

Among others that ſuffered under Antoninus, mention was made alſo of Juſtinus, who (as it is ſaid before) exhibited two Apologies, concerning the defence of Chriſtian Doctrine, the one to the Senate of Rome, and the other to Antoninus Pius the Emperor, concerning whoſe ſuffering, and the cauſes thereof is partly before declared: this Juſtine was born in Neapoli, in the Country of Paleſtine, whoſe Father was Priſcus Bachius, as he himſelf doth teſtifie, by whom in his youth he was ſet to School to learn, where in proceſs of time, he became a famous and worthy Philoſopher, of whoſe excellency many learned and notable men do record. For firſt he being altogether inflamed and raviſhed with deſire of knowledge, would in no wiſe be ſatisfied in his mind, before he had gotten Inſtructors ſingularly ſeen in all kind of Philoſophy, whereupon he writeth of himſelf in the beginning of his Dialogue Cum Triphone thus, declaring that in the beginning he being deſirous of that Sect and Society, applied himſelf to be the Scholar to a certain Stoick, and remaining with him a time, when he nothing profited in Divine knowledge (whereof the Stoick had no skill, and affirmed the knowledge thereof not to be neceſſary) he forſook him, and went to another of the Sect of the Peripateticks, a ſharp-witted man, as he thought; with whom after he had been a while, he demanded of him a ſtipend for his teaching, for the better confirmation of their familiarity. Whereupon Juſtine, accounting him as no Philoſopher, left him, and departed. And yet not ſatisfied in mind, but deſirous to hear of further learning in Philoſophy, adjoyned himſelf to one that profeſſed the Pythagorean Sect, a man of great fame, and one who made no ſmall account of himſelf. Whom after he had followed a time, his Maſter demanded of him whether he had any ſight in Muſick, Aſtronomy, and Geometry, without the ſight of which Science, he ſaid he could not be apt to receive the Knowledge of Vertue and Felicity, unleſs before he had uſed to apply his Mind from ſenſible matters to the Contemplation of things intelligible. And ſpeaking much in the commendation of theſe Sciences, how profitable and neceſſary they were: after that Juſtine had declared himſelf not to be ſeen therein, the Philoſopher gave him over, which grieved Juſtine not a little, and ſo much the more, becauſe he thought his Maſter to have ſome knowledge in thoſe Sciences. After this Juſtine conſidering with himſelf what time was requiſite to the learning of theſe Sciences, and thinking not to defer any longer, thought beſt to reſort to the Sect of the Platoniſts for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore he choſe unto him a ſingular learned man of that Sect, which lately was come to thoſe parts, and ſo remaining with him ſeemed to profit not a little in contemplation of ſupernal things, and inviſible forms, inſomuch that he thought ſhortly to aſpire to ſuch ſharpneſs of wit and wiſdom, that out of hand he might atchieve to the comprehenſion and contemplation of God, which is the end of Plato his Philoſophy. And in this manner he beſtowed his youth: but afterward he growing to a riper age, how and by what means the ſaid Juſtine came to the knowledge and profeſſion of Chriſtianity, it followeth likewiſe in his ſaid firſt Apology: where he affirmeth of himſelf (as witneſſeth Euſebius in his fourth Book) that when he did behold the Chriſtians in their Torments and Sufferings to be ſo conſtant in their Profeſſion, was therewith marveloully moved: after this manner reaſoning with himſelf, that it was impoſſible for that kind of people to be ſubject to any Vice or Carnality, which Vices of their own nature are not able to ſuſtain any ſharp Adverſity, much leſs the bitterneſs of death. The ſight whereof helped him not a little (being of his own nature inclined to the ſearching of true Knowledge and Vertue) to begin thereby to love and imbrace Chriſtian Religion, for ſo he doth witneſs of himſelf in the end of the firſt Apology: ſignifying there how it was his ſeeking and endeavour to attain to Chriſtianity: underſtanding how the Chriſtians by malice of wicked Perſons were compelled to ſuffer wrong and torments, and to be evil ſpoken of. By ſight whereof, as he ſaith himſelf, he became a Chriſtian, through this occaſion. For being thus afflicted in his mind, as is aforeſaid, it came in his head for his more quietneſs to go aſide to ſome Deſart and ſolitary place void of Concourſe of People, unto a Village or Grange near to the Sea ſide: whither as he approached, thinking there to be all alone, there meeteth with him an old ancient Father of a comely Viſage and gentle Behaviour, who, following him a little off, began to reaſon with him: where after long Diſputation, when the old man had declared unto him, that there was no knowledge of truth amongſt the Philoſophers, which neither knew God, neither were aided by the Holy Ghoſt: and further had reaſoned with him of the immortality of the Soul, of the reward of the Godly and puniſhment of the Wicked: then Juſtine being confirmed with his Reaſons and Arguments, yielded to him of his own accord; and demanded of him by what means he might attain to that true knowledge of God, whereof he had ſpoken: who then counſelled him to read and ſearch the Prophets, adjoyning therewith prayer. But what Maſter (quoth Juſtine) ſhould I uſe for the inſtruction thereof, and who ſhall be able to help us if theſe Philoſophers (as you ſay) lack the truth, and are void of the ſame? To whom the old Father anſwered, There have been (ſaid he) many years before theſe Philoſophers, other more ancient than all theſe, which being accounted for Philoſophers were juſt and beloved of God: who ſpake by the Spirit of God, foreſeeing and propheſying theſe things which we ſee now come to paſs, and therefore they are called Prophets. Theſe only have known the truth, and revealed it to men, neither fearing nor paſſing for any; who were ſeduced with no Opinions of mans Invention, but only ſpake and taught thoſe things which they themſelves both heard and ſaw, being inſpired with the holy Spirit of God: whoſe Writings and Works yet to this day remain, out of which the Reader may receive great profit and knowledge of things as concerning the firſt Creation of the World, and end of the ſame, with all other things neceſſary to be known of every true Philoſopher which will give credit unto them. Neither in their teaching do they uſe any demonſtration, as being more certain of themſelves, than that they need any ſuch Demonſtration to be made, foraſmuch as the accompliſhing and the end of things both paſt and now preſent conſtraineth us of neceſſity to believe the words and Doctrine which they taught: which men not only therefore are to be believed, but alſo for their Miracles and Wonders done, are worthy of Credit; for that they both preached of God the Maker and Creator of all things, and alſo did Propheſie before of Chriſt his Son to be ſent of Him; the which, the falſe Prophets being ſeduced with falſe and wicked Spirits, neither have done, nor do, but only take upon them to work certain prodigious Wonders for men to gaze at, ſetting out thereby to the World falſe and unclean Spirits. But then afore all things, make thy prayer that the Gate of Light may be opened unto thee, for otherwiſe theſe things cannot be attained unto of every man, but only of ſuch to whom God and his Chriſt giveth underſtanding.

These things, with much more (which now leiſure ſerveth not to proſecute) after the foreſaid old Father had declared unto him, he departed, exhorting him well to follow the things which he had ſpoken: and after that Juſtine (as he himſelf witneſſeth) ſaw him no more. Immediately after this, Juſtine being all inflamed as with fire kindled in his Breaſt, began to conceive a Love and Zeal towards the Prophets and all ſuch as were favoured of Chriſt: And thus he, revolving in his mind more and more theſe words, found only this Philoſophy among all other Profeſſions both ſure and profitable, and ſo became he a Philoſopher, and in time by theſe means afterwards he was made a Chriſtian and baptized. But where he received this holy Sacrament of Baptiſm it is not read of, nor yet by what occaſion he left his Country and came to Rome. This only we read in Jerome, that he was in Rome, and there uſed certain Exerciſes which he called Diatribas, diſputing there with Creſcens a Cynical Philoſopher, as is before touched. But this is certain, how that Juſtine after he had received the Profeſſion of Chriſtian Religion, became an earneſt Defender of the ſame, travelling and diſputing againſt all the Adverſaries thereof, fearing neither peril of life nor danger of death, whereby he might maintain the Doctrine of Chriſt againſt the malicious Blaſphemers, and alſo augment the number of Chriſtian Believers, as may appear by his vehement Diſputations againſt the Heathen Philoſophers: alſo moreover it well appeareth in that long diſputation which he had with one Tripho at Epheſus, as alſo in his Confutations of Hereticks. Furthermore, his Conflicts and Apologies which with great courage and ſecurity he exhibited againſt the Perſecutors of the Chriſtians, both to the Emperor and the Magiſtrates, yea and the whole Senate of Rome, do teſtifie the ſame.

Diatriba.

Juſtinus a earneſt defender of Chriſt.

Two apologies of Juſtinus.

Of the which Apologies, the firſt he wrote to the Senate of Rome, and after to Antoninus Pius the Emperor, as is before mentioned; where in the firſt writing with great liberty to the Senate, he declared that of neceſſity he was compelled to write and utter his mind and Conſcience to them. For that in perſecuting of the Chriſtians they did neglect their duty, and highly offended God, and therefore need they had to be admoniſhed. And further writing to Urbicius Lieutenant of the City, ſaid, That he put men to death and torments for no Offence committed, but for the Confeſſion only of the Name of Chriſt; which proceedings and judgments neither became the Emperor, nor his Son, nor the Senate: defending moreover in the ſaid Apology, and purging the Chriſtians of ſuch Crimes as falſly were laid and objected againſt them by the Ethnicks.

The ſumm of his apologies.

And likewiſe in his ſecond Apology writing to Antoninus the Emperor, and his Succeſſors, with like gravity and free liberty declareth unto them how they had the Name, commonly being reputed and taken as vertuous Philoſophers, Maintainers of Juſtice, Lovers of Learning; but whether they were ſo, their Acts declared. As for him, neither for flattery, nor favour at their hands, he was conſtrained thus to write unto them; but only to ſue unto them, and deſire a ſerious and righteous kind of dealing in their Judgments and Sentences (for it becometh Princes to follow Uprightneſs and Piety in their Judgments, not Tyranny and Violence,) and alſo in plain words chargeth as well the Emperor as the Senate with manifeſt wrong, for that they did not grant the Chriſtians that which is not denied to all other Malefactors, judging men to death not convicted, but only for the hatred of the Name. Other men which be appeached (ſaid he) in Judgment,

The ſecond apology of Juſtine.

ment, are not condemned before they are convicted: but on Us you take our Name only for the Crime, when as indeed you ought to ſee Juſtice done upon our Accuſers. And again (ſaith he) If a Chriſtian being accuſed only deny that Name, him you Releaſe, being not able to Charge him with any other Offence: but if he ſtand to his Name, only for his Confeſſion you caſt him; where indeed it were your duty rather to examine their manner of life, what thing they confeſs or deny, and according to their Demerits to ſee Juſtice done.

The Lord take away this ſpirit of fury, condemning innocents before they be convicted.

And in the ſame further he ſaith, You examine not the Cauſes, but incenſed with raſh Affections, as with the ſpur of Fury, ye ſlay and murther them not convicted, without any reſpect of Juſtice. And further he addeth, Some peradventure will ſay, certain of them have been apprehended and taken in evil Doings: as though (ſaith he) you uſed to enquire upon them being brought afore you, and not commonly to condemn them before due examination of their Offence for the Cauſe above mentioned. Where alſo in the end of the ſaid Apology after this manner he reprehendeth them. You do degenerate (quoth he) from the goodneſs of your Predeceſſors, whoſe Example you follow not, for your Father Adrian of famous Memory cauſed to be proclaimed, That Chriſtians accuſed before the Judge ſhould not be condemned, unleſs they were found guilty of ſome Notorious Crime. I find that all his vehement and grave Apology ſtandeth upon moſt ſtrong and firm probations, denying, that the Chriſtians ought by Conſcience at the Will and Commandment of the Emperor and Senate to do ſacrifice to the Idols: for the which they being condemned, affirm, that they ſuffer open wrong; affirming moreover, that the true and only Religion is the Religion of the Chriſtians, whoſe Doctrine and Converſation hath no fault. Juſtinus, although with theſe and ſuch like Perſwaſions, he did not ſo prevail with the Emperor, to cauſe him to love his Religion, and become a Chriſtian (for that is not written) yet thus much he obtained, that Antoninus writing to his Officers in Aſia in the behalf of the Chriſtians, required and commanded them, that thoſe Chriſtians only which were found guilty of any Treſpaſs ſhould ſuffer, and ſuch as were not convicted, ſhould not therefore only for the Name be puniſhed, becauſe they were called Chriſtians. By theſe it is apparent with what Zeal and Faith this Juſtinus did ſtrive againſt the Perſecutors, which (as he ſaid) could kill only, but could not hurt.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 4. ca. 16. A place of Epiphanius found faulty.

This Juſtinus by the means and malice of Creſcens the Philoſopher (as is before declared) ſuffered Martyrdom under Marcus Antoninus Verus, a little after that Polycarpus was martyred in Aſia, as witneſſeth Euſebius, lib. 4. Here is to be gathered how Epiphanius was deceived in the time of his death, ſaying, That he ſuffered under Ruſticus the Preſident, and Adrian the Emperor, being of thirty years of age; which indeed agreeth neither with Euſebius, nor Hierome, nor Suide, nor others more, which manifeſtly declare and teſtifie how he exhibited his Apology unto Antoninus Pius which came after Adrian. Thus haſt thou (good Reader) the life of this learned and bleſſed Martyr, although partly touched before, yet now more fully and amply diſcourſed for the better commendation of his excellent and notable Vertues, of whoſe final end thus writeth Photius, ſaying, That he ſuffering for Chriſt, died chearfully and with honour.

Cum dignitate & lætus pro Chriſto periit.

Thus have ye heard the whole Diſcourſe of Juſtinus and of the bleſſed Saints of France, Vetius, Zacharias, Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Blandina, Alexander, Alcibiades, with others, recorded and ſet forth by the writing of certain Chriſtian Brethren of the ſame Church and place of France. In the which foreſaid writing of theirs, moreover appeareth the great meekneſs and modeſt conſtancy of the ſaid Martyrs deſcribed in theſe words; Such Followers were they of Chriſt (who when he was in the Form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God, being in the ſame Glory with him,) that they not once nor twice, but oft times ſuffered Martyrdom; and taken again from the Beaſts, and bearing Wounds, Tearings and Skars in their Bodies, yet neither would count themſelves Martyrs, neither would they ſuffer us ſo to call them: but if any of us either by word or Letter would call them Martyrs, they did vehemently rebuke them, ſaying, That the name of Martyrdom was to be given to Chriſt the faithful and true Martyr, the firſt born of the Dead, and the Captain of Life; teſtifying moreover, That Martyrdom belongeth to ſuch, who by their Martyrdom were already paſſed out of this life: and whom Chriſt by their worthy Confeſſion hath received unto Himſelf, and hath ſealed up their Martyrdom by their end finiſhed: as for them which were not yet conſummated, they (ſaid they) were not worthy the names of Martyrs, but only were humble and worthy Confeſſors, deſiring alſo their Brethren with Tears to pray without ceaſing for their Confirmation. Thus they performing indeed that which belongeth to true Martyrs, in reſiſting the Heathen with much liberty and great patience, without all fear of man, being repleniſhed with the fear of God, refuſed to be named of their Brethren for Martyrs. And after in the ſaid writing it followeth more, They humbled themſelves under the mighty hand of God, by which they were greatly exalted; then they rendred to all men a reaſon of their Faith, they accuſed no man, they looſed all, they bound none, and for them which ſo evil did entreat them they prayed, following the example of Stephen the perfect Martyr, which ſaid, O Lord, impute not their ſin to them. And after again, Neither did they proudly diſdain againſt them which fell, but of ſuch as they had imparted to them that lacked, bearing toward them a motherly affection, ſhedding their plentiful tears for them to God the Father, and prayed for their life and ſalvation; and as God gave it them, they alſo did communicate to their Neighbours, and thus they as Conquerors of all things departed to God. They loved peace, and leaving the ſame to us, they went to God, neither leaving any moleſtation to their Mother, nor Sedition or trouble to their Brethren, but joy, peace, concord, and love to all.

The holy Martyrs refuſe to be called Martyrs.

Out of the ſame writing moreover concerning theſe Martyrs of France afore mentioned, is recorded alſo another Hiſtory not unworthy to be noted, taken out of the ſame Book of Euſebius cap. 3. which Hiſtory is this:

Ex Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 3. Alcibiades. The ſtrict faſting of Alcibiades corrected by the Holy Ghoſt.

There was among theſe conſtant and bleſſed Martyrs, one Alcibiades, as is above ſpecified: which Alcibiades ever uſed a very ſtrict diet, receiving for his food and ſuſtenance nothing elſe but only Bread and Water. When this Alcibiades now being caſt into Priſon, went about to accuſtom the ſame ſtrictneſs of diet, after his uſual manner; it was before revealed by God to Attalus afore mentioned, one of the ſaid Company, being alſo the ſame time impriſoned after his firſt conflict upon the Scaffold, that Alcibiades did not well in that he refuſed to uſe and take the Creatures of God, and alſo thereby miniſtred to others a pernicious occaſion of offenſive example. Whereupon Alcibiades being advertiſed, and reformed, began to take all things boldly, and with giving thanks. Whereby may appear to all ſcrupulous Conſciences, not only a wholſome Inſtruction of the Holy Ghoſt, but alſo here is to be noted how in thoſe days they were not deſtitute of the Grace of God, but had the Holy Spirit of God to be their Inſtructor. Hæc Euſeb.

A Leſſon for ſcrupulous Conſciences.

Ireneus newly made Miniſter, and commended to Eleutherius.

The foreſaid Martyrs of France at the ſame time commended Ireneus, newly then made Miniſter, with their Letters unto Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome, as witneſſeth Euſeb. in the tenth Chapter of the ſaid Book, which Ireneus firſt was the hearer of Polycarpus, then made Miniſter (as is ſaid) under theſe Martyrs: and after their death made Biſhop afterward of Lions in France, and ſucceeded after Photinus. Beſides this Juſtinus, there was alſo the ſame time in Aſia, Claudius Apollinaris, or Apollinarius Biſhop of Hieropolis, and alſo Melito Biſhop of Sardis, an eloquent and learned man, much commended of Tertullian, who ſucceeding after the time of the Apoſtles, in the Reign of this Antoninus Verus, exhibited unto him learned and eloquent Apologies in defence of Chriſts Religion, like us Quadratus and Ariſtides above mentioned did unto the Emperor Adrian, whereby they moved him ſomewhat to ſtay the rage of his Perſecution. In like manner did this Apollinaris and Melito (ſtirred up by God) adventure to defend in writing the cauſe of the Chriſtians unto this Antoninus. Of this Melito Euſebius in his fourth Book making mention, excepteth certain places of his Apology in theſe words, as followeth, Now, ſaith he, which was never ſeen before, the godly ſuffer Perſecution by occaſion of certain Proclamations and Edicts proclaimed throughout Aſia, for villanous Sicophants, Robbers

Apollinaris and Melito exhibited Apologies to the Emperor for the Chriſtians.

Robbers and Spoilers of other mens Goods, grounding themſelves upon thoſe Proclamations, and taking occaſion of them, rob openly night and day, and ſpoil thoſe which do no harm. And it followeth after, Which if it be done by your Commandment, be it ſo, well done: for a good Prince will never command but good things, and ſo we will be contented to ſuſtain the honour of this death. This only we moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that calling before you and examining the Authors of this tumult and contention, then your Grace would juſtly judge whether we are worthy of cruel death, or quiet life. And then if it be not your pleaſure, and that it proceedeth not by your occaſion (which indeed againſt your barbarous Enemies were too bad) the more a great deal we are Petitioners to your Highneſs, that hereafter you will vouchſafe to hear Us thus ſo vexed and oppreſſed with theſe kind of Villainous Robberies. And verily our Philoſophy and Doctrine did firſt among the barbarous take place, which Doctrine firſt in the days of Auguſtus your Predeceſſor, when it did Reign and Flouriſh, thereby your Empire became moſt famous and fortunate: and from that time more and more the State of the Roman Empire increaſed in Honour, whereof you moſt happily were made Succeſſor, and ſo ſhall your Son too. Honour therefore this Philoſophy which with your Empire ſprang up, and came in with Auguſtus, which your Progenitors above all other honoured and moſt eſteemed. And verily this is no ſmall Argument of a good beginning, that ſince our Doctrine flouriſhed in the Empire, no misfortune or loſs happened from Auguſtus's time: but contrary, always Victory, good and honourable years, as ever any man would wiſh: only among all, and of all, Nero and Domitian, being kindled by divers naughty and ſpiteful perſons, cavillingly objected againſt our Doctrine; of whom this ſycophantical ſlandering of Us by naughty cuſtom firſt came and ſprang up. But your godly Fathers eſpying the ignorance of theſe, oftentimes by their writing corrected their temerarious Attempts in that behalf: among whom your Grandfather Adrian with many others is read of, to have written to Fundane the Proconſul and Lieutenant of Aſia: and your Father, your own Father, I ſay, with whom you ruled in all things, wrote to the Cities under his Signet, as the Laerſens, Theſſalonicenſes, Athenienſes, and Grecians; raſhly to innovate or alter nothing. Of your Highneſs therefore, who in this caſe is of that Sect as your Predeceſſors were, yea and of a more benigne and Philoſophical Mind, we are in good hope to obtain our Petition and Requeſt.

The Chriſtians Religion began with the Empire of Rome.

Chriſtian Religion maketh common weals to flouriſh.

Thus much out of the Apology of Melito, who writing to Oneſimus, giveth to us this benefit, to know the true Catalogue and the names of all the authentick Books of the Old Teſtament, received in the ancient time of the Primitive Church. Concerning the number and names whereof, the ſaid Melito in his Letter to Oneſimus declareth; how that he returning into the parts where theſe things were done and preached, there he diligently inquired out the Books approved of the Old Teſtament, the names whereof in order he ſubſcribeth, and ſendeth unto him as followeth, The five Books of Moſes, Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Jeſus Nave, The Judges, Ruth, Four Books of Kings, Two Books Paralipomenon, The Pſalms, Proverbs of Solomon, The Book of Wiſdom, The Preacher, The Song of Songs, Job, The Prophets, Eſay, Hieremy, Twelve Prophets in one Book, Daniel, Ezekiel, Eſdras. And thus much of this matter which I thought here to record, for it is not unprofitable for theſe later times to underſtand, what in the firſt times was received and admitted as authentick, and what otherwiſe.

The Books of the Old Teſtament authentick and received.

But from this little digreſſion, to return to our matter omitted; that is, to the Apologies of Apolinarius and Melito, in the ſtory ſo it followeth; that whether it was by the occaſion of theſe two Apologies, or whether it was through the writing of Athenagoras a Philoſopher, and a Legat of the Chriſtians, it is uncertain: but this is certain, that the Perſecution the ſame time was ſtayed. Some do think, which moſt probably ſeems to touch the truth, that the cauſe of ſtaying this Perſecution did ariſe upon a wonderful Miracle of God ſhewed in the Emperors Camp by the Chriſtians, the ſtory whereof is this; At what time the two Brethren Marcus Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius Commodus Emperors, joyning together, warred againſt the Quades, Vandales, Sarmates, and Germans, in the Expedition againſt them; their Army by reaſon of the imminent aſſault of their Enemies, was cooped and ſhut in within the ſtraits and hot dry places, where their Souldiers, beſides other difficulties of battel, being deſtitute of water five days, were like to have periſhed, which dread not a little diſcomfited them, and abated their courage; where, in this ſo great diſtreſs and jeopardy, ſuddenly withdrew from the Army a Legion of the Chriſtian Souldiers for their ſuccor, who falling proſtrate upon the earth, by ardent prayer, by and by obtained of God double relief: by means of whom, God gave certain pleaſant Showers from the Element, whereby as their Souldiers quenched their thirſt, ſo were a great number of their Enemies diſcomfited and put to flight by continual Lightnings which ſhotted out of the Air. This Miracle ſo pleaſed and won the Emperor, that ever after he waxed gentler and gentler to the Chriſtians, and directed his Letters to divers of his Rulers (as Tertullian in his Apology witneſſeth) commanding them therein to give thanks to the Chriſtians, no leſs for his Victory, than for the preſervation of Him and all his men. The Copy of which Letter inſueth.

Ex Euſebio, ibidem.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, Emperor, to the Senate and people of Rome.

I Give you hereby to underſtand what I intend to do, as alſo what ſucceſs I have had in my Wars in Germany, and with how much difficulty, I have victailed my Camp, being compaſſed about with ſeverity and four fierce Dragons, whom my Scouts deſcried to be within nine miles of us, and Pompeianus our Lieutenant hath viewed, as he ſignified unto Us, by his Letters. Wherefore I thought no leſs but to be overrun and all my bands of ſo great multitude, as well my Va-ward, Main-ward, as Rere-ward, with all my Souldiers of Ephrata; in whoſe Hoſt there were numbred of fighting-men, nine hundred ſeventy and five thouſand. But when I ſaw my ſelf not able to Encounter with the Enemy, I craved Aid of our Country gods: at whoſe hands I finding no comfort, and being driven of the Enemy unto an Exigent, I cauſed to be ſent for thoſe men which we call Chriſtians, who being muſtered were found a good indifferent number, with whom I was in further rage than I had good cauſe, as afterwards I had experience by their marvellous Power; who forthwith did their endeavour, but without either Weapon, Munition, Armor, or Trumpets, as men abhorring ſuch Preparation and Furniture, but only ſatisfied in truſt of their God, whom they carry about with them in their Conſciences. It is therefore to be credited, although we call them wicked men, that they worſhip God in their hearts. For they falling proſtrate upon the Ground, prayed not only for me, but for the Hoſt alſo which was with me, beſeeching their God for help in that our extremity of Victuals and freſh water: for we had been now five days without water, and were in our Enemies Land, even in the midſt of Germany; who thus falling upon their Faces, made their prayers to a God unknown of me. And there fell amongſt us from Heaven a moſt pleaſant and cold ſhower, but amongſt our Enemies a great ſtorm of Hail mixt with Lightning, ſo that immediately we perceived the Invincible aid of the moſt mighty God to be with us: Therefore we give thoſe men leave to profeſs Chriſtianity, leſt, perhaps, by their prayers we be puniſhed with the like, and thereby I make my ſelf the Author of ſuch hurt as ſhall be received by the Chriſtian profeſſion. And if any ſhall apprehend one that is a Chriſtian, only for this cauſe, I will that he being apprehended, without Puniſhment may have leave to confeſs the ſame, ſo that there be none other cauſe Objected againſt him, more than that, he is a Chriſtian; but let this accuſer be burned alive. Neither will I that he confeſſing and being found a Chriſtian, ſhall be inforced to alter the ſame his opinion by the Governor of any of our Provinces, but left to his own choice. And this Decree of mine I will to be ratified in the Senate-houſe, and command the ſame publickly to be proclaimed and read in the Court of Trajanus; and that further from thence it may be ſent into all our Provinces by the diligence of Veratius Governour of our City Polione. And further, we give leave to all men to uſe and write out this our Decree, taking the ſame out of our Copy publickly in the Common Hall ſet forth.

Thus

Thus the Tempeſtuous rage of perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, began for a time to aſſwage, partly by the occaſion hereof, partly alſo upon other cauſes incident, compelling the Enemies to ſurceaſe their perſecution, as great Plagues and Peſtilence lying upon the country of Italy; likewiſe great Wars, as well in the Eaſt parts, as alſo in Italy and France, terrible Earthquakes, great floods, noiſome Swarms of flies and Vermin devouring their Corn-Fields, &c. And thus much of things done under Antoninus Verus, which Antoninus in the beginning of his Reign, joyned with him in the Government of the Empire his brother Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who alſo was with him at the miraculous victory gotten by the Chriſtians, as Euſebius cap. 5. lib. 5. recordeth. Contrary, Platina in vita Soteris, and the book intituled Flores Hiſtoriarum, refer the ſame to the time of Antoninus Verus, and his ſon Lucius Antoninus Commodus, and not of Marcus Aurelius Commodus his brother. But howſoever the truth of years doth ſtand, certain it is, that after the death of Antoninus Verus, and of Aurelius Commodus, ſucceeded Lucius Antoninus Commodus, the ſon of Verus, who Reigned thirty Years.

Antoninus Verus, M. Aurelius Commodus Emperors.

The difference between Euſebius and Platina.

Anno 175

In the time of this Commodus, although he was an incommodious Prince to the Senators of Rome, yet notwithſtanding there was ſome quietneſs univerſally through the whole Church of Chriſt from perſecution, by what occaſion it is not certain. Some think, of whom is Xiphilinus, that it came through Marcia the Emperors Concubine, which favoured the Chriſtians: But howſoever it came (ſaith Euſebius) the fury of the raging Enemies was then ſomewhat mitigated, and peace was given by the grace of Chriſt unto the Church throughout the whole world: At what time, the wholeſome Doctrine of the Goſpel allured and reduced the hearts of all ſorts of people unto the true Religion of God, in ſo much that many, both rich and to noble Perſonages of Rome, with their whole families and houſeholds, to their ſalvation, adjoyned themſelves the Church of Chriſt.

Quietneſs given to the Church.

Among whom there was one Apollonius, a noble man, and a Senator of Rome, mentioned in Euſebius, lib. 5. cap. 21. who being Maliciouſly accuſed unto the Senate, by one whom Hierome writeth to be the ſervant of the ſaid Apollonius, and nameth him Severus: But whoſe ſervant ſoever he was, the wretched man came ſoon enough before the Judge, being condignly rewarded for that his Malicious diligence: For by a law which the Emperor made, that no man upon pain of Death, ſhould falſly accuſe the Chriſtians, he was put to Execution, and had his Legs broken forthwith by the ſentence of Perenninus the Judge, which being an heathen man, he Pronounced againſt him: But the beloved Martyr of God, when the Judge, with much ado had obtained of him, to render an account, before the honourable Senate, of his Faith, under whoſe defence and warrant of life he did the ſame, delivered unto them an eloquent apologie of the Chriſtian belief: But the former warrant notwithſtanding, he by the decree of the Senate was beheaded, and ſo ended his life; for that there was an antient law among them decreed, that none that profeſſed Chriſt, and therefore arraigned, ſhould be releaſed without recantation, or altering his opinion.

Apollonius martyr.

Apollonius accuſed by his own ſervant.

Apollonius exhibiteth an apologie of his Faith to the Senate.

An old wicked law of the Romans.

This Commodus is ſaid in ſtories to be ſo ſure and ſteddy handed in caſting the dart, that in the open Theater before the people, he would encounter with the Wild beaſts, and be ſure to hit them in the place where appointed. Among divers other his vitious and Wild parts, he was ſo far ſurpriſed in pride and arrogancy, that he would be called Hercules, and many times would ſhew himſelf to the people in the skin of a Lion, to be counted thereby the King of men, like as the Lion is of the Beaſts.

The vidicſ lous pride of the Emperor.

Upon a certain time, being his birth-day, this Commodus calling the people of Rome together, in a great Royalty, having his Lions skin upon him, made ſacrifice to Hercules and Jupiter, cauſing it to be cryed through the City, that Hercules was the Patron and defender of the City. There was the ſame time at Rome, Vincentius, Euſebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, learned men, and inſtructors of the people, who, following the ſteps of the Apoſtles, went about from place to place where the Goſpel was not yet preached, converting the Gentiles to the faith of Chriſt. Theſe, hearing the madneſs of the Emperor, and of the people, began to reprove their Idolatrous blindneſs, teaching in Villages and Towns, all that heard them to believe upon the true and only God, and to come away from ſuch Worſhipping of Devils, and to give honour to God alone, which only is to be Worſhipped, willing them to repent and to be Baptiſed, leſt they periſhed with Commodus. With this their preaching they converted one Julius, a Senator, and others, to the Religion of Chriſt. The Emperor hearing thereof, cauſed them to be apprehended of Vitellus his Captain, and to be compelled to ſacrifice unto Hercules, which when they ſtoutly refuſed, after divers grievous torments and great miracles by them done, at laſt they were preſſed with leaden weights to death. Vincentius, lib. 10. cap. 119. & Chron. Henr. de Erfordia.

Vincentius, Euſebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus Martyrs.

Julius a Senator converted to Chriſt.

Ex Vincent lib. 10. cap. 119. Henr. de Erfor.

This Peregrinus above mentioned had been ſent before by Xiſtus, Biſhop of Rome, into the parts of France, to ſupply there the room of a Biſhop and teacher, by reaſon that for the continual and horrible perſecutions thereabout touched, thoſe places were left deſolate and deſtitute of Miniſters and inſtructors, where after he had occupied himſelf with much fruit among the ſtock of Chriſt, and had eſtabliſhed the Congregation there, returning home again to Rome, there he finiſhed at laſt (as it is ſaid) his Martyrdom.

Peregrinus ſent to France and returned at Rome. Ex Platina in vita Sixti.

Now remaineth likewiſe to ſpeak of Julius: which Julius being (as is afore deſcribed) a Senator of Rome, and now won by the Preaching of theſe bleſſed men to the faith of Chriſt, did eftſoones invite them and brought them home to his houſe, where being by them more fully inſtructed in Chriſtian Religion, he believed the Goſpel. And ſending for one Ruffinus a Prieſt, was with all his family by him Baptized, who not (as the common ſort was wont to do) kept cloſe and ſecret his faith, but incenſed with a marvellous and ſincere zeal, openly profeſſed the ſame, altogether wiſhing and praying to be given to him by God, not only to believe in Chriſt, but alſo to hazard his life for him. Which thing the Emperor hearing how that Julius had forſaken his old Religion, and become a Chriſtian, forthwith ſent for him to come before him, unto whom he ſpake on this wiſe: O Julv, what madneſs hath poſſeſſed thee, that thus thou doſt fall from the old and common Religion of thy Forefathers, who acknowledged and worſhipped Jupiter and Hercules their Gods, and now doſt imbrace a new and fond kind of Religion of the Chriſtians? At which time Julius, having good occaſion to ſhew and open his faith, gave ſtraightway account thereof to him, and affirmed that Hercules and Jupiter were falſe Gods, and how the Worſhippers of them ſhould Periſh with Eternal damnation and Puniſhments. Which the Emperor hearing how that he condemned and deſpiſed his Gods, being then inflamed with a great wrath (as he was by nature very cholerick) committed him forthwith to Vitellius, the Maſter of the Souldiers, a very cruel and fierce man, to ſee Julius either to ſacrifice to mighty Hercules, or refuſing the ſame, to ſlay him. Vitellus (as he commanded) exhorted Julius to obey the Emperors commandment, and to worſhip his Gods, alledging how that the whole Empire of Rome was not only conſtituted, but alſo preſerved and maintained by them: which Julius denied utterly to do, admoniſhing ſharply in like manner Vitellus to acknowledge the true God, and obey his Commandments, leſt he with his Maſter, ſhould die ſome grievous Death: whereat Vitellus being moved, cauſed Julius with cudgels to be beaten unto Death.

Julius with his family baptized and after martyred.

Theſe things being thus briefly recited, touching ſuch holy Martyrs as hitherto have ſuffered, now remaineth that we return again to the order of the Roman Biſhops, ſuch as followed next after Alexander, or whom we left, whoſe ſucceeder next was Xiſtus or Sixtus, the ſixth Biſhop counted after Peter, who governed the Miniſtery the ſpace of Ten years, as Damaſcus and others do write. Uſpergenſis maketh mention but of nine years. Platina recordeth that he died a Martyr, and was buried at Vaticane. But Euſebius ſpeaking of his deceaſe, maketh no word or mention of any Martyrdom. In the ſecond tome of the Councels certain Epiſtles be attributed to him, whereof Euſebius, Damaſcus, Hierome, and other old authors, as they make no relation, ſo ſeem they to have no intelligence nor knowledge of any ſuch matter. In theſe counterfeit Epiſtles, and in Platina it appeareth that Xiſtus was the firſt author of theſe ordinances. Firſt, that the holy myſteries and holy Veſſels, ſhould be touched but only of perſons holy and conſecrated, eſpecially of no Woman. Item, that the Cor-

Corporas cloth should be made of no other cloth but of fine linnen. Item, that such Bishops as were called up to the Apostolick See, returning home again, should not be received at their return, unless they brought with them letters from the Bishop of Rome, saluting the People. Item, at the celebration he ordained to be sung this verse, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabboth. Where moreover it is to be noted, that the said Platina, in the life of this Xistus, doth testifie that Peter ministred the celebration of the Communion only with the Lords Prayer.

S. Peter celebrated the Lords Supper only with the Lords Prayer. Platina in vita Sixti.

These trifling ordinances of Xistus, who is so rude that seeth not, or may not easily conjecture to be fallly fathered of Xistus, or of any father of that time? First by the uniform rudeness and stile of all those decretal letters, nothing favoring of that age, but rather of the later dunstical times that followed; also by the matter and argument in those letters contained nothing agreeing with the state of those troublesome days. Neither again is it to be supposed, that any such recourse of Bishops was then to the Apostolical See of Rome, that it was not lawful to return without their letters: when as the Persecution against the Christians was then so hot, in the days of Adrian, that the Bishops of Rome themselves were more glad to fly out of the City, than other Bishops were to come to them unto Rome. And if Xistus added the Sanctus unto the mass canon, what piece then of the canon went before it, when they which put to the other patches came after Xistus? And if they came after Xistus that added the rest why did they set their pieces before his, seeing they that began the first piece of the canon, came after him?

The ordinance of Xistus suspected.

The same likewise is to be judged of the Epistles and ordinances of Telesphorus, who succeeded next unto Xistus, and being Bishop of that Congregation the term of eleven years, the first year of the Raign of Antoninus Pius, died Martyr about the year of our Lord, one hundred thirty and eight. His Epistle, like unto the rest, containing in it no great matter of Doctrine, hath these ordinances. First, he commandeth all that were of the Clergy to fast and abstain from flesh-eating seven week before Easter. That three Masses should be said upon the nativity day of the Lord. That no man should accuse either Bishop or Priest. He ordained moreover, Gloria in excelsis, to be added to the Mass, &c. But these things falsly to be feined upon him may easily be conjectured. For as touching the seven weeks fast, neither doth it agree with the old Roman term commonly received, calling it Quadragesima, that is, the forty days fast: neither with the example of our Saviour, who fasted not seven weeks, but only forty days. Moreover, as concerning this forty days fast, we read of the same in the Epistle of Ignatius, which was long before Telesphorus: whereby it may appear that this Telesphorus was not the first inventor thereof. And if it be true that is lately come out in the name of Abdias (but untruly as by many conjectures may be proved) there it is read, that in the days of S. Matthew, this Lent fast of forty days was observed long before Telesphorus, by these words that follow: In the days (said he) either of Lent, or in the time of other lawful fastings, he that abstaineth not as well from eating meat as also from the mixture of Bodies, doth incurre in so doing, not only pollution, but also committeth offence, which must be washed away with the tears of Repentance. Again, Apollonius affirmeth, that Montanus the Heretick was the first deviser and bringer in of these laws of fasting into the Church, which before was used to be free, Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 18. But especially by Socrates, Writer of the Ecclesiastical story, who lived after the days of Theodosius, it may be argued, that this seven weeks fast is falsly imputed to Telesphorus. For Socrates in his first Book, speaking of this time, hath these words: Romani namque tres ante pascha septimanas præter Sabbatum & Dominicam continuas jejunant, that is, The Romans (saith he) do fast three weeks continually before Easter, beside the Sabbath and Sunday. And moreover, speaking of divers and sundry fastings of Lent in sundry and divers Churches, he addeth these words: And because that no man can bring forth any Commandment written of this matter, it is therefore apparent, that the Apostles left this kind of fast free to every mans will and judgment, lest any should be constrained by fear and necessity to do that which is good, &c. With this of Socrates agree also the words of Sozomenus, living much about the same in his seventh Book, where he thus writeth: The whole fast of Lent (saith he) some comprehend in six weeks, as do the Illirians, and west Churches, with all Libia, Egypt and Palestina: Some in seven weeks, as at Constantinople, and the parts bordering to Phenica: Other some in three weeks next before the day of Easter, and some again in two weeks, &c. By the which it may be collected, that Telesphorus never ordained any such fast of seven weeks: Which otherwise never would have been neglected in Rome, and in the west Churches: Neither again would have been unremembred of these ancient Ecclesiastical Writers, if any such thing had been. The like is to be thought also of the rest, not only of his constitutions, but also of the other ancient Bishops and Martyrs which followed after him, as of Higinus in the year of our Lord one hundred forty and two, who succeeding him and dying also a Martyr, as Volateranus, lib. 22. declareth, is said, or rather fained to bring in the Cream, one Godfather and Godmother in Baptism, to ordain the dedication of Churches: When as in his time so far it was off, that any solemn Churches were standing in Rome, that unneth the Christians could safely convent in their own Houses. Likewise the distuinguishing the orders of Metropolitans, Bishops and other degrees, savor nothing less than of that time.

Dedication of Churches

After Higinus followed Pius, who, as Platina reporteth, was so precisely devout about the holy Mysteries of the Lords Table, that if any one crum thereof did fall down to the ground, he ordained that the Priest should do penance forty days: If any fell upon the super-altar, he should do penance three days: If upon the linnen corporas cloath, four days: if upon any other linnen cloth, nine days. And if any drop of the Blood (saith he) should chance to be spilled, wheresoever it fell, it should be licked up, if it were possible: If not, the place should be washed or pared, and so being washed or pared, should be burned and laid in the Vestry. All which toyes may seem to a wise man more vain and trifling, than to savor of those pure and strict times of those holy Martyrs. This Pius (as is reported) was much conversant with Hermes, called otherwise Pastor. Damasus, saith he, was his brother. But how is that like, that Hermes being the disciple of Paul, or one of the threescore disciples, could be the brother of this Pius? Of this Hermes, and of the revelations, the aforesaid Pius in his Epistle decretal (if it be not forged) maketh mention, declaring that unto him appeared the Angel of God in the habit of a shepherd, commanding him that Easter day should be celebrated of all men upon no other day, but on Sunday: Whereupon, saith the Epistle, Pius the Bishop, by his authority Apostolical decreed and commanded the same to be observed of all men.

Then succeeded Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius, about the year of our Lord one hundred and fourscoure. This Eleutherius, at the request of Lucius, King of Britain, sent to him Damianus and Fugatius, by whom the King was converted to Christs faith, and Baptized about the year of our Lord one hundred threescore and nineteen. Nauclerus, lib. Cron. Gen. 6. saith, it was in the year one hundred fifty and six. Henr. de Erfordia, saith, it was in the year one hundred threescore and nine, in the ninteenth year of Verus the Emperor. Some say it was in the sixth year of Commodus, which should be about the year of our Lord one hundred fourscore and five. Timotheus in his story thinketh, that Eleutherius came himself: But that is not like. And as there is a variance among the Writers for the count of years; so doth there rise a question among some, whether Eleutherius was the first that brought the faith from Rome into this Land or not. Nicephorus. lib. 4. cap. 4. saith that Simon Zelotes came into Britain. Some other alledge out of Gildas de Victoria, Aurel. Ambrosi. that Joseph of Arimathy, after the dispersion of the Jews, was sent by Philip the Apostle from France to Britain, about the year of our Lord threescore and three, and here remaineth in this Land all his time, and so with his fellows, laid the first foundation of Christian faith among the Britain people. Whereupon other Preachers and Teachers coming afterward, confirmed the same, and increased it more. And therefore doth Petrus Cluniacensis call the Scotishmen, and so doth count them as more ancient Christians. For the confirmation hereof might be alledged the Testimony of Origen, of Tertullian, and the words also of the letter of Eleutherius, which import no less but that the Faith of Christ was here in England among the Britain people, before Eleutherius time, and before the King was converted:

But

But hereof more ſhall be ſpoken hereafter (Chriſt willing) when after the tractation of theſe Ten Perſecutions, we ſhall enter into the matter of our Engliſh ſtories.

About this time of Commodus afore mentioned, among divers other learned men and famous Teachers whom God ſtirred up at that time (as he doth at all other times raiſe up ſome) in his Church, to confound the Perſecutors by Learning and Writing, as the Martyrs to confirm the truth with their blood, was Seraphion Biſhop of Antioch, Egeſippus a Writer of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from Chriſts Paſſion to his time, as witneſſeth Hierome and Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 8. & 22. which Books of his be now remaining: and thoſe that be remaining (which be five De excidio Hieroſol.) be not mentioned, neither of Hierome, Euſebius, nor of Miltiades, which alſo wrote his Apology in defence of Chriſtian Religion, as did Melito, Quadratus, and Ariſtides before mentioned. About the ſame time alſo wrote Heraclitus, who firſt began to write Annotations and Enarrations upon the New Teſtament, and Epiſtles of the Apoſtles. Alſo Theophilus Biſhop of Ceſarea, Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth, a man famouſly learned, which wrote divers Epiſtles to divers Churches, and among others written, exhorting Ponitus, a certain Biſhop, Ne grave ſervandæ caſtitatis onus neceſſario fratribus imponat, ſed multorum ſeſe imbecillitati attemperet; that is, That he would lay no yoke of Chaſtity of any neceſſity upon his Brethren; but that he would conſider the infirmity of others, and bear with it, Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 23. Moreover, the ſaid Dionyſius in his Epiſtles writing of Dionyſius Areopagita, declareth of him how that he was firſt converted to the Chriſtian Faith by Saint Paul, according as in the Acts is recorded; and afterward was made the firſt Biſhop of Athens, but maketh there no mention of his Book De Hierarchia. Whereby it may eaſily appear, what is to be judged of that Book. Furthermore, by the Epiſtles of the ſaid Dionyſius of Corinth, this we have to underſtand, to be the uſe at that time in Churches, to read the Letters and Epiſtles, ſuch as were ſent by learned Biſhops and Teachers unto the Congregations, as may appear by theſe words of Dionyſius, who writing to the Church of the Romans, and to Soter, ſaith, This day we celebrate the holy Dominical-day, in which we have read your Epiſtle, which always we will read for our Exhortation; like as we do read alſo the Epiſtle of Clement ſent to us before, &c. Euſebius ibid. Where alſo mention is made of keeping of Sunday holy, whereof we find no mention made in ancient Authors, before his time, except only in Juſtinus Martyr, who in his Deſcription declareth two times moſt eſpecially uſed for Chriſtian men to congregate together: firſt, when any Convert was to be baptized, the ſecond was upon the Sunday, which was wont for two Cauſes then to be hallowed: firſt, becauſe (ſaith he) upon that day God made the World: ſecondly, becauſe that Chriſt upon that day firſt ſhewed himſelf, after his Reſurrection, to his Diſciples, &c.

Over and beſide theſe above named, about the days of Commodus, wrote alſo Clemens Alexandrinus, a man of notable and ſingular Learning, whoſe Books, although for a great part be loſt, yet certain of them yet remain, wherein is declared among other things, the order and number of the Books and Goſpels of the New Teſtament, &c.

The ſame time moreover lived Pantenus, which was the firſt in Alexandria, that profeſſed in open School to read, of whom is thought firſt to proceed the order and manner among the Chriſtians to read and profeſs in Univerſities. This Pantenus for his excellency of Learning, was ſent by Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, to Preach to the Indians, where he found the Goſpel of S. Matthew written in Hebrew, left there by S. Bartholomew, which Book afterward he brought with him from thence to the Library of Alexandria.

During all the Reign of Commodus, God granted reſt and tranquility, although not without ſome bloodſhed of certain holy Martyrs, as is above declared unto his Church. In the which time of tranquility, the Chriſtians having now ſome leiſure from the foreign Enemy, began to have a little contention among themſelves about the Ceremony of Eaſter: which contention albeit of long time before had been ſtirring in the Church, as is before mentioned of Polycarpus and Anicetus: yet the variance and difference of that Ceremony brought no breach of Chriſtian concord and ſociety among them: neither as yet did the matter exceed ſo far, but that the bond of Love, and Communion of brotherly life continued, although they differed in the Ceremony of the day. For they of the Weſt Church pretending the tradition of Paul and Peter, but indeed being the tradition of Hermes and of Pius, kept one day, which was upon the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the firſt month. The Church of Aſia, following the Ordinance of John the Apoſtle, obſerved another, as more ſhall be declared (the Lord willing) when we come to the time of Victor Biſhop of Rome. ## The fifth Perſecution.

After the death of Commodus reigned Pertinax but few months, after whom ſucceeded Severus, under whom was raiſed the fifth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtian Saints: who reigning the term of eighteen years, the firſt ten years of the ſame was very favourable and courteous to the Chriſtians: afterward through ſiniſter Suggeſtions and malicious Accuſations of the malignant, was ſo incenſed againſt them, that by Proclamations he commanded no Chriſtians any more to be ſuffered. Thus the rage of the Emperor being inflamed againſt them, great Perſecution was ſtirred up on every ſide, whereby an infinite number of Martyrs were ſlain, as Euſebius in his ſixth Book recordeth, which was about the year of our Lord two hundred and five. The Crimes and falſe Accuſations objected againſt the Chriſtians, are partly touched before; as Sedition and Rebellion againſt the Emperor, Sacriledge, murthering of Infants, inceſtuous Pollution, eating raw Fleſh, Libidinous Commixture, whereof certain indeed, called then Gnoſtici, were infamed. Item, it was objected againſt them for worſhipping the head of an Aſs: which whereof it ſhould riſe, I find no certain cauſe, except it were, perhaps, by the Jews. Alſo they were charged for worſhipping the Sun, for that peradventure before the Sun did riſe, they convented together, ſinging their morning Hymns unto the Lord, or elſe becauſe they prayed toward the Eaſt: but ſpecially for that they would not with them worſhip their Idolatrous gods, and were counted as enemies to all men, &c.

The Captains and Prelidents of this Perſecution under the Emperor were Hilerianus, Vigellius, Claudius, Hermianus Ruler of Cappadocia, Cecilius, Capella, Veſpronius, alſo Demetrius mentioned of Cyprian, and Aquila Judge of Alexandria, of whom Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 5. maketh relation.

The place where the force of this Perſecution moſt raged, were Africa, Alexandria, Cappadocia and Carthage. The number of them that ſuffered in this Perſecution, by the report of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory, was innumerable. Of whom the firſt was Leonides the Father of Origen, who was beheaded: with whom alſo Origen his Son, being of the age then of Seventeen years, ſhould have ſuffered (ſuch a fervent deſire he had to be martyred for Chriſt) had not his Mother privily in the night ſeaſon conveyed away his Clothes and his ſhirt. Whereupon more for ſhame to be ſeen, than for fear to die, he was conſtrained to remain at home: and when he could do nothing elſe, yet he writeth to his Father a Letter with theſe words, Cave tibi, ne quid propter nos aliud quam Martyrii conſtanter faciendi propoſitum cogites; that is, Take heed to your ſelf, that you turn not your thought and purpoſe for our ſake, &c. Such a fervency had this Origen, being yet young, to the Doctrine of Chriſts Faith, by the operation of Gods heavenly Providence, and partly alſo by the diligent Education of his Father, who brought him up from his Youth moſt ſtudiouſly in all good Literature, but eſpecially in the reading and exerciſe of holy Scripture, wherein he had ſuch inward and myſtical Speculation, that many times he would move queſtions to his Father of the meaning of this place or that place in the Scripture. Inſomuch that his Father divers times would uncover his breaſt being aſleep, and kiſs it, giving thanks to God which had made him ſo happy a Father of ſuch a happy Child. After the death of his Father, and all his Goods confiſcated to the Emperor, he with his poor Mother, and ſix Brethren were brought to ſuch extream Poverty, that he did ſuſtain both himſelf and them by teaching a School: till till at length, being weary of the Profeſſion, he transferred his ſtudy only to the knowledge and ſeeking of Divine Scripture, and ſuch other learning conducible to the ſame. So much he profited both in the Hebrew and other Tongues, that he conferred the Hebrew Text with the tranſlation of the threeſcore: and moreover did confer and find out the other tranſlations which we call the common tranſlation of Aquila, of Symmachus, and Theodotion. Alſo he adjoyned to theſe aforeſaid other four tranſlations, whereof more is in the ſtory of Euſebius expreſſed.

They that write of the life of Origen, teſtifie of him that he was of wit quick and ſharp, much patient of labour, a great traveller in the Tongues, of a ſpare diet, of a ſtrict life, a great faſter; his teaching and his living were both one: his going was much barefoot: a ſtrict obſerver of that ſaying of the Lord, Bidding to have but one Coat, &c. He is ſaid to have written ſo much as ſeven Notaries, and ſo many Maids every day could pen. The number of his Books, by the account of Hierome, came to ſeven thouſand Volumns, the Copies whereof he uſed to ſell for three pence, or a little more, for the ſuſtentation of his living. But of him more ſhall be touched hereafter. So zealous he was in the cauſe of Chriſt, and of Chriſts Martyrs, that he nothing fearing his own peril, would aſſiſt and exhort them going to their death, and kiſs them, inſomuch that he was oft in jeopardy to be ſtoned of the multitude; and ſometimes by the proviſion of Chriſtian men had his houſe guarded about with Souldiers, for the ſafety of them which daily reſorted to hear his Readings. And many times he was compelled to ſhift places and houſes, for ſuch as laid wait for him in all places: but great was the Providence of God to preſerve him in the midſt of all this tempeſt of Severus. Among others which reſorted unto him, and were his Hearers, Plutarchus was one, and died a Martyr; and with him Serenus his Brother, who was burned. The third after theſe was Heraclides, the fourth Heron, who were both beheaded. The fifth was another Serenus, alſo beheaded, Rhais and Potamiena who was tormented with Pitch poured upon her, and martyred with her Mother Marcella, who died alſo in the fire. This Potamiena was of a freſh and flouriſhing beauty, who becauſe ſhe could not be removed from her Profeſſion, was committed to Baſilides one of the Captains there in the Army, to ſee the execution done. Baſilides receiving her at the Judges hand, and leading her to the place, ſhewed her ſome Compaſſion in repreſſing the rebukes and railings of the wicked Adverſaries: for the which Potamiena the Virgin, to requite again his kindneſs, bad him be of good comfort, ſaying, That ſhe would pray the Lord to ſhew mercy upon him, and ſo went ſhe to her Martyrdom, which ſhe both ſtrongly and quietly did ſuſtain.

Plutarchus, Scholar of Origen and Serenus his Brother, martyred. Heraclides, Heron, Rhais, Potamiena, Marcella, Scholars of Origen and Martyrs.

Not long after it happened that Baſilides was required to give an Oath in a matter concerning his fellow Souldiers, which thing he denied to do, plainly affirming that he was a Chriſtian: for their Oath then was wont to be by the Idols and the Emperor. At the firſt he was thought diſſemblingly to jeſt, but after, when he was heard conſtantly and in earneſt, to confirm the ſame, he was had before the Judge, and ſo by him committed to Ward. The Chriſtians marveling thereat, as they came to him in the Priſon, inquired of him the cauſe of that his ſudden Converſion. To whom he anſwered again, and ſaid, That Potamiena had prayed for him to the Lord, and ſo he ſaw a Crown put upon his head; adding moreover, That it ſhould not be long but he ſhould be received. Which things thus done, the next day following he was had to the place of Execution, and there beheaded, Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 5. Albeit the ſaid Euſebius giveth this ſtory of no credit, but only of hear-ſay, as he there expreſſeth.

Baſilides of a Perſecutor made a Martyr.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 5.

As divers and many there were that ſuffered in the days of this Severus, ſo ſome there were again, which through the Protection of God his Providence being put to great torments, yet eſcaped with life. Of whom was one Alexander, who, for his conſtant confeſſion and torments ſuffered, was made Biſhop afterward of Hieruſalem, together with Narciſſus: who being then an old man of an hundred and threeſcore years and three, as ſaith Euſebius, was unweldy for his age to govern that Function alone.

Alexander Confeſſor and Biſhop of Jeruſalem. The notable age of Narciſſus, Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

Of this Narciſſus it is reported in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that certain Miracles by him were wrought, very notable, if they be true. Firſt, of Water by him turned into Oil, at the ſolemn Vigil of Eaſter, what time the Congregation wanted Oil for their Lamps. Another Miracle is alſo told of him, which is this, There were three evil diſpoſed perſons, who ſeeing the ſoundneſs and grave conſtancy of his vertuous life, and fearing their own puniſhment, as a Conſcience that is guilty is always fearful, thought to prevent his Accuſations, in accuſing him firſt, and laying an hainous Crime unto his Charge. And to make their Accuſation more probable before the people, they bound their Accuſation with a great Oath, one wiſhing to be deſtroyed with fire, if he ſaid not true; the other to be conſumed with a grievous ſickneſs; the third to loſe both his eyes if they did lie. Narciſſus, although having his Conſcience clear, yet not able, being but one man, to withſtand their Accuſation, bound with ſuch Oaths, gave place, and removed himſelf from the multitude into a ſolitary Deſart by himſelf, where he continued the ſpace of many years. In the mean time, to them which ſo willingly and wickedly forſware themſelves, this happened: The firſt, by caſualty of one little ſmall parkle of fire, was burnt with his Goods and all his Family. The ſecond was taken with a great ſickneſs from the top to the toe, and devoured with the ſame. The third, hearing and ſeeing the puniſhment of the other, confeſſed his fault, but through great repentance poured out ſuch tears, that he loſt both his eyes; and thus was their falſe Perjury puniſhed. Narciſſus, after long abſence returning home again, was by this means both cleared of the fact, and received into his Biſhoprick again: to whom as is ſaid, for impotency of his age, Alexander was joyned in execution of the Function. Euſebius, Hiſtor. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 10. Of this Alexander is recorded in the ſaid Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that after his Agonies and conſtancy of his Confeſſion ſhewed in the perſecution of Severus, he was admoniſhed by a Viſion in the night ſeaſon to make his journey up to Jeruſalem and Paleſtina (for that place remained free from this Perſecution) to ſee there the Congregation, and to pray. Thus he taking his Journey, and drawing near to the City, a Viſion with plain words was given to certain chief Heads of Jeruſalem, to go out of the Gate of the City, there to receive the Biſhop appointed to them of God. And ſo was Alexander met and received, and joyned Partner with aged Narciſſus, as is before expreſſed, in the City of Jeruſalem, where he continued Biſhop above forty years, until the Perſecution of Decius, and there erected a famous Library, where Euſebius had his chiefeſt help in writing his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He wrote alſo divers Epiſtles to divers Churches, and licenſed Origen openly to teach his Church. At length, being very aged, he was brought from Jeruſalem to Ceſarea before the Judge under Decius, where after his conſtant Confeſſion the ſecond time, he was committed to Priſon, and there died.

Beſides theſe that ſuffered in this Perſecution of Severus, recited of Euſebius, Vincentius alſo, Lib. 11. cap. 6. ex Martyrologio, ſpeaketh of one Andoclus, whom Polycarpus before had ſent into France: which Andoclus, becauſe he had ſpread there the Doctrine of Chriſt, was apprehended of Severus, and firſt beaten with Staves and Bats, and after was beheaded.

Andoclus Martyr.

To theſe above named, may alſo be added Aſclepiades, who, although he was not put to death in this Perſecution of Severus, yet conſtantly he did abide the Trial of his Confeſſion, and ſuffered much for the ſame, as Alexander before mentioned did. Wherefore, afterward he was ordained Biſhop of Antioch, where he continued the ſpace of ſeven years, of whom Alexander writes unto the Church of Antioch out of Priſon, much rejoycing and giving thanks to God, to hear that he was their Biſhop.

Aſclepiades Biſhop of Antioch Confeſſor.

About the ſame time, during the Reign of Severus, died Ireneus, Henr. de Erfordia, Ado, and other Martyr Writers do hold, that he was martyred with a great multitude of others more, for the Confeſſion and Doctrine of Chriſt, about the fourth or fifth year of Severus. This Ireneus, as he was a greater Writer, ſo was he greatly commended of Tertullian for his Learning, whom he calleth Omnium Doctrinarum curioſiſſimum explorato-rem. A great Searcher of all kind of Learning. He was firſt Scholar and Hearer of Polycarpus, from thence either was ſent, or came to France, and there by Photinus, and

and the reſt of the Martyrs, was inſtituted into the Miniſtry, and commended by their Letter to Eleutherius as is before premoniſhed. At length, after the Martyrdom of Photinus, he was appointed Biſhop of Lions, where he continued about the ſpace of three and twenty years. In the time of this Ireneus the ſtate of the Church was much troubled, not only for the outward Perſecution of the foreign enemy, but alſo for divers Sects and Errors then ſtirring, againſt which he diligently laboured, and wrote much, although but few Books be now remaining. The nature of this man, well agreeing with his name, was ſuch, that he ever loved peace, and ſought to ſet agreement when any controverſie roſe in the Church. And therefore, when the queſtion of keeping the Eaſter day was renewed in the Church between Victor Biſhop of Rome, and the Churches of Aſia, and when Victor would have excommunicated them as Schiſmaticks, for diſagreeing from him therein: Ireneus, with other brethren of the French Church, ſorry to ſee ſuch a contention among brethren for ſuch a trifle, convented themſelves together in a common Council, and directing their Letter with their common conſent ſubſcribed, ſent unto Victor, intreating him to ſtay his purpoſe, and not to proceed in excommunicating his brethren for that matter. Although they themſelves agreed with him in obſerving the Sunday Eaſter as he did: yet with great reaſons and arguments they exhorted him not to deal ſo rigorouſly with his other brethren, following the ancient Cuſtom of their Country manner in that behalf. And beſides this, he wrote divers other Letters abroad concerning the ſame contention, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of no force.

Tertullian Eccleſiaſtical Writer.

Not long after Ireneus followed alſo Tertullian about the time of this Severus and Antoninus Caracalla his Son, a Man both in Greek and Latine well expert, having great gifts in diſputing, and in writing eloquent, as his Books declare, and as the commendation of all learned men doth teſtify no leſs. To whom Vincentius Lirienſis giveth ſuch praiſe, that he calleth him the flower of all Latine Writers: and of the eloquence of his ſtile he thus writeth, that with the force of his reaſons, he ſaith, whom he could not perſwade, them he compelled to conſent unto him. How many words, ſo many ſentences, and how many ſentences, ſo many victories he had, &c.

The Apology of Tertullian defending the Chriſtians.

Such men of doing and writing God raiſed up from time to time, as pillars and ſtaies for his poor Church, as he did this Tertullian in theſe dangerous days of Perſecution. For when the Chriſtians were vexed with wrongs, and falſly accuſed of the Gentiles, Tertullian taking their cauſe in hand, defendeth them againſt the Perſecutors, and againſt their ſlanderous accuſations. Firſt, that they never minded any ſtir or rebellion, either againſt the Empire or Emperors of Rome: for ſo much as the uſe of Chriſtians was to pray for the ſtate of their Emperors and Governors. And whereas they were accuſed falſly to be enemies of all Mankind, how could that be (ſaith Tertullian to Scapula) ſeeing the proper office of the Chriſtians is by their profeſſion to pray for all men, to love their enemies, never requiting evil for evil, when as all other do love but only their friends, and ſcarcely them? As touching the horrible ſlander of murthering Infants, how can that be true in the Chriſtians (ſaith he) whoſe order is to abſtain from all blood and ſtrangled; inſomuch that it is not lawful for them to touch the blood of any beaſt at their Tables when they feed? from filthy copulation no ſort more free than they, which are, and ever have been, the greateſt obſervers of chaſtity, of whom, ſuch as may, live in perpetual virginity all their life; ſuch as cannot contract Matrimony, for avoiding all whoredom and fornication. Neither can it be proved that the Chriſtians do worſhip the Sun: which falſe ſurmiſe Tertullian declareth to riſe hereof, for that the manner of the Chriſtians was to pray toward the Eaſt. Much leſs was there any of them ſo mad as to worſhip an Aſſes head; whereof the occaſion being taken only of the Jews, the ſlander thereof therefore he proveth to be falſly and wrongfully laid to the charge of the Chriſtians.

Tertullianus ad Scapulam

The occaſion hereof, belike came of the Jews worſhipping the jaw of an Aſs in the ſtory of Sampſon.

And likewiſe againſt all other lies and ſlanders objected of the Heathen againſt the Chriſtians, the ſaid Tertullian purgeth the Chriſtians, declaring them falſly to be belied, and wrongfully perſecuted, not for any deſert of theirs, but only for the hatred of their name. And yet notwithſtanding, by the ſame Perſecutions, he proveth in the ſame Apology, the Religion of the Chriſtians nothing to be impaired, but rather increaſed. The more (ſaith he) we are mown down of you, the more riſe up. The blood of Chriſtians is Seed. For what man (ſaith he) in beholding the painful torments, and the perfect patience of them, will not ſearch and inquire what is the cauſe? And when hath found it out, who will not agree unto it? And when he agreeth to it, who will not deſire to ſuffer for it? Thus (ſaith he) this Sect will never die, which the more it is cut down, the more it groweth. For every man ſeeing and wondring at the ſufferance of the Saints, is moved the more thereby to ſearch the cauſe; in ſearching, he findeth it, and finding he followeth it. Tertullian. in eodem Apolog.

Tertul. in apologetico.

Thus Tertullian, in this dangerous time of Perſecution, being ſtirred up of God, defended the innocency of the Chriſtians againſt the blaſphemy of the adverſaries; and moreover, for the inſtruction of the Church he compiled many fruitful works, whereof ſome are extant, ſome are not to be found. Notwithſtanding the great learning and famous vertues of this worthy man, certain errors and blemiſhes are noted in his Doctrine, as were before both of Origen and Ireneus, and likewiſe of them, were they never ſo excellent that followed them. Which errors all here, in order to note and comprehend, were too long a matter for this ſtory to proſecute. This by the way ſhall be ſufficient to admoniſh the Reader, never to look for any ſuch perfection of any man in this world, how ſingular ſoever he be (Chriſt only excepted) but ſome blemiſh or other joyneth it ſelf withal, whereof more, perchance, ſhall be ſaid when we come to Cyprian.

The errors and imperfections in learned men noted.

Victor 8 Biſhop of Rome.

Victor reported of ſome to die a Martyr.

And now, to return again to the order of Biſhops of Rome intermitted: After Eleutherius afore mentioned, next in the Biſhoprick of Rome ſucceed Victor, who, as Platina ſaith, died quietly in the days of Severus. But Damaſus ſupplem. lib. 8. and ſuch as do follow the common Chronicles, affirm that he died a Martyr, after he had ſitten ten (or as ſome ſay twelve) years. This Victor was a great ſtirrer (as partly before is ſignified) in the controverſie and contention of Eaſter day, for the which he would have proceeded in Excommunication againſt the Churches of Aſia, had not Ireneus, then Biſhop of Lions, with the counſel of other his brethren there aſſembled, repreſſed his intended violence. As touching that controverſie of Eaſter in thoſe days of the Primitive Church, the original thereof was this, as Euſebius, Socrates, Platina, and others record: Firſt, certain it is, that the Apoſtles, being only intentive and attendant to the Doctrine of Salvation, gave no heed nor regard to the obſervation of days and times, neither bound the Church to any Ceremonies and Rites; except thoſe things neceſſary mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, as ſtrangled and blood, which was ordained then of the Holy Ghoſt, not without a moſt urgent and neceſſary cauſe, touched partly in the Hiſtory before. For when the murthering and blood of infants was commonly objected by the Heathen Perſecutors againſt the Chriſtians, they had no other argument to help themſelves, nor to repel the adverſary, but only their own law, by the which they were commanded to abſtain, not only from all mens blood, but alſo from the blood of all common beaſts. And therefore that law ſeemeth by the Holy Ghoſt to be given, and alſo to the ſame end continued in the Church, ſo long as the cauſe, that is, the Perſecutions of the Heathen Gentiles continued. Beſides theſe, we read of no other Ceremonies or Rites, which the Apoſtles greatly regarded, but left ſuch things free to the liberty of Chriſtians, every man to uſe therein his own diſcretion, for the uſing or not uſing thereof. Whereupon, as concerning all the ceremonial obſervations of days, times, places, meats, drinks, veſtures, and ſuch others: of all theſe things neither was the diverſity among men greatly noted, nor any uniformity greatly required. In ſo much that Ireneus writing to Victor of the tradition of days, and of faſtings, and of the diverſity of theſe things then uſed among the Primitive fathers, ſaith: Nihilo tamen minus omnes illi pacem inter ſe retinuerunt & retinemus etiamnum, & jejunii diſſonantia fidei concordiam commendat, &c. that is, Notwithſtanding all this variety, all they kept peace among themſelves, and yet we keep it ſtill, and this difference of faſting among us commendeth more the con-

Now to return to Victor again, to ſhew what diverſity there was in obſerving the day of Eaſter, and how it came, thus is the ſtory. Firſt, in the time of Pius and Anicetus in the year of Chriſt one hundred ſixty and three, the queſtion of Eaſter day began firſt to be moved, at what time Pius, by the revelation of Hermes, decreed the obſervation of that day to be changed from the wonted manner of the fourteenth day of the Moon in the firſt Moneth unto the next Sunday after. After him came Anicetus, Soter and Eleutherius Biſhops of Rome, which alſo determined the ſame. Againſt theſe ſtood Melito Biſhop of Sardis, Polycarpus, and as ſome think, Egeſippus, with other learned men of Aſia. Which Polycarpus, being ſent by the brethren of Aſia, came to Rome as is aforeſaid, to confer with Anicetus in that matter: wherein when they could not agree after long debating, yet notwithſtanding, they did both communicate together with reverence, and departed in peace. And ſo the celebration of Eaſter day remained adiaphoron, as a thing indifferent in the Church, till the time of Victor; who following after Anicetus and his fellows, and chiefly ſtirring in this matter, endeavoured by all means and might to draw, or rather ſubdue the Churches of Aſia unto his opinion; thinking moreover to excommunicate all thoſe Biſhops and Churches of Aſia, as Hereticks and Schiſmaticks, which diſagreed from the Roman order: had not Ireneus otherwiſe reſtrained him from that doing, as is aforeſaid, which was about the year of our Lord one hundred fourſcore and eleven, in the Reign of Commodus. Thus then began the uniformity of keeping that holy day to be firſt required as a thing neceſſary, and all they accounted as Hereticks and Schiſmaticks, which diſſented from the Biſhop and tradition of Rome.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 26.

Polycarpus and Anicetus diſagreeing in controverſie, yet agreed in charity.

Uniformity in ceremonies not to be required as a thing neceſſary.

With Victor ſtood Theophilus Biſhop of Ceſarea, Narciſſus of Jeruſalem, Ireneus of Lions, Palmas of Pontus, Banchillus of Corinth, the Biſhop of Oſtroena, and others more. All which condeſcended to have the celebration of Eaſter upon the Sunday, becauſe they would differ from the Jews in all things as near as they might, and partly, becauſe the reſurrection of the Lord fell on the ſame day.

Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus.

On the contrary ſide, divers Biſhops were in Aſia, of whom the principal was Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus, who being aſſembled with a great multitude of Biſhops and brethren of thoſe parts, by the common aſſent of the reſt, wrote again to Victor, and to the Church of Rome, declaring, that they had ever from the beginning obſerved that day, according to the rule of Scripture unchanged, neither adding nor altering any thing from the ſame: alledging moreover for them the examples of the Apoſtles and holy Fathers their Predeceſſors, as Philip the Apoſtle, with his three daughters at Hieropolis; Alſo John the Apoſtle and Evangeliſt at Epheſus, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Thraſeas at Eumenia Biſhop and Martyr; likewiſe of Sagaris at Laodicea Biſhop and Martyr, holy Papirius and Melito at Sardis. Beſide theſe, Biſhops alſo of his own kindred, and his own anceſtors, to the number of ſeven which all were Biſhops before him, and he the eighth now after them. All which obſerved (ſaith he) the ſolemnity of the ſame day, after the ſame wiſe and ſort as we do now.

Biſhops in thoſe days married.

Victor excommunicating the Churches of Aſia.

Victor, being not a little moved herewith, by letters again denounceth againſt them (more bold upon authority, than wiſe in his commiſſion) violent excommunication, albeit by the wiſe handling of Ireneus, and other learned men, that matter was ſtaid, and Victor otherwiſe perſwaded. What the perſwaſions of Ireneus were, partly may appear in Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 26. the ſum whereof tendeth to this effect: That the variance and difference of Ceremonies is no ſtrange matter in the Church of Chriſt, when as this variety is not only in the day of Eaſter, but alſo in the manner of faſting, and in divers other uſages among the Chriſtians. For ſome faſt one day, ſome two days, ſome others faſt more. Others there be, which counting forty hours, both day and night, take that for a full days faſt. And this ſo divers faſhion of faſting in the Church of Chriſt began not only in this our time, but was before among our fore-elders. And yet notwithſtanding, they with all this diverſity were in unity among themſelves, and ſo be we; neither doth this difference of Ceremonies any thing hinder, but rather commendeth the concord of faith. And he bringeth forth the examples of the Fathers of Teleſphorus, Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and ſuch others, who neither obſerved the ſame uſage themſelves, nor preſcribed it to others, and yet notwithſtanding kept Chriſtian Charity with ſuch as came to communicate with them, not obſerving the ſame form of things which they obſerved, as well appeared by Polycarpus and Anicetus, which although they agreed not in one uniform cuſtom of Rites, yet refuſed not to communicate together, the one giving reverence unto the other. Thus the controverſie being taken up between Ireneus and Victor, remained free to the time of the Nicene Council. Hæc ex Irenæo. Euſebius. And thus much concerning the controverſie of that matter, and concerning the doings of Victor.

Diverſity commendeth the concord of faith.

After Victor, ſucceeded in the See of Rome, Zephirinus, in the days of the foreſaid Severus, about the year of our Lord two hundred and three. To this Zephirinus be aſcribed two Epiſtles, in the firſt Tome of the Councils. But as I have ſaid before of the Decretal Epiſtles of other Roman Biſhops, ſo I ſay and verily ſuppoſe of this; that neither the countenance of the ſtile, nor the matter therein contained, nor the condition of the time doth otherwiſe give to think of theſe Letters, but that they be verily baſtard Letters, not written by theſe fathers, nor in theſe times, but craftily and wickedly packt in by ſome, which, to let up the Primacy of Rome, have moſt pettilently abuſed the authority of theſe holy and ancient Fathers, to deceive the ſimple Church. For who is ſo rude, but that in conſidering only the ſtate of thoſe terrible times he may eaſily underſtand (except affection blind him) beſide a number of other probable conjectures to lead him, that the poor perſecuted Biſhops in that time would have been glad to have any ſafe covert to put their heads in: ſo far was it off, that they had any luſt or leiſure then to ſeek for any Primacy or Patriarkſhip, or to drive all other Churches to appeal to the See of Rome, or to exempt all Prieſts from the accuſation of any Lay-man; as in the firſt Epiſtle of Zephirinus is to be ſeen, written to the Biſhops of Sicilia: and likewiſe the ſecond Epiſtle of his to the Biſhops of the Province of Egypt, containing no manner of doctrine, nor conſolation neceſſary for that time, but only certain ritual decrees to that purpoſe, argueth no leſs, but the ſaid Epiſtles neither ſo favour of that man, nor to taſte of that time.

Of like credit alſo ſeemeth the conſtitution of the patins of glaſs, which Damaſus ſaith that the ſame Zephirinus ordained to be carried before the Prieſt at the celebration of the Maſs. Again Platina writeth that he ordained the adminiſtration of the Sacrament to be no more uſed in veſſels of Wood, or of Glaſs, or of any other Metal except only Silver, Gold and Tin, &c. But how theſe two teſtimonies of Damaſus and Platina joyn together, let the Reader judge: eſpecially, ſeeing the ſame Decree is referred to Urbanus that came after him. Again, what needed this Decree of Golden Chalices to be eſtabliſhed afterward in the Council of Tiber and Rhenes if it had been enacted before by Zephirinus? How long this Zephirinus ſate, our Writers do vary. Euſebius ſaith, he died in the Reign of Caracalla, and ſate ſeventeen years. Platina writeth that he died under Severus, and ſat eight years, and ſo ſaith alſo Nauclerus. Damaſus affirmeth that he ſat ſixteen years and two moneths.

Matheus Author of the Story intituled Flores hiſtoriarum, with other later Chronicles, maketh mention of Perpetua, and Felicitas, and Revocatus her brother, alſo of Saturninus and Satyrus brethren, and Secundulus, which in the Perſecution of this Severus gave over their lives to Martyrdom for Chriſt, being thrown to Wild beaſts, and devoured of the ſame in Carthage and in Africk, ſave that Saturninus brought again from the beaſts was beheaded, and Secundulus died in Priſon about the year of our Lord two hundred and two, as writeth Florilegus.

Severus warreth in Britain.

This Severus the Perſecutor reigned, as the moſt part of Writers accord, the term of eighteen years, who about the later time of his Reign came with his Army hither into Britain, where after many conflicts had with the Britains, in the borders of the North, he caſt up a Ditch with a mighty Wall made of earth and turfs, and ſtrong ſtakes, to the length of one hundred thirty and two miles from the one ſide of the Sea to the other, beginning at Time, and reaching to the Scotiſh Sea: which done, he removed to York, and there by the breaking in of the Northern men and Scots, was beſieged and ſlain, about the yeat of our Lord two hundred and fourteen, leaving behind him two ſons, Baſſianus and Geta. Which Baſſianus, ſirnamed Caracalla, after he had ſlain his brother Geta here in Britain, governed the Empire alone, the ſpace of ſix years. After whoſe death, he being ſlain alſo of his ſervants (as he had ſlain his Brother before) ſucceeded Macrinus with his Son Diadumenus, to be Emperor, who, after they had reigned one year, were both ſlain of their own people.

A wall between England builded one hundred thirty and two miles in length.

Anno 219.

After them followed Varius Heliogabalus in the Empire, rather to be called a Monſter than a Man, ſo prodigious was his life in all gluttony, filthineſs, and ribaudry. Such was his pomp, that in his Lamps he uſed Balm, and filled his Fiſh-ponds with Roſe water. To let paſs his ſumptuous Veſtures which he would not wear but only of Gold, and moſt coſtly ſilks; his ſhooes gliſtering with precious Stones finely ingraved, he was never two days ſerved with one kind of meat; he never wore one garment twice. And likewiſe for his fleſhly wickedneſs, ſome days his company was ſerved at Meal with the Brains of Oſtriches, and a ſtrange Fowl called Phenocoptery, another day with the tongues of Popingays, and other ſweet ſinging Birds. Being nigh to the Sea, he never uſed Fiſh: in places far diſtant from the Sea, all his houſe was ſerved with moſt delicate Fiſhes: at one Supper he was ſerved with ſeven thouſand Fiſhes, and five thouſand Fowls. At his removing in his progreſs, often there followed him ſix hundred Chariots laden only with Bawds, common Harlots and Ribauds. He ſacrificed young children, and preferred to the beſt advancements in the common Weal moſt light Perſonages, as Bawds, Minſtrels, Carters, and ſuch like: in one word, he was an enemy to all honeſty and good order. And when he was foretold by his Sorcerers and Aſtronomers, that he ſhould die a violent death, he provided Ropes of Silk to hang himſelf, Swords of Gold to kill himſelf, and ſtrong Poyſon in Jacinths and Emrods to poyſon himſelf, if needs he muſt thereto be forced; moreover, he made an high Tower, having the Floor of Boards covered with Gold Plate, bordered with precious ſtones, from the which Tower he would throw himſelf down, if he ſhould be purſued of his enemies. But notwithſtanding all his proviſion, he was ſlain of the Soldiers, drawn through the City, and caſt into Tiber, after he had reigned two years and eight months, as witneſſeth Eutropius, others ſay four years.

The monſtrous life of Heliogabalus Emperor.

A prodigious belly-God.

Heliogabalus ſlain of his ſouldiers. Ex Eutrop.

This Heliogabalus, having no iſſue, adopted to his Son and Heir Aurelius Alexander Severus, the Son of Mammea, who entring his Reign the year of our Lord two hundred twenty and four, continued thirteen years, well commended for vertuous, wiſe, gentle, liberal, and to no man hurtful. And as he was not unlearned himſelf, through the diligent education of Mammea his Mother, ſo he was a great favourer of men wiſe and learned. Neither did he any thing in the Commonweal, without the aſſiſtance of learned and ſage Counſellors. It is reported of him to bear ſuch ſtomach againſt corrupt Judges, that when he chanced to meet with any of them, by the commotion of his mind he would caſt up choler, being ſo moved with them that he could not ſpeak, and was ready with his two fingers to put out their eyes. From his Court he diſmiſſed all ſuperfluous and unneedful ſervants, ſaying, that he was no good Pupil, which fed idle ſervants with the bowels of his Commonweal.

Alexander Severus Emperor.

Anno 224.

Againſt corrupt Judges. The ſaying of Alexander to be noted and followed.

Idle ſervants eat up the bowels of the Commonweal.

Among his other good vertues, it appeareth alſo that he was friendly and favourable unto the Chriſtians, as by this act may be gathered: for when the Chriſtians had occupied a certain publick place in ſome good uſe, belike for the aſſembling and conventing together of the Congregation; the company of the Cooks or Tiplers made challenge of that place to belong unto them. The matter being brought before the Emperor, he judged it more honeſt, the place to be continued to the worſhip of God, howſoever it were, than the dirty ſlubbering of Cooks and Scullions.

A note worthy to be marked.

By this it may be underſtood, that in Rome no Chriſtian Churches were erected unto this time, when as yet (notwithſtanding this favour of the Emperor,) no publick houſe could quietly be obtained for the Chriſtians. So that by the reaſon hereof may appear the Decretal Epiſtle and Ordinance of Pope Higinus concerning the Dedication of Churches above mentioned to be falſified. And likewiſe the Ordinance of Pius his ſucceſſor, concerning the Altar, or Superaltare to be alſo falſe. For what Superaltare was it like they had in the time of Higinus and Pius, when at this time, which was long after, no publick place almoſt could be granted them for the Chriſtians to aſſemble together.

Platina in vita Pontiani.

Of this Alexander Platina writeth, that as he was a great hater of all boaſters and flatterers, ſo he was of ſuch prudence, that no deceit could eſcape him, and bringeth in a ſtory of one Turinus, who had gotten craftily many great bribes and gifts, in making the people believe that he was of great authority with the Emperor, and that he could help them to have whatſoever they ſued for. Whereof the Emperor being certified, cauſed him in the open Market to be faſtned to a Stake, and there killed with ſmoke, where the Crier ſtood thus crying to the People, Smoke he ſold, and with ſmoke he is puniſhed.

Puniſhed with ſmoke, that ſold ſmoke.

Mammea the Mother of this Alexander above mentioned (whom Hierome calleth a devout and religious woman) hearing of the fame and the excellent learning of Origen, being then at Alexandria, ſent for him to Antioch, deſirous to hear and ſee him: unto whom the foreſaid Origen according to her requeſt reſorted, and after that he had there remained a ſpace with the Emperor and his Mother, returned again to Alexandria.

Mammea the Mother of the Emperor.

And thus continued this good Emperor his Reign the ſpace of 13 years; at length at a commotion in Germany, with his Mother Mammea he was ſlain. After whom ſucceeded Maximinus, contrary to the mind of the Senate, only appointed by the Souldiers to be Emperor. During all this time between Severus and this Maximinus, the Church of Chriſt, although it had not perfect peace, yet it had ſome mean tranquility from Perſecution. Albeit ſome Martyrs there were at this time that ſuffered, whereof Nauclerus giveth this reaſon: For although (ſaith he) Alexander being perſwaded through the intreating of his Mother Mammea, did favour the Chriſtians: yet notwithſtanding, there was no publick Edict or Proclamation provided for their ſafeguard. By reaſon whereof, divers there were which ſuffered Martyrdom under Almachius and other Judges. In the number of whom, after ſome ſtories, was Calixtus Biſhop of Rome, who ſucceeded next unto Zephirinus above mentioned; and after him Urbanus alſo, which both being Biſhops of Rome, did both ſuffer, by the opinion of ſome Writers, under Alexander Severus.

Ex Nauclero.

Calixtus Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

This Calixtus in his two Decretal Epiſtles, written to Benedictus, and to the Biſhops of France, giveth theſe ordinances, that no actions or accuſations againſt the Prelats or Teachers of the Church ſhould be received, that no ſecret conſpiracies ſhould be made againſt Biſhops: Item, no man to communicate with perſons excommunicate: alſo no Biſhop to excommunicate or to deal in anothers Dioceſs. And here he expoundeth the Dioceſs, or the Pariſh of any Biſhop or Miniſter to be his Wife. The wife (ſaith the Apoſtle) is bound to the law, as long as the husband liveth; when he is dead, ſhe is free from the law: So (ſaith Calixtus) the wife of a Biſhop (which is his Church) ſo long as he liveth, is bound only to him, neither ought to be judged or diſpoſed by any other man, without his will and judgment: after his death ſhe is free from the law, to marry to whom ſhe will, ſo it be in the Lord, that is regulariter, regularly. In the end of the ſaid his Epiſtle Decretal, he confuteth the error of them which hold, that they which are fallen are not to be received again. Which Hereſie, after the time of Calixtus or Caliſtus, came in firſt by Novatus, in the days of Cornelius. Moreover, in his ſaid firſt Epiſtle Decretal is contained the faſt of the four times, commonly called the Ember faſt, whereof alſo Marianus Scotus maketh mention. But Damaſus ſpeaking of the ſame faſt, ſaith, he ordained the faſt but of three times, which was for the increaſe of Corn, Wine and Oyl.

The decretal Epiſtles of Calixtus examined.

The place of St. Paul unjuſtly expounded.

Ember Faſt firſt ordained.

By theſe hitherto premiſed, it is not hard for a quick Reader to ſmell out the crafty jugling of that perſon or perſons, whoſoever they were, that falſly have aſcribed theſe Decretal inſtitutions to thoſe holy Fathers. For firſt, what leiſure had the Chriſtians to lay in their accuſations againſt their Biſhops, when we never read or find in any ſtory any kind of variance in thoſe days among them, but all love, mutual compaſſion, and hearty communion among the Saints? And as we read of no variance among the people in thoſe days, nor of any fault or backſliding among the Biſhops, who for the moſt part then died all conſtant Martyrs: ſo neither do we read of any Tribunal Seat or Conſiſtory uſed or frequented then about any ſuch matters. Again, if a man examine well the dangers of thoſe buſie days, he ſhall ſee the poor flock of the Chriſtians ſo occupied and pitiouſly oppreſſed by the cruel accuſations of the Heathen Infidels, that though the cauſe did, yet the time would not ſerve them to commence any Law againſt their Biſhops. Secondly, as touching their conſpiracy againſt Biſhops, What conſpiracy either would they then practice againſt them, which always gave their lives for their defence? Or how could they then conſpire in any companies together, when never a true Chriſtian man durſt once put his head out of his doors? neither was there in the Church any Chriſtian man in thoſe perilous days, except he were a true man indeed, ſuch as was far from all falſe conſpiracies. And when as all the World almoſt in all places conſpired againſt them: what time, what cauſe, or what heart, trow ye, could they have to conſpire againſt their inſtructors? Thirdly, concerning the confutation of that Hereſie, how ſtandeth the confutation with the time of Calixtus, when Novatus the Author of that Hereſie was after him in the time of Cornelius? Fourthly, if by the law of Calixtus, every Dioceſs be the proper Wife of every Biſhop or Miniſter, then how many Biſhops Wives and Parſons Wives, had the adulterous Pope of Rome deflour-ed in theſe later days of the Church, which ſo proudly and impudently hath intermedled and taken his pleaſure, and his own profit, in every Dioceſs and Pariſh almoſt through all Chriſtendom, without all leave and licence of the good man, who hath been in the mean time and yet is compelled ſtill, whereſoever the Popes holineſs cometh, Vigilante ſtertere naſo, and to give him leave unasked to do what he liſt? Wherefore if this Canon Decretal be truly his, why is it not obſerved, ſo as it doth ſtand without exception? If it be not, why is it then falſly forged upon him, and the Church of Chriſt deceived? and certes, lamentable it is, that this falſifying of ſuch trifling traditions, under the falſe pretence of antiquity, either was begun in the Church to deceive the people, or that it hath remained ſo long undetected. For, as I think, the Church of Chriſt will never be perfectly reformed, before theſe Decretal Conſtitutions and Epiſtles, which have ſo long put on the Viſor of Antiquity, ſhall be fully detected, and appear in their own colour, wherein they were firſt painted.

Againſt the decretal epiſtles and conſtitutions.

And yet neither do I ſay this, or think contrary, but that it may be, that Biſhops of Rome and of the ſame name have been the true authors of theſe traditions. But here cometh in the error (as I credibly ſuppoſe) that when other later Biſhops of the like name have deviſed theſe ceremonial inventions, the vulgar opinion of men hath transferred them to the firſt primitive fathers, although being of another time, yet bearing the ſame name with the true inventors thereof. But of Calixtus enough: who, as Damaſus ſaith, in the days of this Alexander Severus died a Martyr. Vincentius affirmeth, that he was tied to a great ſtone, and ſo out of a Window was thrown into a ditch. Euſebius, ſpeaking of his death, maketh no mention of his Martyrdom, and ſaith he ſate five years, Platina ſaith ſix years, Sabellicus giveth him ſeven years, and ſo doth Damaſus.

Urbanus Biſhop of Rome. Anno 227.

After Calixtus followed Urbanus, about the year of our Lord two hundred twenty ſeven, who in his Epiſtle Decretal (coming out of the ſame forge) which he wrote in common to all Biſhops, making no mention of the heavy Perſecutions of the Church, nor miniſtring any exhortation of comfort or conſtancy to the brethren, only giveth many ſtrict precepts, for not tranſporting or alienating the goods of the Church, and to pay truly their offerings which they vow: alſo to have all common among the Clergy. Moreover, about the end of his Epiſtle he inſtituteth the confirmation of Children after Baptiſm (which the Papiſts be wont to take into the number of their ſeven Sacraments;) affirming and denouncing more than Scripture will bear, that the impoſition of the Biſhops hand bringeth the Holy Ghoſt, and that thereby men be made full Chriſtians, &c. But of theſe Decretal Epiſtles enough is ſaid before, more may be conſidered of the diſcreet Reader. Marianus Scotus, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, and other late ſtory Writers do hold, as is aforeſaid, that he died a Martyr in the days of Alexander Severus, after he had governed that ſeat four years, as Damaſus and Platina do witneſs, as Marianus ſaith, eight years.

Confirmation of Children inſtituted.

Urbanus martyred.

The ſame Damaſus and Platina do teſtifie of him, that he by his preaching and holineſs of life, converted divers Ethniks to the faith. Among whom were Tiburtius, and Valerianus the Husband of Cecilia, which both, being Noblemen of Rome, remained conſtant in the faith unto the end and Martyrdom. Of this Cecilia thus it is written in the Martyrology by Ado, that Cecilia the Virgin, after ſhe had brought Valerian her Husband eſpouſed, and Tiburtius his brother to the knowledge and faith of Chriſt, and with her exhortations had made them conſtant unto Martyrdom; after the ſuffering of them ſhe was alſo apprehended by Almachius the Ruler, and brought to the Idols to do ſacrifice: which thing when ſhe abhorred to do, ſhe ſhould be preſented before the Judge to have the condemnation of death. In the mean time, the Serjeants and Officers which were about her, beholding her comely beauty, and the prudent behaviour in her converſation, began with many perſwaſions of words to ſollicite her mind to favour her ſelf, and that ſo excellent beauty, and not to caſt her ſelf away, &c. But ſhe again ſo replied to them with reaſons and godly exhortations, that by the grace of Almighty God their hearts began to kindle, and at length to yield to that Religion, which before they did perſecute. Which thing ſhe perceiving deſired of the Judge Almachius a little reſpite: which being granted, ſhe ſendeth for Urbanus the Biſhop home to her houſe, to ſtabliſh and ground them in the faith of Chriſt: and ſo were they with divers others at the ſame time baptiſed, both men and women, to the number (as the ſtory ſaith) of 400 perſons, among whom was one Gordianus a Nobleman. This done, this bleſſed Martyr was brought before the Judge, where ſhe was condemned; then after was brought to the houſe of the Judge, where ſhe was incloſed in a hot bath; but ſhe remaining there a whole day and night without any hurt, as in a cold place, was brought out again, and commandment given that in the Bath ſhe ſhould be beheaded. The Executer is ſaid to have four ſtrokes at her neck; and yet her head being cut off, ſhe (as the ſtory giveth) lived three days after, and ſo died this holy Virgin Martyr, whoſe body in the night ſeaſon Urbanus the Biſhop took and buried among the other Biſhops. Ado the compiler of this Martyrology addeth that this was done in the time of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. But that cannot be, for ſo much as Urbanus by all Hiſtories was long after thoſe Emperors, and lived in the days of this Alexander, as is above declared. Antoninus Bergomenſis, Equilinus, with ſuch other Writers ſet forth this Hiſtory with many ſtrange Miracles wrought by the ſaid Cecilia, in converting her Husband Valerianus and his brother, in ſhewing them the Angel which was the keeper of her Virginity, and of the Angel putting on Crowns upon their heads. But as touching theſe Miracles, as I do not diſpute whether they be true or fabulous, ſo becauſe they have no ground upon any ancient or grave Authors, but are taken out of certain new Legends, I do therefore refer them thither from whence they came.

The Martyrdom of Cecilia.

Under the ſame Alexander divers other there be, whom Bergomenſis mentioned to have ſuffered Martyrdom, as one Agapetus of the age of fifteen years, who being apprehended and condemned at Vreneſte in Italy, becauſe he would not ſacrifice to idols, was aſſailed with ſundry torments: firſt with Whips ſcourged, then hanged up by the feet, after having hot water poured upon him, at the laſt caſt to the wild beaſts: with all which torments when he could not be hurt, finally, with ſword was beheaded. The Executer of theſe puniſhments (as by Henricus Erford may be gathered) was one Antiochus; who in the executing of the foreſaid torments ſuddenly fell down from his Judicial Seat, crying out, that all his inward bowels burned within him, and ſo gave up the breath. Henr. de Erfordia, lib. 6. cap. 29.

Calepodius martyr.

Alſo with the ſame Agapetus is numbred Calepodius a Miniſter of Rome, whoſe body firſt was drawn through the City of Rome, and after caſt into Tiber. Bergo. Ibidem.

Pammachius with his wife and Children martyrs. Forty and two martyrs. Simplicius martyr.

Then followeth Pammachius a Senator of Rome, with his wife and children, and others both men and women, to the number of forty and two.

Item, another noble Senator of Rome named Simplicius, all which together in one day had their heads ſmitten off, and their heads after hanged up in divers gates of the City for a terrour of others, that none ſhould profeſs the name of Chriſt.

Quiritius, Julia his mother, martyrs.

Beſides theſe ſuffered alſo Quiritius a noble man of Rome, who, with his mother Julia and a great number more, were put likewiſe to death.

Tiberius, Valerianus, brethren and martyrs.

Alſo Tiberius and Valerianus Citizens of Rome, and brethren, ſuffered (as Bergomenſis ſaith) the ſame time, who, firſt being bruiſed and broken with bats, after were beheaded.

Marina a virgin and martyr.

Alſo Vincentius, Bergomenſis, and Erfordienſis make mention of Martina a Chriſtian Virgin, which, after divers bitter Puniſhments being conſtant in her faith, ſuffered in like manner by the ſword.

Albeit as touching the time of theſe forenamed Martyrs, as I find them not in older writers: So do I ſuppoſe them to ſuffer under Maximinus or Decius, rather than under Alexander.

The ſixth Perſecution.

Maximinus Emperor and perſecutor. The ſixth perſecution. { Anno 237 }

After the death of Alexander the Emperor, who with his mother Mammea (as is ſaid) was murdered in Germany, followed Maximinus, choſen by the will of the Souldiers, rather than by the authority of the Senate, about the year of our Lord, two hundred thirty and ſeven; who for the hatred he had to the houſe of Alexander (as Euſebius recordeth) raiſed up the ſixth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, eſpecially againſt the teachers and leaders of the Church, thinking thereby the ſooner to vanquiſh the reſt, if the Captains of them were removed out of the way. Whereby I ſuppoſe the Martyrdom of Urbanus the Biſhop, and of the reſt above ſpecified, to have happened rather under the Tyranny of this Maximinus than under Alexander.

Origenes de martyrio.

In the time of this Perſecution Origen wrote his Book. De Martyrio: which book if it were extant would give us ſome knowledge, I doubt not, of ſuch as in this Perſecution did ſuffer, which now lie in ſilence unknown, and no doubt but a great number they were, and more ſhould have been, had not the provident mercy of God, ſhortned his days and bridled his Tyranny, for he Reigned but three years. After whom ſucceeded Gordianus in the year of our Lord two hundred and forty, a man no leſs ſtudious for the utility of the Common-wealth, than mild and gentle to the Chriſtians. This Gordianus, after he had governed with much peace and tranquillity the Monarchy of Rome the ſpace of ſix years, was ſlain of Philip Emperor after him.

Gordianus Emperor. { Anno 240. }

Pontianus Biſhop of Rome. Diverſity between Damaſus and Euſebius.

In the days of theſe Emperors above recited was Pontianus Biſhop of Rome, who ſucceeded next after Urbanus above rehearſed, about the year of our Lord two hundred thirty and ſix, in the twelfth year of Alexander, as Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 28. noteth, declaring him to ſit ſix years. Contrary Damaſus and Platina write, that he was Biſhop nine years and a half, and that in the time of Alexander he with Philippus his Prieſt was baniſhed into Sardinia, and there died. But it ſeemeth more credible that he was baniſhed rather under Maximinus, and died in the beginning of the Reign of Gordianus. In his Epiſtles decretal (which ſeem likewiſe to be fained) he appeareth very devout, after the common example of other Biſhops, to uphold the dignity of Prieſts, and of Clergy men, ſaying; that God hath them ſo familiar with him, that by them he accepteth the offerings and oblations of others, he forgiveth their ſins, and reconcileth them unto him: Alſo, that they do make the body of the Lord with their own mouth, and give it to others, &c. which doctrine how it ſtandeth with the teſtament of God and glory of Chriſt, let the Reader uſe his own Judgment.

Pontianus baniſhed.

This doctrine ſeemeth derogatory to Chriſt and blaſphemous.

Other notable Fathers alſo in the ſame time were raiſed up in the Church, as Philetus Biſhop of Antioch, which ſucceeded after Aſclopiades afore mentioned, in the year of our Lord two hundred and twenty, and after him Zebenus Biſhop of the ſame place, in the year of our Lord two hundred thirty and one.

Ammonius a Chriſtian writer.

To theſe alſo may be added Ammonius the ſchoolmaſter of Origen, as Suidas ſuppoſeth, alſo the kinſmen of Porphyrie, the great Enemy of Chriſt: Notwithſtanding, this Ammonius indued with better grace as he left divers Books in defence of Chriſts Religion, ſo did he conſtantly perſevere (as Euſebius reporteth) in the doctrine of Chriſt, which he had in the beginning received, who was about the days of Alexander.

Julius Aphricanus writer.

Julius Aphricanus alſo, about the time of Gordianus aforeſaid, is numbred among the old and ancient writers, of whom Nicephorus writeth that he was the ſcholar of Origen, and a great writer of hiſtories of that time.

Natalius, confeſſor. Ex Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 28.

Unto theſe Doctors and confeſſors may be adjoyned the ſtory of Natalius mentioned in the firſt Book of Euſebius. This Natalius, had ſuffered Perſecution before like a conſtant coſeſſor, and was ſeduced and perſwaded by Aſclepiodotus and Theodorus (which were the diſciples of Theodocus) to take upon him to be Biſhop of their ſect, promiſing to give him every month an hundred and fifty pieces of ſilver: And ſo joyning himſelf to them, was admoniſhed by viſion and revelation from the Lord; for ſuch was the great mercy of God, and of our Lord Chriſt Jeſus, that he would not have his Martyr, which had ſuffered ſo much for his name before, now to periſh out of his Church: For the which cauſe (ſaith Euſebius) God by certain viſions did admoniſh him; but he not taking great heed thereunto, being blinded partly with lucre, partly with honour, was at length all the night long ſcourged of the Angels, in ſo much that he being made thereby very ſore, and early on the morrow putting on ſack-cloth, with much weeping and lamentation went to Zephirinus the Biſhop above mentioned, where he falling down before him and all the Chriſtian Congregation, ſhewed them the ſtripes of his body, and prayed them for the mercies of Chriſt, that he might be received into their communion again, from which he had ſequeſtred himſelf before, and ſo was admitted according as he deſired.

The Lord will not loſe them which have done or ſuffered any thing for him.

Anterius Biſhop of Rome martyr.

After the deceaſe of Pontianus Biſhop of Rome aforementioned, ſucceeded next in that place Anterius, of whom Iſuardus writeth, that Pontianus departing away did ſubſtitute him in his room: But Euſebius writeth that he ſucceeded immediately after him. Damaſus ſaith, that becauſe he cauſed the acts and deaths of the Martyrs to be written, therefore he was put to Martyrdom himſelf by Maximinus the Judge. Concerning the time of this Biſhop our writers do greatly Jarr. Euſebius and Marianus Scotus affirm that he was Biſhop but one month; Sabellicus ſaith that not to be ſo. Damaſus aſſigneth to him twelve years and one month. Volateranus, Bergomenſis, and Henricus Erford give to him three years and one month. Nauclerus writeth that he ſat one year and one month. All which are ſo far diſcrepant one from another, that which of them moſt agreeth with truth, it lieth in doubt. Next to this Biſhop was Fabianus, of whom more is to be ſaid hereafter.

Authors diſagree.

Hipp. lytus Biſhop and martyr.

Of Hippolytus alſo both Euſebius and Hieronymus maketh mention that he was a Biſhop; but where, they make no relation. And ſo likewiſe doth Theodoretus witneſs him to be a Biſhop, and alſo a Martyr, but naming no place. Gelatius contra Eutichen ſaith, he died a Martyr, and that he was Biſhop of an head City in Arabia. Nicephorus writeth, that he was Biſhop of Oſtia, a port town near to Rome. Certain it is, he was a great writer, and left many works in the Church, which Euſebius and Hierome do recite: By the ſupputation of Euſebius, he was about the year of our Lord, two hundred and thirty.

Prudentius Periſtephanon.

Prudentius in his Periſtephanon, making mention of great heaps of Martyrs buried by threeſcore together, ſpeaketh alſo of Hippolytus, and ſaith that he was drawn with wild Horſes through fields, dales and buſhes, and deſcribeth thereof a pitiful ſtory.

Philippus Emperor. { Anno 245. }

After the Emperor Gordianus, the Empire fell to Philippus, who with Philip his ſon, governed the ſpace of ſeven years, in the year of our Lord, two hundred forty and ſix. This Philippus with his ſon and all his family was Chriſtened and converted by Fabianus and Origen, by whom by letters exhorted him and Severa his wife to be Baptiſed, being the firſt of all the Emperors that brought in Chriſtianity into the Imperial ſeat. Howſoever Pom-

Philippus the firſt Chriſtian Emperor.

ponius Letus reporteth him to be a diſſembling Prince, this is certain, that for his Chriſtianity he with his Son was ſlain of Decius, one of his Captains, Sabellicus Bargomenſis, lib. 8. ſheweth this hatred of Decius againſt Philippus to be conceived, for that the Emperor Philip both the father and the Son had committed their Treaſures unto Fabianus, then Biſhop of Rome.

The ſeventh Perſecution.

Decius Emperor. { Anno } 250. { The ſeventh Perſecution. The cauſe and occaſion of this perſecution.

THus Philippus being ſlain, after him Decius invaded the Crown about the year of our Lord two hundred and fifty, by whom was moved a terrible Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which Oroſius noteth to be the ſeventh Perſecution. The firſt occaſion of this hatred and Perſecution of this Tyrant, conceived againſt the Chriſtians, was chiefly (as is before touched) becauſe of the treaſures of the Emperor which were committed to Fabian the Biſhop.

Fabianus Biſhop of Rome. Euſeb. lib.6.

This Fabian firſt being a married man (as Platina writeth) was made Biſhop of Rome after Anterius above mentioned, by the miraculous appointment of God, which Euſebius doth thus deſcribe in his ſixth Book. When the brethren (ſaith he) were together in the Congregation about the election of their Biſhop, and had purpoſed among themſelves upon the nomination of ſome noble and worthy perſonage of Rome, it chanced that Fabianus among others was there preſent, who of late before was newly come out of the Country to inhabite in the City. This Fabian (as is ſaid) thinking nothing leſs than of any ſuch matter, there ſuddenly cometh a Dove flying from above, and ſitteth upon his head, whereupon all the Congregation being moved, with one mind and one voice to chooſe him for their Biſhop, in the which Function he remained the ſpace of thirteen years, as Euſebius writeth; Damaſus, Marianus and Sabellicus ſay fourteen years unto the time of Decius: who, whether for that Philippus had committed to him his treaſures, or whether for the hatred he bare to Philippus, in the beginning of his Reign cauſed him to be put to death, ſending out moreover his Proclamation into all quarters, that all which profeſſed the name of Chriſt ſhould be ſlain.

The miraculous election of Fabianus.

Fabianus Martyr.

The Ordinances of Fabianus pretenſed. Oyl and Cream. Accuſing of Biſhops. Appealing to the See Apoſtolical. Marriage not within the fifth degree.

To this Fabian be aſcribed certain Ordinances, as of conſecrating new Oyl once every year, and burning the old, of accuſations againſt Biſhops, of appealing to the Sea Apoſtolick, of not marrying within the fifth degree, of communicating thrice a year, of offering every Sunday, with ſuch other things more in his three Epiſtles Decretal; the which Epiſtles, as by divers other evidences may be ſuppoſed to be untruly named upon him, giving no ſignification of any matter agreeing to that time: ſo do I find the moſt part of the third Epiſtle word for word ſtanding in the Epiſtle of Sixtus the third, which followed almoſt two hundred years after him, beſide the unſeemly Doctrine alſo in the end of the ſaid Epiſtles contained, where he contrary to the tenor of the Goſpel applieth remiſſion of ſins (only due to the blood of Chriſt) unto the Offerings of Bread and Wine by men and women every Sunday in the Church.

False Doctrine detected.

Origen.

To this Fabianus wrote Origen de Orthodoxia ſuæ fidei, that is, Of the righteouſneſs of his faith: whereby is to be underſtood, that he continued to the time of Decius: ſome ſay alſo to the time of Gallus. Of this Origen partly mention is touched before, declaring how bold and fervent he was in the days of Severus, in aſſiſting, comforting, exhorting and kiſſing the Martyrs that were impriſoned and ſuffered for the Name of Chriſt, with ſuch danger of his own life, that had not been the ſingular protection of God, he had been ſtoned to death many times of the Heathen multitude. Such great concourſe of men and women was daily at his houſe to be catechiſed and inſtructed in the Chriſtian faith by him, that Souldiers were hired of purpoſe to defend the place where he taught them. Again, ſuch ſearch ſometime was ſet for him, that ſcarce any ſhifting of place or Country could cover him. In whoſe laborious travels and affairs of the Church, in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting and expounding, he continued about the ſpace of fifty two years, unto the time of Decius and Gallus. Divers and great Perſecutions he ſuſtained, but eſpecially under Decius, as teſtifieth Euſebius in his ſixth Book, declaring that for the Doctrine of Chriſt, he ſuſtained bands and torments in his body, rackings with bars of iron, Dungeons, beſides terrible threats of death and burning. All this he ſuffered in the Perſecution of Decius, as Euſebius recordeth of him, and maketh no relation of any further matter. But Suidas and Nicephorus following the ſame, ſaith further concerning him, that the ſaid Origen, after divers and ſundry other torments which he manfully and conſtantly ſuffered for Chriſt, at length was brought to an Altar, where a foul filthy Ethiop was appointed to be, and there this option or choice was offered unto him, whether he would ſacrifice to the Idols, or have his body polluted with that foul and ugly Ethiop. Then Origen (ſaith he) who with a Philoſophical mind ever kept his Chaſtity undefiled, much abhorring that filthy villany to be done to his body, condeſcended to their requeſt: whereupon the Judge, putting incenſe in his hand, cauſed him to ſet it to the fire upon the Altar; for the which impiety he afterward was excommunicated of the Church. Epiphanius writeth, that he being urged to ſacrifice to idols, and taking the Boughs in his hand, wherewith the Heathen were wont to honour their Gods, called upon the Chriſtians to carry them in the honour of Chriſt. The which fact the Church of Alexandria miſliking, removed him from their Communion: whereupon Origen, driven away with ſhame and ſorrow out of Alexandria, went into Jury, where being in Jeruſalem among the Congregation, and there requeſted of the Prieſts and Miniſters (he being alſo a Prieſt) to make ſome exhortation in the Church, he refuſed a great while to do. At length by importunate petition being conſtrained thereunto, he roſe up, and turning the Book, as though he would have expounded ſome place of the Scripture, he only read the Verſe of the forty ninth Pſalm; But God ſaid to the ſinner, why doſt thou preach my juſtifications, and why doſt thou take my teſtament in thy mouth? &c. Which Verſe being read, he ſhut the Book, and ſate down weeping and wailing, the whole Congregation alſo weeping and lamenting with him: Suid. Niceph. More what became of Origen it is not found in Hiſtory, but only that Suidas addeth, he died and was buried at Tyrus, Euſebius affirmeth, that he departed under the Emperor Gallus, about the year of our Lord 255; and the 70th. year of his age, in great miſery (as appeareth) and poverty.

Ex Suid. & Niceph. lib. 5. cap. 32.

The fall of Origen.

Origen excommunicated.

The repentance of Origen.

In this Origen divers blemiſhes of Doctrine be noted, whereupon Hierome ſometimes doth inveigh againſt him; albeit in ſome places again he doth extoll and commend him for his excellent learning, as in his Apology againſt Ruff. And in his Epiſtle to Pammachius and Ocean, where he praiſeth Origen, although not for the perfection of his Faith and Doctrine, nor for an Apoſtle, yet for an excellent Interpreter, for his wit, and for a Philoſopher: and yet in his Prologue upon the Homilies of Origen on Ezekiel, he calleth him another Maſter of the Churches after the Apoſtles. And in another Preface upon his queſtions upon Geneſis, he wiſheth to himſelf the knowledge of the Scriptures, which Origen had, alſo with the zeal of his name. Athanaſius moreover calleth him ſingular and laborious, and uſeth alſo his teſtimonies againſt the Arrians. Socrates lib.6. cap.13.

Blemiſhes noted in Origen.

Origen commended for learning.

Ex Socrat. lib.6. cap.13.

After Origen, the congrue order of Hiſtory requireth next to ſpeak of Heraclas his Uſher; a man ſingularly commended for his knowledge, not only in Philoſophy, but alſo in ſuch faculties as to a chriſtian divine do appertain. This great towardneſs of wit and learning when Origen perceived in him, he appointed him above all others to be his Uſher or Under-teacher, to help in his School or Univerſity of Alexandria in the Reign of Antoninus Caracalla Son of Severus. And after in the tenth year of Alexander, Origen departing unto Ceſarea, he ſucceeded in his room to govern the School in Alexandria. Further alſo in the time of Gordianus, after the deceaſe of Demetrius Biſhop of Alexandria, this Heraclas ſucceeded to be Biſhop of the ſaid City: Euſebius lib.6.cap.29. In the which function he miniſtred the term of ſixteen years. Euſebius lib.6. cap. 35. Of this Heraclas writeth Origen himſelf, that he, although being Prieſt, yet ceaſed not to read over and peruſe the Books of the Gentiles, to the intent he might the better out of their own Books confute their error &c.

Heraclas Biſhop of Alexandria. Euſeb. lib.6. cap. 29.

After Heraclas ſucceeded Dionyſius Alexandrinus in the Biſhoprick of Alexandria, like as he ſucceeded him in the School before: which Dionyſius alſo writeth of the ſame Heraclas unto Philemon a Prieſt of Rome, thus ſaying: Hunc ego canonem & typum a beato Heracla Papa noſtro accepi, &c. That is, This Canon and Type I received of bleſſed Heraclas our Pope, &c. This Heraclas was no Martyr, which which died three years before Decius, about the year of our Lord, two hundred and fifty. After whom ſucceeded next in the ſame ſeat of Alexandria, Dionyſius Alexandrinus, who alſo ſuffered much under the Tyranny of Decius, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed (Chriſt willing) when we come to the time of Valerian.

Ex Niceph. lib. 2. cap. 39.

Nicephorus in his firſt Book, and others which write of this Perſecution under Decius declare the horribleneſs thereof to be ſo great, and ſo innumerable Martyrs to ſuffer in the ſame, that he ſaith, it is as eaſie to number the ſands of the Sea, as to recite the particular names of them whom this Perſecution did devour. In the which Pereſcution the chiefeſt doers and tormentors under the Emperor appear in the hiſtory of Vincentius to be theſe: Optimus the under-conſul, Secundianus, Verianus, and Marcellianus, &c. Although therefore it be hard here to infer all and ſingular Perſons in order that died in this Perſecution, yet ſuch as remain moſt notable in ſtories, I will briefly touch by the grace of him for whoſe cauſe they ſuffered.

Perſecutors.

Alexander Biſhop of Hieruſalem, martyr.

In the former tractation of the firſt Perſecution, mention was made before of Alexander, Biſhop of Hieruſalem, and of his troubles ſuffered under Severus, and how afterward by the miracle of God, he was appointed Biſhop of Hieruſalem, where he continued a very aged man, above the term of forty years Governor of that Church, till the time of the firſt year of Decius, at what time he being brought from Hieruſalem to Ceſarea into the Judgment place, after a conſtant and evident confeſſion of his faith made before the Judge, was committed unto priſon, and there finiſhed his life, as teſtified Dionyſius Alexandrinus in the ſixth Book of Euſebius. After whom ſucceeded in that ſeat Mezabanes the thirty and ſixth Biſhop of that City, after James the Apoſtle.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 41.

Aſclepiades Biſhop of Antioch martyr.

Mention was made alſo before of Aſclepiades Biſhop of Antioch, who ſucceeded after Serapion, and in the Perſecution of Severus did likewiſe perſevere a conſtant confeſſor, and, as Vincentius teſtifieth in his eleventh Book, ſuffered Martyrdom at laſt under this Decius. But this computation of Vincentius can in no wiſe agree with the truth of time; for ſo much as by probable writers, as Zonaras, Nicephorus, and others, the ſaid Aſclepiades after Serapion entred the Biſhops ſeat of Antioch, in the year of our Lord, two hundred and fourteen, and ſate ſeven years before the time of Gordianus, after whom ſucceeded Philetus, in the year of our Lord, two hundred twenty and one, governing the function twelve years. And after him Zebinus followed in the year of our Lord, two hundred thirty and two, and ſo after him Babylas; which Babylas, if he died in this Perſecution of Decius, then could not Aſclepiades alſo ſuffer in the ſame time, who died ſo long before him, as is declared

Ex ſpec. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 52.

A place of Vincentius reproved.

Of this Babylas Biſhop of Antioch, Euſebius and Zonaras record, that under Decius he died in priſon, as did Alexander, Biſhop of Hieruſalem above rehearſed.

Babylas Biſhop of Antioch, martyr.

Ex Chryſoſt. lib. contra Gentiles.

The ſtory of Babylas.

We read in a certain treatiſe of Chryſoſtom, intituled Contra Gentiles, a noble and long Hiſtory of one Babylas a Martyr, who about theſe times was put to death for reſiſting a certain Emperor, not ſuffering him to enter into the Temple of the Chriſtians after a cruel murther committed, the ſtory of which murther is this: There was a certain Emperor, who upon concluſion of peace made with a certain nation, had received for hoſtage or ſurety of peace the ſon of the King, being of young and tender age, with conditions upon the ſame, that neither he ſhould be moleſted of them, nor that they ſhould ever be vexed of him. Upon this the Kings ſon was delivered, not without great care and fear of the father, unto the Emperor, whom the cruel Emperor, contrary to promiſe, cauſed in ſhort time without all juſt cauſe to be ſlain. This fact ſo horrible being committed, the tyrant with all haſt would enter into the Temple of the Chriſtians, where Babylas being Biſhop or Miniſter withſtood him that he ſhould not into that place approach. The Emperor therewith not a little incenſed, in great rage bad him forthwith to be laid in priſon with as many Irons as he could bear, and from thence ſhortly after to be brought forth to death and Execution. Babylas, going conſtantly and boldly to his Martyrdom, deſired after his death to be buried with his Irons and bands, and ſo he was. The ſtory procedeth moreover, and ſaith; that in the continuance of time in the raign of Conſtantinus, Gallus, then made the overſeer of the Eaſt parts, cauſed his body to be tranſlated into the Suburbs of Antioch, called Daphnes, where was a Temple of Apollo, famous with deviliſh oracles and anſwers given by that Idol, or by the Devil rather in that place. In the which Temple, after the bringing of the body of Babylas, the Idol ceaſed to give any more oracles, ſaying, that for the body of Babylas he could give no more anſwers, and complaining that that place was wont to be conſecrated unto him, but now it was full of dead mens Bodies. And thus the oracles there ceaſed for that time till the coming of Julianus; who inquiring out the cauſe why the oracles ceaſed, cauſed the bones of the holy Martyr to be removed again from thence by the Chriſtians, whom he then called Galileans. They coming in a great multitude, both men, maidens and children, to the tombe of Babylas, tranſported his bones according to the commandment of the Emperor, ſinging by the way as they went, the verſe of the Pſalm in words, as followeth: Confounded be all that worſhip Images, and all that glory in Idols, &c. Which coming to the Emperors ear, ſet him in great rage againſt the Chriſtians, ſtirring up Perſecution againſt them. Albeit Zonaras declareth the cauſe ſomething otherwiſe, ſaying, that ſo ſoon as the body of him and other Martyrs were removed away, incontinent the Temple of the Idol, with the image, in the night was conſumed with fire: For the which cauſe (ſaith Zonaras) Julian ſtirred up with anger, perſecuted the Chriſtians, as ſhall be ſhewed (Chriſt willing) in his order and place hereafter.

The body of Babylas ſtoppeth the oracles of Idols.

Ex Zonara, tom. 3.

And thus much of Babylas, which whether it was the ſame Babylas Biſhop then of Antioch, or another of the ſame name, it appeareth not by Chryſoſtom, which neither maketh mention of the Emperors name, nor of the place where this Babylas was Biſhop. Again, the ſtopping of the Emperor out of the Church importeth as much, as that Emperor to have been a Chriſtian: For otherwiſe, if he had come in as an heathen, and as a Perſecutor, it was not then the manner of Chriſtian Biſhops violently to withſtand the Emperors, or to ſtop them out. Over and beſide the teſtimony of Euſebius, Zonaras doth witneſs contrary in his ſixth Book, that this Babylas, which was then Biſhop of Antioch after Zebinus, was not put to death by the tormentors, but died in priſon: Wherefore it is not unpoſſible, but this Babylas, and this Emperor which Chryſoſtom ſpeaketh of, may be another Babylas than that which ſuffered under Decius. Nicephorus in his fifth Book maketh mention of another Babylas beſide this that ſuffered under Decius, which was Biſhop of Nicomedia.

In the Country of Phrygia, and in the Town of Lampſar, the ſame Vincentius alſo ſpeaketh of one Peter which there was apprehended, and ſuffered bitter torments for Chriſts Name under Optimus the Proconſul: And in Troada likewiſe of other Martyrs that there ſuffered, whoſe names were, Andrew, Paul, Nicomachus, and Dionyſia a virgin, Lib. 11. cap. 46.

Peter of Phrygia martyr. Andreas, Paulus, Nicomachus, Dionyſia virgin martyrs.

Alſo in Babylon (ſaith he) divers Chriſtian confeſſors were found of Decius, which were led away into Spain, there to be executed: Lib. eodem, cap. 43.

Martyrs of Babylon, Germanus, Theophilus, Ceſarius, Vitalis, Polychronius, Neſtor.

In the country of Cappadocia at the City Ceſarea, in like manner of the ſaid author is teſtified, that Germanus, Theophilus, Ceſarius, and Vitalis ſuffered Martyrdom for Chriſt. Eodem cap. 52. and in the ſame Book mention is alſo made of Polychronius, Biſhop of Babylon, cap. 89. and in Pamphilia of Neſtor there Biſhop that died Martyr, cap. 52.

At Perſide, in the town of Cardala, Olympiades and Maximus; in Tyrus alſo Anatolia virgin, and Audax gave their lives likewiſe to death for the teſtimony of Chriſts Name.

Olympiades, Maximus noble men. Anatolia virgin, Audax, martyrs.

Euſebius moreover in his ſixth Book reciteth out of the Epiſtles of Dionyſius Alexandrinus, divers that ſuffered diverſly at Alexandria; the which places of Dionyſius, as they be cited in Euſebius, I thought here good for the antientneſs of the author, to inſert and notifie in his own words, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch, as followeth.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 40. 41. 42.

This

The Epiſtle of Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria to Fabius.

This perſecution (ſaith he) began not with the proclamation ſet forth by the Emperor, but began a whole year before, by the occaſion and means of a wicked perſon, a South-ſayer, and a follower of wicked arts: Who, coming to our City here, ſtirred up the multitude of the heathen againſt us, and incited them to maintain their own old ſuperſtition and gentility of their country; whereby they being ſet agog, and obtaining full power to proſecute their wicked purpoſe, ſo thought, and no leſs declared, all their piety and Religion to conſiſt only in Idolatrous worſhip of Devils, and in our deſtruction. And firſt flying upon a certain Prieſt of ours, named Metra, they apprehended him, and brought him forth to make him ſpeak after their wicked Blaſphemy; which, when he would not do, they laid upon him with ſtaves and clubs, and with ſharp reeds pricked his face and eyes, and afterward bringing him out into the Suburbs, there they ſtoned him to death. Then they took a faithful woman, called Quinta, and brought her to the Temple of their Idols, to compel her to worſhip with them: Which when ſhe refuſed to do, and abhorred their Idols, they bound her feet, and drew her through the whole ſtreet of the City upon the hard ſtones, and ſo daſhing her againſt Milſtones, and ſcourging her with whips, brought her to the ſame place of the Suburbs, as they did the other before, where ſhe likewiſe ended her life. This done, in a great outrage, and with a multitude running together, they burſt into houſes of the Religious and Godly Chriſtians, ſpoiling, ſacking and carrying away all that they could find of any price. The reſt of things, ſuch as were of leſs value and of wood, they brought into the open Market, and ſet them on fire. In the mean time the brethren voided aſide, and withdrew themſelves, taking patiently and no leſs joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods, than did they of whom Saint Paul doth teſtifie: Neither do I know any of them all (one excepted) apprehended of them, which revolting from his profeſſion denied the Lord yet to this preſent day.

A commotion of the people of Alexandria againſt the Chriſtians.

Metra, martyr.

Quinta a faithful woman and martyr.

Patience and joy in affliction. The conſtancy of the martyrs of Alexandria.

Amongſt the reſt that there were taken, there was a certain virgin well ſtricken in years, named Apollinia, whom they brought forth, and daſhing all her teeth out of her jaws, made a great fire before the City, threatning to caſt her into the ſame, unleſs ſhe would Blaſpheme with them and deny Chriſt: whereat ſhe ſtaying a little with her ſelf, as one that would take a pauſe, ſuddenly leaped into the midſt of the fire, and there was burned.

Apollonia a bleſſed virgin and martyr.

Serapion martyr.

There was alſo one Serapion, whom they took in his own houſe, and after they had aſſayled him with ſundry kinds of Torments, and had broken almoſt all the joynts of his body, they caſt him down from an upper loft, and ſo did he complete his Martyrdom. Thus was there no way neither privy nor publick, nor corner, nor alley left for us, neither by day nor by night to eſcape, all the People making an outcry againſt us, that unleſs we uttered words of Blaſphemy, we ſhould be drawn to the fire and burned. And this outragious tumult indured a certain ſpace, but at length, as the Lord would, the miſerable wretches fell at deſſention among themſelves, which turned the cruelty they exerciſed againſt us, upon their own heads. And ſo had we a little breathing time for a ſeaſon, while the fury of the heathen people by this occaſion aſſwaged.

The juſt puniſhment of God turning the cruelty of adverſaries upon themſelves.

Shortly then after this, word was brought unto us that the ſtate of the Empire, which before was ſomething favourable to us, was altered and changed againſt us, putting us in great fear. And conſequently upon the ſame followed, the edict of the Emperor ſo terrible and cruel, that according to the forewarning of the Lord, the elect (if it had been poſſible) might have been thereby ſubverted. Upon that edict ſuch fear came over us all, that many there were, eſpecially of the richer ſort, of whom ſome for fear came running, ſome were led by the occaſion of time, ſome were drawn by their neighbours being cited by name, to thoſe unpure and Idolatrous ſacrifices. Other-ſome came trembling and ſhaking, as men not which ſhould do ſacrifice, but which ſhould be ſacrificed themſelves, the multitude laughing them to ſcorn. Some again came boldly to the altars, declaring themſelves never to have been of that profeſſion, of whom it is ſaid, that hardly they ſhall be ſaved. Of the reſidue, ſome followed one part, ſome another, ſome ran away, ſome were taken; of whom certain continued to bands and torments conſtant; others again after long Impriſonments, before they ſhould come before the Judge, renounced their faith. Some alſo, after they ſuffered torments, yet after revolted. But others being as ſtrong as bleſſed, and valiant pillars of the Lords, fortified with conſtancy agreeing to their faith, were made faithful Martyrs of the Kingdom of God.

Of whom the firſt was Julianus, a man diſeaſed with the Gout, and not able to go, being carried of two men, of whom the one quickly denied the other, Cronion, ſurnamed Eunus, with the foreſaid Julianus the old man, confeſſing the Lord with a perfect faith, were laid upon Camels, and there ſcourged, at length caſt into the fire, and with great conſtancy were ſo conſumed.

Julianus martyr.

As theſe aforeſaid were going to their Martyrdom, there was a certain Souldier, who in their defence, took part againſt them that railed upon them. For the which ceuſe the People crying out againſt him, he alſo was apprehended, and being conſtant in his Profeſſion, was forthwith beheaded.

A certain Souldier c martyr.

Likewiſe one Macar, a man born in Libia, being admoniſhed and exhorted of the Judge to deny his faith, and not agreeing to his perſwations, was burned alive.

Macara bleſſed martyr.

After theſe ſuffered Epimachus, and one Alexander, who being long detained in priſon and in bands, after innumerable pains and torments with Razors and ſcourges, were alſo caſt into the burning fire with four other women with them, which all there ended their Martyrdom.

Epimachus, Alexander with four women, martyrs.

Alſo Ammonarion, an holy virgin, whom the cruel Judge, had long and bittterly tormented, for that ſhe promiſing the Judge before, that for no puniſhment ſhe would yield to his requeſt, and conſtantly performing the ſame, ſuffered likewiſe Martyrdom with two other women, of whom there was an aged Matron, named Mercuria; the other was called Dionyſia, being a Mother of many fair Children, whom yet notwithſtanding ſhe loved not above the Lord. Theſe, after they could not be overcome by any torments of the cruel Judge, but he rather aſhamed and confounded to be overcome of ſilly women, at length being paſt feeling of all torments, were ſlain with the ſword; firſt Ammonarion, like a valiant Captain, ſuffering before them.

Ammonarion virgin, martyr.

Mercuria, Dionyſia, martyrs.

Heron, Ater, Iſidorus, Dioſcorus, martyrs.

Heron, Ater and Iſidorus, Egyptians, and with them Dioſcorus alſo a Child of fifteen years, were Crowned with the ſame Crown of Martyrdom. And firſt the Judge began with the Child, thinking him more eaſie to be won with words to intice him, than with torments to conſtrain him. But he perſiſted immoveable, giving neither place to perſwaſions nor puniſhment. The reſt, after he had grievouſly tormented them, being conſtant in their profeſſion, he committed to the fire. The Judge, greatly marvelling at Dioſcorus for his wiſe anſwers and grave conſtancy, diſmiſſed him, ſparing (as he ſaid) his age to a longer reſpite: Which Dioſcorus is yet alſo with us at this preſent, waiting for a long Tryal.

Nemeſion, martyr. Thieve. in the old time amongſt the Romans burned.

Nemeſion, being alſo an Egyptian, firſt was accuſed for a Companion of Thieves, but being purged thereof before the Centurion, was then accuſed of Chriſtianity, and for that cauſe being in bands, was brought to the Preſident; who moſt Unrighteouſly tormenting and ſcourging him double, to all other Thieves and Felons, at length among the Thieves burned him to Death, making him a bleſſed Martyr.

There were ſtanding before the Tribunal ſeat certain of the Warriors or Knights, whoſe names were Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, and with them a certain aged man called Theophilus; who ſtanding by at what time a certain Chriſtian man was before the Judge examined, and there ſeeing him for fear ready to decline and fall away, did burſt almoſt for ſorrow within themſelves, making ſigns to him with their hands, and all geſtures of their body, to be conſtant. This being noted of all the ſtanders by, they were ready to lay hold upon them; but they preventing this matter, preſſed up of their own accord before to the bench of the Judge, profeſſing themſelves to be Chriſtians. Inſomuch that both the Prelident with the benchers, were all aſtonied, the Chriſtians, which were judged more imboldned to ſuffer, and the Judges thereby terrified. This done, they departed away from the place,

Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, Theophilus, confeſſors.

A notable example of a Chriſtian courage in confeſſing Chriſt.

glad

glad and rejoycing for the teſtimony that they had given of their Faith. Many other beſides, were in other Cities and Towns rent and torn aſunder by the Heathen, among whom one I will ſpeak of for cauſe worthy of memory.

Iſchirion, Martyr.

Iſchirion, one that was in ſervice with a certain Noble man, was commanded of his Maſter to make Sacrifice, who for not obeying, was therefore rebuked: after perſiſting in the ſame, was grievouſly threatned with ſharp and menacing words. At laſt his Maſter, when he could not prevail againſt him, taking a ſtake or pike in his hands, ran him thorow in the body and ſlew him.

What ſhall I ſpeak of the multitude of them, which wandring in Deſarts and Mountains, were conſumed with Hunger, Thirſt, Cold, Sickneſs, Thieves or wild Beaſts, of whoſe bleſſed Victory they which be alive are yet Witneſſes? In the number of whom, one I will ſpeak of, among divers others, named Cheremon, Biſhop of the City called Nilus, an aged man: he with his wife, flying to the Mountain of Arabia, never returned again, nor ever could be ſeen after. And though they were ſought for diligently by their Brethren, yet neither they nor their bodies were found: many others there were, which flying to theſe Mountains of Arabia were taken of the barbarous Arabians: of whom ſome with much money could ſcarce be ranſomed, ſome were never heard of yet to this preſent day. Thus much out of the Epiſtles, of Dionyſius in Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 41, 42, &c.

Cheremon, Martyr. Cheremon, a Biſhop had a wife.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. ca. 40, 41, 42.

Moreover, the foreſaid Dionyſius in another place writing to Germanus, of his own dangers and of others, ſuſtained in this Perſecution, and before this perſecution of Decius, thus inferreth as followeth, I (ſaith he) behold before the ſight of God, I lye not, and He knoweth, I lye not, how that I having no regard of mine own life, and not without the motion of God, did fly and avoid the danger of this Perſecution. Yea, and alſo before that this Perſecution of Decius did rage againſt us, Sabinus *the ſame hour ſent a Farmer to ſeek me, at what time I remaining at home waited three days for his coming. But he ſearching narrowly for me by all Ways, Fields, Floods, and Corners, where he thought I might beſt have hid my ſelf, or have paſſed by, was ſtricken with ſuch blindneſs, that he could not find my houſe, thinking with himſelf nothing leſs than that I would abide at home in ſuch and ſo dangerous Perſecution. Thus theſe three days being paſt, upon the fourth day, the Lord God ſo willing and commanding me to fly, and alſo marvellouſly opening to me the way, I with my * Children and many other Brethren went out together. And this not to come of my ſelf, but to be the work of Gods Providence, the ſequel of thoſe things declared, wherein afterward I was not unprofitable peradventure to ſome, &c.*

The Epiſtle of Dionyſius Alexandrinus to Germanus. This Germanus was a Biſhop in that time, which charged Dionyſius for his flying perſecution, againſt whom he purgeth himſelf.

God willed Dionyſius to fly in Perſecution.

* Ergo, Biſhops then had wives and children.

Again, in another place ſhortly after, the foreſaid Dionyſius proceeding in the Narration of himſelf, thus inferreth, Then I coming to Jeruſalem with them which were with me, was brought by Souldiers unto Tapoſixis, where as Timotheus (by the Providence of God) neither was preſent, nor yet taken. Who then returning home, found his Houſe deſert, and Officers watching about the ſame, and us within taken, &c. And again ſhortly after it followeth, And to ſee (ſaith he) the admirable diſpoſing of God his Works; as Timotheus was thus flying with much haſt and great fear, a certain man, as hapned, a dweller near by met him by the way, and asked whither he went ſo haſtily? to whom Timotheus anſwering, declared all the matter ſimply as it was. Which done, the man proceedeth on his journey, whither he was purpoſed to go, which was to a Marriage, the manner of which Marriages then was to ſit up all the night long feaſting and drinking. Thus, as he was come, ſitting with them at the Feaſt, he telleth his Companions what was done, and what he heard by the way. This was no ſooner told, but all they forthwith upon a head, as ſtricken with a ſudden fury, ruſhing out together, made toward Us as faſt as they could, with ſuch crying and noiſe as might ſeem very terrible. At the firſt hearing whereof, the Souldiers that had us in keeping being afraid, ran away, by reaſon whereof we were left alone, and found as we were lying upon Formes and Benches. I then (the Lord knoweth) thinking with my ſelf that they had been Thieves, which came to ſpoil and rob, being in my Couch, lay ſtill in my ſhirt only as I was, the reſt of my Garments lying by me I offered to them: they then willed me in all haſte to riſe and get away; whereby I then, perceiving the cauſe of their coming, cried unto them, deſiring that they would ſuffer us ſo to do: and if they would do any benefit for me, for ſo much as I could not eſcape the hands of them which would purſue me and carry me away, I prayed them that they would prevent them, and cut off my head before. And as I was crying thus unto them, caſting my ſelf grovelling upon the pavement, as my Companions can teſtifie, who were partakers of all theſe things, they burſt forth violently, taking me by the hands and feet, and carried me out of the doors, and led me away. There followed me Gaius, Paulus, Petrus, Paulus (who were Witneſſes of all the ſame) which brought me alſo out of the City, and ſo ſetting me upon a bare Aſs, conveyed me away.

The Providence of God in preſerving his. The ſtory of the deliverance of Dionyſius and his fellows.

Dionyſius, Gaius, Paulus, Petrus, Paulus delivered from the Centurion and the Souldiers.

Thus much writeth Dionyſius of himſelf, the example of whoſe Epiſtle is cited in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory of Euſebius, lib. 6. cap. 40. alſo lib. 7. cap. 11.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. ca. 40. lib. 7. ca. 11.

Nicephorus in his firſt Book, cap. 27. maketh mention of one named Chriſtophorus, which alſo ſuffered in this Perſecution of Decius. Of which Chriſtophorus, whether the Fable riſeth of that mighty Giant ſet up in Churches, wading through the Seas with Chriſt on his ſhoulder, and a Tree in his hand for a walking-Staff, &c. it is uncertain. Georgius Wiceliùs alledgeth out of Ruggerus Fuldenſ. and mentioneth of one Chriſtophorus, born of the Nation of Canaanites, which ſuffered under Decius, being, as he ſaith, of twelve cubits high. But the reſt of the Hiſtory painted in Churches, the ſaid Wicelius derideth as Fables of Centaurs, or other Poetical Fictions.

The Fable of great S. Chriſtopher.

Bergomenſis in his eighth Book maketh relation of divers martyred under Decius, as Meniatus which ſuffered at Florence, of Agatha an holy Virgin of Sicily, who is ſaid to ſuffer divers and bitter torments under Quintilianus the Proconſul, with Priſonment, with Beatings, with Famine, with Racking, rolled alſo upon ſharp ſhells and hot coals, having moreover her Breaſts cut from her Body, as Bergomenſis and the Martyrology of Ado record. In the which Authors as I deny not but that the reſt of the ſtory may be true, ſo again, concerning the Miracles of the aged man appearing to her, and of the young man clothed in a ſilken Veſture, with an hundred young men after him, and of the Marble Table with the Inſcription, Mentem ſanctam, &c. I doubt.

Meniatus, Agatha, Martyrs. Ex Bergomenſ. lib. 8. Ex Martyrologio Adonis.

Hard it is to recite all that ſuffered in this Perſecution, when as whole multitudes went into Wildernеſſes and Mountains, wandring without ſuccour or comfort, ſome ſtarved with Hunger and Cold, ſome with Sickneſs conſumed, ſome devoured of Beaſts, ſome with barbarous Thieves taken and carried away. Vincentius in his eleventh Book, ſpeaking of Aſclepiades, writeth alſo of forty Virgins and Martyrs, which by ſundry kinds of torments were put to death about the ſame time, in the Perſecution of this Tyrant.

Martyrs wandring in Mountains.

Likewiſe in the ſaid Vincentius menton is made of Triphon, a man of great holineſs, and conſtant in his ſuffering, who being brought to the City of Nice, before the Prelident Aquilus for his conſtant Confeſſion of Chriſts Name, was afflicted with divers and grievous torments, and at length with the Sword put to death.

Forty Virgins Martyrs. Triphon Martyr.

At what time Decius had erected a Temple in the midſt of the City of Epheſus, compelling all that were in the City there to ſacrifice to the Idols: Seven Chriſtians were found, whoſe names were Maximianus, Malchus, Martianus, Dionyſius, Joannes, Serapion and Conſtantinus, who, refuſing the Idolatrous Worſhip, were accuſed for the ſame unto the Emperor to be Chriſtians. Which when they conſtantly profeſſed and did not deny; notwithſtanding, becauſe they were Souldiers, retaining to the Emperors Service, reſpite was given them for a certain ſpace, to deliberate with themſelves, till the return again of the Emperor, which then was going to War. In the mean ſpace, the Emperor being departed, they taking counſel together, went and hid themſelves in ſecret Caves of the Mount Celius. The Emperor returning again, after great inquiſition made for them, hearing where they were, cauſed the mouth of the place where they were to be cloſed up with heaps of ſtones, that they, not able to get out, ſhould be famiſhed within. And thus were thoſe good men martyred. The ſtory (if it be true) goeth further, that they, between fear and ſorrow, fell aſleep, in which ſleep they they continued the ſpace of certain Ages after, till the time of Theodoſius the Emperor, before they did awake, as reporteth Vincentius, Nicephorus, lib. 5. cap. 27. and partly alſo Henricus Erfordienſ. But of their awaking, that I refer to them that liſt to believe it. Certain it is, that at the laſt day they ſhall awake indeed without any Fable.

A Souldier Martyr. Ex Hieron. in vita Pauli Eremita.

Hieronymus in the life of Paulus the Heremite reciteth a ſtory of a certain Souldier, whom when the Pretor could not otherwiſe with torments remove from his Chriſtianity; he deviſed another way, which was this; He commanded the Souldier to be laid upon a ſoft bed in a pleaſant Garden among the flouriſhing Lillies and red Roſes; which done, all others being removed away, and himſelf there left alone, a beautiful Harlot came to him, who imbraced him and with all other Incitements of an Harlot laboured to provoke him to her naughtineſs. But the godly Souldier fearing God more than obeying fleſh, bit off his own Tongue with his teeth, and ſpit it in the face of the Harlot, as ſhe was kiſſing him, and ſo got he the Victory, by the conſtant Grace of the Lord aſſiſting him.

A notable example of a chaſt ſouldier biting off his tongue, and ſpiting it in the face of an Harlot.

A like example of Chaſtity between two Chriſtians. Ex Ambr. lib. 2. de virg in.

Another like Example of ſingular Chaſtity is written of the Virgin Theodora, and another Souldier, by Ambroſ. lib. 2. de Virginibus. At Antioch, this Theodora refuſing to do ſacrifice to the Idols was condemned by the Judge to the Stews, and notwithſtanding by the ſingular Providence of God was well delivered. For as there was a great Company of wanton young men ready at the door to preſs into the houſe where ſhe was, one of the Brethren named Didymus (as Ado ſaith) moved with faith and motion of God, putting on a Souldiers habit, made himſelf one of the firſt that came in, who rounding her in the ear, told her the cauſe and purpoſe of his coming, being a Chriſtian as ſhe was: his counſel was that ſhe ſhould put on the Souldiers habit, and ſo ſlip away; and he putting on her Garments would there remain to abide their force, and ſo did, whereby the Virgin eſcaped unknown. Didymus left unto the rage and wondering of the people, being a man in ſtead of a woman, was preſented unto the Preſident, unto whom without delay he uttered all the whole matter as it was done, profeſſing him, ſo as he was, to be a Chriſtian, and thereupon was condemned to ſuffer. Theodora underſtanding thereof, and thinking to excuſe him by acculing her ſelf, offered her ſelf as the party guilty unto the Judge, claiming and requiring the condemnation to light upon her, the other as innocent to be diſcharged. But the cruel Judge (crueller than Dionyſius, which ſpared Damon and Pithias) neither conſidering the vertue of the perſons, nor the innocency of the cauſe, unjuſtly and inhumanely proceeded in execution againſt them both, who, firſt having their heads cut off, after were caſt into the fire:- Ambroſ. Ado. Although what time, or in what Perſecution theſe did ſuffer, in the Authors of this Narration it doth not appear.

Theodora, Didymus, Martyrs.

Agathon, Martyr.

Agathon, a man of Arms in the City of Alexandria, for rebuking certain lewd perſons ſcornfully deriding the dead bodies of the Chriſtians, was cried out of and railed on of the people, and afterward accuſed to the Judge, was condemned to loſe his head. Erfordienſis.

Paulus, Andreas, Martyrs.

The ſaid Erfordienſis alſo maketh mention of Paulus, Andreas, whom the Proconſul of Troada gave to the people; who being ſcourged, and after drawn out of the City, were troden to death with the feet of the people. Henr. de Erford.

Juſtinus, Nicoſtratus, Portius, Martyrs.

Among others that ſuffered under this wicked Decius, Bergomenſis alſo maketh mention of one Juſtinus a Prieſt of Rome, and of another Nicoſtratus a Deacon. To theſe Vencentius alſo addeth Portius a Prieſt of Rome, whom he reporteth to be the Converter of Philip the Emperor aforementioned.

Abdon, Sennas, Martyrs.

Of Abdon and Sennas we read alſo in the foreſaid Bergomenſis and Vincentius, two Noble men, who becauſe they had buried the Chriſtians, whom Decius had brought from Babylon to Corduba, and there put them to death, were therefore accuſed to Decius, and brought to Rome; where they, being commanded to ſacrifice to dead Idols, would not obey; and for the ſame were given to the wild Beaſts to be devoured: but when the wild Beaſts, more gentle than the Men, would not touch them, they were at length with the Sword beheaded. Bergom. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 4. Albeit to me it ſeemeth not impoſſible nor unlike, this Abdon and Sennas to be the ſame, whom in other ſtories we find, and before have mentioned to be Ammon and Zenon.

Secundianus, Virianus, Marcellianus, Martyrs.

One Secundianus was accuſed to Valerian a Captain of Decius, to be a Chriſtian, which Profeſſion when he ſtoutly did maintain, he was commanded to priſon. By the way as the Souldiers were leading him to the Gaol, Virianus and Marcellianus ſeeing the matter, cried to the Souldiers, asking them whither they drew the Innocent? At the which word, when they alſo confeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, they were likewiſe apprehended, and brought to a City named Centumcellas: where being willed to ſacrifice, they did ſpit upon the Idols, and ſo after Sentence and Judgment given, firſt they were beaten with Waſters or Trunchions, after that were hanged and tormented upon the Gibbet, having fire ſet to their ſides. Vincentius addeth moreover that ſome of the Tormentors falling ſuddenly dead, other ſome being taken with wicked Spirits, the Martyrs with the Sword at length were beheaded. Vin. lib. 11. cap. 51.

Ex Vincent. lib. 11. c. 51.

To proſecute in length of Hiſtory the Lives and Sufferings of all them, which in this terrible Perſecution were martyred, it were too long, and almoſt infinite: briefly therefore to rehearſe the Names of ſuch as we find alledged out of a certain brief Treatiſe of Bede, intituled, De Temporibus, cited by Henricus de Erford, it ſhall be at this time ſufficient. Under Decius ſuffered Hippolitus and Concordia, Hiereneus and Abundus, Victoria a Virgin, being noble Perſonages of Antioch, Bellias Biſhop of the City of Apollonia, Leacus, Tirſus, and Gallinetis. Nazarius, Triphon in the City of Egypt, called Tamas, Phileas Biſhop, Philocomus, with many other in Perſide, Philcronius Biſhop of Babylon; Theſiphon Biſhop of Pamphilia, Neſſor Biſhop in Corduba, Parmenius Prieſt, with divers more. In the Province called Colonia, Circenſis, Marianus and Jacobus. In Africa, Nemeſianus, Felix, Rogatianus Prieſt, Feliciſſimus. At Rome, Jovinus, Baſileus, alſo Ruffina, and Secunda Virgins, Tertullianus, Valerianus, Nemeſius, Sempronianus and Olympius. In Spain, Teragon. At Verona, Zeno Biſhop. Children martyred. Ex Vincent. lib. 11. c. 52.

Vincentius in his eleventh Book maketh mention, citing Ex Hugone, of certain Children ſuffering Martyrdom under the ſame Perſecution, in a City of Tuſcia, called Aretium, whoſe names I find not, except they be Pergentius and Laurentius mentioned in Equilinus, lib. 5. cap. 80.

Such as revolted and fell in this Perſecution.

Now that I have recorded of them ſufficiently, which under this tempeſt of Decius conſtantly gave their lives to Martyrdom for the Teſtimony of Chriſt; it remaineth that a few words alſo be ſpoken of ſuch as for fear or frailty in this Perſecution did ſhrink and ſlide from the truth of their Confeſſion. In the number of whom firſt cometh in the remembrance of Serapion an aged old man. Of whom writeth Dionyſius Alexandrinus unto Fabius, declaring that this Serapion was an old man, which lived amongſt them a ſincere and upright life of long time, but at length fell. This Serapion oft and many times deſired to be received again, but no man liſtened to him, for he had ſacrificed before. After this, not long after, he fell into Sickneſs, where he remained three days dumb, and benummed of all Senſes. The fourth day following, beginning a little to recover, he called to him his Sifters Son, and ſaid, How long, how long (my Son) do ye hold me here? Make haſte, I pray you, that I were abſolved. Call hither ſome of the Miniſters to me: and ſo, ſaying no more, held his peace as dumb and ſpeechleſs. The boy ran (it was then night) unto the Miniſter, who, at the ſame time being ſick, could not come with the Meſſenger, but ſaid, For ſo much as he willed heretofore (as he ſaid) that ſuch as lay a dying, if they covet to be received and reconciled, and eſpecially if they required it earneſtly, ſhould be admitted, whereby with the better hope and confidence they may depart hence; therefore he gave to the boy a little of the * Euchariſt, willing him to crumble it into the Cup, and ſo to drop it into the mouth of the old man. With this the boy returned, bringing with him the holy Euchariſt. As he was now near at hand, before he had entred in, Serapion the old man, ſpeaking again,

The repentance and reconciliation of Serapion.

In the City of Troad, as the Proconſul was grievouſly tormenting one Nicomachus, he cried out, That he was no Chriſtian, and ſo was let down again. And after, when he had ſacrificed, he was taken eftſoons with a wicked Spirit, and ſo thrown down upon the ground, where he, biting off his Tongue with his teeth, ſo departed. Henr. de Erford.

The goodneſs of God ſhewed to Serapion. Ex Henr. de Erford.

A terrible example of denying, ſhewed upon Nicomachus. Dionyſius ad Fabium.

Dionyſius in his Epiſtles alſo writing to Fabius, and lamenting the great terror of this Perſecution, declareth, how that many worthy and notable Chriſtians, for fear and horror of the great Tyranny thereof, did ſhew themſelves feeble and weak men. Of whom ſome for dread, ſome of their own accord, others after great Torments ſuffered, yet after revolted from the conſtancy of their Profeſſion. Alſo Saint Cyprian in his Treatiſe De Lapſis reciteth with great ſorrow, and teſtifieth how that a great number at the firſt threatning of the Adverſary, neither being compelled nor thrown down with any violence of the Enemy, but of their voluntary weakneſs fell down themſelves. Neither (ſaith he) tarrying while the Judge ſhould put Incenſe in their hands, but before any ſtroke ſtricken in the field, turned their backs, and played the Cowards; not only coming to their Sacrifices, but preventing the ſame, and pretending to come without compulſion, bringing moreover their Infants and Children either put into their hands, or taking them with them of their own accord, and exhorting moreover others to do the like after their example.

Cyprianus Serm. de Lapſis.

The weakneſs of Chriſtians denying their Faith.

Of this weakneſs and falling, the ſaid Author ſheweth two Cauſes, either love of their Goods and Patrimony, or fear of Torments: and addeth moreover examples of the Puniſhments of them which revolted; affirming, that many of them were taken and vexed with wicked Spirits; and that one man among other, after his voluntary denial, was ſuddenly ſtricken dumb. Again, another after his Abjuration, as he ſhould communicate with others, in ſtead of bread received aſhes in his hand. Item, a certain Maiden being taken and vexed with a Spirit, did tear her own Tongue with her teeth, and tormented with pain in her belly and inward parts ſo deceaſed.

Amongſt others of this ſort, S. Cyprian. lib. 2. cap. 8. maketh alſo mention of one Euariſtus a Biſhop in Africa, who leaving his Charge, and making ſhipwrack of his Faith, went wandring about in other Countries, forſaking his own Flock. In like manner, he maketh alſo mention of Nicoſtratus a Deacon, who forſaking his Deaconſhip, and taking the Goods of the Church with him, fled away into other Countries, &c. Albeit Bergomenſis affirmeth, that this Nicoſtratus the Deacon afterward died a Martyr. Thus then, although ſome did relent, yet a very great number (ſaith he) there was, whom neither fear could remove, nor pain could overthrow, to cauſe them to betray their Confeſſion, but they ſtood like glorious Martyrs unto the end. Cyprian.

Cyprian. lib. De mortalitate.

The ſame Cyprianus alſo, in another Book De Mortalitate, reciteth a notable ſtory of one of his own Collegues and fellow Prieſts, who being oppreſſed with weakneſs, and greatly afraid with death drawing at hand, deſired leave to depart, and to be diſcharged. As he was thus intreating, and almoſt now dying, there appeared by him a young man, of an honourable and reverent Majeſty, of a tall ſtature, and comely behaviour, ſo bright and clear to behold, that ſcarce mans carnal eyes were able ſo to do, which was now ready to depart this world. To whom this young man ſpeaking with a certain indignation of mind and voice, thus ſaid, Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To ſuffer ye dare not, to go out ye will not, what would ye have me to do unto you?

A notable voice of God to a Prieſt of Carthage.

The occaſion and riſing up of Novatus Hereſie.

Upon the occaſion of theſe and ſuch others, which were a great number, that fell and did renounce, as is aforeſaid, in this Perſecution of Decius, roſe up firſt the quarrel and hereſie of Novatus, who in theſe days made a great diſturbance in the Church, holding this opinion, that they which once renounced the Faith, and for fear of torments had offered Incenſe to the Idols, although they repented therefore, yet could not afterward be reconciled, nor admitted to the Church of Chriſt. This Novatus being firſt Prieſt under Cyprian at Carthage, afterward by ſtirring up Diſcord and Factions began to diſturb the Biſhoprick of Cyprian, to appoint there a Deacon called Feliciſſimus, againſt the Biſhops mind or knowledge; alſo to allure and ſeparate certain of the Brethren from the Biſhop; all which Cyprian. lib. 2. Epiſt. 8. doth well declare. After this the ſaid Novatus going to Rome, kept there the like ſtir with Cornelius (as the ſame Cornelius in Euſebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. doth teſtifie) ſetting himſelf up as Biſhop of Rome againſt Cornelius, which was the lawful Biſhop of Rome before. The which to bring to paſs, he uſed this practice. Firſt he had allured to him, to be his Adherents, three or four good men and holy Confeſſors, which had ſuffered before great torments for their Confeſſion, whoſe names were Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus. After this he inticed three ſimple Biſhops about the Coaſts of Italy to repair to Rome, under pretence to make an end of certain Controverſies then in hand. This done, he cauſed the ſame, whether by making them drunk, or by other crafty counſel, to lay their hands upon him, and to make him Biſhop, and ſo they did. Wherefore the one of thoſe three Biſhops hardly was received to the Communion, by the great interceſſion of his people: the other two by Diſcipline of the Church were diſplaced from their Biſhopricks, and others poſſeſſed with their rooms. Thus then were there two Biſhops together in one Church of Rome, Novatus and Cornelius, which was unſeemly, and contrary to the Diſcipline of the Church. And hereupon riſeth the true cauſe and meaning of St. Cyprian, writing in his Epiſtles ſo much of one Biſhop, and of the unity to be kept in Eccleſiaſtical Regiment, as appeareth, Lib. 4. Epiſt. 2. de ſimplicit. prælat. Item, lib. 3. Epiſt. 11. &c. And in like ſort writeth alſo Cornelius himſelf of one Biſhop, ſaying, Itaque vindex ille Evangelii ignoravit unum eſſe debere Epiſcopum in Catholica Eccleſia, &c. that is, He knew not that there ought to be one Biſhop in a Catholick Church, &c. This by the way, not out of the way I truſt, I have touched briefly, to detect or refute the cavilling wreſting of the Papiſts, which falſly apply theſe places of Cyprian and Cornelius to maintain the Popes ſupream Maſterſhip alone, over the whole Univerſal Church of Chriſt in all places; when their meaning is otherwiſe, how that every one Catholick Church or Dioceſs ought to have one Biſhop over it, not that the whole World ought to be ſubject to the Dominion of him only that is Biſhop of Rome. Now to the ſtory again. Novatus being thus Biſhop, took not a little upon him, going about by all means to defeat Cornelius, and to allure the people from him. Inſomuch that (as in the foreſaid Book of Euſebius appeareth) when Novatus came to the diſtributing of the Offerings, and ſhould give every man his part, he compelled the ſimple perſons every man to ſwear, before they ſhould receive of the Benediction, and of the Collects or Oblations, holding both their hands in his, and holding them ſo long, ſpeaking theſe words unto them (Swear to me by the body and blood of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that thou wilt not leave me and go to Cornelius) till that they ſweaging unto him, in ſtead of Amen (to be ſaid at the receiving of the * Bread) ſhould anſwer, I will not return to Cornelius, &c. Where note by the way, that the Latine Book of Chriſtoferſons tranſlation, in this place, craftily leaveth out the name of Bread. This ſtory being written in Euſebius, alſo contained in Nicephorus, although not in the ſame order of words, yet in effect drawn out of him, doth declare in plain words in both the Authors (who ſo will mark the ſame) that the Sacrament of the Body of Chriſt is termed with the plain name of Bread, after the conſecration.

It followeth more in the ſtory, that Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus, before mentioned, perceiving at length the crafty Diſſimulation and Arrogancy of Novatus, left him, and with great Repentance returned again to the Church, and were reconciled to Cornelius, as they themſelves writing to Cyprian, and Cyprian likewiſe writing to them an Epiſtle gratulatory doth declare, lib. 3. Epiſt. 3. and Cornelius alſo in his Epiſtle to Fabius witneſſeth the ſame. In this Epiſtle the ſaid Cornelius moreover writeth of one Moſes a worthy Martyr, which once being alſo a Follower of Novatus, after perceiving his wickedneſs, forſook him, and did Excommunicate him. Of whom Cyprian alſo maketh mention, and calleth him a bleſſed Confeſſor. Lib.2. Epiſt. 4. Damaſus in his Pontifical ſaith, That he was apprehended with Marimus and Nicoſtratus above mentioned, and was put with them in priſon, where he ended his life. And thus much of Novatus, againſt whom (as Euſebius teſtifieth) a Synod was holden at Rome of threeſcore ſundry Biſhops in the time of Cornelius, under the Reign of Decius, in the year of our Lord, two hundred fifty and five; whereby it may be ſuppoſed that the heat of the Perſecution at that time was ſomewhat calmed.

A Synod at Rome. Anno 255.

After Fabianus (or as Zonaras calleth him Flavianus) next ſucceeded into the Biſhoprick of Rome Cornelius, whom Cyprian noteth to be a worthy Biſhop, and for his great vertue and maidenly continency much commendable, choſen to that room not ſo much by his own conſent, as by the full agreement, both of the Clergy-men, and alſo of the people. Hierome addeth alſo, That he was a man of great Eloquence: whereby it may appear thoſe two Epiſtles decretal, which go in his name, not to be his, both for the rudeneſs of the barbarous and groſs ſtile, and alſo for the matter therein contained, nothing taſting of that time, nor of that age, nor doings then of the Church. Whereof in the firſt he writeth to all Miniſters and Brethren of the Church, concerning the lifting up of the bodies and bones of Peter and Paul, De Catbecumbis, and tranſpoſed to Vaticanum, at the inſtance of a certain devout Woman named Lucina, having no great argument or cauſe to write thereof unto the Churches, but only that he in that Letter doth deſire them to pray unto the Lord, that through the Interceſſion of thoſe Apoſtolical Saints, their ſins might be forgiven them, &c. In the ſecond Epiſtle written to Ruffus a Biſhop of the Eaſt Church, he decreeth and ordaineth, that no Oath ought to be required or exacted of any head or chief Biſhop, for any cauſe, or by any power. Alſo that no cauſe of Prieſts or Miniſters ought to be handled in any ſtrange or foreign Court, without his Precinct, except only in the Court of Rome by Appellation: whereby who ſeeth not the train of our later Biſhops, going about craftily to advance the Dignity of the Court of Rome, under and by the pretenſed Title of Cornelius, and of ancient Biſhops? If Cornelius did write any Epiſtles to any indeed in thoſe turbulent times of Perſecution, no doubt but ſome ſignification thereof he would have touched in the ſaid his Letters, either in miniſtring Conſolation to his Brethren, or in requiring Conſolation and Prayers of others. Neither is there any doubt, but he would have given ſome touch alſo of the matter of Novatus, with whom he had ſo much to do; as indeed he did: for ſo we find it recorded both in Euſebius, and Hierome, that he wrote unto Fabius Biſhop of Antioch, of the decreements of the Council of Rome, and another Letter of the manner of the Council, the third alſo of the cauſe of Novatus, and again of the Repentance of ſuch as fell, whereof there is no word touched at all in theſe foreſaid Epiſtles decretal.

Cornelius Biſhop of Rome, and Martyr.

Biſhops were choſen then not without the voice of the people.

A cenſure of the decretal Epiſtles of Cornelius.

What trouble this Cornelius had with Novatus, ſufficiently is before ſignified. In this Perſecution of Decius, he demeaned himſelf very conſtantly and faithfully, which ſuſtained great Conflicts with the Adverſaries, as Saint Cyprian giveth witneſs, lib. 1. Epiſt. 1. Hierome teſtifieth that he remained Biſhop after the death of Decius, to the time of Gallus, and ſo appeareth alſo by Saint Cyprian, which hath theſe words, Et tyrannum armis & bello poſtmodum victum, prior ſacerdotio ſuo vicit. But Damaſus and Sabellicus, his Followers, affirm, that he was both exiled and alſo martyred under the tyrannous Reign of Decius. Of whom Sabellicus writeth this ſtory, taken out (as it ſeemeth) of Damaſus, and ſaith, That Cornelius by the Commandment of Decius, was baniſhed to a Town called Centumcellas, bordering on Hetruria, from whence he ſent his Letters to Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage, and Cyprian again to him. This coming to the ears of Decius the Emperor, he ſendeth for Cornelius, asking him, How he durſt be ſo bold to ſhew ſuch ſtubbornneſs, that he neither caring for the gods, nor fearing the diſpleaſure of his Princes, durſt againſt the Common wealth give and receive Letters from others? To whom Cornelius anſwering again, thus purged himſelf, declaring to the Emperor, That Letters indeed he had written, and received again concerning the Praiſes and honouring of Chriſt, and the Salvation of Souls, but nothing as touching any matter of the Common-wealth. And it followeth in the ſtory; Then Decius moved with anger, commanded him to be beaten with Plumbats (which, as ſaith Sabellicus, is a kind of ſcourging) and ſo to be brought to the Temple of Mars: either there to do Sacrifice, or to ſuffer the extremity. But he rather willing to die, than to commit ſuch Iniquity, prepared himſelf to Martyrdom, being ſure that he ſhould die. And ſo commending the Charge of the Church unto Stephanus his Archdeacon, was brought to the way of Appius, where he ended his life in faithful Martyrdom. Euſebius in one place ſaith that he ſat two years, in another place he ſaith that he ſat three years, and ſo doth Marianus Scotus, following alſo the diverſity of the ſaid Euſebius. Damaſus giveth him only two years.

Cyprian. lib. 1. Epiſt. 1.

In this foreſaid Perſecution of Decius, it ſeemeth by ſome Writers alſo that Cyprian was baniſhed; but I ſuppoſe rather his Baniſhment to be referred to the Reign of Gallus next Emperor after Decius, whereof more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) in his place hereafter. In the mean time the ſaid Cyprian in his ſecond Book, Epiſt. 5. & 6. maketh mention of two that ſuffered either in the time of this Decius, or much about the ſame time. Of whom one was Aurelius a worthy and valiant young man, who was twice in torments for his Confeſſion; which he never denied, but manfully and boldly withſtood the Adverſary till he was baniſhed, and alſo after: and therefore was commended of Cyprian to certain Brethren to have him for their Lecturer, as in the forenamed Epiſtle of Cyprian appeareth. The other was named Mappalicus, who in the day before he ſuffered, declaring to the Proconſul in the midſt of his torments, and ſaying, Videbas cras agonem: that is, To morrow you ſhall ſee the running for a wager, &c. Was brought forth, according as he foreſpoke, to Martyrdom, and there with no leſs conſtancy than patience did ſuffer.

Aurelius Martyr.

Mappalicus Martyr.

And thus much of the tyranny of this wicked Decius againſt God his Saints. Now to touch alſo the Power of God, his Vengeance and Puniſhment againſt him. Like as we ſee commonly a tempeſt that is vehement, not long to continue: ſo it happened with this tyrannical Tormentor, who reigning but two years, as ſaith Euſebius, or three at moſt, as writeth Oroſius, among the middle of the Barbarians, with whom he did war, was there ſlain with his Son. Like as he had ſlain Philippus and his Son his Predeceſſors before, ſo was he with his Son ſlain by the righteous Judgment of God himſelf. Euſebius, lib. 7. cap. 1. Platin. Pomponius affirmeth, that he warring againſt the Gotthians, and being by them overcome, leſt he ſhould fall into their hands, ran into a Whirle-pit, where he was drowned, and his body never found after.

The juſt revenge of God againſt Perſecutors.

Neither did the juſt hand of God plague the Emperor only, but alſo revenged as well the Heathen Gentiles and Perſecutors of his Word throughout all Provinces and Dominions of the Roman Monarchy; amongſt whom the Lord, immediately after the death of Decius, ſent ſuch a Plague and Peſtilence, laſting for the ſpace of ten years together, that horrible it is to hear, and almoſt incredible to believe. Of this Plague or Peſtilence teſtifieth Dionyſius to Hierax a Biſhop in Egypt, Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 21, 22. where he declareth the mortality of this Plague to be ſo great in Alexandria where he was Biſhop, that there was no houſe in the whole City free. And although the greatneſs of the Plague touched alſo the Chriſtians ſomewhat, yet it ſcourged the Heathen Idolaters much more: beſide that the order of their behaviour in the one and in the other was much divers. For as the foreſaid Dionyſius doth record, the Chriſtians through brotherly love and piety, did not refuſe one to viſit and comfort another; and to miniſter to him what need required, notwithſtanding it was to them great danger; for divers there were who in cloſing up their eyes, in waſhing their bodies, and interring them in the ground were next themſelves which followed them to their graves. Yet all this ſtayed not them from doing their duty, and ſhewing mercy one to another: whereas the Gentiles contrarily, being extreamly viſited by the hand of God, felt the Plague, but conſidered not the ſtriker, neither yet conſidered they their Neighbour, but every man ſhifting for himſelf, neither cared one for another, but ſuch as were infected, ſome they would caſt out of the doors half dead to be devoured of Dogs and wild Beaſts, ſome they let die within their houſes without all ſuccour, ſome they ſuffered to lie unburied, for that no man durſt come near them: and yet notwithſtanding for all their voiding and ſhifting, the Peſtilence followed them whitherſoever they went, and miſerably conſumed them. Inſomuch that Dionyſius Biſhop the ſame time of Alexandria, thus reporteth of his own City, that ſuch a mortality was then among them, that the ſaid City of Alexandria had not in number ſo many of all together both old and young, as it was wont to contain before of the old men only from the age of threeſcore to ſeventy, and as were found in time paſt commonly almoſt in that City. Pomponius Letus and other Latine Writers alſo making mention of the ſaid Peſtilence declare how the beginning thereof firſt came (as they think) out of Ethiope, and from the hot Countries and ſo invading and waſting firſt the South parts, from thence ſpread into the Eaſt, and ſo further running and increaſing into all other quarters of the world, eſpecially wheresoever the Edicts of the Emperor went againſt the Chriſtians, it followed after and conſumed the moſt part of the Inhabitants; whereby many places became deſolate and void of all Concourſe, and ſo continued the term of ten years together.

A terrible peſtilence reigning through all the Roman Monarchy.

This peſtiferous Mortality (by the occaſion whereof Cyprian took the ground to write his Book De mortalitate) began as is ſaid, immediately after the death of Decius the Perſecutor, in the beginning of the Reign of Vibias Gallus, and Voluſianus his Son, who ſucceeded through treaſon next unto Decius, about the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and five, and continued their Reign but two years.

Cyprianus lib. de mortalitate. Gallus and Voluſianus Emperors. Anno 255.

This Gallus, although the firſt beginning of his Reign was ſomething quiet, yet ſhortly after following the ſteps of Decius, by whom rather he ſhould have taken better heed, ſet forth Edicts in like manner for the perſecution of Chriſtians, albeit in this Edict we find no number of Martyrs to have ſuffered, but only all this Perſecution to reſt only in the exilement of Biſhops or Guids of the Flock. Of other Sufferings or Executions we do not read, for the terrible Peſtilence following immediately kept the barbarous Heathen otherwiſe occupied. Unto this time of Gallus, rather than to the time of Decius, I refer the baniſhment of Cyprian, who was then Biſhop of Carthage, of the which baniſhment he himſelf teſtifieth in divers of his Epiſtles, declaring the cauſe thereof to riſe upon a Commotion or Sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himſelf, leſt the Sedition ſhould grow greater; notwithſtanding the ſaid Cyprian, though being abſent, yet had no leſs care of his Flock, and of the whole Church, than if he had been preſent with them, and therefore never ceaſed in his Epiſtles continually to exhort and call upon them to be conſtant in their Profeſſion, and patient in their Afflictions. Amongſt divers others whom he doth comfort in his baniſhment, although he was in that caſe to be comforted himſelf, writing to certain that were condemned to mining for metals, whoſe Names were Nemeſianus, Felix, Lucius, with other Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons, he declareth unto them; How it is no ſhame but a glory not to be feared, but to be rejoyced at, to ſuffer baniſhment or other pains for Chriſt; and confirming them in the ſame, or rather commending them, ſignifieth how worthily they do ſhew themſelves to be as valiant Captains of vertue, provoking both by the confeſſions of their mouth, and by the ſuffering of their bodies, the hearts of the Brethren to Chriſtian Martyrdom, whoſe example was and is a great confirmation to many, both Maids and Children to follow the like: as for Puniſhment and Suffering, it is (ſaith he) a thing not execrable to a Chriſtian: for a Chriſtian mans breaſt, whoſe hope doth wholly conſiſt in the Tree, dreadeth neither bat nor club: wounds and ſkars of the body be Ornaments to a Chriſtian man, ſuch as bring no ſhame nor diſhoneſty to the party, but rather preferreth and freeth him with the Lord. And although in the Mines where the metals be digged there be no beds for Chriſtian mens bodies to take their reſt, yet they have their reſt in Chriſt: and though their weary bones lie upon the cold ground, yet it is no pain to lie with Chriſt. Their feet have been fettered with bands and chains, but happily he is bound of man, whom the Lord Chriſt doth looſe: happily doth he lie tied in the ſtocks, whoſe feet thereby are made ſwifter to run to Heaven. Neither can any man tie a Chriſtian ſo faſt, but he runneth ſo much the faſter for his garland of life. They have no garments to ſave them from cold, but he that putteth on Chriſt is ſufficiently coted. Doth bread lack to their hungry bodies? But man liveth not only by bread, but by every word proceeding from the mouth of God. Your deformity (ſaith he) ſhall be turned to honour, your mourning to joy, your pain to pleaſure, and felicity infinite. And if this do grieve you that you cannot now imploy your Sacrifices and Oblations after your wonted manner, yet your daily Sacrifice ceaſeth not, which is a contrite and humble heart, as when you offer up daily your bodies a lively and a glorious Sacrifice unto the Lord, which is the Sacrifice that pleaſeth God. And though your travel be great, yet is the reward greater, which is moſt certain to follow: for God beholding and looking down upon them that confeſs his Name, in their willing mind approveth them, in their ſtriving helpeth them, in their Victory crowneth them, rewarding that in us which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in us perfected. With theſe, and ſuch like comfortable words he doth animate his Brethren, admoniſhing them that they are now in a joyful journey, haſting apace to the manſions of the Martyrs, there to enjoy after this darkneſs a ſtable light and brightneſs greater than all their Paſſions, according to the Apoſtles ſaying, Theſe ſufferings of this preſent time be nothing like comparable to the brightneſs of the Glory that ſhall be revealed in us, &c.

Item, although before men they ſuffered torments, yet their hope is full of Immortality, and being vexed in ſmall things, they ſhall be well requited in great matters: For the Lord hath tried them as gold in the fire. And writeth moreover, admoniſhing that it is appointed from the beginning of the World, that Righteouſneſs here ſhould ſuffer in ſecular Conflicts; for ſo juſt Abel was ſlain in the beginning of the World, and after him all juſt and good men, the Prophets alſo and the Apoſtles ſent of the Lord himſelf; unto whom all the Lord firſt gave an example in himſelf, teaching that there is no coming to his Kingdom, but by that way which he entred himſelf, ſaying by theſe words, He that loveth his life in this World ſhall loſe it, &c. And again, Fear ye not them that ſlay the body, but have no power to ſlay the ſoul. And Saint Paul likewiſe admoniſhing all them whoſoever covet to be Partakers of the Promiſes of the Lord, to follow the Lord, ſaith, If we Suffer together with him, we ſhall Reign together, &c.

Lucius Biſhop of Rome baniſhed. Anno 265.

In the ſame time, and under the ſaid Gallus reigning with his Son Voluſianus, was alſo Lucius Biſhop of Rome ſent to baniſhment, who next ſucceeded after Cornelius in that Biſhoprick, about the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and ſix. Albeit in this baniſhment he did not long continue, but returned home to his Church, as by the Epiſtle of Saint Cyprian, lib. 3. Epiſt. 1. may appear. As to all other Biſhops of Rome in thoſe Primitive days certain decretal Epiſtles with ſeveral Ordinances be aſcribed, bearing their Names and Titles, as hath been before declared: So alſo hath Lucius one Epiſtle fathered upon him, in the which Epiſtle he writing to the Brethren of France and of Spain, appointeth ſuch an order and form of the Church as ſeemeth not to agree with the time then preſent: for ſo he declareth in that Epiſtle,

The Epiſtle decretal of Lucius Biſhop.

The Ordinances of Lucius.

that a Biſhop in all places, whitherſoever he goeth, ſhould have two Prieſts with three Deacons waiting upon him to be witneſſes, of all his ways and doings. Which ordinance although I deny not but it may be and is convenient, yet I ſee not how that time of Lucius could ſerve then for a Biſhop to carry ſuch a pomp of Prieſts and Deacons about him, or to ſtudy for any ſuch matter: For ſo much as Biſhops commonly in thoſe days were ſeldom free to go abroad, went they never ſo ſecret, but either were in houſes cloſe and ſecret, or in Priſon, or elſe in baniſhment. Moreover in the ſaid Epiſtle how pompouſly writeth he to the Church of Rome? This holy and apoſtolical Church of Rome (ſaith he) the mother of all Churches of Chriſt, by the Grace of God omnipotent hath never been proved to ſwarve out of the path of Apoſtolical tradition, neither hath ever fallen or been depraved with heretical innovations: But even as in the firſt beginning it received the rule of the Apoſtolical faith by his firſt inſtructors, the Princes of the Apoſtles, ſo it continueth ever immaculate and undefiled unto the end.

The pompous ſtile of the Church of Rome.

Unto this Lucius alſo is referred in the decrees of Gratian this conſtitution, that no Miniſter whatſoever after his ordination, would at any time reenter into the chamber of his own wife, in pain of loſing his Miniſtery in the Church, &c. Euſebius in his ſeventh Book making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his Martyrdom, ſaith that he ſat but eight months: But Damaſus in his Martyrologe holdeth that he ſat three years, and was beheaded the ſecond year of Valerian and Galienus Emperors, and ſo doth alſo Marianus Scotus and Nauclerus, with other that follow Damaſus, affirm the ſame.

Dift. 81. miniſtri. Miniſters reſtrained from their own Wives. Euſebius and Damaſus vary in time. Lucius Biſhop of Rome martyr.

After him came Stephanus next Biſhop of Rome following Lucius, whom Damaſus, Platina, and Sabellicus affirm to have ſit ſeven years and five months, and to die a martyr. Contrary Euſebius, and Volateranus holding with him, give him but two years: which part cometh moſt near to the truth, I leave to the Readers Judgment. Of his two Epiſtles decretal, and of his Ordinances out of the ſame collected, I need not much to ſay, for two reſpects; either for that concerning theſe decretal Epiſtles ſuſpiciouſly intituled to the names of the Fathers of the primitive Church ſufficiently hath been ſaid before; or elſe becauſe both the phraſe barbarous and incongrue, and alſo the matter it ſelf therein contained is ſuch, that although no teſtimony came againſt it, yet it eaſily reſelleth it ſelf. As where in the ſecond Epiſtle he decreeth. That no Biſhop being expulſed out of his ſeat, or deprived of his goods, ought to be accuſed of any, or is bound to anſwer for himſelf, before that by the Law regularly he be reſtored again fully to his former ſtate, and that the Primates and the Synod, render unto him again all ſuch poſſeſſions and fruits as were taken from him before his accuſation, as is agreeing both to the Laws canon and alſo ſecular. Firſt here I would deſire the Reader a little to ſtay, and this to conſider with himſelf, who be theſe here meant which either uſed or might deſpoile theſe Biſhops of their goods, and expulſe them from their ſeats for ſuch wrongful cauſes, but only Kings and Emperors, which at this time were not yet Chriſtned, nor uſed any ſuch proceedings againſt theſe Biſhops, in ſuch ſort as either Primates of Synods could reſtore them again to their places and poſſeſſions: Again, what private goods or poſſeſſions had Biſhops then to be taken from them, when as Churches yet neither were indued with patrimonies nor poſſeſſions? And if any treaſures were committed to the Church, it pertained not properly to the Biſhop, but went in general to the ſubvention of the poor in the Church, as in the Epiſtle of Cornelius to Fabius may appear, alledged in Euſebius, *lib.6.cap.*43. where he ſpeaking of his Church, and declaring how there ought to be but one Biſhop in the ſame, inferreth mention of forty and ſix Prieſts, ſeven Deacons, with ſeven Subdeacons, forty two Acoluthes, of Widdows and poor afflicted perſons, to the number of fifteen hundred and above, found and nouriſhed in the ſame by the merciful benignity and providence of God: Euſebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the end of the ſaid Canon, Which thing is forbidden both by the Laws Eccleſiaſtical, and alſo ſecular, &c. Now what Laws ſecular were in the time of Steven, for Biſhops not to be charged with any accuſation before they were reſtored again to their ſtate, let any Reader marking well the ſtate of the heathen Laws that then were, Judge; and in judging I doubt not but this matter alone, though there were no other, will be enough to deſcribe the untruth hereof.

Moreover, by divers other probable notes and arguments in the ſaid ſecond Epiſtle of Stephanus it may be eaſily eſpied, this Epiſtle to be fained and miſauthoriſed, eſpecially by the fift canon of the ſaid Epiſtle, where he ſo ſolemnly entreateth of the difference between Primats, Metropolitans, and Arch-Biſhops: Which deſtinction of degrees and titles, ſavouring more of ambition than of perſecution, giveth me verily to ſuppoſe this Epiſtle not to be written by this Stephan, but by ſome other man either of that name, or of ſome other time when the Church began to be ſetled in more proſperity, and orders therein to be taken for every man to know his degree and limits of his authority, according as is ſpecified by the ſixth and ſeventh canon of the Nicene councel decreeing of the ſame matter.

Primats, Metropolitant, Archbiſhops.

The like eſtimation may be conceived alſo of the ſeventh canon of the ſaid Epiſtle, where he willeth and appointeth all cauſes judiciary to be decided and determined within the precinct of their own proper Province, and not to paſs over the bounds thereof, unleſs (ſaith he) the Appeal be made to the apoſtolical See of Rome; which favoureth in my noſe rather of a ſmack of Poſtery, than of the vain of Chriſtianity, eſpecially in theſe times, during this terrible perſecution among the Biſhops of Chriſt. And thus much of the ſecond decretal Epiſtle of Stephanus, although of the firſt Epiſtle alſo written to Hilarius, ſomething may be ſaid; as where he ſpeaketh in the ſaid Epiſtle of holy Veſtiments, and holy Veſſels, and other ornaments of the Altar ſerving to divine worſhip, and therefore not to be touched nor handled of any man, ſaving of Prieſts alone. Concerning all which implements my opinion is this; I think the Church of Rome, not to have been in ſo good ſtate then, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him, being occupied about other more earneſt matters, and ſcarce able to hide their own heads, had any mind or cogitation to ſtudy upon ſuch unneceſſary inventions ſerving in publick Churches: Neither do I ſee how the Heathen in thoſe days would have ſuffered thoſe ornaments to be unconſumed, which would not ſuffer the Biſhops themſelves to live amongſt them, notwithſtanding Iſidorus and Polydorus judge the contrary. Between this Stephan and Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage was a great contention about rebaptiſing Hereticks, whereof more hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall be ſaid.

Lawful to appeal to Rome.

Veſtiments and holy veſſels ſerving for the altar.

Beſides theſe Biſhops above ſpecified, divers other there were alſo ſent into baniſhment under the forenamed Emperors, Gallus and Voluſianus, as appeareth by Dionyſius writing to Hermannus on this wiſe: That Gallus not ſeeing the evil of Decius, nor foreſeeing the occaſion of his ſeduction and ruin, ſtumbled himſelf alſo at the ſame ſtone, lying open before his eyes: For when at the firſt beginning his Empire went proſperouſly forward, and all things went luckily with him, afterward he drave out holy men, which prayed for his peace and ſafegard, and ſo with them rejected alſo the prayers which they made for him, &c. *Euſeb.lib.7.cap.*1. Otherwiſe of any bloodſhed, or any Martyrs that in the time of this Emperor were put to death, we do not read.

Biſhops baniſhed in the time of Gallus.

After the Reign of which Emperor Gallus, and of his ſon Voluſianus being expired (who Reigned but two years) Emilianus, which ſlew them both by civil ſedition, ſucceeded in their place, who Reigned but three months, and was alſo ſlain. Next to whom Valerianus and his ſon Galienus were advanced to the Empire.

Gallus and Voluſianus Emperors ſlain. Emilianus Emperor three months. Valerianus and Galianus his ſon Emperor

About the changing of theſe Emperors the perſecution which firſt began at Decius, and afterward ſlacked in the time of Gallus, was now extinguiſhed for a time, partly for the great Plague reigning in all places, partly by the change of the Emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the firſt entrance of the Empire, for the ſpace of three or four years, was right courteous and gentle to the people of God, and well accepted of the Senate.

Perſecution ceaſed for a time. The good beginning of Valerian.

Neither was there any of all the Emperors before him, no not of them which openly profeſſed Chriſt, that ſhewed himſelf ſo loving and familiar toward the Chriſtians as he did: In ſo much that (as Dionyſius writing to Herman doth teſtifie) all his whole court was replenished with holy Saints and ſervants of Chriſt and Godly perſons, ſo that his houſe might ſeem to be made a Church of God. But by the malice of Satan, through wicked counſel, theſe quiet days endured not very long. For in proceſs of time this Valerian being charmed or incenſed by a certain Egyptian, a chief Ruler of the Heathen Synagogue of the Egyptians, a maſter of the Charmers or Inchanters, who indeed was troubled for that he could not do his Magical feats for the Chriſtians, was ſo far infatuated and bewitched, that through the deteſtable provocations of that deviliſh Egyptian, he was wholly turned unto abominable idols, and to execrable impiety, in ſacrificing young infants, and quartering bodies, and dividing the intrails of children new born; and ſo, proceeding in his fury, he moved the eighth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, whom the wicked Egyptian could not abide, as being the hinderers and deſtroyers of his Magical Inchantings, about the year of our Lord 259.

The eighth Perſecution.

The eighth perſecution. { Anno 259. }

IN the which Perſecution the chief adminiſters and executers were Emilianus Preſident of Egypt, Paternus and Galerius Maximus, Proconſuls in Africa. Bergomenſis alſo maketh mention of Paternus Vicegerent of Rome, and of Perennius. Vincentius ſpeaketh alſo of Nicerius and Claudius Preſidents, &c.

The chief executers of this Perſecution.

What was the chief original cauſe of this Perſecution partly is ſignified before, where mention was made of the wicked Egyptian: but as this was the outward and political cauſe, ſo S. Cyprian ſheweth other cauſes more ſpecial and Eccleſiaſtical in his fourth book, Epiſt. 4. whoſe words be theſe: But we (ſaith he) muſt underſtand and confeſs, that this turbulent oppreſſion and calamity, which hath waſted for the moſt part all our whole company, and doth daily conſume it, riſeth chiefly of our own wickedneſs and ſins, while we walk not in the way of the Lord, nor obſerve his precepts left unto us for our inſtitution. The Lord obſerved the will of his Father in all points, but we obſerve not the will of the Lord, having all our mind and ſtudy ſet upon lucre and poſſeſſions, given to pride, full of emulation and diſſention, void of ſimplicity and faithful dealing, renouncing this World in word only, but nothing in deed, every man pleaſing himſelf, and diſpleaſing all others. And therefore are we thus ſcourged, and worthily: for what ſtripes and ſcourges do we not deſerve, when the Confeſſors themſelves (ſuch as have bid the trial of their confeſſion) and ſuch as ought to be an example to the reſt of well-doing, do keep no diſcipline? And therefore becauſe ſome ſuch there be, proudly puft up with this ſwelling and unmannerly bragging of their confeſſion, theſe torments come, ſuch as do not eaſily ſend us to the Crown, except by the mercy of God, ſome, being taken away by quickneſs of death, do prevent the tedioufneſs of puniſhment. Theſe things do we ſuffer for our ſins and deſerts, as by the Lords cenſure we have been forewarned, ſaying: If they ſhall forſake my Law, and will not walk in my Judgments; if they ſhall prophane my Inſtitutions, and will not obſerve my precepts, I will viſit their iniquities with the rod, and their tranſgreſſions with ſcourges. Theſe rods and ſcourges (ſaith he) we feel, which neither pleaſe God in our good deeds, nor repent in our evil deeds. Wherefore the ſaid Cyprian adding this exhortation withal, exhorted them to pray and intreat from the bottom of their heart and whole mind, the mercy of God, which promiſeth, ſaying: But yet my mercy I will not ſcatter from them, &c. Let us ask, and we ſhall obtain; and though (ſaith Cyprian) it be with tariance, yet for ſo much as we have grievouſly offended, let us continue knocking, for to him that knocketh it ſhall be opened, if our prayers, ſighings and weepings knock ſtill at the door with continuance, and if our prayers be joyned together with brotherly agreement, &c. Moreover, what vices were then principally reigning among the Chriſtians, he further ſpecifieth in the ſaid Epiſtle, which chiefly were diviſion and diſſention among the brethren. For when it was ſpoken to them in a Viſion by theſe words, Petite & impetrabitis, that is, Pray and ye ſhall obtain; afterward it was required of the Congregation there preſent, to direct their prayers for certain perſons aſſigned to them by name: but they could not agree and condeſcend altogether of the names and perſons of them which they ſhould pray for, but were diſſonant in their conſent and petition: which thing (ſaith Cyprian) did greatly diſpleaſe him that ſpake unto them, Pray, and ye ſhall obtain, for that there was no uniform equality of voice and heart, nor one ſimple and joynt concord among the brethren, whereof it is written in the ſixty ſeventh Pſalm, God which maketh to dwell in the houſe together men of one accord, &c. And ſo by the occaſion hereof, he writeth unto them in the foreſaid Epiſtle, and moveth them to prayer and mutual agreement. For (ſaith he) if it be promiſed in the Goſpel to be granted whatſoever any two conſenting together ſhall ask, what ſhall then the whole Church do agreeing together? Or what if this unanimity were among the whole Fraternity? Which unanimity (ſaith Cyprian) if it had been then amongſt the brethren, Non veniſſent fratribus hæc mala, ſi in unum fraternitas fuiſſet animata: that is, Theſe evils had not happened to the brethren, if the brethren had joyned together in brotherly unanimity, &c.

Pſal. 67.

After the cauſes thus declared of this and other Perſecutions, the ſaid Saint Cyprian moreover in the forenamed Epiſtle (worthy to be read of all men) deſcribeth likewiſe a certain Viſion, wherein was ſhewed unto him by the Lord before the Perſecution came, what ſhould happen. The Viſion was this. There was a certain aged father ſitting, at whoſe right hand ſate a young man very ſad and penſive, as one with an indignation ſorrowful, holding his hand upon his breaſt, his countenance heavy and unchearful. On the left hand ſate another perſon, having in his hand a Net, which he threatned to lay to catch the people that ſtood about. And as he was marvelling that ſaw the ſight thereof, it was ſaid unto him: The young man, whom thou ſeeſt ſit on the right hand, is ſad and ſorry that his precepts be not obſerved. But he on the left hand danceth, and is merry, for that occaſion is given him to have power of the aged father to afflict men. And this Viſion was ſeen long before this tempeſt of Perſecution happened, wherein is declared the ſame that before is ſaid; the ſins of the People to be the cauſe why Satan, in this Perſecution and all others, hath had and hath ſtill ſuch power with his net of deſtruction to rage againſt the blood of Chriſtian men, and all becauſe (ſaith Cyprian) we foreſlack our praying, or be not ſo vigilant therein as we ſhould: wherefore the Lord, becauſe he loveth us, correcteth us; correcteth us to amend us, amendeth us to ſave us, &c. Cyprian.

Our ſins give Satan power againſt us.

Furthermore, the ſame Cyprian, and in the ſame Epiſtle, writing of his own revelation or meſſage ſent to him, thus ſaith: And to his leaſt ſervant both ſinful and unworthy (meaning himſelf) God of his tender goodneſs hath vouchſafed to direct this word: Tell him (ſaith he) that he be quiet and of good comfort, for peace will come, albeit a little ſtay there is for a while, for that ſome remain yet to be proved and tryed, &c. And ſheweth alſo in the ſame place of another revelation of his, wherein he was admoniſhed to be ſpare in his feeding, and ſober in his drink, leſt his mind, given to heavenly meditation, might be carried away with worldly allurements, or oppreſſed with too much ſurfeit of meats and drinks, ſhould be leſs apt or able to prayer and ſpiritual exerciſe.

Another revelation ſhewed to S. Cyprian.

Spare diet and ſober drink convenient in Chriſtian Biſhops.

Finally, in the later end of the foreſaid Epiſtle mention alſo followeth of other revelations or ſhewings: Wherein the Lord (ſaith Cyprian) doth vouchſafe to many of his ſervants to fore-ſhew to come the reſtoring of his Church, the ſtable quiet of our health and ſafeguard; after rain fair weather, after darkneſs light, after ſtormy tempeſt peaceable calm, the fatherly help of his love, the wont and old glory of his divine Majeſty, whereby both the blaſphemy of the Perſecutor ſhall be repreſſed, and the repentance of ſuch as have fallen be reformed, and the ſtrong and ſtable confidence of them that ſtand ſhall rejoyce and glory. Thus much hath S. Cyprian written of theſe things to the Clergy. Lib. 4. Epiſt. 4.

The peace of the Church to come, foreſhewed by the Lord.

As touching now the crimes and accuſations in this Perſecution laid to the charge of the Chriſtians, this was the principal: Firſt, becauſe they refuſed to do worſhip to their Idols and to the Emperors; then for that they profeſſed the Name of Chriſt: beſides, all the calamities and evils that happened in the World, as Wars, Famine and Peſtilence, were imputed only to the Chriſtians. Againſt all which quarrelling Accuſations Cyprian doth eloquently defend the Chriſtians in his Book Contra Crimes and cauſes falſly laid to the Chriſtians.

The Apology of Cyprian for the Chriſtians.

Cypr. Contra Demetrianum. Cypr. de idolorum vanitate.

Demetrianum: like as Tertullian had done before, writing contra Scapulam. And firſt touching the objection, for not worſhipping Idols, he cleareth the Chriſtians both in his Book Contra Demetrian. And alſo De vanitate idol. proving thoſe Idols to be no true Gods, but images of certain dead Kings, which neither could ſave themſelves from death, nor ſuch as worſhip them. The true God to be but one, and that by the teſtimony of Softhenes, Plato and Triſmegiſtus, the which God the Chriſtians do truly worſhip. And as concerning that the Chriſtians were thought to be the cauſe of publick calamities, becauſe they worſhipped not the Gentiles Idols, he purgeth the Chriſtians thereof, proving that if there be any defect in increaſe of things, it is not to be aſcribed to them, but rather to the decreaſe of Nature, languiſhing now towards her age and latter end. Again, for that it hath been ſo foreſaid and propheſied, that towards the end of the World ſhould come Wars, Famine and Peſtilence. Moreover, if there be any cauſe thereof more proper than other, it is moſt like to be imputed to their vain Idolatry, and to the contempt of the true God. Alſo that ſuch evils be increaſed by the wickedneſs of the people, ſo that to ſpeak in his own words, Famem majorem facit rapacitas quam ſicitas, that is, Famine cometh more by avarice of men, than by drought of the Air; but eſpecially the cauſe thereof to proceed of the cruel ſhedding of the innocent blood of the Chriſtians, &c.

Thus with many other more probations doth Cyprian defend the Chriſtians againſt the barbarous exclamations of the Heathen Gentiles. Of which Cyprian, for ſo much as he ſuffered in the time of this Perſecution, I mind (Chriſt willing) to recapitulate here in ample diſcourſe the full ſum, firſt of his life and bringing up, then of his death and Martyrdom, as the worthineſs of that man deſerveth to be remembred. Of this Cyprian therefore, otherwiſe named Statius, thus writeth Nicephorus, Nazianzenus, Jacobus de Voragine, Henricuss de Erfordia, Volateranus, Hieronymus, and others; that he being an African, and born in Carthage, firſt was an Idolater and Gentile, altogether given to the ſtudy and practice of the Magical Arts; of whoſe parentage and education in Letters from his youth no mention is made, but that he was a worthy Rhetorician in Africa: of whoſe Converſion and Baptiſm he himſelf in his firſt Book and ſecond Epiſtle, writeth a flouriſhing and eloquent Hiſtory. Which his converſion unto the Chriſtian Faith, as Hieronymus affirmeth in his Commentary upon Jonas, was through the grace of God, and the means of Cecilius a Prieſt, whoſe name after he bare, and through the occaſion of hearing the Hiſtory of the Prophet Jonas. The ſame Hierome moreover teſtifieth how he immediately upon his Converſion diſtributed among the poor all his ſubſtance, and after that, being ordained a Prieſt, was not long after conſtituted Biſhop of the Congregation of Carthage. But whether he ſucceeded Agrippinus of whom he often maketh mention (which alſo was the firſt author of Rebaptiſation) or ſome other Biſhop of Carthage, it remaineth uncertain. But this is moſt true, he himſelf ſhined in his office and dignity with ſuch good gifts and vertues, that, as Nazianzenus writeth, he had government of the whole Eaſt Church, and Church of Spain, and was called the Biſhop of the Chriſtian men.

The vertues of Cyprians life deſcribed.

And to the further ſetting forth (to the praiſe of God) of his godly Vertues wherewith he was endued, appearing as well in his own works to them that liſt to peruſe the ſame, as alſo deſcribed by other worthy Writers: he was courteous and gentle, loving and full of patience, and therewithal ſharp and ſevere in his office, according as the cauſe required, as appeareth in his firſt Book and third Epiſtle. Furthermore, he was moſt loving and kind toward his brethren, and took much pains in helping and relieving the Martyrs, as appeareth by his Letters to the Elders and Deacons of his Biſhoprick, that with all ſtudy and endeavour they ſhould gently entertain and ſhew pleaſure unto the Martyrs in his abſence, as partly is touched before.

The care of Cyprian toward the afflicted brethren.

The third Epiſtle of his firſt Book doth declare of what ſtomack and godly courage he was in executing his office, and handling his matters. Neither was he void of prudence and circumſpection, but was adorned with marvellous modeſty, whereby he attempted nothing upon his own head and judgment, but with the conſent of his fellow Biſhops and other inferior Miniſters: and that chiefly (among others) doth the tenth Epiſtle of his third Book witneſs. He was of a marvelous liberal diſpoſition towards the poor brethren of other Countries: for ſo often as he had cauſe of abſence, he committed the care of thoſe poor men to his fellow officers, and wrote to them, that of their own proper goods they would help their baniſhed brethren to that which was neceſſary for them, as witneſſeth the twenty fourth Epiſtle of his third Book. He recited among other gifts wherewith he was indued, as touching the Viſions and heavenly admonitions of the Perſecutions that ſhould follow, and of other matters touching the government of the Church in his firſt book and third epiſtle, and fourth book and fourth epiſtle, where he reciteth and expoundeth the form or manner of a certain Viſion which we have before ſufficiently expreſſed.

Viſions concerning the troubles and peace of the Church, recited and expounded by Cyprian.

He had moreover great skill in the foreknowledge of things that ſhould chance, as may be gathered in the ſixth Epiſtle of his fourth book. Alſo Auguſtine doth attribute unto him many worthy vertues, who writeth much in ſetting forth his gifts of humility in his ſecond book of Baptiſm, the fourth Chapter againſt the Donatiſts; and in his ſeventh book and eleventh chapter, of his long ſufferance and patience; alſo of his courteſie and meekneſs: by which vertues he concealed nothing that he underſtood, but uttered the ſame meekly and patiently. Alſo that he kept the eccleſiaſtical peace and concord with thoſe that were of another opinion than he was of. Laſtly, that he neither circumvented nor did prejudice any man, but followed that thing which ſeemed good in his judgment, it is manifeſt in St. Auguſtine his firſt book, De baptiſmo contra Donatiſtas. Neither is this to be paſſed with ſilence, that Hierome writeth, that he was very diligent in reading, eſpecially the works of Tertullian: for he ſaith, that he ſaw a certain old man whoſe name was Paulus, which told him he ſaw the Notary of bleſſed Cyprian, being then an old man, when he himſelf was but a ſpringal in the City of Rome, and told him that it was Cyprians wont, never to let one day paſs without ſome reading of Tertullian, and that he was accuſtomed oftentimes to ſay unto him: Give me my Maſter, meaning thereby Tertullian.

Cyprian a great reader of Tertullian

Now a few words touching his Exile and Martyrdom. Of his Epiſtles which he wrote back to his Congregation, leading his life in exile, mention is made above, wherein he ſheweth the vertue beſeeming a faithful Paſtor, in that he took no leſs care as well of his own Church, as of other Biſhops being abſent, than he did being preſent. Wherein alſo he himſelf doth ſignifie that voluntarily he abſented himſelf, leſt he ſhould do more hurt than good to the Congregation, by reaſon of his preſence, as is likewiſe declared before. Thus from the deſolate places of his baniſhment, wherein he was oftentimes ſought for, he writeth unto his brethren, as in his third book and tenth epiſtle is manifeſt, which thing ſeemeth to be done in the Reign of Decius or Gallus. But after that he returned again out of exile in the Reign of this Valerianus, he was alſo after that the ſecond time baniſhed of Paternus the Proconſul of Africa into the City of Thurbin, as the Oration of Auguſtine touching Cyprian ſheweth; or elſe, as Pontius the Deacon ſaith, into a City named Furabilitana, or Curabilitana. But when Paternus the Proconſul was dead, Galienus Marimus ſucceeded in the room and office of Paternus, who finding Cyprian in a Garden, cauſed him to be apprehended by his Serjeants, and to be brought before the Idols to offer Sacrifice. Which when he would not do, then the Proconſul breaking forth in theſe words, ſaid, Long haſt thou lived in a ſacrilegious mind, and haſt gathered together men of a wicked conſpiracy, and haſt ſhewed thy ſelf an enemy to the Gods of the Romans, and to their holy laws: neither could the ſacred Emperors Valerianus and Galienus revoke thee to the Sect of their ceremonies. At length the wicked Tyrant condemned him to have his head cut off, he patiently and willingly ſubmitted his neck to the ſtroke of the Sword, as Hieronymus affirmeth. And to this bleſſed Martyr ended this preſent life in the Lord; Xyſtus then being Biſhop of Rome, as Euſebius noteth, in the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and nine. Sabellicus ſaith that he was martyred in the Reign of Gallus and Voluſianus, Lucius being Biſhop of Rome: but that ſeemeth not like.

Now

The Books of Cyprian.

Now remaineth to ſpeak ſomething likewiſe of his Works and Books left behind him, although all peradventure that he wrote do not remain: whereof ſome are miſſing, ſome again, in the livery of his Name and Title, are not his: but ſuch as be certainly his, by the ſtile and ſenſe may ſoon be diſcerned; ſuch is the eloquence of his phraſe, and gravity of his ſentence, vigor of wit, power in perſwaſion, ſo much differing from many others, as he can lightly be imitated but of few. Of the which his Books with us extant, as the flouriſhing eloquence is worthily commended, proceeding out of the School of Rhetoricians, ſo is the authority thereof no leſs of Reputation, not only among us of this age of the Church, but alſo among the ancient Fathers.

The judgement of Auguſtine upon the Books of Cyprian. Auguſt. contra Creſcon. lib.1.ca.32.

Whereof St. Auguſtine ſpeaking in his commendation, ſaith, Ego (inquit) literas Cypriani non ut canonicas habeo, ſed eas ex canonicis conſidero: & quod in eis divinarum Scripturarum authoritati congruit cum laude ejus accipio; quod autem non congruit, cum pace ejus reſpuo, &c. By which words it may appear that Auguſtine, although he did not repute the Books and Writings of Cyprian to be equivalent with the Holy Scripture, yet notwithſtanding, next after the Holy Scriptures he had the ſame in exceeding great admiration.

Sentences of Cyprian collected. Ex Vincent. lib.24 c.63.

Vincentius and Lazarus Celeſtinus reciting the names of divers Books, bearing the Title of Cyprian (more perchance than be truly his) do collect out of them a certain extract of his moſt pithy Sentences, all which here to repeat were too tedious. To give a taſte of the ſpecial, I thought it not impertinent. As where he ſpeaking of the treaſures of a rich man, exhorteth ſaying:

Ne dormiat in theſauris tuis, quod pauperi prodeſſe poteſt.
Let it not ſleep in thy treaſures, that may profit the poor.

Duo nunquam veteraſcunt in homine: cor ſemper novas cogitationes machinando: lingua, cordis vanas conceptiones proferendo.
Two things never wax old in man, the heart ever imagining new cogitations, the tongue ever in uttering the vain conceptions of the heart.

Quod aliquando de neceſſitate amittendum eſt, ſponte pro divina remuneratione diſtribuendum eſt.
That which a man muſt needs forgo of neceſſity, wiſdom it is for a man to diſtribute ſo, that God may everlaſtingly reward him.

Diſciplina eſt morum præſentium ordinata correctio, & malorum præteritorum regularis obſervatio.
Diſcipline is an ordinate amendment of manners preſent, and a regular obſervation of evils paſt.

Integritas ibi nulla eſſe poteſt, ubi, qui improbos damnent, deſunt: & ſoli, qui damnentur, occurrunt.
There can be no integrity, whereas they which ſhould condemn the wicked, are ever wanting: and they only which are to be condemned, are ever preſent.

Avari ad hoc tantum poſſident quæ habent, ut ne alteri poſſidere liceat,
A covetous man only poſſeſſeth his goods for this, becauſe another ſhould not poſſeſs them.

Sericum & purpurum induta Chriſtum induere non poſſunt.
Women, that advance themſelves in putting on ſilks and purple, cannot lightly put on Chriſt.

Fœminæ crines ſuos inficiunt malo præſagio: capillos enim ſibi flammeos auſpicari non metuunt.
They which colour their locks with red and yellow, begin betime to prognoſticate of what colour their hair ſhall be in Hell.

The more children and greater houſhold thou haſt at home, the more cauſe thou haſt not to hoord up, but to diſperſe abroad, for that many ſins are to be redeemed, many Conſciences are to be purged.

The place of Scripture expounded. Eleemoſyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat. Tob. 4. Ex Cypr. lib. Epiſt. 2.

Moreover leſt the Papiſts here ſhould take an occaſion by this Text, grounded upon the Text of Tob. cap. 4. Alms (ſaith he) delivereth from all ſin and death: to build up the works of ſatisfaction, the ſaid Cyprian, Lib. 4. Epiſt. 2. more plainly expoundeth both himſelf, and that place of Scripture, writing in theſe words: Quia ſcriptum eſt, Eleemoſyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat: Tob. 4. Non utique ab ea morte, quam ſemel Chriſti ſanguis extinxit, & a qua nos ſalutaris baptiſmi & redemptoris noſtri gratia liberavit, ſed ab illa quæ per delicta poſtmodum ſerpit, &c. that is, Alms do deliver from all ſin and from death, Tob. 4. Not from that (ſaith Cyprian) which the blood of Chriſt hath once extinguiſhed, and from which the wholeſome grace of our Baptiſm, and of our Redeemer hath delivered us, but from that death which afterwards creepeth in by ſin, &c. Cyprian. Lib. 4. Epiſt. 2. By which words it is apparent, that Cyprian meaneth this deliverance (which cometh by Alms giving) from death and ſin not to be expounded nor to be taken for death everlaſting, from which only the blood of Chriſt doth ſave us: but for temporal or tranſitory puniſhment, which is wont to be inflicted in this body of ſin. For ſo it is nothing repugnant, but that temporal vertues may have their temporal rewards in this life, and likewiſe ſins committed, may have temporal puniſhments both in us and in our families, our eternal ſalvation ſtanding evermore firm in Chriſt yet notwithſtanding.

Twelve abuſes in the life of man noted out of Cyprian

The foreſaid Vincentius moreover ſpeaking of another Book of Cyprian (although the ſaid Book be not numbred in the Catalogue of his Works) maketh mention of twelve abuſes, or abſurdities in the life of man, which in order be theſe:

1. Sapiens ſine operibus. A wiſe man without good works.
2. Senex ſine Religione. An old man without Religion.
3. Adoleſcens ſine obedientia. A young man without obedience.
4. Dives ſine eleemoſyna. A rich man without Alms.
5. Fœmina ſine pudicitia. A woman ſhameleſs.
6. Dominus ſine virtute. A guid without vertue.
7. Chriſtianus contentioſus. A Chriſtian man contentious.
8. Pauper ſuperbus. A poor man proud.
9. Rex iniquus. A King unrighteous.
10. Epiſcopus negligens. A Biſhop negligent.
11. Plebs ſine Diſciplina. People without Diſcipline.
12. Populus ſine lege. Subjects without Law.

The learning of Cyprian enjoyed with his blemiſhes.

As we have hitherto ſet forth the commendation of Cyprian this bleſſed Martyr: ſo muſt we now take heed again that we do not here incur the old and common danger, which the Papiſts are commonly accuſtomed to run into, whoſe fault is always almoſt to be immoderate and exceſſive in their proceedings, making too much almoſt of every thing. So in ſpeaking of the Holy Sacraments, they make more of them than doth the nature of Sacraments require; not uſing them, but abuſing them, not referring or applying them, but adorning them, not taking them in their kind for things godly, as they are, but taking them for God himſelf, turning Religion into Superſtition, and the creature to the Creator, the things ſignifying to the things themſelves ſignified, &c. To the Church likewiſe and ceremonies of the Church, to General Councils, to the bleſſed Virgin Mary Mother of Chriſt, to the Biſhop of Rome, and to all other in like caſe, not contented to attribute that which is ſufficient, they exceed moreover, the bounds of judgment and verity, judging ſo of the Church, and General Councils, as though they could never, or did never err in any jot. That the bleſſed Mother of Chriſt amongſt all women was bleſſed, and a Virgin full of grace, the Scripture and truth doth give: but to ſay that ſhe was born without all original ſin, or to make of her an advocate, or mother of mercy, there they run further than truth will bear. The ceremonies were firſt ordained to ſerve but only for order ſake, unto the which they have attributed ſo much at length, that they have ſet in them a great part of our Religion, yea, and alſo of Salvation. And what thing is there elſe almoſt, wherein the Papiſts have not exceeded?

The fault of Papiſts to make too much of every thing.

How far the authority of the Doctors ought to extend.

Wherefore, to avoid this common error of the Papiſts, we muſt beware in commending the Doctors and Writers of the Church, and ſo commend them, that truth and conſideration, go with our commendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other bleſſed Martyrs were holy Men; yet notwithſtanding; they were Men, that is, ſuch as might have, and had their falls and faults; Men, I ſay, and not Angels, nor Gods; ſaved by God, not ſaviours of Men, nor Patrons of Grace. And though they were alſo men of excellent learning, and worthy Doctors, yet with their learning they had their errors alſo annexed. And though their Books be (as they ought to be) of great authority, yet ought they not to be equal with the Scriptures. And albeit they ſaid well in moſt things, yet it is not therefore enough that what they ſaid, it muſt ſtand for a truth. That preeminence of authority only belongeth to the Word of God, and not to the Pen of Man. For of Men and Doctors, be they never ſo famous, there is none that is void of his reprehenſion. In Origen (although in his time the admiration of his learning was ſingular) yet how many things be there, which the Church now holdeth not? But examining him by Scriptures, where he ſaid well, they admit him, where otherwiſe, they leave him. In Polycarpus, the Church hath corrected and altered that which he did hold in celebrating the Eaſter day after the Jews. Neither can holy and bleſſed Ignatius be defended in all his ſayings; as where he maketh the faſting upon the Sunday or the Sabbath day as great an offence, as to kill Chriſt himſelf: Ignat. Epiſt. ad Philip. contrary to this ſaying of Saint Paul, Let no man judge you in meat and drink: alſo where the ſaid Ignatius ſpeaketh De Virginitate, and of other things more. Irenæus did hold that man was not made perfect in the beginning. He ſeemeth alſo to defend free will in man, in thoſe things alſo that be ſpiritual. He ſaith that Chriſt ſuffered after he was fifty years old, abuſing this place of the Goſpel, Quinquaginta annos nondum habes, &c. Tertullian (whom Saint Cyprian never laid out of his hands almoſt) is noted to be a Chiliaſt: alſo to have been of Montanus Sect. The ſame did hold alſo with Juſtine, Cyprian, and others, that the Angels fell firſt for the concupiſence of women: Lib. de habitu mulierum. He defendeth free will of man after the corruption of nature, inclining alſo to the error of them, which defend the poſſibility of keeping Gods Law. Concerning Marriage; Unum matrimonium (inquit) novimus, ſicut unum Deum: that is, We know (ſaith he) one Marriage, as we know one God; condemning the ſecond Marriage, Lib. de Monogam. Divers other things of like abſurdity in him be noted. Juſtinus alſo ſeemeth to have inclined unto the error of the Chiliaſts, of the fall of certain Angels by Women, of free will of man, of poſſibility of keeping the Law, and ſuch others. Neither was this our Cyprian, the great Scholar of Tertullian, utterly exempt from the blot of them, who, contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, did hold with rebaptiſing of ſuch as were before baptiſed of Hereticks, whereof ſpeaketh Saint Auguſtine, miſliking the ſame error of Cyprian, in theſe words contained in his ſecond Book Contra Creſconiam. Cypriani, inquit, laudem ego conſequi non valeo, ejus multis literis mea ſcripta non comparo, ejus ingenium diligo, ejus ore delector, ejus charitatem miror, ejus martyrium veneror: non accipio quod de baptiſandis hæreticis & ſchiſmaticis ſenſit, &c. Upon the which matter there was a great contention between the ſaid Cyprian and Stephan Biſhop of Rome, as partly afore is noted. Of Auguſtine himſelf likewiſe, of Ambroſe, Hierome, Chryſoſtome, the ſame may be ſaid, that none of them all ſo clearly paſſed away, but their peculiar faults and errors went with them, whereof it were too long, and out of our purpoſe at this preſent to intreat. And thus much concerning the ſtory of Cyprian, the holy learned Martyr of Chriſt.

Contention between Cyprian and Stephanus Biſhop of Rome.

Albeit here is to be noted by the way, touching the life and ſtory of Cyprian, that this Cyprian was not he whom the narration of Nazianzen ſpeaketh of (as is above mentioned) who from Art Magick was converted to be a Chriſtian, which Cyprian was a Citizen of Antioch, and afterward Biſhop of the ſame City, and was martyred under Diocleſian: whereas this Cyprian was Biſhop of Carthage, and died under Valerianus, as is ſaid, &c. By the decrees of Gratian. diſt. 10. quoniam, it appeareth moreover that there was alſo a third Cyprian in the time of Julianus the Emperor Apoſtata, long after both theſe aforenamed: for ſo giveth the title prefixed before the ſaid diſtinction, Cyprianus Juliano Imperatori: the diſtinction beginning: Quoniam idem Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Chriſtus Jeſus, ſic actibus propriis, & dignitatibus diſtinctis officia poteſtatis utriuſque diſcernit, &c. Upon the which diſtinction the gloſs cometh in with theſe words, ſaying, that the Popedome, and the ſeat Imperial, have both one beginning of one, that is Chriſt: who was both Biſhop, and King of Kings. And that the ſaid dignities be diſtinct, albeit the Pope notwithſtanding hath both the ſwords in his hand, and may exerciſe them both ſometime. And therefore although they be diſtinct, yet in exerciſe the one ſtandeth lineally under the other, ſo that the imperial dignity is ſubject under the Papal Dignity, as the inferiour is ſubject under the ſuperiour: that as there is one ruler over the whole World, which is God: ſo in the Church is one Monarch, that is, the Pope, to whom the Lord hath committed the power and lawful right both of the heavenly and terrene dominion. Hæc gloſſa.

Cyprian. A diſtinct on of Gratian diſproved.

Thus much I thought here to note by the way, becauſe this diſtinction is fathered upon Cyprian, which is falſe: for this Cyprian was not in the time of Julian, not by two hundred years, and ſo likewiſe the other Cyprian, which died Martyr under Diocleſian. Of any Cyprian beſides theſe two we read not; neither is it credible, that, if there were any ſuch Cyprian, he would ever have written of any ſuch matter, of the difference and mutual need of Chriſtian Emperors and Chriſtian Popes; when as that Emperor being an Apoſtata, neither regarded Chriſt, nor cared for any Pope.

Xiſtus the ſecond Biſhop of Rome Martyr.

About this time, and under the ſame Emperor Valerianus ſuffered alſo Xiſtus, or Sixtus, the ſecond of that name, Biſhop of Rome, who, being accuſed of his adverſaries to be a Chriſtian, was brought with his ſix Deacons to the place of execution, where he with Nemeſius and other his Deacons were beheaded and ſuffered Martyrdom. Lawrence in the ſame time, being alſo Deacon, followed after, complaining to Xiſtus (as one being grieved) that he might not alſo ſuffer with him, but to be ſecluded as the ſon from the father. To whom the Biſhop anſwering again, declared that within three days he ſhould follow after. In the mean time he willed him to go home, and to diſtribute his treaſures, if he had any, unto the poor. The Judge, belike hearing mention to be made of treaſures to be given to the poor, and thinking that Lawrence had great ſtore of treaſure in his cuſtody, commanded him to bring the ſame unto him, according as in the diſcourſe of the ſtory here under written more fully may appear. Which Hiſtory, becauſe it is ſet forth more at large in Prudentius, Ambroſe, and other Writers, and containeth in it more things worthy to be noted of the Reader; we have therefore with the more diligence here inſerted the more ample deſcription of the ſame, to the further admiration of his patience, and God his glory ſhewed in him.

Six Deacons with Xiſtus Martyrs.

Now then, as order required, let us enter the ſtory of that moſt conſtant and couragious Martyr of Chriſt S. Laurence, whoſe words and works deſerve to be as freſh and green in Chriſtian hearts, as is the flouriſhing Laurel tree. This thirſty heart longing after the water of life, deſirous to paſs unto it through the ſtrait door of bitter death, when on a time he ſaw his vigilant ſhepherd Xiſtus, led as an harmeleſs Lamb, of harmeful Tyrants to his Death, cryed out with open mouth and heart invincible, ſaying, ſaying: O dear Father, Whither goeſt thou, without the company of thy dear ſon? Whither haſteneſt thou, O reverend Prieſt, without thy Deacon? Never waſt thou wont to offer ſacrifice without thy Miniſter. What crime is there in me that offendeth thy fatherhood? Haſt thou proved unnatural? Now try, ſweet Father, whether thou haſt choſen a faithful Miniſter or not? Denieſt thou unto him the fellowſhip of thy blood, to whom thou haſt committed the diſtribution of the Lords blood? See that thy Judgment be not miſtaken, whilſt thy fortitude is liked and lauded. The abuſing of the ſcholar is the diſgracing of the Maſter. What? Have we not learned that worthy Maſters have obtained moſt worthy fame by the worthy acts of their Diſciples and ſcholars? Finally, Abraham ſacrificed his only begotten Iſaac; ſtoned Stephan, prepared the way to Preaching Peter: Even ſo Father declare thy manifold vertues by me thy ſon. Offer thou him that proffereth himſelf; grant that the body of thy ſcholar may be ſacrificed, whoſe mind with good letters thou haſt beautified. Theſe words with tears Saint Laurence uttered, not becauſe his Maſter ſhould ſuffer, but for that he might not be ſuffered to taſte of Deaths cup which he thirſted after.

The ſtory of martyrdom of Laurence. Ex Ambroſ. lib. 1. offic. cap. 41. Ex Prudent. in lib. Periſteph.

The words of Laurence to Xyſtus.

The anſwer of Xyſtus to Laurence.

Then Xyſtus to his ſon ſhaped this anſwer: I forſake thee not, O my ſon; I give thee to wit, that a ſharper conflict remaineth for thee. O feeble and weak old man am I, and therefore run the race of a lighter and eaſier Death: But luſty and young thou art, and more luſtily, yea more gloriouſly ſhalt thou triumph over this Tyrant: Thy time approacheth, ceaſe to weep and lament, three days after thou ſhalt follow me: Decent it is that this ſpace of time come between the Prieſt and the Levite. It may not beſeem thee, O ſweet pupil, to triumph under thy Maſter, leſt it be ſaid, he wanted an helper. Why craveſt thou to be partaker with me in my paſſion? I bequeath unto thee the whole inheritance. Why requireſt thou to enjoy my preſence? Let weak ſcholars go before, and the ſtronger come after, that thoſe without maſter may get the victory, which have no need by maſter to be governed. So Helias left behind him his beloved Heliſeus. I yield up into thy hands the ſucceſſion of my virtues. Such was their contention, not unmeet for ſo Godly a Prieſt, and ſo zealous a Miniſter; ſtriving with themſelves who ſhould firſt ſuffer for the name of Chriſt Jeſus.

In tragical Hiſtories we have it mentioned, that through joy and admiration, people clapped their hands, when Pilades named himſelf Oreſtes; Oreſtes (as truth it was) affirmed himſelf to be Oreſtes: Pilades wiſhing to die for Oreſtes, Oreſtes not ſuffering Pilades to loſe his life for his ſake; but neither of them might eſcape Death; for both theſe lovers were guilty of blood, the one committing the fact, the other conſenting. But this our Laurence, the Martyr moſt conſtant, was by no means enforced to make this proffer, moving only by his ardent zeal and fervent ſpirit, who thirſting after the Cup of Martyrdom, had it ſhortly after filled to the hard brim.

Some ſay that this Tyrant was Decius the rebel Emperor, but that cannot be, except Galienus or ſome other judge now was called by the name of Decius.

Now let us draw near to the fire of Martyred Laurence, that our cold Hearts may be warmed thereby. The mercileſs Tyrant; underſtanding this vertuous Levite, not only to be a Miniſter of the Sacraments; but a diſtributer alſo of the Church riches (whereof mention is made before in the words of Xyſtus) promiſed to himſelf a double prey, by the apprehenſion of one ſilly Soul. Firſt with the rake of avarice to ſcrape to himſelf the Treaſure of poor Chriſtians; then with the fiery fork of Tyranny, ſo to toſs and turmoil them, that they ſhould wax weary of their Profeſſion: With furious face and cruel countenance, the greedy wolfe demanded where this Deacon Laurence, had beſtowed the ſubſtance of the Church? Who craving three days reſpite, promiſed to declare where the Treaſure might be had. In the mean time, he cauſed a good number of poor Chriſtians to be Congregated. So when the day of his anſwer was come, the perſecutor ſtrictly charged him to ſtand to his promiſe. Then valiant Laurence ſtretching out his Arms over the poor, ſaid: Theſe are the precious Treaſure of the Church, theſe are the Treaſure indeed, in whom the faith of Chriſt Reigneth, in whom Jeſus Chriſt hath his manſion place. What more precious jewels can Chriſt have, than thoſe in whom he hath promiſed to dwell? For ſo it is written, I was hungry and ye gave me to eat; I was thirſty, and ye gave me to drink; I was harbourleſs, and ye lodged me. And again; Look what ye have done to the leaſt of theſe, the ſame have ye done to me. What greater riches can Chriſt our Maſter poſſeſs, than the poor People, in whom he loved to be ſeen? Oh, what tongue is able to expreſs the fury and madneſs of the tyrants Heart! Now he ſtamped, he ſtared, he ramped, he fared as one out of his wits: His eyes like fire glowed, his mouth like a Bore fomed, his teeth like a helhound grinned. Now not a reaſonable man, but a roaring Lion he might be called. Kindle the fire (he cryed) of wood make no ſpare. Hath this vallain deluded the Emperor? Away with him, away with him: Whip him with ſcourges, jerk him with rods, buffit him with fiſts, brain him with clubs. Jeſteth the traytor with the Emperor? Pinch him with fiery Tongs, gird him with burning plates, bring out the ſtrongeſt chains, and the fire-forks, and the grated bed of Iron: on the fire with it, bind the rebel hand and foot; and when the bed is fire hot, on with him: Roſt him, broil him, toſs him, turn him: on pain of our high diſpleaſure do every man his office, O ye tormentors. The word was no ſooner ſpoken, but all was done.

The true Treaſure of Chriſt his Church.

Laurence tormented on the fiery gridiron.

After many cruel handlings, this meek lamb was laid. I will not ſay on his fiery bed of Iron, but on his ſoft bed of Down. So mightily God wrought with his Martyr Laurence, ſo miraculouſly God tempered his element the fire; not a bed of conſuming pain, but a pallet of nouriſhing reſt was it unto Laurence. Not Laurence, but the Emperor might ſeem to be tormented: The one broyling in the fleſh, the other burning in the Heart. When this triumphant Martyr had been preſſed down with fire-picks for a great ſpace, in the mighty Spirit of God he ſpake to the vanquiſhed Tyrant.

The ſtupendar patience of Laurence in his pains.

This ſide is now roſted enough, turn up O Tyrant great:
Aſſay whether roſted or raw, thou thinkſt the better meat.

O rare and unaccuſtomed patience! O faith invincible! that not only not burneſt, but by means unſpeakable doſt recreate, refreſh, ſtabliſh, and ſtrengthen thoſe that are burned, afflicted and troubled. And why ſo mightily comforteſt thou the perſecuted? Becauſe through thee they believe in Gods promiſes infallible. By thee this glorious Martyr overcometh his torments, vanquiſheth this Tyrant, confoundeth his Enemies, confirmeth the Chriſtians, ſleepeth in peace, and reigneth in glory. The God of might and mercy grant us grace by the life of Laurence to learn in Chriſt to live, and by his death to learn for Chriſt to die, Amen.

The martyr down and end of bleſſed Laurence.

Such is the wiſdom and providence of God, that the blood of his dear Saints (like good ſeed) never falleth in vain to the ground, but it bringeth ſome increaſe: So it pleaſed the Lord to work at the Martyrdom of this holy Laurence, that by the conſtant confeſſion of this worthy and valiant Deacon, a certain Souldier of Rome being therewith compunCted, and converted to the ſame faith, deſired forthwith to be Baptized of him: For the which he, being called for of the Judge, was ſcourged, and afterward beheaded. Henr. de Erford.

A Roman ſouldier converted by Laurence, and martyred.

Under the ſame Velerianus, ſuffered alſo Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria, much affliction and baniſhment, with certain other brethren: Of the which he writeth himſelf, and is alledged in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory of Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 11. the words whereof tend to this effect. Dionyſius with three of his Deacons, to wit, Maximus, Fauſtus and Cheremon, alſo with a certain Brother of Rome, came to Emilianus then preſident, who were declared unto them in circumſtance of words, how he had ſignified unto them the clemency of his Lords and Emperors; who had granted them pardon of life, ſo that they would return to them, and worſhip the Gods and keepers (as he called them) of their Empery, asking them what anſwer they would give him thereunto: Truſting as he ſaid that they would not ſhew themſelves ingrateful, to the clemency of them which ſo gently did exhort them. To this Dionyſius anſwering, ſaid: All men worſhip not all Gods, but divers men, divers Gods; ſo as every one hath in himſelf a mind or Phantaſie to worſhip. But we worſhip not many, nor divers Gods, but only that one God, who is the Creator of all things, and hath committed to our Lords, Valerianus and Galienus, the government of their Empery, making to him our prayers inceſſantly for their proſperous health and continuance. Then the Preſident ſaid: And what hurt is it, ſith that you may both worſhip your God, what God ſoever he be, and theſe our Gods alſo? For you are commanded to worſhip ſuch Gods, as all men know to be Gods. Dionyſius anſwered, We worſhip none other, but as we have ſaid. Emilianus the Preſident ſaid; I ſee you are ingrateful men, and conſider not the benignity of the Emperor; wherefore you ſhall remain no longer in this City, but ſhall be ſent out to the parts of Libya, unto a Town called Cephro: For that place by the commandment of the Emperor I have choſen for you. Neither ſhall it be lawful for you to convent your aſſemblies, or to reſort as ye are wont to your burial places. And if any of you ſhall be found out of your places whereunto you are appointed, at your peril be it. And think not contrary, but ye ſhall be watched well enough. Depart therefore to the place, as is commanded you. And it followeth more in the ſaid Dionyſius, ſpeaking of himſelf: And as for me (ſaith he) although I was ſick, yet he urged me ſo ſtrictly to depart, that he would not give me one days reſpite. And how (ſaid he, writing to Germanus) could I congregate or not congregate any aſſemblies? And after a few lines it followeth; And yet neither am I altogether abſent from the Corporal ſociety of the Lords flock, but I have collected them together, which were in the City, being abſent, as though I had been preſent; abſent in body, yet preſent in Spirit. And in the ſame Cephro, a great Congregation remained with me, as well of thoſe brethren which followed me out of the City, as alſo of them which were remaining there out of Egypt. And there the Lord opened to me the door of his Word: Although at the firſt entrance I was perſecuted and ſtoned among them, yet afterward a great number of them fell from their Idols, and were converted unto the Lord. And ſo by us the Word was preached to them which before were infidels: Which Miniſtery after that we had accompliſhed there, the Lord removed us to another place. For Emilianus tranſlated us from thence to more ſharp and ſtricter places of Libia, and commanded us to meet all together at the City Mareota: Thinking there to ſeparate us ſeverally into ſundry Villages, or thinking rather to take and prevent us by the way. After we were come thither, it was aſſigned to me (ſaith Dionyſius) to go to Colluthian, which place I never heard of before: Which was the more grief to me; yet ſome ſolace it was to me, that the brethren told me it was near to a City named Paretonium. For as my being at Cephro got me the acquaintance of many brethren of Egypt, ſo my hope was, that the vicinity of that place (where I ſhould be) to the City, might procure the familiarity and converſe of certain loving brethren, which would reſort and aſſemble with us, and ſo it came to paſs, &c.

Moreover, the ſaid Dionyſius in his Epiſtle, Ad Domitium & Dydimum, making mention of them which were afflicted in this perſecution of Valerian, recordeth in theſe words, ſaying: It were ſuperfluous (ſaith he) here to recite the names, peculiarly of all our brethren ſlain in this perſecution, which both were many, and to me unknown. But this is certain, that there were men, women, young men, maidens, old wives, ſouldiers, ſimple innocents, and of all ſorts and ages of men. Of whom ſome with ſcourgings and fire, ſome with ſword obtain victory, and got the Crown. Some continued a great time, and yet have been reſerved. In the which number am I reſerved hitherto, to ſome other opportune time known unto the Lord, which ſaith: In the time accepted I have heard thee, and in the day of ſalvaton I have helped thee, &c. Now as concerning my ſelf in what ſtate I am, if thou deſire to know firſt how I and Caius, and Fauſtus, Petrus and Paulus, being apprehended by the Centurion, were taken away by certain of the Town of Mareota, I have declared to you before. Now I and Caius, and Petrus alone are left here included in a Weſt place of Libia, diſtant the ſpace of three days journey from Paretonium, &c. And in proceſs further he addeth: In the City (ſaith he) were certain which privily viſit the brethren: Of Prieſts, Maximus, Dioſcorus, Demetrius and Lucius. For they which were more notable in the world, Fauſtinus and Aquila, do wander abroad in Egypt. Of the Deacons beſides them whom ſickneſs hath conſumed, Fauſtus, Euſebius, and Cheremon are yet alive. Euſebius hath God raiſed and ſtirred up to miniſter to the confeſſors lying in bands, and to bury the bodies of the bleſſed Martyrs, not without great peril. Neither doth the Preſident ceaſe yet to this day, cruelly murthering ſuch as be brought before him, tearing ſome with torments, impriſoning and keeping ſome in cuſtody, commanding that no man ſhould come to them, enquiring alſo who reſorted unto them. Yet notwithſtanding God with cheerfulneſs, and daily reſort of the brethren doth comfort the afflicted. Hæc Dionyſius.

Martyrs of all ſorts and ages.

Concerning theſe Deacons above recited, here is to be noted, that Euſebius afterward was made Biſhop of Laodicea in Syria. Maximus the Prieſt aforeſaid, had the miniſtration of the Church of Alexandria after Dionyſius. Fauſtus long after continued in great age, unto the laſt perſecution, where he being a very old man, at length was beheaded, and died a Martyr.

Euſebius the Deacon made Biſhop of Laodicea. Maximus Biſhop of Alexandria. Fauſtus long preſerved, at laſt a martyr.

As touching Dionyſius himſelf, thus the ſtories report, that he ſurviving all theſe troubles and perſecutions, by the providence of God, continued after the death of Valerian, unto the twelfth year of the Reign of Galienus, which was about the year of our Lord, two hundred threeſcore and eight; and ſo departed in peace in great age, after that he had governed the Church of Alexandria the ſpace of ſeventeen years, and before that had taught the School of the ſaid City of Alexandria, the term of ſixteen years, after whom ſucceeded Maximus, as is above ſpecified. And thus much touching the full ſtory of Dionyſius Alexandrinus, and of other alſo, Martyrs and confeſſors of Alexandria.

The end and death of Dionyſius.

Priſcus, Malchus, Alexander, a woman, Martyrs.

In Ceſarea Paleſtine ſuffered alſo the ſame time Priſcus, Malchus and Alexander, the which three dwelling in the Country, and good men, ſeeing the valiant courage of the Chriſtians, ſo boldly to venture, and conſtantly to ſtand, and patiently to ſuffer in this perſecution, as men being grieved with themſelves, began to repent and accuſe their ſo great ſluggiſhneſs, and cowardly negligence, to ſee others ſo zealous and valiant, and themſelves ſo cold and faint-hearted, in labouring for the Crown of Chriſtian martyrdom: And firſt conſulting and agreeing with themſelves, they came to Ceſarea, and there ſtepping to the Judge, declared themſelves what they were, and obtained the end they came for, being given to the wild beaſts. After which manner alſo and in the ſame City of Ceſarea, a certain woman, whoſe name Euſebius expreſſeth not, who had been before of the ſect of Marcion, was brought before the Preſident, and likewiſe obtained the ſame Martyrdom, Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 12.

Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 12.

Neither was the City of Carthage all this while free from the ſtroke of this perſecution, if credit ſhould be given to the ſpeculative glaſs of Vincentius, who citing it out of Hugo, recordeth of three hundred Martyrs, of which three hundred Martyrs, the ſtory ſaith thus, that the Preſident ſetting before them coals and incenſe to do ſacrifice by a lime-kiln, which was there near at hand, offered unto them this condition, either to ſet incenſe to the coals for ſacrifice to Jupiter, or elſe to go into the furnace of lime: Whereupon they all together with a general motion, ſuddenly ruſhed into the kiln, and there with the duſty ſmoke of the lime were ſmothered. Vincent. Erford.

Three hundred martyres in Carthage. Ex ſpecul. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 83.

In Africa alſo, in the City of Tuburba, the ſaid Vincentius out of the Martyrology inferreth mention of three conſtant virgins, Maxima, Donatilla, and Secunda; who, in the perſecution of this Valerian and Galienus, firſt had given for their drink vinegar and gall, then with ſcourges were tried, after that upon the gibbet were tormented, and rubbed with lime, then were ſcorched upon the fiery grid-iron, at laſt were caſt to the wild beaſts; who, being not touched of them, finally with the ſword were beheaded, Vincent. Erford.

Maxima, Donatilla, Secunda, virgins, Martyrs.

In Simela, a City in Italy, under the Alps, one Pontius being there apprehended, by the commandment of Claudius the Preſident, was hanged firſt upon the rack, then was caſt to the wild beaſts, of whom he being nothing hurt, was after committed to the fire; and finally, not touched therewith (if the ſtory of Vincentius be true) was beheaded by the rivers ſide, and his body thrown into the flood, where immediately the ſame hour, the foreſaid Claudius, with his aſſiſtant Anabius, were taken with wicked ſpirits, by whom they were ſo miſerably vexed that they bit off their tongues, and died.

Pontius martyr.

Commendation of Euſebius the Deacon.

Zenon,

Zenon Martyr.

Zenon Biſhop of Verona, is ſaid alſo in the ſame perſecution to ſuſtain Martyrdom.

Bergomenſis reproved.

Moreover, in the ſame City of Alexandria aforeſaid, Bergomenſis in his eighth Book, writing of the ſtory of Valerianus Emperor, maketh mention of Philippus, Biſhop of the ſaid See of Alexandria, who (as he ſaith) was under the ſaid Valerian beheaded. But that is not to be found in any approved ſtory, nor ſtandeth it with the truth of time that any ſuch Philip was then Biſhop of Alexandria, or any other, except only Dionyſius. After whom next ſucceeded Maximus, who remained eighteen years, and after him Theonas, &c. So that, by the ancient Records of old Writers, it appeareth not that Philippus, or any other of that name was Biſhop of Alexandria, during this time ſignified by Bergomenſis.

Although in ſome other later Writers, as Equilinus, Antoninus, and Bergomenſis, I find a certain Hiſtory of one Philippus, Preſident of Alexandria about the ſame time of Valerian and Galienus, elected by the Emperor and Senate of Rome, to govern thoſe quarters, where he was at length converted to the Chriſtian Faith, and after made Prieſt or Biſhop (as they ſay) of Alexandria: but that not to be ſo, the teſtimony of ancient Writers doth manifeſt. The Hiſtory of this Philippus, witneſſed in our later Chronicles, is this, Philippus being promoted to the Preſidentſhip of Alexandria, came down with his wife Claudia, and his two Sons, Avitus and Sergius, and with his Daughter named Egenia, of the which Eugenia a long Hiſtory full of ſtrange and prodigious Miracles is written of Antoninus and others, whereof many things I will cut off, and briefly touch the effect of the ſtory, leaving to the judgment of the Reader the credit of mine Authors, as he ſhall ſee cauſe.

Ex Antonin. part. 1. cap. 6.

The ſtory of Philippus and Eugenia

This Eugenia Daughter of Philippus, being of ſingular beauty, and diligently brought up by her Parents in the ſtudy of Science and Learning, was by occaſion of hearing Chriſtians reduced and brought up to Chriſtianity, with two other Eunuchs her School-Fellows, called Prothus and Hiacinthus: with whom ſhe taking counſel, upon occaſion (whether to avoid the danger of Perſecution, or refuſing to marry with a Pagan) unknown to her Parents and Friends did fly away; and becauſe the more boldly ſhe might reſort to hear the Readings of Helenus then an aged Biſhop, and of others, ſhe changed her ſelf into mans Apparel, and named her ſelf Eugenius, under the which name ſhe was at length admitted unto a certain Monaſtery, or a Society of Chriſtians in the Suburbs of Alexandria (although I hardly believe that any Monaſtery of Chriſtians was then in the Suburbs of Alexandria permitted) where alſo at the laſt, for her excellency of Learning and Vertue, ſhe was made Head of the Place.

Eugenia, Prothus, Hiacinthus, converted.

Eugenia leaving her Parents, changeth her ſelf into mans apparel.

Helenus Biſhop of Hieropolis.

Here by the way I omit the Miracles of the foreſaid Helenus, Biſhop (as the ſtory ſaith) of Hieropolis, how he carried burning coals in his lap, and how he adventured himſelf to go in the burning fire, to refel wicked Zereas a Pagan, remaining in the ſame unburned. Here alſo I omit the careful ſearch of her Parents for her, and of the anſwer of the Pithoniſſe again unto them, that ſhe was taken up to Heaven among the goddeſſes. I omit moreover the Miracles done by the ſaid Eugenia, in healing the Diſeaſes and Sickneſſes of ſuch as came to her, &c. The ſtory proceedeth thus, Among others which were by this Eugenius cured and reſtored, there was a certain Matron of Alexandria, named Melancia; who, after ſhe had uſed the help and acquaintance of Eugenius, ſuppoſing her to be a man, fell into an inordinate love of her, ſeeking by all means how to accompliſh the luſt of her Concupiſcence. Inſomuch that in her daily viſiting of her, at length ſhe began ſecretly to break her mind, and to intice her to her lewdneſs. Eugenius contrarily exhorted her to vertue and honeſty, ſhewing her the miſeries of this life, and the peril of that folly. Melancia ſeeing that by no means ſhe would be allured, nor by force drawn to her deſire, and fearing moreover, that ſhe in detecting of her, would bring her to ſhame, beginning firſt to make an Out-cry of Eugenius, declaring how that ſhe went about corruptly to deflower her; and ſo preſented her Accuſation before Philippus the Preſident, as well againſt Eugenius, as alſo againſt the reſt of that Company. This matter being heard, and the woman well known, the Crime began to ſeem ſuſpicious, and ſo much the more, becauſe it was objected againſt the Chriſtians. By reaſon whereof Eugenius with her fellow Chriſtians was now not only in great hatred, but alſo in danger of preſent death and deſtruction. Then Eugenius purging her ſelf and her honeſtly, although with ſufficient probation; yet notwithſtanding, perceiving that whatſoever ſhe ſaid could take no place, and ſeeing no time now to diſſemble any longer, for the danger as well of her own ſelf, as ſpecially of her Brethren, which troubled her more: ſhe deſired of the Judge place and time to make manifeſt to him the truth, and ſo ſhewed her ſelf what ſhe was, and how ſhe was his Daughter, the other to be Prothus and Hiacinthus, the two Eunuchs, her School-Fellows, uttering moreover to him and to her Brethren, the cauſe of her departing from them. At the Narration whereof, Philippus her Father, and her two Brethren coming to the knowledge of her, conceived no little joy, in receiving their Eugenia again, whom they thought had been loſt. No leſs gladneſs was among the people, to ſee the evidence of the matter ſo plainly to try out the truth of the one, and the falſeneſs of the other. Whereat the malignant Accuſer was with double ſhame confounded, firſt, for her diſhoneſty falſly cloaked; ſecondly, for the untruth of her Accuſation openly detected. Bergomenſis addeth moreover, that the ſaid Accuſer was ſtricken preſently with lightning. Thus Eugenia trying her honeſty to her Parents and Friends, was not only received of them again, but alſo by the Grace of the Lord working with her, in the ſpace of time did win them to Chriſt. Whereby Philippus the Father of her by Nature, now by Grace was begotten of his own Daughter to a more perfect life; and whom once he thought to have been loſt, not only he found again, but alſo with her found his own Soul, and his own life, which before he had loſt indeed. This Philippus (ſaith the ſtory) was made afterward Biſhop of Alexandria, and there ſuffered Martyrdom. Concerning whoſe Martyrdom I deny not but it may be true; but that he was Biſhop of Alexandria, that cannot be admitted, as is before ſufficiently proved out of Euſebius and other ancient Hiſtorians.

Eugenia known of her Parents.

Falſe accuſation convicted.

Philippus by his daughter converted unto Chriſt.

Philippus Martyr.

Likewiſe it is ſaid, that Eugenia, after the Martyrdom of her Father, returning to Rome with Prothus and Hiacinthus, by occaſion of converting Baſilla (who ſhould have been married to a Pagan Husband, and was then beheaded) to the Chriſtian Faith, was aſſailed with ſundry kinds of death: firſt, being tied to a great ſtone and caſt into Tiber, where ſhe was carried up from drowning, then put in the hot Baths, which were extinguiſhed, and ſhe preſerved: afterward by famiſhment in Priſon, where they ſay ſhe was fed at the hand of our Saviour: all which legendary Miracles I leave to the Reader to judge of them as ſhall ſeem good unto him. At laſt the ſtory ſaith, ſhe was with the Sword beheaded. Antonin. Bergom. Ado.

Baſilla, Eugenius Martyrs.

And becauſe in this preſent Hiſtory mention was made of Helenus, whom Antoninus with his Fellows noteth to be the Biſhop of Hieropolis, here is to be underſtood and obſerved by the way, that as Philippus in the foreſaid Hiſtory is falſly ſaid to be Biſhop of Alexandria; ſo likewiſe untrue it is, that Helenus was Biſhop of Hieropolis. For by Euſebius it appeareth, lib. 7. cap. 5. alledging the words of Dionyſius, that he was Biſhop of Tarſus, in Cilicia, and had there overlight of that Church from the time of our Lord God, two hundred fifty and four, to the year of our Redemption two hundred ſeventy and four.

Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus.

The ſixth year of Valerianus and Galienus we read in the Hiſtory of Herfordienſis, cited out of Iſuardus, of Victor and Victorinus, who lying in Priſon the ſpace of three years with Claudianus and Boſſa his wife, are ſaid to have ſuſtained great Torments and Martyrdom for the teſtimony and Name of Chriſt, Ex Iſuardo. { Anno 262. } Victor, Victorinus, Claudianus, Boſſa, Martyrs.

Aurelius Prudentius, in his Book, Intituled, Periſtephanon, inferreth mention of Fructuoſus Biſhop of Tarraconia in Spain, who, with his two Deacons, Auguſtus and Eulogius, ſuffered alſo Martydom, being burned after ſix days Impriſonment under the foreſaid Emperors in this Perſecution. The cauſe of their Puniſhment was for the Profeſſion of Chriſts Name; their Judge and Condemner was Emilianus; their Impriſonment endured ſix days; the kind of death miniſtred unto them was fire; wherein they being all together caſt with their Arms bound behind hind them; their Bands (as Prudentius writeth) were diſſolved, their Hands untouched with the fire, and their bodies remaining whole. The charge of this Judge unto the Biſhop was this, That he ſhould worſhip the gods whom the Emperor Galienus worſhipped. To whom Fructuoſus the Biſhop anſwering, Nay (ſaith he) I worſhip no dumb god of Stocks and Blocks, whom Galienus doth worſhip, but I worſhip the Lord and Maſter of Galienus, the Father and Creator of all times, and his only Son ſent down to us, of whoſe Flock I am here the Paſtor and Shepheard. At this word Emilianus anſwering again, Nay (ſaith he) ſay not thou art, but ſay thou waſt. And forthwith commanded them to be committed to the fire, where (as is ſaid) their bands and manacles being looſed by the fire, they litted up their hands to Heaven, praiſing the living God, to the great admiration of them that ſtood by, praying alſo that the Element, which ſeemed to fly from them, might work his full force upon them, and ſpeedily diſpatch them; which was after their requeſt obtained. In the mean ſpace, as they were in the fire, there was a certain Souldier in the houſe of Emilianus, who did ſee the Heavens above to open, and theſe foreſaid Martyrs to enter into the ſame, which Souldier likewiſe ſhewed the ſight the ſame time unto the Daughter of Emilianus the Preſident, who, beholding the ſame ſight with the Souldier, was a preſent witneſs of the bleſſedneſs of them whom her cruel Father had condemned.

Fructuoſus and his Deacons ſtrengthned in the fire.

The favour of God toward his Martyrs openly declared.

As this godly Biſhop was preparing to his death (ſaith Prudentius) the Brethren approaching to him, brought him drink, deſiring him with much weeping to receive and drink with them; but that he refuſed to do, requiring them moreover to refrain their tears. With like readineſs the Brethren alſo were diligent about him to pluck off his ſhoos and hoſe, as he was addreſſing himſelf to the fire: but neither would he ſuffer any Servants help in that wherein he was no leſs willing than able to help himſelf. And thus this bleſſed and fruitful Biſhop Fructuoſus, with his two Deacons Augurius and Eulogius, being brought to the fire, witneſſed the conſtant Confeſſion of the Name of Chriſt with the ſhedding of their blood. Aurel. Prudentius, Ado, Equilinus.

The modeſty of Fructuoſus.

And thus far continued wicked Valerian in his tyranny againſt the Saints of Chriſt. But as all the Tyrants before, and Oppreſſors of the Chriſtians had their deſerved reward at the juſt hand of God, which rendreth to every man according to his Works: ſo this cruel Valerian, after he had raigned with his Son Galienus the term of ſix or ſeven years, and about two years had afflicted the Church of Chriſt, felt the juſt ſtroke of his hand, whoſe Indignation before he had provoked, whereof we have to witneſs Eutropius, Pollio, Sabellicus, Volateranus: for making his Expedition againſt the Perſians, whether by the fraud and treaſon of ſome about him, or whether by his own raſhneſs, it is doubtful: but this is certain, that he fell into the hands of his Enemies, being about the age of fourſcore years; where he led his wretched age in a more wretched Captivity. Inſomuch that Sapores the King of the Perſians uſed him (and well worthy) not for his riding-ſool, but for his riding-block: for whenſoever the King ſhould light upon his Horſe openly in the ſight of the people, Valerian, Emperor Quondam, was brought forth in ſtead of a block for the King to tread upon his back in going to his horſeback. And ſo continued this blockiſh butcherly Emperor with ſhame and ſport enough unto his final end, as witneſſeth Letus and Aurelius Victor.

The notable plague of God againſt Valerian the Perſecutor.

Gods puniſhment to be noted.

Albeit Euſebius, in a certain Sermon to the Congregation, declareth a more cruel handling of him, affirming that he was ſlain, writing in theſe words, Sed & tu Valeriane, quoniam eandem homicidiorum ſævitiam erga ſubditos Dei exercuiſti, juſtum Dei judicium declaraſti, dum captivus ac vinctus una cum ipſa purpura ac reliquo Imperatorio ornatu abductus ac tandem a Sapore Perſarum Rege excoriari juſſus ſaleque conditus perpetuum infelicitatis tuæ trophæum erexiſti, &c. that is, And thou Valerian, for ſo much as thou haſt exerciſed the ſame cruelty in murthering of the Subjects of God, therefore haſt proved unto us the righteous judgment of God, in that thy ſelf haſt been bound in Chains, and carried away for a Captive Slave with thy gorgeous Purple, and thy imperial Attire, and at length alſo, being commanded of Sapores, King of the Perſians to be ſlain and powdered with ſalt, haſt ſet up unto all men a perpetual Monument of thine own wretchedneſs, &c. Euſeb.

Ex Euſeb. in ſermone ad conventum Sanctorum. Valerian the perſecuting Emperor excoriat of the Perſians.

The like ſeverity of God his terrible judgment is alſo to be noted in Claudius his Preſident and Miniſter of his Perſecutions. Of which Claudius Henricus de Erfordia thus writeth, that he was poſſeſſed and vexed of the Devil, in ſuch ſort, that he biting off his own Tongue in many ſmall pieces, ſo ended his life. Erford.

The Puniſhment of God upon Claudius, Preſident to the Emperor

Neither did Galienus the Son of Valerian, after the Captivity of his Father, utterly eſcape the righteous hand of God: for beſide the miſerable captivity of his Father, whom he could not reſcue, ſuch portents ſtrange and out of the courſe of nature, ſuch Earth-quakes did happen; alſo ſuch Tumults, Commotions and Rebellions did follow, that Trebellio doth reckon up to the number of thirty together, which in ſundry places all at one time took upon them to be Tyrants and Emperors over the Monarchy of Rome, by the means whereof he was not able to ſuccour his Father, though he would. Notwithſtanding the ſaid Galienus, being (as is thought) terrified by the example of his Father, did remove, at leaſt did moderate the Perſecution ſtirred up by the Edicts of Valerian his Father, directing forth his Emperial Proclamation, the tenor whereof proceedeth after this effect, as is to be ſeen in Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 13. Emperor and Cæſar, Publius Licinius, Galienus, Pius, Fortunatus, Auguſtus, unto Dionyſius, to Pinna, and to Demetrian, and to all other the like Biſhops. The bountiful benignity of my gift I have willed and commanded to be proclaimed through the whole World, to the intent that ſuch, which are detained in baniſhment for diſcipline ſake, may ſafely return home again from whence they came, and for the ſame cauſe I have here ſent to you the example of my reſcript for you to peruſe and to enjoy; ſo that no man be ſo hardy to vex or moleſt you; and this which you may now lawfully enjoy, hath been long ſince by me granted. And therefore for your more warrant in the ſame, I have committed the examplar hereof to the cuſtody of Aurelianus Cirenius my chief Steward, where you may fetch the Copy to ſee at your pleaſure.

Galienus plagued for his perſecution.

Peace granted to the Church.

Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 13.

This Mandate above prefixed did Galienus ſend to Dionyſius Alexandrinus, and other Biſhops, as is premiſed. Another reſcript alſo the ſaid Emperor ſent to other Chriſtian Biſhops, permitting to them full liberty to receive again their wonted places where they were wont to aſſociate together, called of them Cæmiteria.

Another grant of Galienus unto the Chriſtian Biſhops. Anno 263.

By this it may appear that ſome peace was granted then under this Galienus to the Church of Chriſt: albeit not ſo, but that ſome there were which ſuffered, of whom was one Marinus mentioned in Euſebius, lib. 7. This Marinus, being a Warrior and a Nobleman in Ceſarea, ſtood for the dignity of a certain order, which by all order of courſe was next to fall upon him by right, had not the envious ambition of him, that ſhould follow next after him, ſupplanted him both of office and life; for he accuſed him to be a Chriſtian, and therefore ſaid that he was not to be admitted unto their offices, which was againſt their Religion. Whereupon Achaius, then being Judge, examined him of his Faith; who finding him to be a Chriſtian indeed, and conſtantly to ſtand to his Profeſſion, gave him three hours to deliberate and adviſe with himſelf. There was the ſame time in Ceſarea a Biſhop named Theotechnus, otherwiſe called Theodiſtus, who perceiving him to ſtand in doubtful deliberation and perplexity in himſelf, took him by the hand and brought him into the Houſe or Church of the Chriſtians, laying before him a Sword (which he had under his Cloke for the ſame purpoſe) and a Book of the New Teſtament, and ſo willed him to take his free choice which of them both he would prefer. The Souldier immediately without delay ran to the Book of the Goſpel, taking that before the Sword. And then he being animated by the Biſhop, preſented himſelf boldly before the Judge, by whoſe Sentence he was beheaded, and died a Martyr. Euſebius ibidem.

Of which Aſyrius the ſaid Author writeth moreover this ſtory, How that in the foreſaid City of Ceſarea, the Gentiles uſed thereof an ancient cuſtom to offer up a certain Sacrifice by a Fountain ſide, the which Sacrifice by the working of the Devil was wont ſuddenly to vaniſh out of their eyes, to the great admiration of the Inhabiters by. Aſyrius ſeeing this, and pitying the miſerable error of the ſimple people, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, made his prayer to Almighty God in the name of Chriſt, that the people might not be ſeduced of the Devil any longer: by the vertue of whoſe prayer the Sacrifice was ſeen to ſwim in the water of the Fountain; and ſo the ſtrange wonder of that ſight was taken away, and no ſuch matter could be there wrought any more. Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 17.

And becauſe mention is made here of Ceſarea, there followeth in the next Chapter of the ſame Author a ſtrange Miracle if it be true, which he there reporteth; how that out of the ſame City was the woman which in the Goſpel came to our Saviour, and was healed of her bloody Iſſue, her houſe being in the City of Ceſarea. Before the door thereof was ſet up a certain pillar of ſtone, and upon the Pillar an Image was made of braſs, of a woman meekly kneeling on her knees, and holding up her hands as one that had ſome ſuit. Againſt the which there was another Image alſo of a man proportioned of the ſame metal, cunningly engraven in a ſhort ſeemly Veſture, and ſtretching forth his hand to the woman. At the foot of which Pillar grew up a certain herb of a ſtrange kind, but of a more ſtrange operation, which growing up to the hem of his Veſture, and once touching the ſame, is ſaid to have ſuch vertue, that it was able to cure all manner of Diſeaſes. This picture of the man (they ſay) repreſented the Image of Chriſt. The Hiſtory is written in Euſebius, as is ſaid; the credit whereof I refer to the Reader, whether he will think it true or falſe. If he think it falſe, yet I have ſhewed him mine Author: if he think it true, then muſt he think withall that this miraculous operation of the herb proceeded neither by the vertue of the Picture, nor by the prayer of the other, being both dumb Pictures, and ingraven no doubt at that time by the hand of Infidels; but to be wrought by ſome ſecret permiſſion of God his wiſdom, either to reduce the Infidels at that time to the belief of the ſtory, or to admoniſh the Chriſtians to conſider with themſelves what ſtrength and health was to be looked for only of Chriſt and no other Advocate; ſeeing the dumb Picture, ingraven in braſs, gave his efficacy to a poor herb to cure ſo many Diſeaſes. This Picture (ſaith Euſebius) remained alſo to his time, which was under Conſtantinus the Great.

No virtue to be aſcribed to pictures.

As touching the line and order of the Roman Biſhops hitherto intermitted; after the Martyrdom of Xiſtus above ſpecified, the government of that Church was committed next to one Dionyſius, about the year of our Lord two hundred ſixty and ſix: Who continued in the ſame the ſpace of nine years, as Euſebius ſaith; as Damaſus recordeth, but only ſix years and two months. Of his decretal Epiſtles, becauſe ſufficient hath been ſaid before concerning that matter, I omit to ſpeak. After whom ſucceeded Felix in the firſt year of Probus the Emperor, about the year of our Lord two hundred and eighty, who governed that Church five years, and died, as Platina ſaith, a martyr. After him followed Eutychianus, and then Gaius, both Martyrs, as the Hiſtories of ſome do record.

Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome. { Anno 264. } Felix Biſhop of Rome and Martyr. Eutychianus Biſhop of Rome and Martyr. Gaius Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

About the time of theſe Biſhops lived Theodorus Biſhop of Neoceſarea, who is otherwiſe called Gregorius Magnus, whom alſo Nicephorus for his miracles calleth Θαυματουργον.

Thus Galienus the foreſaid Emperor reigned, as is declared, with his Father Valerian ſeven years, after whoſe Captivity he ruled the Monarchy alone about nine years, with ſome peace and quietneſs granted to the Church.

The death of Galienus Emperor. { Anno 272. }

The days of this Galienus being expired, followed Claudius a quite Emperor, as moſt ſtories do record. Although Vincentius affirmeth that he was a mover of Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and maketh mention of two hundred ſixty and two Martyrs, which in his time did ſuffer; but becauſe no ſuch Record remaineth to be found in Euſebius, who would not have omitted ſome memorial thereof, if it had been true, therefore I refer the ſame to the free judgment of the Reader, to find ſuch credit as it may. This Claudius reigned but two years, after whom came Quintilianus his Brother, next Emperor, and a quiet Prince, who continued but only ſeventeen days, and had to his Succeſſor Aurelianus; under whom Oroſius in his ſeventh Book doth number the ninth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians.

Quintianus Emperor.

The ninth Perſecution.

The ninth perſecution. Aurelianus Emperor.

Hitherto from the Captivity of Valerian, the Church of Chriſt was in ſome quietneſs till the death of Quintilianus, as hath been declared; after whom Aurelianus the next Succeſſor poſſeſſed the Crown; who in the firſt beginning of his Reign (after the common manner of all Princes) ſhewed himſelf a Prince moderate and diſcreet, much worthy of commendation, if his good beginning had continued in a conſtant courſe agreeing to the ſame. Of nature he was ſevere, and rigorous in correcting, diſſolute in manners; inſomuch as it was ſaid of him in a vulgar Proverb, That he was a good Phyſitian, ſaving that he gave too bitter Medicines. This Emperor being ſick, never ſent for Phyſitian, but cured himſelf with abſtinence; and as his beginning was not unfruitful to the Common-wealth, ſo neither was he any great Diſturber of the Chriſtians, whom he did not only tolerate in their Religion, but alſo their Councils; and they being the ſame time aſſembled at Antioch, he ſeemed not to be againſt them. Notwithſtanding in continuance of time, through ſiniſter motion and inſtigation of certain about him, (as commonly ſuch are never abſent in all places from the ears of Princes) his nature, ſomewhat inclinable to ſeverity, was altered to a plain tyranny; which tyranny firſt he ſhewed, beginning with the death of his own Siſters Son, as witneſſeth Eutropius. After that he proceeded either to move, or at leaſt to purpoſe Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians; albeit that wicked purpoſe of the Emperor the merciful working of God his hand did ſoon overthrow. For as the Edict or Proclamation ſhould have been denounced for the perſecuting of the Chriſtians, and the Emperor now ready to ſubſcribe the Edict with his hand, the mighty ſtroke of the hand of the Lord ſuddenly from above did ſtop his purpoſe, binding, (as a man might ſay) the Emperors hands behind him, declaring (as Euſebius ſaith) to all men, how there is no power to work any violence againſt the Servants of God, unleſs his permiſſion do ſuffer them, and give them leave. Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 30. Eutropius and Vopiſcus affirm, that as the ſaid Aurelianus was purpoſing to raiſe Perſecution againſt us, he was ſuddenly terrified with Lightning, and ſo ſtopped from his wicked tyranny. Not long after, about the fifth or ſixth year of his Reign, he was ſlain between Biſance and Heraclea, in the year of our Lord two hundred ſeventy and eight. Thus Aurelianus rather intended than moved perſecution. Neither is there any more than this found concerning this Perſecution in ancient Hiſtories and Records of the Church: wherefore I marvail the more that Vincentius, collecting out of the Martyrologies, hath comprehended ſuch a great Catalogue of ſo many Martyrs, which in France and in Italy (ſaith he) ſuffered death and torments under this Emperor Aurelianus; whereunto Oroſius alſo ſeemeth to agree in numbring this to be the ninth Perſecution under the ſaid Aurelian.

The death of Aurelianus. { Anno 276 }

Next after Aurelianus the ſucceſſion of the Empire fell to Publius Annius Tacitus, who reigned but ſix months; him ſucceeded his Brother Florianus, who reigned but threeſcore days; and after him followed Marcus Aurelius, ſirnamed Probus. Of whom more hereafter (God willing) ſhall appear.

Ex Eutropio. Tacitus Emperor. Florianus Emperor.

In the mean time, within the compaſs of theſe Emperors falleth in a ſtory recorded of Euſebius, and not unworthy here to be noted, whereby to underſtand the faithful diligence of good Miniſters, what good it may do in a Common-wealth.

Mention is made before of Euſebius the Deacon of Dionyſius, whom God ſtirred up to viſit and comfort the Saints that were in priſon and bands, and to bury the bodies of the bleſſed Martyrs departed, not without great peril of his own life, who after was made Biſhop (as is ſaid) of Laodicea. But before he came to Laodicea to be Biſhop there, it chanced, the ſaid Euſebius remaining as yet at Alexandria, the City to be beſieged of the Romans, Pyruchius being their Captain. In which ſiege half of the City

Euſebius Deacon of Alexandria. Anatholius Rector of the Univerſity of Alexandria.

City did hold with the Romans, the other half withſtood them. In that part which went with the Roman Captain was Euſebius, being alſo in great favour with the Captain for his worthy fidelity and ſervice ſhewed: with the other half that reſiſted the Romans was Anatholius Governor or Moderator then of the School of Alexandria, who alſo was Biſhop, after the ſaid Euſebius, of Laodicea. This Anatholius, perceiving the Citizens to be in miſerable diſtreſs of Famine and Deſtruction, by reaſon of penury and lack of ſuſtenance, ſendeth to Euſebius being then with the Romans, and certifieth him of the lamentable penury and peril of the City, inſtructing him moreover what to do in the matter: Euſebius, underſtanding the caſe, repaireth to the Captain, deſiring of him ſo much favour, that ſo many as would fly out of the City from their Enemies, might be licenſed to eſcape and freely to paſs, which was to him eaſily granted. As Euſebius was thus labouring with the Captain; on the other ſide Anatholius for his part laboured with the Citizens, moving them to aſſemble together, and perſwading them to give themſelves over, in yielding to the force and might of the Romans. But when the Citizens could not abide the hearing thereof; Yet (ſaid Anatholius) with this I truſt you will be contented, if I ſhall counſel you in this miſerable lack of things to avoid out of your City all ſuch ſuperfluities and unneceſſary Impediments unto you, as old Women, young Children, aged Men, with ſuch other as be feeble and impotent, and not ſuffer them here to periſh with famine, whoſe preſence can do no ſtead to you if they die, and leſs if they live, for ſpending the Victuals which otherwiſe might ſerve them that be more able to defend the City. The Senate hearing this Sentence, and underſtanding moreover the grant of the Captain promiſing them their ſafety, were well conſenting thereunto. Then Anatholius having a ſpecial care to them that belonged to the Church of Chriſt, calleth them together with the reſt of the multitude, and perſwading them what they ſhould do, and what had been obtained for them, cauſed them to void the City, and not only them, but alſo a great number of other more; who perſwaded by him under that pretence, changing themſelves in womens Apparel, or faining ſome impotency, ſo eſcaped out of the City. At whoſe coming out, Euſebius on the other ſide was ready to receive them, and refreſhed their hungry and pined bodies, whereby not only they, but the whole City of Alexandria was preſerved from deſtruction. Euſeb. lib 7. cap. 32. Euſub. lib. 7. cap. 32.

The piety of Anatholius and Euſebius to their Country.

The Prelates of Rome are clean contrary to theſe good Prelates.

By this little Hiſtory of Euſebius and Anatholius, deſcribed in the ſeventh Book of Euſebius, cap. 32. and briefly here ſet forth to thee (gentle Reader) thou mayſt partly underſtand the practiſe of the Prelates, what it was in thoſe days in the Church, which was then only imployed in ſaving of life, and ſuccouring the Common weals wherein they lived, as by theſe two godly perſons Euſebius and Anatholius may well appear. Unto the which practiſe if we compare the practice of our later Prelates of the Church of Rome, I ſuppoſe no little difference will appear.

Marcus Aurelius Probus Emperor.

Peace in the Church.

The ſaying of Marcus Aurelius.

The next Emperor to Florianus (as is ſaid) was Marcus Aurelius Probus, a Prince both wiſe and vertuous, and no leſs valiant in martial Affairs, than fortunate in the ſucceſs of the ſame. During his time we read of no Perſecution greatly ſtirring in the Church, but much quietneſs as well in matters of Religion, as alſo in the Commonwealth. Inſomuch that, after his great and many Victories, ſuch peace inſued, that his ſaying was, There needed no more Souldiers, ſeeing there were no more Enemies to the Common-wealth to fight againſt. It was his ſaying alſo, That his Souldiers need not to ſpend Corn and Victual, except they laboured to ſerve the Common-wealth. And for the ſame cauſe he cauſed his Souldiers to be ſet a work about certain Mountains in Smyrna and in Meſſia to be planted with Vines, and not ſo much as in Winter ſuffered them to be at reſt; therefore by them at length he was ſlain, after he had reigned the ſpace of ſix years and four months, in the year of our Lord two hundred eighty and four, Eutrop.

Anno 284

Carus with his two ſons Carinus and Numerianus Emperor.

Carus Emperor ſlain with lightning.

Carus, with his two Sons Carinus and Numerianus, ſucceeded next after Probus in the Empire: the Reign of which Emperors continued in all but three years. Of the which Three firſt Carus, warring againſt the Perſians, was ſlain with Lightning. Of Numerianus his Son, being with his Father in his Wars againſt the Perſians, we find much Commendation in Eutropius, Vopiſcus, and other Writers, which teſtified him to be a valiant Warrior, and an eloquent Orator, as appeared by his Declamations and Writings ſent to the Senate; thirdly, to be an excellent Poet. This Numerianus, ſorrowing and lamenting for the death of his Father, through immoderate weeping fell into a great ſoreneſs of his eyes; by reaſon whereof he keeping cloſe was ſlain not long after of his Father in law, named Aper; who, traytorouſly aſpiring to the Empire, diſſembled his death with a falſe excuſe to the people asking for him, ſaying, For the pain of his eyes he kept in from the wind and weather, till at length by the ſtinch of his body being carried about, his death was uttered.

Correction of a verſal place of Eutropius. Ex editione Frobeniana.

In the life this Emperor Carus aforeſaid, written by Eutropius in the later Edition ſet forth, by Frobenius, I find (which in other Editions of Eutropius doth not appear) that Numerianus, the Son of this Carus, was he that ſlew Babylas the holy Martyr, whoſe Hiſtory before we have comprehended. But that ſeemeth not to be like, both by the Narration of Chryſoſtome, and alſo for that Urſpergenſis declaring the ſame Hiſtory, and in the ſame words, as it is in Eutropius, ſaith that it was Cyrillus whom Numerianus killed, the ſtory whereof is this, What time Carus the Emperor, in his Journey going toward the Perſians, remained at Antioch, Numerianus his Son would enter into the Church of the Chriſtians, to view and behold their Myſteries. But Cyrillus their Biſhop would in no wiſe ſuffer him to enter into the Church, ſaying, That it was not lawful for him to ſee the Myſteries of God, who was polluted with Sacrifices of Idols. Numerianus full of indignation at the hearing of theſe words, not ſuffering that repulſe at the hands of Cyrillus, in his fury did ſlay the godly Martyr. And therefore juſtly (as it ſeemed) was he himſelf ſlain afterward by the hands of Aper.

Cyrillus refuſeth the Emperor.

Cyrillus Biſhop of Antiochia Martyr.

Ex Chron. Urſpergen.

Thus Carus with his Son Numerianus being ſlain in the Eaſt parts, as is declared, Carinus the other Son reigned alone in Italy; where he overcame Sabinus driving for the Empire, and reigned there with much wickedneſs, till the returning home of the Army again from the Perſians, who then ſet up Diocleſian to be Emperor; by whom the foreſaid Carinus for the wickedneſs of his life, being forſaken of his Hoſt, was overcome, and at length ſlain with the hand of the Tribune, whoſe wife before he had defloured. Thus Carus with his two Sons, Numerinus and Carionus, ended their lives, whoſe Reign continued not above three years.

Carinus Emperor ſlain. Adultery punished.

All this mean ſpace we read of no great Perſecution ſtirring in the Church of Chriſt, but it was in mean quiet ſtate and tranquility, unto the nineteenth year of the Reign of Diocleſian; ſo that in counting the time from the later end of Valerian unto this aforeſaid year of Diocleſian, the peace of the Church, which God gave to his people, ſeemeth to continue above four and forty years. During the which time of peace and tranquility, the Church of the Lord did mightily increaſe and flouriſh, ſo that the more bodies it loſt by Perſecution, the more honour and reverence it won daily among the Gentiles in all quarters, both Greeks and barbarous; inſomuch that (as Euſebius in his ſeventh Book deſcribeth) amongſt the Emperors themſelves, divers there were which not only bare ſingular good will and favour to them of our Profeſſion, but alſo did commit unto them Offices and Regiments over Countries and Nations, ſo well were they affected to our Doctrine, that they priviledged the ſame with liberty and indemnity. What needeth to ſpeak of them which not only lived under the Emperors in liberty; but alſo were familiar in the Court with the Princes themſelves, intertained with great honour and ſpecial favour beyond the other Servitors of the Court? As was Dorotheus, with his Wife, Children, and whole Family, highly accepted and advanced in the Palace of the Emperor; alſo Gorgonius in like manner with divers others more, who, for their Doctrine and Learning which they profeſſed, were with their Princes in great eſtimation. In like reverence alſo were the Biſhops of Cities and Dioceſſes with the Preſidents and Rulers where they lived: who not only ſuffered them to live in peace, but alſo had them in great price and regard, ſo long as they kept themſelves upright, and continued in God his favour. Who is able to number at that time the mighty and innumerable multitudes and Congregations aſſembling togetogether in every City, and the notable concourſes of ſuch as daily flocked to the common Oratories to pray? For the which cauſe they, being not able to be contained in their old houſes, had large and great Churches, new builded from the foundation, for them to frequent together. In ſuch increaſement (ſaith Euſebius) by proceſs of time did the Church of Chriſt grow and ſhoot up daily more and more, profiting and ſpreading through all quarters, which neither envy of men could infringe, nor any devil could inchant, neither the crafty policy of mans wit could ſupplant, ſo long as the protection of God his heavenly arm went with his people, keeping them in good order, according to the rule of Chriſtian life.

Corruption through much peace and proſperity crept into the Church.

But as commonly the nature of all men, being of it ſelf unruly and untoward, always ſeeketh and deſireth proſperity, and yet can never well uſe proſperity; always would have peace, and yet having peace always abuſeth the ſame: ſo here likewiſe it hapned with theſe men, which through this ſo great liberty and proſperity of life began to degenerate and languiſh unto idleneſs and delicacy, and one to work Spite, and contumely againſt another, ſtriving and contending amongſt themſelves, for every occaſion, with railing words after moſt deſpiteful manner; Biſhops againſt Biſhops, and people againſt people, moving hatred and ſedition one againſt another, beſides alſo curſed hypocriſie and ſimulation with all extremity increaſing more and more. By reaſon whereof the judgment of God after his wonted manner (whilſt yet the congregation began to multiply) began by a little and a little to viſit our men with Perſecution, falling firſt upon our Brethren, which were abroad in warfare; but when that touche the other nothing or very little, neither did they ſeek to appeaſe Gods wrath and call for his mercy; but wickedly thinking with our ſelves, that God neither regarded nor would viſit our tranſgreſſions, we heaped our iniquities daily more and more one upon another; and they which ſeemed to be our Paſtors, refuſing the rule of piety, were inflamed with mutual contentions one againſt another. And thus whilſt they were given only to the ſtudy of contentions, threatnings, emulations, mutual hatred and diſcord, every man ſeeking his own ambition, and perſecuting one another after the manner of tyranny: then, then, I ſay, the Lord according to the voice of Jeremy, took away the beauty of the Daughter of Sion, and the glory of Iſrael fell down from Heaven neither did he remember the footſtool of his feet in the day of his wrath. And the Lord overturned all the comely ornaments of Iſrael, and deſtroyed all her gorgeous buildings, and according to the ſaying of the Pſalm, ſubverted and extinguiſhed the Teſtament of his ſervant, and prophaned his Sanctuary in deſtruction of his Churches and in laying waſt the buildings thereof, ſo that all paſſengers ſpoiling the multitude of the people, they were made an obloquie to all the dwellers about. For he exalted the ſtrength of his enemies, and turned away the help of his ſword from her, nor aided her in the battel, but ceaſed from the purging of her and her ſeat. He ſtroke down to the ground, and diminiſhed her days, and over all this poured upon her contuſion. All theſe things were fulfilled upon us, when we ſaw the Temples raced from the top to the ground and the Sacred Scriptures to be burnt in the open market-place, and the Paſtors of the Church to hide themſelves, ſome here, ſome there; ſome other, taken priſoners with great ſhame, were mocked of their enemies, when alſo according to the ſaying of the Prophet in another place, Contempt was poured out upon the Princes, and they cauſed to go out of the way, and not to keep the ſtraight path.

The Tenth Perſecution.

The Tenth Perſecution.

BY reaſon whereof (the wrath of God being kindled againſt his Church) enſued the Tenth and laſt Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, ſo horrible and grievous, that The it maketh the Pen almoſt to tremble to write upon it; ſo tedious that never was any Perſecution before or ſince comparable to it for the time it continued, laſting the ſpace of ten years together. This Perſecution although it paſſed through the hands of divers Tyrants and workers more than one or two, yet principally it beareth the name of Diocleſian, who was Emperour, as is above noted, next after Carus and Numerianus. This Diocleſian, ever having an ambitious mind, aſpired greatly to be Emperour. To whom Druas his Concubine ſaid, That firſt he ſhould kill a wild Boar before he ſhould be Emperour. He, taking effect at theſe words, uſed much with hands to kill wild Boars: but ſeeing no ſucceſs to come thereof, he uſed this Proverb, Ego apros occido, alius pulpamento fruitur, that is, I kill the Boars, but others do eat the fleſh. At length the ſaid Diocleſian being nominated to be Emperour, and ſeeing Aper (who had killed Numerianus the Emperour) ſtanding thereby, ſware to the Souldiers that Numerianus was wrongfully killed, and forthwith running upon Aper with his ſword ſlew him: Vopiſc. After this, he being ſtabliſhed in the Empire, and ſeeing on every ſide divers and ſundry commotions riſing up againſt him, which he was not well able himſelf to ſuſtain, in the firſt beginning of his raign he choſeth for his Colleague Maximianus. Sirnamed Herculius, Father of Maxentius. Which two Emperours, becauſe of divers Wars that roſe in many Provinces, choſe to them two other Noblemen, Galerius and Conſtantius, whom they called Ceſars. Of whom Galerius was ſent into the Eaſt parts againſt the Perſians. Conſtantius was ſent over to Britain, to this our Country of England, to recover the tribute, where he took to Wife Helena the Daughter of King Coill, which was a Maiden excelling in beauty, and no leſs vertuouſly brought up in the ſtudy of learning, of whom was born Conſtantinus the Great.

Maximianus Herculius, fellow Emperor with Diocleſian.

Galerius, Conſtantius, Ceſars, under Diocleſian and Maximian.

Helena Daughter of Coill married to Conſtantinus

All this while hitherto no Perſecution was yet ſtirred of theſe four Princes againſt the Church of Chriſt, but quietly and moderately they governed the Commonwealths wherefore accordingly God proſpered their doings and affairs, and gave them great Victories: Diocleſian in Egypt, Maximian in Africk, and in France, Galerius in Perſia, Conſtantius in England, and in France alſo. By reaſon of which Victories, Diocleſian and Maximian puft up in pride, ordained a ſolemn Triumph at Rome, after which Triumph Diocleſian gave commandment that he ſhould be worſhipped as God, ſaying, that he was brother to the Sun and Moon, and adorning his ſhoos with gold and precious ſtones, commanded the people to kiſs his feet.

Pride in Diocleſian.

And not long after by the judgment of God, for certain enormities uſed in the Church, above touched, began the great and grievous Perſecution of the Chriſtians, moved by the outragious cruelty of Diocleſian, which was about the Nineteenth year of his reign, who in the Month of March, when the Feaſt of Eaſter was nigh at hand, commanded all the Churches of the Chriſtians to be ſpoiled and caſt to the earth, and the Books of holy Scripture to be burned.

Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians.

Thus moſt violent Edicts and Proclamations were ſet forth, for the overthrowing, as is ſaid, of the Chriſtians Temples throughout all the Roman Empire. Neither did there want in the Officers any cruel execution of the ſame Proclamations. For their Temples were defaced even when they celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter, Euſeb. Lib. 8. Cap. 2. And this was the firſt Edict given out by Diocleſian. The next Proclamation that came forth, was for the burning of the Books of the Holy Scripture; which thing was done in the open Market-place as before: then next unto that were Edicts given forth for the diſplacing of ſuch as were Magiſtrates, and that with great ignominy, and all other whoſoever bear any office, impriſoning ſuch as were of the common ſort, if they would not abjure Chriſtianity, and ſubſcribe to the Heathen Religion: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & *Nicephorus lib.*7. *cap.*4. Zonaras alſo in his ſecond Tome. And theſe were the beginning of the Chriſtians evils.

Chriſtian Magiſtrates diſplaced. Chriſtian ſubjects impriſoned. Euſeb. lib. 8. c. 2. Nicepho lib. 7. *cap.*4. Zonaras Tom. 2.

It was not long after but that new Edicts were ſent forth, nothing for their cruelty inferior to the firſt: for the caſting of the Elders and Biſhops into priſon, and then conſtraining them with ſundry kinds of puniſhments to offer unto their Idols. By reaſon whereof enſued a great perſecution amongſt the Governours of the Church, amongſt whom many ſtood manfully, paſſing through many exceeding bitter torments, neither were overcome therewith, being tormented and examined divers of them diverſly, ſome ſcourged all their bodies over with whips and ſcourges, ſome with racks and raiſings of the fleſh intolerable were cruciated, ſome one way, ſome another way put to death. Some again violently were drawn to the unpure ſacrifice, and as though they had ſacrificed, when indeed they did not, were let go. Other ſome neither coming at all to their Altars, nor touching any piece of their ſacrifices, yet were born in hand of them that ſtood by, that they had ſacrificed, and ſo ſuffering that falſe infamation of their enemies quietly went away. Other, as dead men, were carried and caſt away being but half dead. Some they caſt down upon the Pavement, and trailing them a great ſpace by the legs, made the people believe that they had ſacrificed. Furthermore, other there were which ſtoutly withſtood them, affirming with a loud voice that they had done no ſuch ſacrifice. Of whom ſome ſaid they were Chriſtians, and gloried in the profeſſion of that name: ſome cried, ſaying, that neither they had nor would ever be partakers of that Idolatry: and thoſe, being buffeted on the face and mouth with the hands of the Souldiers, were made to hold their peace, and ſo thruſt out with violence. And if the Saints did ſeem never ſo little to do what the enemies would have them, they were made much of: albeit all this purpoſe of the adverſary did nothing prevail againſt the holy and conſtant ſervants of Chriſt. Notwithſtanding, of the weak ſort innumerable there were, which for fear and infirmity fell and gave over, even at the firſt brunt.

The noble courage and conſtancy of a Chriſtian Martyr.

At the firſt coming down of theſe Edicts into Nicomedia, there chanced a deed to be done much worthy of memory, of a Chriſtian, being a noble man born; which moved by the zeal of God, after the Proclamation made at Nicomedia was ſet up, by and by ran and took down the ſame, and openly tare and rent it in pieces, not fearing the preſence of the two Emperors, then being in the City. For which act he was put to a moſt bitter death, which death he with great faith and conſtancy endured even to the laſt gaſp. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & 5.

Perſecution firſt beginning in the Emperors Camp.

After this the furious rage of the malignant Emperors, being let looſe againſt the Saints of Chriſt, proceeded more and more, making havock of Gods people throughout all quarters of the world. Firſt, Diocleſian (which had purpoſed with himſelf to ſubvert the whole Chriſtian Religion) executed his Tyranny in the Eaſt, and Maximianus in the Weſt. But wily Diocleſian began very ſubtilly; for he put the matter firſt in practiſe in his own Camp, among whom the Marſhal of the field (as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 4. affirmeth) put the Chriſtian Souldiers to this choiſe, whether they would obey the Emperors commandment in that manner of ſacrifice he commanded, and ſo both to keep their offices, and lead their bands, or elſe to lay away from them their armour and weapons. Whereunto the Chriſtian men couragiouſly anſwered, that they were not only ready to lay away their armour and weapons, but alſo to ſuffer death, if it ſhould with tyranny be enforced upon them, rather than they would obey the wicked decrees and commandments of the Emperor.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 4.

A notable Religion and faith in Soldiers.

There might a man have ſeen very many which were deſirous to live a ſimple and poor life, and which regarded no eſtimation and honour in compariſon of true piety and godlineſs. And this was no more but a ſubtil and wily flattery in the beginning, to offer them to be at their own liberty, whether they would willingly abjure their profeſſion or not; as alſo this was another, that in the beginning of the Perſecution, there were but a few tormented with puniſhment, but afterward by little and little he began more manifeſtly to burſt out into perſecution. It can hardly be expreſſed with words what number of Martyrs, and what blood was ſhed throughout all Cities and Regions for the name of Chriſt. Euſebius in his Eighth Book, and ſeventh Chapter ſaith, that he himſelf knew the worthy Martyrs that were in Paleſtina. But in Tyre of Phenicia he declareth, in the ſame, a marvellous Martyrdom made, where certain Chriſtians being given to moſt cruel wild Beaſts, were preſerved without hurt of them, to the great admiration of the beholders; and thoſe Lions, Bears, and Leopards (kept hungry for that purpoſe) had no deſire to devour them: which notwithſtanding moſt vehemently raged againſt thoſe by whom they were brought into the Stage, who ſtanding as they thought without danger of them, were firſt devoured. But the Chriſtian Martyrs, becauſe they could not be hurt of the Beaſts, being ſlain with the ſword, were afterward thrown into the Sea. At that time was martyred the Biſhop of Sidon. But Sylvanus the Biſhop of Gazenſis, with nine and thirty others were ſlain in the Metal-mines of Phenicia. Pamphilus the Elder of Ceſarea, being the glory of that Congregation, died a moſt worthy Martyr; whoſe both life and moſt commendable Martyrdom, Euſebius oftentimes declareth in his Eighth Book, and thirteenth Chapter, inſomuch that he hath written the ſame in a Book by it ſelf. In Syria all the chief Teachers of the Congregation were firſt committed to priſon, as a moſt heavy and cruel ſpectacle to behold; as alſo the Biſhops, Elders, and Deacons, which all were eſteemed as men-killers, and perpetrators of moſt wicked facts. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. After that we read of another whoſe name was Tirannion, which was made meat for the Fiſhes of the Sea, and of Zenobius which was a very good Phyſician, which alſo was ſlain with Brickbats in the ſame place. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Furthermore, he maketh mention in the ſame place of others which were not tormented to death, but every day terrified and feared without ceaſing: of ſome others that were brought to the ſacrifice, and commanded to do ſacrifice, which would rather thruſt their right hand into the fire, than touch the prophane or wicked ſacrifice; alſo of ſome others, that before they were apprehended, would caſt down themſelves from ſteep places, leſt that being taken they ſhould commit any thing againſt their profeſſion. Alſo of two Virgins very fair and proper, with their Mother alſo, which had ſtudiouſly brought them up, even from their infancy in all godlineſs, being long ſought for, and at the laſt found, and ſtrictly kept by their Keepers; who, whilſt they made their excuſe to do that which nature required, threw themſelves down headlong into a River: alſo of other two young Maidens being Siſters, and of a worſhipful ſtock, indued with many goodly vertues, which were caſt of Perſecutors into the Sea; and theſe things were done at Antioch, as Euſebius in his eighth Book, and thirteenth Chapter affirmeth. But Sylvanus the Biſhop of Emiſſa, the notable Martyr together with certain others was thrown to the Wild Beaſts, Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Divers and ſundry torments were the Chriſtians in Meſopotamia moleſted with; where they were hanged up by the feet, and their heads downwards, and with the ſmoke of a ſmall fire ſtrangled; and alſo in Cappadocia, where the Martyrs had their legs broken: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 12.

Martyrs of Cappadocia.

Henricus de Erfordia maketh mention of the Martyrs of Tharſus in Cilicia, as Tharatus, Probus and Andronicus: but yet the Martyrs in the Region of Pontus ſuffered far more paſſing and ſharper torments, whereof I will hereafter make mention, Euſebius ibid. So outragious was the beginning of the Perſecution which the Emperor made in Nicomedia in Bithinia, as before is ſaid, that he refrained not from the ſlaughter of the Children of Emperors, neither yet from the ſlaughter of the moſt chief Princes of his Court, whom a little before he made as much of, as if they had been his own Children. Such another was Peter, which among divers and ſundry torments (among whom he being naked, was lifted up, his whole body being ſo beaten with Whips and torn, that a man might ſee the bare bones; and after they had mingled Vinegar and Salt together, they poured it upon the moſt tender parts of his body, and laſtly, roaſted him at a ſoft fire, as a man would roaſt fleſh to eat) as a victorious Martyr ended his life. Dorotheus and Gorgonius, being in a great Authority and Office under the Emperor, after divers torments were ſtrangled with a Halter: both which being of the Privy Chamber to him, when they ſaw and beheld the grievous puniſhment of Peter their houſhold companion, Wherefore (ſay they) O Emperor, do you puniſh in Peter that opinion which is in all us? Why is this accounted in him an offence, that we all confeſs? We are of that faith, religion, and judgment that he is of. Therefore he commanded them to be brought forth, and almoſt with like pains to be tormented as Peter was, and afterwards hanged. Euſeb. Ruffin. lib. 8. cap. 6. After whom Anthimus the Biſhop of Nicomedia, after he had made a notable Confeſſion, bringing with him a great company of Martyrs, was beheaded. Theſe men being thus diſpatched, the Emperor vainly thought that he might cauſe the reſt to do whatever him lifted. To this end came Lucianus the Elder of the Congregation of Antioch, and was martyred, after he had made his Apology before the Emperor. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Religion:

Niceph. li. 7. cap. 14. Eulampius, Eulampia, Agape, Irene Chionia, Anaſtaſia, Martyrs.

Religion: ſo much did the rage of Perſecution utterly forget all natural affects. Other Martyrs of Nicomedia doth Nicephorus in his Seventh Book, and fourteenth Chapter recite, as Eulampius and Eulampia, Agape, Irene, Chionia, and Anaſtaſia, who under Illyricus, chief Officer, were bound hand and foot to a poſt and burnt. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 66. and alſo Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. mentioneth ſuch another like matter full of horror and grief. There aſſembled together in their Temple many Chriſtian men to celebrate the memory of the Nativity of Chriſt, of every age and ſort ſome. There Maximianus thinking to have been given a very fit occaſion to execute his tyranny upon the poor Chriſtians, ſent thither ſuch as ſhould burn the Temple; the doors being ſhut and cloſed round about, thither come they with fire, but firſt they commanded the Cryer with a loud voice to cry, That whoſoever would have life ſhould come out of the Temple, and do ſacrifice upon the next altar of Jupiter they came to; and unleſs they would do this, they ſhould all be burnt with the Temple. Then one ſtepping up in the Temple, anſwered in the name of all the reſt with great courage and boldneſs of mind, that they were all Chriſtians, and believed that Chriſt was their only God and King, and that they would do ſacrifice to him, with his Father, and the Holy Ghoſt; and that they were now all ready to offer unto him. With theſe words the fire was kindled and compaſſed about the Temple, and there were burnt of men, women and children, certain thouſands. There were alſo in Arabia very many Martyrs ſlain with axes, as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 12. There was in Phrygia a City, unto which the Emperor ſent his Edicts, that they ſhould do ſacrifice to the Gods, and worſhip Idols; all which Citizens, the Mayor himſelf, the Queſtor, and chief Captain, confeſſed that they were all Chriſtians. The City upon this was beſieged and ſet on fire, and all the people. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 11. In Melitina a Region of Armenia, the Biſhops and Elders were caſt in priſon. Euſeb. eodem cap. 6. In Arabrace a Region near adjoyning to Armenia, Euſtratius was martyred, as Nicephorus declareth, Lib. 7. cap. 14. This Euſtratius was that Countryman born, and very skilful in the Greek Tongue, executing by the Emperors commandment the Sheriffs Office at Licia in the Eaſt, which alſo did execution there upon the Chriſtians, and was a Tribe of great eſtimation, called Ordinis Ducalis. This man beholding the marvellous conſtancy of the Martyrs, thirſted with the deſire of Martyrdom, for that he had privily learned the Chriſtian Religion. Therefore he not abiding for other accuſers, detected himſelf, and worthily profeſſed that he was a Chriſtian, openly execrating the madneſs and vanity of the wicked Ethnicks. He therefore being carried away, was tyed up, being firſt moſt bitterly beaten. After that he was parched with fire being put unto his bowels, and then baſted with ſalt and vinegar, and laſtly ſo ſcorched and bemangled with the ſhards of ſharp and cutting ſhels, that his whole body ſeemed to be all one continual wound; howbeit, by Gods great goodneſs, afterward it was reſtored to the firſt integrity. After this he was carried away to Sebaſtia, where with his companion Oreſtes he was burnt. At that time alſo ſuffered Eugenius, Aurentius, Mardarius. Niceph. lib. 7. cap. 14. And in no leſs wiſe raged this perſecution throughout all Egypt, where Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13. maketh mention of Peleus and Nilus Martyrs and Biſhops in Egypt. But at Alexandria eſpecially were declared moſt notable conflicts of Chriſtian and true conſtant Martyrs that ſuffered; which Phileas the Biſhop of Thumitan deſcribeth, as after (God willing) ſhall be declared. In this Perſecution of Alexandria, the principal that then ſuffered was Peter the Biſhop of Alexandria, with the Elders of the ſame, moſt worthy Martyrs: as Fauſtus, Didius, and Ammonius, alſo Phileas, Heſichius, Pachiminus, and Theodorus; which all were Biſhops of the Congregations within Egypt, and beſides them many other both famous and ſingular men. The whole Legion of Chriſtian Souldiers, which lay at Thebes in Egypt, under the Chriſtian Captain Mauritius, when they would not obey the Emperors commandment touching the worſhipping of Images, were tyched to death once, and then again: and at laſt, through the exhortation of Maurtitius, died all together like conſtant Martyrs. Vincentius in Speculo, lib. 13. cap. 2. Likewiſe at Antino divers Chriſtian Souldiers, notwithſtanding they were ſeriouſly diſſwaded, ſuffered death together, among whom were Aſcla, Philemon, and Apollonius, Ibidem cap. 50. And alſo in the other parts of Africa, and Mauritania, was great Perſecution, as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. Alſo in Sammium, of which place Chronicon maketh mention, and Sicilia, where were ſeventy nine Martyrs ſlain for the profeſſion of Chriſt. Henr. de Erfordia.

In Chalcedon ſuffered Euphemia under Priſcus the Proconſul. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 77.

Henricus de Erfordia ſaith, that at Rome, Joannes and Criſpus being Prieſts, had the execution of Martyrs. And at Bohemia, Agricola and Vitalis. Vincent lib. 12. cap. 49. And at Aquileia the Emperor commanded every man to kill the Chriſtians. Vincent. lib. eodem cap. 58. And among thoſe Martyrs he maketh mention of Felices and Fortunatus. Reginus alſo writeth that in other places of Italy the Perſecution became great, as at Florentia, Pergamus, Naples, Campania, Beneventus, at Vemuſa in Apulia, and in Thuſcia. Henricus de Erfordia ſaith, alſo at Verona. In France doubtleſs Rectionarus appointed to that office, played the cruel Helhound, of whoſe great cruelty againſt the Chriſtians many Hiſtories are full. At Mediolanus ſuffered Victor. And at Maſſilia, Maximianus ſet forth his Decree, that either they ſhould all do ſacrifice unto the Gods of the Gentiles, or elſe be all ſlain with divers kinds of torments. Therefore many Martyrs there died for the glory of Chriſt. Antoninus & Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 2. In Beluacus ſuffered Lucian.

Vincentius and Reginus write of many places in Spain, where was great Perſecution, as at Emerita, where ſuffered Eulalia, of whom more followeth hereafter; and Adula, where alſo ſuffered Vincentius, Sabina, and Chriſtina. At Toletum ſuffered Leucadia the Virgin at Ceſarea Auguſta, where were put to death eighteen, beſides a great number of other Martyrs which ſuffered under Decianus the Governour, which afflicted with Perſecution all the Coaſts of Spain, as ſaith Vincent. lib. 13. cap. 123, 124, 128, 130, 134. The foreſaid Rectionarus made ſuch Perſecution at Trevers near the river of Moſella, that the blood of the Chriſtian men that were ſlain ran like ſmall Brooks, and coloured great and main rivers. Neither yet did this ſuffice him, but from thence he ſent certain Horſemen with his Letters, commanding them to ride into every place, and charge all ſuch as had taken and apprehended any Chriſtians, that they ſhould immediately put them to death. Vincentius lib. 13. cap. 136.

Beda alſo ſaith, that this Perſecution reached even unto the Britans, in his Book, De ratione temporum. And the Chronicle of Martinus, and the Noſegay of Time do declare, that all the Chriſtians in Britany were utterly deſtroyed. Furthermore, that the kinds of death and puniſhment were ſo great and horrible, as no mans tongue is able to expreſs. In the beginning, when the Emperor by his ſubtilty and wilineſs rather dallied than ſhewed his rigor, he but threatned them with bands and impriſonment; but within a while, when he began to work the matter in good earneſt, he deviſed innumerable ſorts of torments and puniſhments, as whippings, and ſcourgings, rackings, horrible ſcrapings, ſword, fire and ſhipboats, wherein a great number being put were ſunk and drowned in the bottom of the Sea. Euſeb. lib. 8. c. 6. & 7. Alſo hanging them upon Croſſes, binding them to the bodies of dead Trees, with their heads downward, hanging them by the middles upon Gallows, till they died for hunger; throwing them alive to ſuch kind of wild Beaſts as would devour them; as Lions, Bears, Leopards, and wild Bulls. Euſeb. lib. 8. c. 8. Pricking and thruſting them in with bodkins and talents of Beaſts till they were almoſt dead; lifting them up on high with their heads downward, even as in Thebaide they did unto the women, being naked and unclothed, one of their feet tyed and lifted on high, and ſo hanging down with their bodies, which thing to ſee was very pitiful; with other deviſed ſorts of puniſhments moſt tragical or rather tyrannical and pitiful to deſcribe: As firſt, the binding of them to Trees, and to the boughs thereof; the pulling and tearing aſunder of their

With ſuch kind of torments the Martyrs at Antioch were afflicted. But in Pontus, other horrible puniſhments, and fearful to be heard, did the Martyrs of Chriſt ſuffer; of which ſome had their fingers ends under the nails thruſt in with ſharp bodkins; ſome all to beſprinkled with boiling lead, having their moſt neceſſary members cut from them; ſome other ſuffering moſt filthy, intolerable, and undurable torments and pains in their bowels and privy members. Euſeb. eodem cap. 12.

Perſecution in Alexandria.

To conclude, how great the outrage of the Perſecution which reigned in Alexandria was, and with how many and ſundry kinds of new deviſed puniſhments the Martyrs were afflicted, Phileas the Biſhop of the Thumitans, a man ſingularly well learned, hath deſcribed in his Epiſtle to the Thumitans, the Copy whereof, Euſeb. hath, l. 8. c. 10. out of the which we mean here briefly to recite ſomewhat. Becauſe (ſaith he) every man might torment the holy Martyrs as they liſted themſelves, ſome beat them with cudgels, ſome with rods, ſome with whips, ſome with thongs, and ſome with cords; and this example of beating was in ſundriwiſe executed, and with much cruelty. For ſome of them having their hands bound behind their backs, were lifted up upon timber logs, and with certain inſtruments their members and joints were ſtretched forth whereupon their whole bodies hanging were ſubject to the will of the tormentors, who were commanded to afflict them with all manner of torments, and not on their ſides only (like as homicides were) but upon their bellies, thighs and legs, they ſcratched them with the talens and claws of wild beaſts. Some others were ſeen to hang by one hand upon the Engin, whereby they might feel the more grievous pulling out of the reſt of their joints and members. Some others were in ſuch ſort bound unto pillars with their faces turned to the wall, having no ſtay under their feet, and were violently weighed down with the poiſe of their bodies, that by reaſon of their ſtrict binding, they being drawn out might be more grievouſly tormented. And this ſuffered they, not only during the time of their examination, and while the Sheriff had to do with them, but alſo the whole day long. And whilſt the Judge went thus from one to another, he by his authority appointed certain Officers to attend upon thoſe he left, that they might not be let down, until either through the intolerableneſs of the pain, or by the extremity of cold, they being near the point of death ſhould be let down; and ſo were they haled upon the ground. And further they were commanded that they ſhould ſhew not ſo much as one ſpark of mercy or compaſſion upon us, but ſo extremely and furiouſly did they deal with us, as though our ſouls and bodies ſhould have died together. And therefore yet another torment our adverſaries deviſed, to augment our former plagues. After that they had moſt lamentably beaten them, they deviſed moreover a new kind of rack, wherein they lying upright were ſtretched by both the feet above the fourth ſtop or hole with ſharp ſhels or ſhares ſtrewed under them, after a ſtrange kind of Engin to us here unknown. Otherſome were caſt down upon the pavement, where they were oppreſſed ſo thick, and ſo grievouſly with torments, that it is not almoſt to be thought what afflictions they ſuffered.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Strange kinds of torments.

Thus they lying in pains and torments, ſome died therewith not a little ſhaming and confounding their enemies by their ſingular patience. Some half dead and half alive, were thruſt into priſon, where ſhortly after by pains and wounds of their bodies they ended their bitter life. Some again being cured of their wounds by their endurance in priſon, were more confirmed, who being put to the choice whether they would come to their curſed ſacrifice, and enjoy their wicked liberty, or elſe ſuſtain the ſentence of death, did willingly and without delay abide the extremity, remembring with themſelves what is written in the Scriptures: He that ſacrificeth (ſaith he) to ſtrange gods, ſhall be exterminated, &c. Item, Thou ſhalt have no ſtrange gods beſides me, &c. Thus much wrote Phileas to the Congregation where he was Biſhop before he received the ſentence of death being yet in bands; and in the ſame he exhorteth his brethren conſtantly to perſiſt after his death, in the truth of Chriſt profeſſed. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 10. Ex Sabellico, lib. 7. cap. 9.

Sabellicus in his Seventh Enead, and Eighth Book, ſaith that that Chriſtened man which tore and pulled down the wicked Edict of the Emperor in Nicomedia, being ſtript and beaten that the bones appeared, and after waſhed in ſalt and vinegar, was then ſlain with this cruel kind of torment. But Platina writeth that Dorotheus and Gorgonius exhorted him to die ſo conſtantly.

An holy Martyr of Nicomedia tormented.

But as all their torments were for their horribleneſs marvellous and notable, and therewithal ſo ſtudiouſly deviſed, and no leſs grievous and ſharp; ſo notwithſtanding, therewith were theſe Martyrs neither diſmaid nor overcome, but rather thereby confirmed and ſtrengthened; ſo merrily and joyfully ſuſtained they whatſoever was put unto them. Euſebius ſaith, that he himſelf beheld and ſaw the huge and great Perſecution that was done in Thebaide; inſomuch that the very ſwords of the Hangmen and Perſecutors being blunt with the great and often ſlaughter, they themſelves for wearineſs ſat down to reſt them, and others were ſain to take their places. And yet all this notwithſtanding the murthered Chriſtians ſhewed their marvellous readineſs, willingneſs and divine fortitude, which they were endued with; with ſtout courage, joy, and ſmiling, receiving the ſentence of death pronounced upon them, and ſung even unto the laſt gaſp, Hymns and Pſalms to God. So did alſo the Martyrs of Alexandria, as witneſſeth Phileas above mentioned. The holy Martyrs (ſaith he) keeping Chriſt in their minds, being led with the love of better rewards, ſuſtained not only at one time whatſoever labour and deviſed puniſhments they had to lay upon them; but now alſo the ſecond time have done the ſame, and have born all the menaces of the cruel Souldiers, not only in words wherewith they threatned them, but alſo whatſoever in deed and work they could deviſe to their deſtruction, and that with moſt manly ſtomacks, excluding all fear, with the perfection of their unſpeakable love towards Chriſt, whoſe great ſtrength and fortitude cannot by words be expreſſed. And Sulpitius ſaith in the Second Book of his Sacred Hiſtory, that then the Chriſtians with more greedy deſire, preſſed and fought for Martyrdom, than now they do deſire Biſhopricks.

Euſebius a beholder and a witneſs of their ſuffering.

The ſwords blunt, and the Hangmen wearied with ſlaughter.

Although ſome there were alſo, as I have ſaid, that with fear and threatnings, and by their own infirmities were overcome and went back, Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 4. among whom Socrates nameth Miletius, Lib. 1. cap. 6. and Athanaſius in his ſecond Apology, nameth the Biſhop of Licus, a City in little Egypt, whom Peter the Biſhop of Alexandria Excommunicated, for that in this Perſecution he ſacrificed unto the Gentiles gods. Of the fall of Marcellinus, the Biſhop of Rome, I will ſpeak afterwards; for he being perſwaded by others, and eſpecially of the Emperor Dioclefian himſelf, did ſacrifice, whereupon he was Excommunicated; but afterwards he repenting the ſame, was again received into the Congregation, and made Martyr, as Platina, and the compiler of the Book of the General Councils affirm. The number of the Martyrs increaſed daily, ſometimes ten, ſometimes twenty were ſlain at once; ſome whiles thirty, and oftentimes threeſcore, and other whiles a hundred in one day, men, women, and children, by divers kinds of death. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 9. Alſo Damaſus, Beda, Oroſius, Honorius, and others do witneſs, that there were ſlain in this Perſecution by the names of Martyrs, within the ſpace of thirty days, ſeventeen thouſand perſons, beſides another great number and multitude that were condemned to the Metal-mines and Quarries with like cruelty.

Mauritius

The Hiſtory of Mauritius Captain of the Thebai Souldiers.

Mauritius came out of Syria into France and Italy, being Captain of the band of the Theban Souldiers, to the number of Six thouſand ſix hundred and threeſcore, being ſent for of Maximianus, to go againſt the rebellious Bangandes; but rather, as it ſhould ſeem, by the reaſon of the Tyrant, which thought he might better in theſe quarters uſe his tyranny upon the Chriſtians, than in the Eaſt part. Theſe Thebans, with Mauritius the Captain, after that they had entred into Rome, were there of Marcellus the bleſſed Biſhop, confirmed in the faith, promiſing by Oath, that they would rather be ſlain of their enemies, than forſake that faith which they had received; who followed the Emperors Hoſt through the Alps even into France. At that time the Ceſareans were encamped not far from the Town called Ottodor, where Maximianus offered ſacrifice to his Devils, and called all the Souldiers both of the Eaſt and Weſt to the ſame, ſtrictly charging them by the Altars of his gods, that they would fight againſt thoſe rebels the Bangandes, and perſecute the Chriſtian enemies of the Emperors gods: which his commandment was ſhewed to the Thebans hoſt, which were alſo encamped about the river of Rode, and in a place that was named Agaune; but to Ottodor they would in no wiſe come, for that every man did certainly appoint and perſwade with themſelves, rather in that place to die, than either to ſacrifice to the gods, or bear armour againſt the Chriſtians. Which thing indeed, very ſtoutly and valiantly they affirmed, upon their Oath before taken to Maximianus, when he ſent for them. Wherewith the Tyrant, being wrathful and all moved, commanded every tenth man of that whole band to be put to the ſword, whereto ſtrivingly and with great rejoycing they committed their necks. To which notable thing and great force of faith, Mauritius himſelf was a great encourager, who by and by with a moſt grave Oration, exhorted and animated his Souldiers both to fortitude and conſtancy. Which, being again called of the Emperor, anſwered in this wiſe, ſaying, We are, O Emperor, your Souldiers, but yet alſo, to ſpeak freely, the ſervants of God. We owe to thee ſervice of war, to him innocency: of thee we receive for our travel, wages: of him the beginning of life. But in this we may in no wiſe obey thee, O Emperor, to deny God our Author and Lord, and not only ours, but your Lord likewiſe, will ye, nill ye. If we be not ſo extremely enforced that we offend him, doubtleſs, as we have hitherto before, we will yet obey you: but otherwiſe we will rather obey him than you. We offer here our hands againſt any other enemies: but to defile our hands with the blood of innocents, that we may not do. Theſe right hands of ours have skill to fight againſt the wicked and true enemies: but to ſpoil and murther the Godly and Citizens, they have no skill at all. We have in remembrance how we took armour in hand, for the defence of the Citizens, and not againſt them. We fought always for juſtice ſake, piety, and for the health of innocents. Theſe have been always the rewards of our perils and travel. We have fought in the quarrel of faith which in no wiſe we can keep to you, if we do not ſhew the ſame to our God. We firſt ſware upon the Sacraments of our God, then afterward to the King: and do you think the ſecond will avail us, if we break the firſt? By us you would plague the Chriſtians, to do which feat we are only commanded by you. We are here ready to confeſs God the Author of all things, and believe in his Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. We ſee before our eyes our fellows, and partakers of our labours and travels, to be put to the ſword, and we ſprinkled with their blood: of which our moſt bleſſed companions and brethren the end and death we have not bewailed nor mourned, but rather have been glad, and have rejoyced thereat, for that they have been counted worthy to ſuffer for the Lord their God. The extreme neceſſity of death cannot move us againſt your Majeſty, neither yet any deſperation, O Emperor, which is wont in wretched affairs to do much, ſhall arm us againſt you. Behold here we caſt down our weapons, and reſiſt not, for that we had rather to be killed, than kill, and guiltleſs to die, than guilty to live. Whatſoever more ye will command, appoint and enjoyn us, we are here ready to ſuffer, yea, both fire and ſword, and whatſoever other torments. We confeſs our ſelves to be Chriſtians, we cannot perſecute Chriſtians, nor will do ſacrifice to your Deviliſh Idols.

Every tenth man in the Legion ſlain.

The Oration of the Souldiers to the Emperor.

With which their anſwer, the King being altogether incenſed and moved, commanded the ſecond time the tenth man of them that were left to be in like caſe murthered. That cruelty alſo being accompliſhed, at length, when the Chriſtian Souldiers would in no wiſe condeſcend unto his mind, he ſet upon them with his whole hoſt, both footmen and alſo horſemen, and charged them to kill them all. Who with all force ſet upon them; they making no reſiſtance, but throwing down their armour, yielded their lives to the perſecutors, and offered to them their naked bodies.

Mauritius and his Company martyred.

Victor at the ſame time was not of that band, nor yet then any Souldier; but being an old Souldier, was diſmiſſed for his age. At which time he coming ſuddenly upon them as they were banqueting and making merry with the ſpoils of the holy Martyrs, was bidden to ſit down with them: who firſt asking the cauſe of that their ſo great rejoycing, and underſtanding the truth thereof, deteſted the gueſts, and refuſed to eat with them. And then being demanded of them whether happily he were a Chriſtian or no? openly confeſſed and denied not but that he was a Chriſtian, and ever would be. And thereupon they ruſhing upon him, killed him, and made him partner of the like martyrdom and honour.

Beda in his Hiſtory writeth, that this perſecution, being under Diocleſian, endured unto the ſeventh year of Conſtantinus. And Euſeb. lib. cap. 6. ſaith, that it laſted until the tenth year of Conſtantinus. It was not yet one year from the day in which Diocleſian and Maximinian, joyning themſelves together, began their perſecution, when that they ſaw the number of the Chriſtians rather to increaſe than to diminiſh, notwithſtanding all the cruelty that ever they could ſhew, and now were out of all hope for the utter rooting out of them. Which thing was the cauſe of their firſt enterpriſe; and having now even their fill of blood, and loathing, as it were, the ſhedding thereof, they ceaſed at the laſt of their own accord to put any more Chriſtians to death. But yet of a great multitude they did thruſt out their right eyes, and maimed their left legs at the ham with a ſearing Iron, condemning them to the mines of metals, not ſo much for the uſe of their labour, as for the deſire of afflicting them. And this was the clemency and releaſe of the cruelty of thoſe Princes, which ſaid that it was not meet that the Cities ſhould be defiled with the blood of Citizens, and to make the Emperors Highneſs to be diſtained with the name of cruelty, but to ſhew his Princely beneficence and liberality to all men, Euſebius, lib. 8. cap. 10.

The number of the Chriſtians encreaſed for all this perſecution.

Diocleſian and Maximinian were tired with perſecution, and gave up their Kingdom.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

When Diocleſian and Maximinian had reigned together Emperors one and twenty years (Nicephorus ſaith, two and twenty years) at length Diocleſian put himſelf from his Imperial dignity at Nicomedia, and lived at Salona; Maximinian at Mediolanum; and led both of them a private life in the three hundred and ninth year after Chriſt. This ſtrange and marvellous alteration gave occaſion (and ſo it came to paſs) that within ſhort ſpace after, there were in the Roman Commonwealth many Emperors at one time.

In the beginning of this perſecution, you heard how Diocleſian being made Emperor took to him Maximinian. Alſo how theſe two, governing as Emperors together, choſe out other two Ceſars under them, to wit, Galerius Maximinus, and Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine the Great. Thus then Diocleſian reigning with Maximinian, in the nineteenth year of his reign began his furious perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, whoſe reign after the ſame continued not long. For ſo it pleaſed God to put ſuch a ſnaffle in the Tyrants mouth, that within two years after, he cauſed both him and Maximinian (for what cauſe he knoweth) to give over their Imperial function, and ſo to remain not as Emperors any more, but as private perſons. So that they being now diſplaced and diſpoſſeſſed, the Imperial Dominion remained with Conſtantius and Galerius Maximinus, which two divided the whole Monarchy between them: ſo that Maximinus ſhould govern the Eaſt Countries, and Conſtantius the Weſt parts. But Conſtantius as a modeſt Prince, only contented with the Imperial title, refuſed Italy and Africk, contenting himſelf only with France, Spain, and Britain. Wherefore Galerius Maximinus choſe to him his two Sons, Maximinus and Severus. Likewiſe Conſtantius took Conſtantinus his Son Ceſar under him. In the mean time while Maximinus with his two Ceſars were in Aſia, the Roman Souliders ſet up for their Emperor Maxentius the ſon of Maximinian, who had before depoſed himſelf. Againſt whom Maximinus the Emperor of the Eaſt ſent his ſon Severus, which Severus was ſlain in the ſame Voyage of Maxentius, in whoſe place then Maximinus took Licinius. And theſe were the Emperors and Ceſars, which ſucceeding after Diocleſian and Maximinian, proſecuted the reſt of that perſecution, which Diocleſian and Maximinian before begun, during near the ſpace of ſeven or eight years, which was to the year of our Lord three hundred and eighteen; ſave only that Conſtantius with his ſon Conſtantinus was no great doer therein, but rather a maintainer and a ſupporter of the Chriſtians. Which Conſtantius, ſurnamed Clorus for his paleneſs, was the ſon of Eutropius, a man of great nobility of the Roman nation, as Letus affirmeth. He came of the line of Eneas and Claudia the daughter of Claudius Auguſtus. This man had not the deſire of great and mighty dominions, and therefore parted he the Empire with Galerius, and would rule but in France, Britain and Spain, refuſing the other Kingdoms for the troubleſome and difficult government of the ſame. Otherwiſe he was a Prince, as Eutropius maketh deſcription of him, very excellent, civil, meek, gentle, liberal, and deſirous to do good unto thoſe that had any private authority under him. And as Cyrus once ſaid, that he got treaſure enough, when he made his friends rich: Even ſo it is ſaid that Conſtantius would oftentimes ſay, that it were better that his ſubjects had treaſure, than he to have it in his treaſure Houſe. Alſo he was by nature ſufficed with a little, in ſo much that he uſed to eat and drink in earthen veſſels (which thing was counted in Agathocles the Sicilian a great commendation) and if at any time cauſe required to garniſh his table, he would ſend for plate and other furniture to his friends. To theſe vertues he added yet a more worthy ornament, that is, devotion, love, and affection towards the Word of God, as Euſebius in his eighth Book and thirteenth Chapter affirmeth: After which vertues enſued great peace and tranquility in all his Provinces. By which word he being guided, neither levied any wars contrary to piety and Chriſtian Religion, neither aided he any other that did the ſame, neither deſtroyed he the Churches, but commanded that the Chriſtians ſhould be preſerved and defended, and kept them ſafe from all contumelious injuries. And when that in the other juriſdictions of the Empire the Congregations were moleſted with perſecution, as Sozomenus declareth in his firſt Book and ſixth Chapter, he only gave licence unto the Chriſtians to live after their accuſtomed manner. This wonderful act of his following, beſides others, do ſhew that he was a ſincere Worſhipper, and of the Chriſtian Religion.

Thoſe which bare the chief offices amongſt the Ethnikes drave out of the Emperors Court all the Godly Chriſtians: Whereupon this enſued, that the Emperors themſelves, at the laſt, were diſtitute of help, when ſuch were driven away, which dwelling in their courts, and living a Godly life, poured out their prayers unto God for the proſperous eſtate and health both of the Empire and Emperor, Conſtantius therefore, minding at a certain time to try what ſincere and good Chriſtians he had yet in his Court, called together all his officers and ſervants in the ſame, fayning himſelf to chuſe out ſuch as would do ſacrifice to Devils, and that thoſe only ſhould dwell there and keep their offices, and that thoſe which would refuſe to do the ſame, ſhould be thruſt out and baniſhed the Court. At this appointment, all the Courtiers divided themſelves into companies: The Emperor marked which were the conſtanteſt and godlieſt from the reſt. And when ſome ſaid they would willingly do ſacrifice, other ſome openly and boldly denied to do the ſame; then the Emperor ſharply rebuked thoſe which were ſo ready to do ſacrifice, and judged them as falſe Traytors unto God, accounting them unworthy to be in his Court, which were ſuch Traytors to God; and forthwith commanded that they only ſhould be baniſhed the ſame. But greatly he commended them which refuſed to do ſacrifice, and confeſſed God; affirming that they only were worthy to be about a Prince; forthwith commanding that thenceforth they ſhould be the truſty Counſellors and defenders both of his Perſon and Kingdom; ſaying thus much more, that they only were worthy to be in office, whom he might make account of as his aſſured friends, and that he meant to have them in more eſtimation, than the ſubſtance he had in his treaſury. Euſebius maketh mention hereof in his firſt Book of the like of Conſtantinus, and alſo Sozomenus in his firſt Book and ſixth Chapter.

With this Conſtantius was joyned (as hath been aforeſaid) Galerius Maximinus, a man, as Eutropius affirmeth, very civil and a paſſing good ſouldier: Furthermore, a favourer of wiſe and learned men, of quiet diſpoſition, not rigorous, but in his Drunkenneſs, whereof he would ſoon after repent him, as Victor writeth; whether he meaneth Maximinus the Father or Maximinus his Son, it is uncertain. But Euſebius far otherwiſe deſcribeth the conditions of him in his eighth Book and firſt Chapter. For he ſaith he was of a Tyrannical diſpoſition; the fearfulleſt man that might be, and curious in all magical ſuperſtition; in ſo much that without the Diviſations and anſwers of Divels, he durſt do nothing at all, and therefore he gave great offices and dignities to inchanters. Furthermore, that he was an exactor and extortioner of the Citizens, liberal to thoſe that were flatterers, given to turſeiting and riot, a great drinker of wine, and in his furious Drunkenneſs moſt like a mad-man, a ribaud, and idulterer, which came to no City, but he ravithed virgins, and defiled mens Wives. To conclude, he was ſo great an Idolater, that he built up Temples in every City, and repaired theſe that were fallen in great decay: And he choſe out the moſt worthy of his political Magiſtrates to be the Idols Prieſts, and deviſed that they ſhould execute that their office with great authority and dignity, and alſo with warlike pomp. But unto Chriſtian piety and Religion, he was moſt intenſive, and in the Eaſt Churches exerciſed cruel perſecution, and uſed as executioners of the ſame, Pencetius, Quintianus, and Theotechnus, beſides others.

Notwithſtanding he was at length revoked from his cruelty by the juſt Judgment and Puniſhment of God. For he was ſuddenly vexed with a fatal diſeaſe moſt filthy and deſperate, which diſeaſe to deſcribe was very ſtrange, taking the firſt beginning in his fleſh outwardly, from thence it proceeded more and more to the inward parts of his body. For in the privy members of his body, there happened unto him a ſudden putrefaction, and after in the bottom of the ſame a botchy corrupt bile, with a Fiſtula conſuming and eating up his intrails, out of the which came ſwarming forth an innumerable multitude of lice, with ſuch a peſtiferous ſtink, that no man could abide him; and ſo much more, for that all the groſſneſs of his body by abundance of meat before he fell ſick, was turned alſo into fat; which fat now putrified and ſtinking, was ſo ugſome and horrible, that none that come to him could abide the ſight thereof. By reaſon whereof, the Phyſitians which had him in cure, not able to abid the intolerable ſtink, ſome of them were commanded to be ſlain. Other ſome, becauſe they could not heal him, being ſo ſwoln and paſt hope of cure, were alſo cruelly put to death. At length, being put in remembrance that this diſeaſe was ſent of God, he began to forethink the wickedneſs that he had done againſt the Saints of God, and ſo coming again to himſelf, firſt confeſſeth to God all his offences, then calling them unto him which were about him, forthwith commanded all men to ceaſe from the perſecutions of the Chriſtians: Requiring moreover that they ſhould ſet up his Emperial proclamations, for the retoring and reedifying of their Temples, and that they would obtain of the Chriſtians in their aſſemblies (which without all fear and doubt they might be bold to make) that they would devoutly pray to their God for the Emperor. Then forthwith was the perſecution ſtayed, and the Emperial Proclamations in every City were ſet up, containing the retractation or countermand of thoſe things which againſt the Chriſtians were before decreed, the copy whereof enſueth.

Amongſt other things, which for the benefit and commodity of the commonweal we eſtabliſhed, we commanded to reform all things according to the ancient Laws and publick Diſcipline of the Romans, and alſo to uſe this policy, that the Chriſtians, which had forſaken the Religion of their forefathers, ſhould be brought again to the right

Therefore, when our foreſaid decree was proclaimed, many there were that felt the penalty thereof, and many being troubled therefore, ſuffered many kinds of death. And becauſe we ſee yet that there be many which perſevere in the ſame, which neither give due worſhip unto the celeſtial Gods, neither receive the God of the Chriſtians, we have reſpect to our accuſtomed benignity, wherewith we are wont to ſhew favour unto all men, think good in this cauſe alſo to extend our clemency, that the Chriſtians may be again tolerated, and appoint them places where again they may meet together, ſo that they do nothing contrary to the publick order diſciplin. By another Epiſtle we mean to preſcribe unto the Judges, what ſhall be convenient for them to do. Wherefore according as this our benignity clemency deſerveth, let them make interceſſion to God for our health, commonweal, and for themſelves; that in all places the ſtate of the commonweal may be preſerved, and that they themſelves may be able ſafely to live within their bounds. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. ult.

But one of his inferior officers, whoſe name was alſo Maximinus, was not well pleaſed, when this countermand was publiſhed throughout all Aſia, and the Provinces where he had to do. Yet he being qualified by this example, that it was not convenient for him to repugne the pleaſure of thoſe Princes which had the chief authority, as Conſtantinus and Maximinus, ſet forth of himſelf no edict touching the ſame; but commanded his officers in the preſence of others, that they ſhould ſomewhat ſtay from the perſecution of the Chriſtians: Of which commandment of the inferior Maximinus, each of them gave intelligence unto their fellowes by their letters. But Sabinus, which then amongſt them all had the chiefeſt office and dignity, to the ſubſtitutes of every Country wrote by his letter, the Emeprors pleaſure in this wiſe.

Sabinus in the favour of the Chriſtians publiſheth the decree.

The Majeſty of our moſt gracious and ſoveraign Lords the Emperors, hath lately decreed with ſpecial diligence and devotion, to induce all men to an uniform life, ſo that they; which ſeemed to diſſent from the Roman cuſtom by a ſtrang manner of living, ſhould exhibit to the immortal Gods their due and proper worſhip; but the wilful and obſtinate mind of divers ſo much and ſo continually reſiſted the ſame, that by no lawful means they might be revoked from their purpoſe, neither made afraid by any terror or puniſhment. Becauſe therefore it ſo came to paſs, that by this means many put themſelves in peril and jeopardy: The Majeſty of our ſoveraign Lords the Emperors, according to their Noble piety, conſidering that it was far from the meaning of their Princely Majeſties that ſuch things ſhould be, whereby ſo many men and much people ſhould be deſtroyed, gave me in charge, that with diligence I ſhould write into you, that, if any of the Chriſtians from henceforth fortune to be taken in the exerciſe of their Religion, in no wiſe ye moleſt the ſame, neither for that cauſe you do judge any man worthy of Puniſhment; for that in all this time it hath evidently appeared, that by no means they might be allured from ſuch wilfulneſs. It is therefore requiſite that your wiſdom write unto the Queſtors, Captains, and Conſtables of every City and village, that they may know it not to be lawful for them, or any of them, to do contrary to the preſcript of this commandment, neither that they preſume to attempt the ſame. Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

Perſecution ceaſeth for a time.

The Governors therefore of every Province, ſuppoſing this is to be the determinate pleaſure (and not fained) of the Emperor, did firſt adverti ſe thereof the ruſtical and pagan multitude: After that they releaſed and ſet at liberty, all ſuch priſoners as were condemned to the metal mines, and to perpetual impriſonment for their faith, thinking thereby (where indeed they were deceived) that the doing thereof would pleaſe the Emperor. This therefore ſeemed to them as unlooked for, and as light to Travellers in a dark night. They gather themſelves together in every City, they call their Synods and Councels, and much marvel at the ſudden change and alteration. The infidels themſelves extol the only and true God of the Chriſtians. The Chriſtians receive again all their former liberties; and ſuch as fell away before in the time of perſecution repent themſelves, and after penance done, they returned again to the Congregation. Now the Chriſtians rejoyced in every City, praiſing God with Hymns and Pſalms: Euſebius ibidem. This was a marvellous ſudden alteration of the Church, from a moſt unhappy ſtate into a better: But ſcarce ſuffered Maximinus the Tyrant the ſame ſix months unviolated to continue. For whatſoever ſeemed to make for the ſubverſion of the ſame peace (yet ſcarcely hatched) that did he only mediate. And firſt of all he took from the Chriſtians all liberty and leave for them to aſſemble and Congregate in Churchyards under a certain colour. After that he ſent certain miſcreants unto the Athenians, to ſollicit them againſt the Chriſtians, and to provoke them to ask of him, as a recompence and great reward, that he would not ſuffer any Chriſtian to inhabit in their country: And amongſt them was one Theotechnus, a moſt wicked miſcreant, and inchanter, and a moſt deadly Enemy againſt the Chriſtians. He firſt made the way whereby the Chriſtians were put out of credit and accuſed to the Emperor; to which fraud alſo he erected a certain Idol of Jupiter to be worſhipped of the inchanters and conjurers, and mingled the ſame worſhip with ceremonies, full of deceiveable witchcraft. Laſtly, he cauſed the ſame Idol to give this ſound out of his mouth, that is: Jupiter commandeth the Chriſtians to be baniſhed out of the City and ſuburbs of the ſame, as Enemies unto him. And the ſame ſentence did the reſt of the Governors of the Provinces publiſh againſt the Chriſtians, and thus at length perſecution began to kindle againſt them. Maximinus appointed and inſtituted high Prieſts and Biſhops in every City to offer ſacrifice unto Idols, and inveigled all thoſe that were in great offices under him, that they ſhould not only ceaſe to pleaſure them and to do for them, but alſo that they ſhould with new deviſed accuſations againſt them, at their pleaſure, put as many to death as by any means they might. They alſo did counterfeit certain practiſes of Pilate againſt our Saviour Chriſt full of blaſphemy, and ſent the ſame into all the Empire of Maximinus by their letters, commanding that the ſame ſhould be publiſhed and ſet up in every City and ſuburbs of the ſame, and that they ſhould be delivered to the School-maſters, to cauſe their Scholars to learn by rote the ſame.

After that, one named Præfectus caſtrorum, whom the Romans do call Captain, allured certain light women, partly by fear, and partly by puniſhment, dwelling at Damaſcus and Phenicia, and taken out of the Court wherein they were accuſed, that they ſhould openly ſay in writing, that they were once Chriſtians, and that they knew what wicked and laſcivious acts the Chriſtians were wont to execute amongſt themſelves upon the ſundays, and what other things they thought good to make more of their own head, to the ſlander of the Chriſtians. The Captain ſheweth unto the Emperor their words, as though it had been ſo indeed: And the Emperor by and by commanded the ſame to be publiſhed throughout every City. Furthermore, they did hang in the middeſt of every City (which was never done before) the Emperors edicts againſt the Chriſtians, graven in tables of Braſs. And the Children in the Schools with great noiſe and clapping of hands, did every day reſound the contumelious Blaſphemies of Pilate unto Jeſus, and what other things ſoever were deviſed of the Magiſtrates, after a moſt deſpiteful manner. Euſeb lib. 8. cap. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. Perſecution renued afreſh.

Thus came it to paſs that at the length Perſecution was as great as ever it was, and the Magiſtrates of every Province were very diſdainful againſt the Chriſtians, which condemned ſome to death, and ſome to exile. Among whom they condemned three Chriſtians at Emiſa in Phenicia, with whom Sylvanus the Biſhop, a very old man, being forty years in the Eccleſiaſtical Function, was condemned to death. At Nicomedia Lucianus the elder of Antioch, brought thither, after he had exhibited to the Emperor his Apology concerning the Doctrine of the Chriſtians, was caſt in Priſon, and after put to death. In Amaſea a City of Cappadocia, Bringes, the Lieutenant of Maximinus, had at that time the executing of that Perſecution. At Alexandria, Petrus a moſt worthy Biſhop, was beheaded, with whom many other Egyptian Biſhops alſo died, Euſebius lib. 9. cap. 7. Niceph. lib. 7. cap. 44. Quirinus the Biſhop of Sceſcanus, having a Hand-Mill tied about his Neck, was thrown headlong from the Bridge into the Flood, and there a long while floted above the water, and when he opened his mouth to ſpeak to the Lookers on, that they ſhould not be diſmaid with that his puniſhment, was with much ado drowned, Chron. Euſeb. At Rome died Marcellus the Biſhop, as ſaith Platina, alſo Timotheus the elder, with many other Biſhops and Prieſts were martyred. To conclude, many in ſundry places every where were martyred, whoſe names the Book, Intituled, Faſciculus temporum declareth, as Victorianus, Symphorianus, Caſtorius with his wife, Caſtulus, Ceſarius, Mennas, Nobilis, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, and other innumerable Martyrs, Eraſmus, Bonifacius, Juliana, Coſmas, Damianus, Baſilinus, with ſeven others. Dorothea, Theophilus, Theodoſia, Vitalis, Agricola, Acha, Philemon, Hireneus, Januarius, Feſtus, Deſiderius, Gregorius, Spoletanus, Agapes, Chionia, Hirenea, Theodora, and two hundred threeſcore and ten other Martyrs. Florianus, Primus and Felicianus, Vitus and Modeſtus, Creſcentia, Albinius, Rogatianus, Donatianus, Pancratius, Catharina, Margaret, Lucia the Virgin, and Antheus the King, with many thouſand Martyrs more. Simplicius, Fauſtinus, Beatrix, Panthaleon, Georgius, Juſtus, Leocandia, Anthonia, and other more (to an infinite number) ſuffered Martyrdom in this Perſecution, whoſe names God hath written in the Book of Life. Alſo Felix, Victor with his Parents, Lucia the widow, Gemenianus, with threeſcore and nineteen others. Sabinus, Anaſtaſia, Chryſogonus, Felix and Audactus, Adrianus, Natholia, Eugenia. Agnes alſo, when ſhe was but thirteen years old, was martyred. Euſebius in his eighth Book and fifteenth Chapter, rehearſeth theſe kinds of Torments and Puniſhments; that is to ſay, Fire, wild Beaſts, the Sword, Crucifyings, the bottom of the Sea, the cutting and burning of Members, the thruſting out of Eyes, diſmembring of the whole Body, Hunger, Impriſonment, and whatſoever other cruelty the Magiſtrates could deviſe. All which notwithſtanding, the godly ones, rather than that they would do Sacrifice, as they were bid, manfully endured. Neither were the women any thing at all behind them. For they, being enticed to the filthy uſe of their Bodies, rather ſuffered baniſhment, or willingly killed themſelves. Neither yet could the Chriſtians live ſafely in the Wilderneſs, but were fetched even from thence to death and torments, inſomuch that this was a more grievous Perſecution under Maximinus the Tyrant, than was the former cruel Perſecution under Maximianus the Prince, Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 6.

And for ſo much as ye have heard the cruel Edict of Maximinus proclaimed againſt the Chriſtians, graven in braſs, which he thought perpetually ſhould indure to the aboliſhing of Chriſt and his Religion: now mark again the great handy work of God, which immediately fell upon the ſame, checking the proud preſumption of the Tyrant, proving all to be falſe and contrary that in the braven Proclamation was contained. For where the foreſaid Edict boaſted ſo much of the Proſperity and Plenty of all things in the ſame time of this Perſecution of the Chriſtians, ſuddenly befel ſuch unſeaſonable Drought, with Famine and Peſtilence among the people, beſides alſo the Wars with the Armenians, that all was found untrue that he had bragged ſo much of before. By reaſon of which Famine and Peſtilence the people were greatly conſumed, inſomuch that one meaſure of Wheat was ſold for two thouſand and five hundred pieces of money of Athens Coin, by reaſon whereof innumerable died in the Cities, but many more in the Country and Villages, ſo that moſt part of the Husbandmen and Countrymen died up with the famine and Peſtilence

The work of God againſt the foreſaid Edict.

The proud and blaſphemous boaſting of the Emperor proved falſe and contrary.

Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 8.

Peſtilence. Divers there were which bringing out their beſt Treaſure, were glad to give it for any kind of ſuſtenance, were it never ſo little. Others ſelling away their Poſſeſſions, fell by reaſon thereof to extream poverty and beggery. Certain eating Graſs, and feeding on other unwholſome Herbs, were fain to relieve themſelves with ſuch food as did hurt and poyſon their bodies. Alſo a number of women in the Cities, being brought to extream miſery and penury, were conſtrained to depart the City, and fall to begging thorow the Country. Some others were weak and faint (as Images without breath) wandring up and down, and not able to ſtand for feebleneſs, fell down in the middle of the ſtreets, and holding up their hands moſt pitiful, cried for ſome ſcraps or fragments of bread to be given them, and being at the laſt gaſpe, ready to give up the ghoſt, and not able to utter any other words, yet cried out that they were hungry. Of the richer ſort divers there were, who being weary with the number of beggers and askers, after they had beſtowed largely upon them, became hard-hearted, fearing leſt they ſhould fall into the ſame miſery themſelves, as they which begged. By reaſon whereof, the Market-place, Streets, Lanes, and Alleys lay full of dead and naked bodies, being caſt out and unburied, to the pitiful and grievous beholding of them that ſaw them, wherefore many were eaten of Dogs, for which cauſe they that lived fell to the killing of Dogs, leſt they running mad, ſhould fall upon them, and kill them.

A terrible hunger among the Heathen perſecutors deſcribed.

In like manner the Peſtilence ſcattering through all houſes and ages of men, did no leſs conſume them, eſpecially thoſe which through plenty of Victuals eſcaped Famine. Wherefore the rich Princes and Preſidents, and other innumerable of the Magiſtrates, being the more apt to receive the Infection, by reaſon of their plenty, were quickly diſpatched, and turned up their heels. Thus the miſerable multitude being conſumed with Famine and with Peſtilence, all places were full of Mourning, neither was there any thing elſe ſeen, but wailing and weeping in every corner. So that death, what for Famine and Peſtilence, in ſhort time brake up and conſumed whole Houſholds, two or three dead bodies being born out together from one houſe to one funeral.

Peſtilence among the perſecutors.

Theſe were the rewards of the vain braggs of Maximinus and his Edicts, which he did publiſh in all Towns and Cities againſt us, when it was evident to all men, how diligent and charitable the Chriſtians were to them all in this their miſerable extremity. For they only in all this time of diſtreſs, ſhewing compaſſion upon them, travelled every day, ſome in curing the ſick, and ſome in burying the dead, which otherwiſe of their own ſort were forſaken. Otherſome of the Chriſtians calling and gathering the multitude together, which were in jeopardy of Famine, diſtributed Bread unto them, whereby they miniſtred occaſion to all men to glorifie the God of the Chriſtians, and to confeſs them to be the true Worſhippers of God, as appeared by their works. By the means and reaſon hereof, the great God and Defender of the Chriſtians, who before had ſhewed his anger and indignation againſt all men, for their wrongful afflicting of us, opened again unto us the comfortable light of his Providence, ſo that by means thereof peace fell unto us, as light unto them that ſit in darkneſs, to the great admiration of all men, which eaſily perceive God himſelf to be a perpetual Directer of our doings, who many times chaſtneth his people with Calamities for a time to exerciſe them, but after ſufficient correction again ſheweth himſelf merciful and favourable to them which with truſt call upon him.

The charity of the Chriſtians to the Enemies.

Let your light ſo ſhine among men, that they may ſee your good works, and glorifie your Father which is in Heaven.

By the Narration of theſe things heretofore premiſed, taken out of the ſtory of Euſebius, like as it is manifeſt to ſee, ſo it is wonderful to mark and note, how thoſe counſels and rages of the Gentiles atchieved againſt Chriſt and his Chriſtians, when they ſeemed moſt ſure againſt them, were moſt againſt themſelves. And whereby they thought moſt to confound the Church and Religion of Chriſt, the ſame turned moſt to their own confuſion, and to the profit and praiſe of the Chriſtians (God of his marvelous Wiſdom ſo ordering and diſpoſing the end of things.) For where the brazen Edict of the Emperor promiſed temperate weather, God ſent drought: where it promiſed plenty, God immediately ſent upon them Famine and penury: where it promiſed health, God ſtrook them even upon the ſame, with grievous Peſtilence, and with other more Calamities, in ſuch ſort that the moſt relief they had, was chiefly by the Chriſtians, to the great praiſe both of them, and to the honour of our God.

The wiſdom and policy of man overthrown in his own turn.

Qui cõprehendit ſapientes in aſtutia.

Thus moſt plainly and evidently was then verified the true Promiſe of Chriſt to his Church, affirming and aſſuring us, That the Gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt his Church builded upon his Faith: as ſufficiently may appear by theſe ten Perſecutions above ſpecified and deſcribed. Wherein as no man can deny, but that Satan and his malignant World have aſſayed the uttermoſt of their power and might to overthrow the Church of Jeſus: ſo muſt all men needs grant, that read theſe ſtories, that when Satan and the gates of Hell have done their worſt, yet have they not prevailed againſt this Mount of Sion, nor ever ſhall. For elſe what was here to be thought, where ſo many Emperors and Tyrants together, Diocleſian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximinus, Severus, Maxentius, Licinius, with their Captains and Officers, were let looſe, like ſo many Lions, upon a ſcattered and unarmed flock of ſheep, intending nothing elſe but the utter ſubverſion of all Chriſtianity, and eſpecially alſo when Laws were ſet up in braſs againſt the Chriſtians, as a thing perpetually to ſtand: what was here to be looked for, but a final deſolation of the Name and Religion of Chriſtians? But what followed, partly ye have heard, partly more is to be marked, as in the ſtory followeth.

The gates of hell ſhall not prevail againſt the Church builded upon the Faith of Chriſt.

I ſhewed before how Maxentius, and the Son of Maximinian, was ſet up at Rome by the Pretorian Souldiers to be Emperor. Whereunto the Senate, although they were not conſenting, yet for fear they were not reſiſting. Maximinian his Father, who had before deprived himſelf with Diocleſian, hearing of this, took heart again to him, to reſume his dignity, and ſo laboured to perſwade Diocleſian alſo to do the ſame: but when he could not move him thereunto, he repaireth to Rome, thinking to wreſt the Empire out of his Sons hands. But when the Souldiers would not ſuffer that, of a crafty purpoſe he flieth to Conſtantinus in France, under pretence to complain of Maxentius his Son, but in very deed to kill Conſtantinus. Notwithſtanding that Conſpiracy being detected by Fauſta the Daughter of Maximinian, whom Conſtantinus had married, ſo was Conſtantinus through the grace of God preſerved, and Maximinian retired back. In the which his flight by the way he was apprehended, and ſo put to death. And this is the end of Maximinian.

The death and end of Maximinian

Now let us return to Maxentius again, who all this while reigned at Rome with tyranny and wickedneſs intolerable, much like to another Pharaoh or Nero. For he ſlew the moſt part of his Noble men, and took from them their goods. And ſometime in his rage he would deſtroy great multitudes of the people of Rome by his Souldiers, as Euſebius declareth, lib. 8. cap. 14. Alſo he left no miſchievous nor laſcivious act unattempted, but was the utter enemy of all womenly chaſtity, which uſed to ſend the honeſt wives, whom he had adulterated, with ſhame and diſhoneſty unto their Husbands (being worthy Senators) after that he had raviſhed them. He abſtained from no Adulterous act, but was inflamed with the unquenchable luſt of deflowring of women. Letus declareth that he being that time far in love with a noble and chaſte Gentlewoman of Rome, ſent unto her ſuch Courtiers of his, as were meet for that purpoſe, whom alſo he had in greater eſtimation than any others, and with ſuch was wont to conſult about matters for the Common weal. Theſe firſt fell upon her Husband and murthered him within his own houſe; then when they could by no means neither with fear of the Tyrant, or with threatning of death pull her away from him: at length ſhe being a Chriſtian deſired leave of them to go into her Chamber, and after her prayers ſhe would accompliſh that which they requeſted. And when ſhe had gotten into her Chamber, under this pretence, ſhe killed her ſelf. But the Courtiers when they ſaw that the woman tarried ſo long, they being diſpleaſed therewith, brake open the doors, and found her there lying dead. Then returned they and declared this matter to the Emperor, who was ſo far paſt ſhame, that inſtead of Repentance he was the more ſet on fire in attempting the like.

He

A Monſter in the likelihood of an Emperor.

He was alſo much addict to the Art Magical, which to execute, he was more fit than for the Imperial Dignity. Alſo ſometime he would rip women when they were in labour, and would ſearch the place where the infant lay, being born a little before. Often he would invocate Devils in a ſecret manner, and by the anſwers of them he ſought to break the Wars, which he knew Conſtantinus and Licinius prepared againſt him. And to the end he might the rather perpetrate his miſchievous and wicked attempts, which in his ungracious mind he had conceived, according to his purpoſe, in the beginning of his Reign he feigned himſelf to be a favourer of the Chriſtians. In which thing doing, thinking to make the People of Rome his friends, he commanded that they ſhould ceaſe from perſecuting the Chriſtians. And he himſelf in the mean ſeaſon abſtained from [illegible] contumelious vexation of them, till that he began at the laſt to ſhew himſelf an open perſecuter of them: at which time as Zonaras writeth, he moſt cruelly raged againſt the Chriſtians thereabouts, vexing them with all manner of injuries. Which thing he in no leſs wiſe did, than Maximinus, as Euſebius in his eighth Book and fifteenth Chapter ſeemeth to affirm. And Platina declareth in the life of Marcellus the Biſhop, that he baniſhed a certain Noble Woman of Rome, becauſe ſhe gave her goods to the Church.

A lively pattern of an Hypocrite.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 15.

Thus by the grievous tyranny and unſpeakable wickedneſs of this Maxentius, the Citizens and Senators of Rome, being much grieved and oppreſſed, ſent their complaints with Letters unto Conſtantinus, with much ſute and moſt hearty petitions, deſiring him to help and releaſe their Country and City of Rome: who hearing and underſtanding their miſerable and pitiful ſtate, and grieved therewith not a little, firſt ſendeth by Letters to Maxentius, deſiring and exhorting him to reſtrain his corrupt doings, and great cruelty. But when no Letters nor exhortations would prevail, at the length pitying the woful caſe of the Romans, gathered together his power and Army in Britain and France, therewith to repreſs the violent rage of that Tyrant: thus Conſtantinus ſufficiently appointed with ſtrength of Men, but eſpecially with ſtrength of God, entred his journey coming towards Italy, which was about the laſt year of the Perſecution, three hundred and eighteen. Maxentius underſtanding of the coming of Conſtantinus, and truſting more to his deviliſh Art of Magick, than to the good will of his Subjects, which he little deſerved, durſt not ſhew himſelf out of the City, nor encounter with him in the open field, but with privy Garriſons laid in wait for him by the way, in ſundry ſtraits as he ſhould come. With whom Conſtantinus had divers skirmiſhes, and by the power of the Lord did ever vanquiſh them and put them to flight. Notwithſtanding Conſtantinus yet was in no great comfort, but in great care and dread in his mind (approaching now near unto Rome) for the Magical Charms and Sorceries of Maxentius, wherewith he had vanquiſhed before Severus ſent by Galerius againſt him, as hath been declared, which made alſo Conſtantinus the more afraid. Wherefore being in great doubt and perplexity in himſelf, and revolving many things in his mind, what help he might have againſt the operations of his charming, which uſed to cut Women great with Child, to take his deviliſh Charms by the intrails of the Infants, with ſuch other like feats of deviliſhneſs which he practiſed: theſe things (I ſay) Conſtantinus doubting and revolving in his mind, in his journey drawing toward the City, and caſting up his eyes many times to Heaven, in the South part, about the going down of the Sun, ſaw a great brightneſs in Heaven, appearing in the ſimilitude of a Croſs, with certain Stars of equal bigneſs, giving this Inſcription like Latine Letters, IN HOC VINCE, that is, In this overcome. Euſebius de vita Conſtant. lib. 2. Niceph. lib. 7. cap. 29. Eutrop. lib. 11. Sozom. lib. 1. cap. 3. Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 2. Urſpergenſis, Chronic. Paul. Diacon. lib. 11. This miraculous Viſion to be true, for the more credit, Euſebius Pamphilus in his firſt Book De vita Conſtantini, doth witneſs moreover, that he had heard the ſaid Conſtantinus himſelf oftentimes report, and alſo to ſwear this to be true and certain, which he did ſee with his own eyes in Heaven, and alſo his Souldiers about him. At the ſight whereof when he was greatly aſtonied, and conſulting with his Men upon the meaning thereof, behold in the Night ſeaſon in his ſleep, Chriſt appeared to him with the ſign of the ſame Croſs which he had ſeen before, bidding him to make the figuration thereof, and to carry it in his Wars before him, and ſo ſhould he have the Victory.

This Viſion reported and teſtified by Conſtantine himſelf to be true.

¶ Wherein is to be noted (good Reader) that this ſign of the Croſs, and theſe Letters added withal, In hoc vince, was given to him of God, not to induce any ſuperſtitious worſhip or opinion of the Croſs, as though the Croſs it ſelf had any ſuch power or ſtrength in it, to obtain Victory: but only to bear the meaning of another thing, that is to be an admonition to him, to ſeek and aſpire to the knowledge and faith of him, which was crucified upon the Croſs for the ſalvation of him, and of all the World, and ſo to ſet forth the glory of his Name, as afterward it came to paſs. This by the way. Now to the matter.

An admonition concerning the material croſs not to be worſhipped, but to be a means to bring Conſtantine to the faith of him which was crucified.

The next day following after this Nights Viſion, "Conſtantinus cauſed a Croſs after the ſame figuration to be made of Gold and precious ſtone, and to be borne before him inſtead of his Standard, and ſo with much hope of victory, and great confidence, as one armed from Heaven, ſpeedeth himſelf toward his enemy. Againſt whom Maxentius being conſtrained perforce to iſſue out of the City, ſendeth all his power to joyn with him in the field beyond the River of Tybur, where Maxentius craftily breaking down the Bridge called Pons Milvius, cauſed another deceitful Bridge to be made of Boats and Whirries, being joyned together, and covered over with Boards and Planks, in manner of a Bridge, thinking therewith to take Conſtantine as in a trap. But here it came to paſs which in the ſeventh Pſalm is written, He digged a pit, and fell therein himſelf; let his working return upon his own head, and his unrighteouſneſs upon his own pate. Which here in this Maxentius was rightly verified. For after the two Hoſts did meet, he being not able to ſuſtain the force of Conſtantine fighting under the Croſs of Chriſt againſt him, was put to ſuch a flight, and driven to ſuch an exigent, that in retiring back, for haſte thinking to get the City, upon the ſame Bridge which he did lay for Conſtantine, was overturned by the fall of his Horſe into the bottom of the flood, and there with the weight of his Armour, he with a great part of his beaten men, were drowned. Repreſenting unto us the like example of Pharaoh and his Hoſt drowned in the Red Sea, who not unaptly ſeemeth to bear a Prophetical figuration of this Maxentius. For as the Children of Iſrael were in long thraldome and Perſecution in Egypt under Tyrants there, till the drowning of this Pharaoh their laſt Perſecuter: ſo was this Maxentius and Maximinus and Licinius the laſt Perſecuter in the Roman Monarchy of the Chriſtians, whom this Conſtantinus, fighting under the Croſs of Chriſt did vanquiſh and ſet the Chriſtians at liberty, who before had bin perſecuted now three hundred years in Rome, as hath been hitherto in this Hiſtory declared.

Wherefore as the Iſraelites with their Moſes at the drowning of their Pharaoh, ſung gloriouſly unto the Lord, who miraculouſly had caſt down the Horſe and Horſemen into the Sea, ſo no leſs rejoycing and exceeding gladneſs was here, to ſee the glorious hand of the Lord Chriſt fighting with his People, and vanquiſhing his Enemies and Perſecuters.

Exo. 15.

In Hiſtories we read of many Victories and great Conqueſts gotten: yet we never read, nor ever ſhall, of any Victory ſo wholſome, ſo commodious, ſo opportune to Mankind as this was, which made an end of ſo much bloodſhed, and obtained ſo much liberty and life to the Poſterity of ſo many generations. For albeit that ſome Perſecution was yet ſtirring in the Eaſt Countrys by Maximinus and Licinius, as ſhall be declared; yet in Rome, and in all the Weſt parts, no Martyr died after this heavenly Victory gotten. And alſo in the Eaſt parts the ſaid Conſtantinus with the ſaid Croſs borne before him, conſequently upon the ſame, ſo vanquiſhed the Tyrants, and ſo eſtabliſhed the peace of the Church, that for the ſpace of a juſt thouſand years after that, we read of no ſet Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, unto the time of John Wickliffe, when the Biſhops of Rome began with fire to perſecute the true Members of Chriſt, as in further proceſs of this Hiſtory (Chriſt granting) ſhall appear. So happy, ſo glorious (as I ſaid) was this Victory of Conſtantine, ſirnamed named the Great. For the joy and gladness whereof, the Citizens who had sent for him before, with exceeding triumph brought him into the City of Rome, where he with the Cross was most honourably received, and celebrated the space of seven days together, having moreover in the Market-place, his image set up, holding in his right hand the sign of the Cross, with this Inscription: Hoc salutari signo, veraci fortitudinis indicio civitatem nostram jugo tyranni ereptam liberavi: that is, With this Wholesome sign, the true token of fortitude, I have rescued and delivered our City from the yoke of the Tyrant. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9.

By this heavenly Victory of Constantinus, and by the death of Maxentius no little tranquility came unto the Church of Christ. Although notwithstanding in the East Churches the storm of this Tenth Persecution was not yet altogether quieted, but that some tail thereof in those parts remained for the space of two or three years. But of this we mind to speak (Christ willing) hereafter. In the mean season to return again to the West parts here in Europe, where Constantinus then had most to do, great tranquility followed, and long continued in the Church without any open slaughter for a thousand years together (to the time of John Wickliff and Waldenses, as is before touched) by the means of the godly beginning of good Constantinus, who with his fellow Licinius, being now established in their dominion, eftsoons set forth their general Proclamation or Edict, not constraining therein any man to any Religion, but giving liberty to all men, both for the Christians to persist in their profession without any danger, and for other men freely to adjoyn with them, whosoever pleased. Which thing was very well taken, and highly allowed of the Romans, and all wise men. The Copy of the Edict or Constitution here ensueth.

Note well these thousand years, and then read the 20 chap. of the Apocalyp. Satanas was bound up for a thousand years. &c.

The Copy of the Emperial Constitution of Constantinus and Licinius, for the establishing of the free worshipping of God after the Christian Religion.

The Copy of the Emperial Constitution of Constantinus and Licin. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

NOt long agone We weighing with Our Selves, that the liberty and freedom of Religion ought not in any case to be prohibited, but that free leave ought to be given to every man to do therein according to his will and mind, We have given Commandment to all men to qualifie matters of Religion as they themselves thought good, and that also the Christians should keep the Opinions and Faith of their Religion: but because that many and sundry Opinions by the same our first licence, spring and increase through such liberty granted, We thought good manifestly to add thereunto, and make plain such things whereby perchance some of them in time to come, may from such their observance be let or hindred. When therefore by prosperous success, I Constantinus Augustus, and I Licinius Augustus came to Mediolanum, and there sate in Council upon such things as served for the utility and profit of the Commonweal, these things amongst others We thought would be beneficial to all men, yea and before all other things We purposed to establish those things wherein the true reverence and worship of God is comprehended; that is, to give unto the Christians free choice to follow what Religion they think good, and whereby the same sincerity and celestial grace, which is in every place received, may also be imbraced and accepted of all Our loving Subjects. According therefore unto this our pleasure upon good advisement and sound judgment We have decreed, that no man so hardly be denied to choose and follow the Christian Observance or Religion: but that this liberty be given to every man, that he may apply his mind to what Religion he thinketh meet himself, whereby God may perform upon us all his accustomed care and goodness. To the intent therefore you might know that this is Our pleasure, We thought it necessary this to write unto you, whereby all such errors and opinions being removed, which in Our former Letters (being sent unto you in the behalf of the Christians) are contained, and which seem very undiscreet and contrary to our clemency, may be made frustrate and annihilate. Now therefore firmly and freely We will and command, that every man have a free liberty to observe the Christian Religion, and that without any grief or molestation he may be suffered to do the same. These things have we thought good to signifie unto you by as plain words as we may, that we have given to the Christians free and absolute power to keep and use their Religion. And for so much as this liberty is absolutely given of us unto them, to use and exercise their former observance, if any be disposed, it is manifest that the same helpeth much to establish the publick tranquility of our time, every man to have licence and liberty to use and choose what kind of worshipping he list himself. And this is done of us only for the intent, that We would have no man to be enforced to one Religion more than another. And this thing also amongst others We have provided for the Christians, that they may have again the possession of such places, in which heretofore they have been accustomed to make their Assemblies: so that if any have bought or purchased the same either of us, or of any other; the same places without either money or other recompence, forthwith and without delay We will to be restored again unto the said Christians. And if any man have obtained the same by gift from Us, and shall require any recompence to be made to them in that behalf, then let the Christians repair to the President (being the Judge appointed for that place) that consideration may be had of those men by Our benignity: All which things We will and command that you see to be given and restored freely, and with diligence, unto the society of the Christians, all delay set apart. And because the Christians themselves are understood to have had not only those places wherein they were accustomed to resort together, but certain other peculiar places also, not being private to any one man, but belonging to the right of their Congregation and Sonety: you shall see also all those to be restored unto the Christians, that is to say, to every fellowship and company of them, according to the Decree, whereof We have made mention, all delay set apart, Provided that the Order We have taken in the mean time be observed, that if any (taking no recompence) shall restore the same Lands and Possessions, they shall not mistrust, but be sure to be saved harmless by Us. In all these things it shall be your part to imploy your diligence in the behalf of the foresaid company of the Christians, whereby this our Commandment may speedily be accomplished, and also in this case by Our Clemency the common and publick peace may be preserved. For undoubtedly by this means, as before We have said, the good will and favour of God towards Us (whereof in many cases We have had good experience) shall always continue with us. And to the intent that this Our Constitution may be notified to all men, it shall be requisite that the Copy of these Our Letters be set up in all places, that Men may read and know the same, lest any should be ignorant thereof.

By these Histories I doubt not (good Reader) but thou dost right well consider and behold with thy self the marvellous working of Gods mighty power; to see so many Emperors at one time conspired and confederate together against the Lord and Christ his anointed, whose Names before we have recited, as Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maxentius, Maximinus, Severus, Licinius, who having the subjection of the whole World under their Dominion, did bend and extend their whole might and devices, to extirpate the Name of Christ, and of all Christians. Wherein if the power of Man could have prevailed, what could they not do? or what could they do more than they did? If policy or devices could have served, what policy was there lacking? If torments or pains of death could have helped, what cruelty of torment by man could be invented, which was not attempted? If Laws, Edicts, Proclamations, written not only in Tables, but ingraven in brass, could have stood, all this was practised against the weak Christians. And yet notwithstanding, to see how no counsel can stand against the Lord, note here how all these be gone, and yet Christ and his Church doth stand. First, of the taking away of Maximinian you have heard, also of the death of Severus, of the drowning moreover of Maxentius, enough hath been said. What a terrible Plague was upon Galerius, consuming his Privy Members with Lice, hath been also described. How Diocletian the the Quondam being at Salona, hearing of the proceedings of Conſtantinus, and this Edict, either for ſorrow died, or as ſome ſay, did poyſon himſelf. Only Maximinus now in the Eaſt parts remained alive, who bare a deadly hatred againſt the Chriſtians, and no leſs expreſſed the ſame with mortal Perſecution, to whom Conſtantine and Licinius cauſed this Conſtitution of theirs to be delivered. At the ſight whereof although he was ſomewhat appaled, and defeated of his purpoſe: yet for ſo much as he ſaw himſelf too weak to reſiſt the authority of Conſtantinus and Licinius the ſuperiour Princes, he diſſembled his counterfeit piety, as though he himſelf had tendered the quiet of the Chriſtians, directing down a certain Decree in the behalf of the Chriſtians, wherein he pretendeth to write to Sabinus aforementioned, firſt repeating unto him the former Decree of Diocleſian and Maximinian in few words, with the commandment therein contained touching the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians. After that, he reciteth the Decree which he himſelf made againſt them, when he came firſt to the Emperial Dignity in the Eaſt part joyned with Conſtantinus. Then the countermand of another Decree of his again, for the reſcuing of the Chriſtians, with ſuch feigned and pretenſed cauſes, as is in the ſame to be ſeen. After that, he declareth how he coming to Nicomedia, at the ſuit and ſupplication of the Citizens (which he alſo feigned, as may appear before) he applying to their ſuit, revoked that his former Edict, and granted them that no Chriſtian ſhould dwell within their City or Territories. Upon which Sabinus alſo had given forth his Letters, rehearſing withal the general countermand ſent forth by him, for the Perſecution again of the Chriſtians. Laſt of all now he ſendeth down again another ſurrecountermand, with the cauſes therein contained, touching the ſafety of the Chriſtians, and tranquility of them: commanding Sabinus to publiſh the ſame. Which Edict of his is at large ſet forth of Euſebius lib. 9. cap. 9. But this ſurrecountermand he then diſſembled, as he had done in the other before. Howbeit ſhortly after, he making Wars, and fighting a Battel with Licinius, wherein he loſt the Victory, coming home again, took great indignation againſt the Prieſts and Prophets of his Gods, whom before that time he had great regard unto, and honoured: upon whoſe anſwers he truſting, and depending upon their inchantments, began his War againſt Licinius. But after that he perceived himſelf to be deceived by them, as by wicked inchanters and deceivers, and ſuch as had betrayed his ſafety and perſon, he killed and put them to death. And he ſhortly after, oppreſſed with a certain diſeaſe, glorified the God of the Chriſtians, and made a moſt abſolute law for the ſafety and preſervation of them, with franchiſe and liberty: the Copy whereof enſueth:

IMperator Cæſar, Gaius, Valerius, Maximinus, Germanicus, Pius, Fortunatus, Auguſtus, It is neceſſary that We always carefully provide and ſee unto the benefit and commodity of ſuch as be Our Subjects, and to exhibite ſuch things unto them, whereby they may beſt obtain the ſame. But we ſuppoſe that there are none of you ſo ignorant, but know and underſtand what things make beſt for the profit and commodity of the Commonweal, and beſt pleaſe every mans diſpoſition. But it is meet and convenient that every man have recourſe to that which they have ſeen done before their eyes, and that all ſorts of men conſider the ſame, and bear it in their minds. When therefore, and that before this time, it came to our knowledge, upon the occaſion that Dioceſianus, and Maximinianus, our progenitors of famous memory, commanded the Aſſemblies and Meetings of the Chriſtians to be cut off, there were many of them ſpoiled and robbed of our Officials; which thing we alſo perceive is now put in practice againſt our Subjects, that they in like caſe may be ſpoyled of their Goods and Subſtance, which thing chiefly to prevent is our only endeavour. By our Letters ſent to the Governors of our Province the year paſt, we ordained, that if any man were diſpoſed to lean unto the Chriſtian Religion, he might without any injury done unto him, accompliſh his deſire, neither to be of any man either let or moleſted, and that he might without any fear or ſuſpicion, do whatſoever he therein thought good. But now alſo we underſtand that there be certain Judges which have neglected our commandment, and have put Our Subjects in doubt, whether that hath been Our pleaſure or not; which thing they did, that ſuch men might be the better adviſed, how they entred into ſuch Religion: wherein they followed their own phantaſie. To the intent therefore, that after this, all ſuſpicion, doubt and fear may be taken away: We have thought good to publiſh this our Edict, whereby it may be made manifeſt to every man, that it ſhall be lawful for all ſuch as will follow that Religion, by the benefit of this Our Grant and Letters Patents, to uſe what Religion they like beſt: And alſo hereby we grant to them licence to build them Oratories or Temples. And furthermore, that this Our Grant may more amply extend unto them, We vouchſafe to Appoint and Ordain, That whatſoever Lands and Subſtance before belonging and appertaining to the Chriſtians, and by the commandment of our Predeceſſor were tranſpoſed to our Revenue and Exchequer, or elſe be in the poſſeſſion of any City by means of the franchiſes of the ſame, or elſe otherwiſe ſold or given to any man: All and every parcel thereof We command ſhall be reſtored unto the proper uſe of the Chriſtians again, whereby they may all have in this matter more experience of our godly devotion and providence. Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 10.

Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 10.

Maximinus then being conquered of Licinius, and alſo plagued with an incurable Diſeaſe in the Guts, ſent by the hand of God, was compelled by torments and adverſity to confeſs the true God, whom before he regarded not, and to write this Edict in the favour of thoſe Chriſtians whom before he did perſecute. Thus the Lord doth make many times his enemies, be they never ſo ſtern and ſtout, at length to ſtoop, and mauger their hearts to confeſs him, as this Maximinus here did, who not long after, by the vehemency of his Diſeaſe ended his life. Whereby no more Tyrants now were left alive, to trouble the Church, but only Licinius. Of which Licinius and of his Perſecutions ſtirred up in the Eaſt parts againſt the Saints of God, now remaineth in order of ſtory to proſecute.

Anno 319. God maketh his enemies to confeſs him.

The end and death of Maximinus.

This Licinius being a Dane born, and made firſt Ceſar by Galerius, as is above ſpecified, was afterwards joyned with Conſtantinus in government of the Empire, and in ſetting forth the Edicts, which before we have deſcribed: although it ſeemeth all this to be done of him with a diſſembling mind. For ſo is he in all Hiſtorys deſcribed, to be a man paſſing all others in deſire of inſatiable riches, given to lechery, haſty, ſtubborn and furious. To Learning he was ſuch an enemy, that he named the ſame a poyſon and a common peſtilence, and eſpecially the knowledge of the Laws. He thought no Vice worſe became a Prince than Learning, becauſe he himſelf was unlearned. Eutropius, Lætus, Ignatius, Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

The Perſecution of the Church under Licinius.

An enemy to learning.

Euſeb. lib 8. cap. 13.

There was between him and Conſtantinus in the beginning great familiarity, and ſuch agreement, that Conſtantinus gave unto him his Siſter Conſtantia in Matrimony, as Aurelius Victor writeth. Neither would any man have thought him to have been of any other Religion than Conſtantinus was of, he ſeemed in all things ſo well to agree with him. Whereupon he made a Decree with Conſtantinus, in the behalf of the Chriſtians, as we have ſhewed: Euſebius lib. 9. cap. 9. And ſuch was Licinius in the beginning; but after arming himſelf with Tyranny, began to conſpire againſt the perſon of Conſtantinus, of whom he had received ſo great benefits; neither favourable to the law of Nature, nor mindful of his Oaths, his Blood, nor promiſes. But when he conſidered that in his Conſpiracies he nothing prevailed, for that he ſaw Conſtantinus was preſerved and ſafely defended of God: and partly being puffed up with the Victory againſt Maximinus, he began vehemently to hate him, and not only to reject the Chriſtian Religion, but alſo deadly to hate the ſame. He ſaid he would become an enemy to the Chriſtians, for that in their Aſſemblies and Meetings they prayed not for him, but for Conſtantinus. Therefore firſt by little and little, and that ſecretly, he went about to wrong and hurt the Chriſtians, and baniſhed them his Court, which never were by any means prejudicial to his Kingdom. Then he commanded that all thoſe ſhould be deprived which were Knights of the honourable Order, unleſs they would do do ſacrifice to Devils: Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 8. The ſame Perſecution afterward ſtretched he from his Court, into all his Provinces, which with moſt wicked and deviſed laws he ſet forth. Firſt, that for no cauſe the Biſhops ſhould in any matter communicate together: neither that any man ſhould come at the Churches next unto them, or to call any aſſemblies, and conſult for the neceſſary matters and utility of the Church.

After, that the Men and Women together ſhould not come in companies to pray, nor that the Women ſhould come in thoſe places where they uſed to preach and read the Word of God, neither that they ſhould be after that inſtructed any more of the Biſhop, but ſhould chooſe out ſuch Women amongſt them as ſhould inſtruct them. The third moſt cruel and wickedeſt of all was, that none ſhould help and ſuccour thoſe that were caſt in priſon, nor ſhould beſtow any Alms or Charity upon them, though they ſhould die for hunger; and they which ſhewed any compaſſion upon thoſe that were condemned to death, ſhould be as greatly puniſhed, as they to whom they ſhewed the ſame ſhould be. Euſebius libro primo de vita Conſtantini. Theſe were the moſt horrible Conſtitutions of Licinius, which went beyond and paſſed the bounds of nature.

Secret perſecution for fear of Conſtantine.

After this he uſed violence againſt the Biſhops, but yet not openly, for fear of Conſtantinus, but privily and by conſpiracy, by which means he ſlew thoſe that were the worthieſt men amongſt the Doctors and Prelates. And about Amaſea and other Cities of Pontus, he raced the Churches even with the ground. Otherſome he ſhut up, that no man ſhould come after their accuſtomed manner to pray and worſhip God; and therefore, as we ſaid before, his Conſcience accuſing him, all this he did, for that he ſuſpected they prayed for Conſtantinus, and not at all for him. And from this place in the Eaſt parts to the Lybians, which bordered upon the Egyptians, the Chriſtians durſt not aſſemble and come together for the diſpleaſure of Licinius: which he had conceived againſt them. Sozomenus lib. 1. cap. 2.

Sozomenus, lib. 1. cap. 2.

Furthermore, the flattering Officers that were under him, thinking by this means to pleaſe him, ſlew and made out of the way many Biſhops, and without any cauſe put them to death, as though they had been homicides and heinous offenders; and ſuch rigorouſneſs uſed they towards ſome of them, that they cut their bodies into gobbets and ſmall pieces in manner of a Butcher, and after that threw them into the Sea to feed the Fiſhes, Euſebius lib. 10. cap. 8. What ſhall we ſpeak of the exiles and confiſcations of good and vertuous Men? For he took by violence every mans ſubſtance, and cared not by what means he came by the ſame; but threatned them with death, unleſs they would forgo the ſame. He baniſhed thoſe which had committed none evil at all. He commanded that both Gentlemen and Men of Honour ſhould be made out of the way; neither yet herewith content, but gave their daughters that were unmarried to Varlets and wicked ones to be defloured. And Licinius himſelf (although that by reaſon of his years his body was ſpent) yet ſhamefully did he vitiate many Women, Mens Wives and Maids. Euſeb. lib. 1. de vita Conſtantini. Which cruel outrage of him cauſed many godly men of their own accord to forſake their houſes; and it was alſo ſeen, that the Woods, Fields, deſert places and Mountains were faign to be the habitations and reſting-places of the poor and miſerable Chriſtians. Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 4. Of thoſe worthy men and famous Martyrs which in this Perſecution found the way to Heaven, Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 10. firſt ſpeaketh of Theodorus, who firſt being hanged upon the Croſs, had Nails thruſt into his Arm-pits, and after that, his head ſtricken off. Alſo of another Theodorus being the Biſhop of Tyre; the third was a man of Perga; Baſilius alſo the Biſhop of Amaſemus, Nicholaus the Biſhop of Mirorus, Gregorius of Armenia the great; after that Paul of Neoceſarea, which by the impious commandment of Licinius, had both his hands cut off with a fearing iron. Beſides theſe were in the City of Sebaſtia forty worthy men, and Chriſtian Souldiers in the vehement cold time of Winter ſowſed and drowned in a Horſe-Pond, whom Locias as yet, of whom we ſpoke before, and Agricolaus executing the Sheriffs office under Licinius in the Eaſt parts, were alive, and were in great eſtimation, for inventing of new and ſtrange torments againſt the Chriſtians. The Wives of thoſe forty good men were carried to Heraclea a City in Thracia, and there, with a certain Deacon whoſe name was Amones, were (after innumerable torments by them moſt conſtantly indured) ſlain with the ſword. Theſe things writeth Nicephorus. Alſo Sozomenus in his ninth Book and ſecond Chapter maketh mention of the ſame Martyrs. And Baſilius in a certain Oration ſeemeth to intreat of their Hiſtory, ſaving that in the circumſtances he ſomewhat varieth. And ſurely Licinius was determined, for that the firſt face of this Perſecution fell out according to his deſire, to have overrun all the Chriſtians, to which thing neither counſel, nor good will, nor yet opportunity perchance wanted, unleſs God had brought Conſtantinus into thoſe parts where he governed, where, in the Wars which he himſelf began (knowing right well that Conſtantinus had intelligence of his Conſpiracy and Treaſon) joyning Battel with him he was overcome.

Licinius overcome in Battel by Conſtantine.

Thus have ye heard the end and concluſion of all the ſeven Tyrants which were the authors and workers of this tenth and laſt Perſecution againſt the true People of God. The chief Captain and incentor of which Perſecution was firſt Diocleſian, who died at Salena, as ſome ſay, by his own poyſon in the year of our Lord three hundred and nineteen. The next was Maximinian, who (as is ſaid) was hanged of Conſtantine at Maſilia, about the year of our Lord three hundred and ten. Then died Galerius, plagued with an horrible Diſeaſe ſent of God. Severus was ſlain by Maximinian, father of Maxentius the wicked Tyrant, who was overcome and vanquiſhed of Conſtantine, in the year of our Lord three hundred and eighteen. Maximinus the ſixth Tyrant not long after, who being overcome by Licinius, died about the year of our Lord three hundred and twenty. Laſtly, how this Licinius was overcome by Conſtantine and ſlain, in the year of our Lord, Three hundred twenty and four, is before declared. Only Conſtantius the Father of Conſtantine being a good and a godly Emperor, died in the third year of the Perſecution, in the year of our Lord Three hundred and ten, and was buried at York. After whom ſucceeded after his godly Father Conſtantinus, as a ſecond Moſes ſent and ſet up of God to deliver his people out of this ſo miſerable captivity, into liberty moſt joyful.

The end & death of the Tyrants which were the authors of this Tenth perſecution.

Now remaineth after the end of theſe Perſecutors thus deſcribed, to gather up the names and ſtories of certain particular Martyrs, which now are to be ſet forth worthy of ſpecial memory, for their ſingular conſtancy and fortitude, ſhewed in their ſufferings and cruel torments. The names of all which that ſuffered in this foreſaid tenth Perſecution, being in number infinite, in vertue moſt excellent, it is impoſſible here to comprehend; but the moſt notable, and in moſt approved Authors expreſſed, we thought here to inſert, for the more edification of other Chriſtians, which may and ought to look upon their examples, firſt beginning with Albanus, the firſt Martyr that ever in England ſuffered death for the name of Chriſt.

A brief ſtory of the moſt notable Martyrs that ſuffered in this Tenth Perſecution.

At what time Diocleſian and Maximinian the Pagan Emperors had directed out their Letters with all ſeverity for the perſecuting of the Chriſtians; Alban being then an Infidel, received into his houſe a certain Clerk, flying from the Perſecutors hands, whom when Alban beheld, continually both day and night to perſevere in, watching and prayer, ſuddenly by the great mercy of God, he began to imitate the example of his faith and vertuous life; whereupon by little and little he being inſtructed by his wholeſome exhortation, and leaving the blindneſs of his Idolatry, became at length a perfect Chriſtian. And when the forenamed Clerk had lodged with him a certain time, it was informed the wicked Prince, that this good man and Confeſſor of Chriſt (not yet condemned to death) was harbour'd in Albans houſe, or very near unto him. Whereupon immediately he gave in charge to the Souldiers to make more diligent inquiſition of the matter. Who as ſoon as they came to the houſe of Alban the Martyr, he by and by putting on the apparel wherewith his gueſt and maſter was appa-relled (that is, a garment at that time uſed, named Caracalla) offered himſelf in the ſtead of the other to the ſouldiers; who binding him, brought him forthwith to the Judge. It fortuned that at that inſtant when bleſſed Alban was brought unto the Judge, they found the ſame Judge at the Altars offering ſacrifice unto Devils, who as ſoon as he ſaw Alban, was ſtraight ways in a great rage, for that he would preſume of his own voluntary will, to offer himſelf to peril, and give himſelf a Priſoner to the Soldiers, for ſafeguard of his gueſt whom he harboured, and commanded him to be brought before the images of the Devils whom he worſhipped ſaying, For that thou hadſt rather hide and convey away a Rebel, than to deliver him to the Officers, and that (as a contemner of our Gods) he ſhould not ſuffer puniſhment and merit of his blaſphemy; look what puniſhment he ſhould have had, thou for him ſhalt ſuffer the ſame, if I perceive thee any whit to revolt from our manner of worſhipping. But bleſſed Alban, who of his own accord had bewrayed to the Perſecutors that he was a Chriſtian, feared not at all the menaces of the Prince, but being armed with the ſpiritual armour, openly pronounced that he would not obey his commandment. Then ſaid the Judge, Of what ſtock or kindred art thou come? Alban anſwered, What is that to you? of what ſtock ſoever I came of, if you deſire to hear the verity of my Religion, I do ye to wit, that I am a Chriſtian, and apply my ſelf altogether to that calling. Then ſaid the Judge, I would know thy name, and ſee thou tell me the ſame without delay. Then ſaid he, My Parents named me Alban, and I worſhip the true and living God, which hath created all the World. Then ſaid the Judge, fraught with fury, If thou wilt enjoy the felicity of this preſent life, do ſacrifice (and that out of hand) to theſe mighty Gods: Alban replieth, Theſe Sacrifices which ye offer unto Devils, can neither help them that offer the ſame, neither yet can they accompliſh the deſires and prayers of their ſuppliants; but rather ſhall they, whatſoever they be, that offer Sacrifice to theſe Idols, receive for their meed everlaſting pains of Hell fire. The Judge when he heard theſe words, was paſſing angry, and commanded the tormentors to whip this holy Confeſſor of God, endeavouring to overcome the conſtancy of his heart with ſtripes, which had prevailed nothing with words. And when he was cruelly beaten, yet ſuffered he the ſame patiently, nay, rather joyfully for the Lords ſake. Then when the Judge ſaw that he would not with torments be overcome, nor be reduced from the worſhip of Chriſtian Religion, he commanded him to be beheaded.

The reſt that followeth of this ſtory in the narration of Beda, as of drying up the River, as Alban went to the place of his execution; then of making a Well-ſpring in the top of the Hill, and of the falling out of the eyes of him that did behead him (with ſuch other prodigious Miracles mentioned in his ſtory) becauſe they ſeem more Legend-like than Truth-like; again, becauſe I ſee no great profit nor neceſſity in the relation thereof, I leave them to the free judgment of the Reader, to think of them as cauſe ſhall move him.

Superfluous Miracles in his ſtory written by Beda omitted.

The like eſtimation I have of the long ſtory, wherein is written at large, a fabulous diſcourſe of all the doings and Miracles of St. Alban, taken out of the Library of St. Albans, compiled (as there is ſaid) by a certain Pagan, who (as he ſaith) afterward went to Rome, there to be baptiſed. But becauſe in the beginning or Prologue of the Book, the ſaid Writer maketh mention of the ruinous Walls of the Town of Verolamium, containing the ſtory of Albanus, and of his bitter puniſhments; which Walls were then falling down for age, at the writing of the ſaid Book, as he ſaith; thereby it ſeemeth this ſtory to be written a great while after the Martyrdom of Alban, either by a Britain, or by an Engliſh man. If he were a Britain, how then did the Latine Tranſlation take it out of the Engliſh Tongue, as in the Prologue he himſelf doth teſtifie: If he were an Engliſh man, how then did he go up to Rome for Baptiſm, being a Pagan, when he might have been baptiſed among the Chriſtian Britains more near at home.

The legend of St. Alban diſproved.

But among all other evidences and declarations ſufficient to diſprove this Legendary Story of Saint Alban, nothing maketh more againſt it, than the very ſtory it ſelf: as where he bringeth in the head of the holy Martyr to ſpeak unto the people after it was ſmitten off from the body. Alſo where he bringeth in the Angels going up, and coming down in a Pillar of Fire, and ſinging all the night long. Item, in the River which he ſaith St. Alban made dry, ſuch as were drowned in the ſame before in the bottom were found alive. With other ſuch like Monkiſh-Miracles and groſs fables, wherewith theſe Abby-Moniks were wont in times paſt to deceive the Church of God, and to beguile the whole World for their own advantage. Notwithſtanding this I write not to any derogation of the bleſſed and faithful Martyr of God, who was the firſt that I did ever find in this Realm, to ſuffer Martyrdom for the teſtimony of Chriſt. And worthy no doubt of condign condemnation, eſpecially of us here in this Land; whoſe Chriſtian Faith in the Lord, and Charity towards his neighbour, I pray God all we may follow. As alſo I wiſh moreover, that the ſtories both of him, and of all other Chriſtian Martyrs might have been delivered to us ſimple as they were, without the admixture of all theſe Abbey-like additions of Monkiſh-Miracles, wherewith they were wont to paint out the glory of ſuch Saints to the end by whoſe offerings they were accuſtomed to receive moſt advantage.

St. Alban the firſt Martyr in this Realm of England.

The ſtories of the Saints corrupted with lies.

As touching the name of the Clerk mentioned in this ſtory, whom Alban received into his houſe, I find in the Engliſh ſtories to be Amphibalus, although the Latine Authors name him not, who the ſame time flying into Wales, was alſo fetcht from thence again to the ſame Town of Verolamium, otherwiſe called Verlancaſter, where he was Martyred, having his belly opened, and made to run about a ſtake, while all his bowels were drawn out, then thruſt in with ſwords and daggers; and at laſt was ſtoned to death, as the foreſaid Legend declareth.

The Martyrdom of Amphibalus

Moreover the ſame time with Alban ſuffered alſo two Citizens of the aforeſaid City of Verlancaſter, whoſe names were Aaron and Julius; beſide others, whereof a great number the ſame time no doubt, did ſuffer, although our Chronicles of their names do make no rehearſal.

Aaron, Julius Martyrs.

The time of Martyrdom of this bleſſed Alban and the other, ſeemeth to be about the ſecond or third year of this Tenth Perſecution, under the Tyranny of Diocleſian, and Maximinianus Herculius, bearing then the rule in England, about the year of our Lord three hundred and one, before the coming of Conſtantius to his Government. Where, by the way is to be noted, that this Realm of Britain being ſo chriſtened before, yet never was touched with any other of the Nine Perſecutions, before this Tenth Perſecution of Diocleſian and Maximinian. In which Perſecution our ſtories and Polychronicon do record, that all Chriſtianity almoſt in the whole Iſland was deſtroyed, the Churches ſubverted, all Books of the Scripture burned, many of the faithful, both Men and Women were ſlain; among whom the firſt and chief Ring-leader (as hath been ſaid) was Albanus. And thus much touching the Martyrs of Britain. Now from England to return again unto other Countries, where this Perſecution did more vehemently rage; we will add hereunto (the Lord willing) the ſtories of others, although not of all that ſuffered in this Perſecution, (which were impoſſible) but of certain moſt principal, whoſe ſingular conſtancy in their ſtrong torments are chiefly renowned in later Hiſtories; beginning firſt with Romanus the notable and admirable Souldier and true Servant of Chriſt, whoſe Hiſtory ſet forth in Prudentius, doth thus proceed; ſo lamentably by him deſcribed, that it will be hard for any man almoſt with dry Cheeks to hear it.

Perſecution in this Realm of Britain.

Pitileſs Galerius with his grand Captain Aſclepiades violently invaded the City of Antioch, intending by force of Arms to drive all Chriſtians to renounce utterly their pure Religion. The Chriſtians, as God would, were at that time congregated together, to whom Romanus haſtily ran, declaring that the Wolves were at hand which would devour the Chriſtian Flock; But fear not, ſaid he, neither let this imminent peril diſturb you my brethren. Brought was it to paſs, by the great grace of God working in Romanus, that old Men and Matrons, Fathers and Mothers, young Men and Maidens were all of one will and mind, moſt ready to ſhed ther blood in defence of their Chriſtian profeſſion. Word was brought unto the Captain, that the band of armed ſouldiers was not able to wreſt the ſtaff of faith out of the hand of the armed congregation, and all by The exhortation of Romanus to the Chriſtians.

reaſon

reaſon that one Romanus ſo mightily did incourage them, that they ſtick not to offer their naked throats, wiſhing gloriouſly to die for the name of their Chriſt. Seek out that Rebel (quoth the Captain) and bring him to me that he may anſwer for the whole Sect. Apprehended he was, and bound as a Sheep appointed to the Slaughter-houſe, was preſented to the Emperor, who with wrathful countenance beholding him, ſaid, What? Art thou the Author of this Sedition? Art thou the cauſe why ſo many ſhall loſe their lives? By the Gods I ſweat thou ſhalt ſmart for it, and firſt in thy fleſh ſhalt thou ſuffer the pains, wherunto thou haſt incouraged the hearts of thy fellows. The Chriſtian boldneſs of Romanus. Romanus anſwered, Thy ſentence, O Emperor, I joyfully embrace, I refuſe not to be ſacrificed for my brethren and that by as cruel means as thou mayſt invent: and whereas thy Souldiers were repelled from the Chriſtian Congregation, that ſo hapned, becauſe it lay not in Idolaters and worſhippers of Devils, to enter into the holy houſe of God, and to pollute the place of true prayer. Then Aſclepiades, wholly inflamed with this ſtout anſwer, commanded him to be truſſed up, and his bowels drawn out. The Executioners themſelves more pitiful in heart than the Captain, ſaid, Not ſo, Sir, this man is of Noble Parentage, unlawful it is to put a Nobleman to ſo unnoble a death. Scourge him then with Whips (quoth the Captain) with knaps of lead at the ends. Inſtead of tears, ſighs and groans, Romanus ſung Pſalms all the time of his whipping, requiring them not to favour him for Nobility ſake; Not the blood of my Progenitors (ſaid he) but Chriſtian Profeſſion maketh me Noble. Then with great power of Spirit he inveighed againſt the Captain, laughing to ſcorn the falſe Gods of the Heathen, with the idolatrous worſhipping of them, affirming the God of the Chriſtians to be the true God that created Heaven and Earth, before whoſe Judicial Seat all Nations ſhall appear. But the wholeſome words of the Martyr were as oyl to the fire of the Captains fury. The more the Martyr ſpake, the madder was he, inſomuch that he commanded the Martyrs ſides to be lanced with Knives, until the bones appeared white again. Sorry am I, O Captain, (quoth the Martyr) not for that my fleſh ſhall be thus cut and mangled, but for thy cauſe am I ſorrowful, who being corrupted with damnable errors, ſeduceſt others. The ſecond time he preached at large the living God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt his welbeloved Son, eternal life through faith in his blood, expreſſing therewith the abomination of Idolatry, with a vehement exhortation to worſhip and adore the living God. At theſe words Aſclepiades commanded the tormentors to ſtrike Romanus on the mouth, that his teeth being ſtricken out, his pronunciation at leaſt wiſe might be impaired. The commandment was obeyed, his face buffeted, his Eye-lids torn with their Nails, his Cheeks ſcotched with Knives, the Skin of his Beard was plucked by little and little from the fleſh; finally, his ſeemly Face was wholly defaced. The meek Martyr ſaid, I thank thee O Captain, that thou haſt opened unto me many mouths, wherein I may preach my Lord and Saviour Chriſt. Look how many Wounds I have, ſo many Mouths I have lauding and praiſing God. The Captain aſtoniſhed with this ſingular conſtancy, commanded them to ceaſe from the tortures. He threatneth cruel fire, he revileth the noble Martyr, he blaſphemeth God, ſaying, Thy crucified Chriſt is but a yeſterdays God, the Gods of the Gentiles are of moſt antiquity.

The preaching of Romanus to the Captain.

Antiquity alledged of the Pagans.

Here again Romanus taking good occaſion, made a long Oration of the Eternity of Chriſt, of his Humane Nature, of the Death and Satisfaction of Chriſt for all Mankind. Which done, he ſaid, Give me a Child, O Captain, but ſeven years of age, which age is free from malice and other vices, wherewith riper age is commonly infected, and thou ſhalt hear what he will ſay. His requeſt was granted. A pretty boy was called out of the multitude, and ſet before him. Tell me my babe (quoth the Martyr) whether thou think it reaſon that we worſhip one Chriſt, and in Chriſt one Father, or elſe that we worſhip infinite Gods? Unto whom the Babe anſwered, That certainly, whatſoever it be that Men affirm to be God, muſt needs be one; which with one, is one and the ſame; and in as much as this one is Chriſt, of neceſſity Chriſt muſt be the true God; for that there be many Gods, we children cannot believe. The Captain hereat clean amazed, ſaid, Thou young Villain and Traitor, where, and of whom learnedſt thou this leſſon? Of my mother (quoth the child) with whoſe milk I ſucked in this Leſſon, that I muſt believe in Chriſt. The mother was called, and ſhe gladly appeared. The Captain commanded the Child to be horſed up and ſcourged. The pitiful beholders of this pitileſs act, could not temper themſelves from tears; the joyful and glad mother alone ſtood by with dry cheeks: yea ſhe rebuked her ſweet Babe for craving a draught of cold water, ſhe charged him to thirſt after the Cup that the infants of Bethlehem once drank of, forgetting their Mothers Milk and Paps; ſhe willed him to remember little Iſaac, who beholding the Sword wherewith, and the Altar whereon he ſhould be ſacrificed, willingly proffered his tender Neck to the dint of his Fathers Sword. Whilſt this counſel was in giving, the butcherly tormentor pluckt the ſkin from the Crown of his head hair and all. The Mother cried, Suffer my child, anon thou ſhalt paſs to him that will adorn thy naked head with a Crown of eternal glory. The mother counſelleth, the child is counſelled; the mother incourageth, the babe is incouraged, and received the ſtripes with ſmiling countenance. The Captain perceiving the Child invincible, and himſelf vanquiſhed, committeth the ſilly ſoul, the bleſſed babe, the child uncheriſhed, to the ſtinking Priſon, commanding the torments of Romanus to be renewed and increaſed, as chief author of this evil.

Thus was Romanus brought forth again to new ſtripes, the puniſhments to be renewed and received upon his old ſores, in ſo much as the bare bones appeared, the fleſh all torn away; wherein no pity was ſhewed, but the raging Tyrant puffing out of his blaſphemous mouth, like a mad-man theſe words, cried out to the tormentors, ſaying:

Where is (quoth the Captain) Where is your might?
What? are ye not able one body to ſpill?
Scant may it, ſo weak is it, ſtand upright:
And yet in ſpite of us, ſhall it live ſtill?

The cruel words of the Tyrant.

The Griph with Talen, the Dog with his Tooth,
Could ſoon, ye daſtards, this corps rent and tear:
He ſcorneth our Gods in all that he doth,
Cut, prick and pounce him, no longer forbear.

Yea, no longer could the Tyrant forbear, but needs he muſt draw nearer to the ſentence of death. Is it painful to thee (ſaith he) to tarry ſo long alive? A flaming fire, doubt thou not, ſhall be prepared for thee by and by, wherein thou and that boy, thy fellow of Rebellion ſhall be conſumed into aſhes. Romanus and the Babe were led to the place of execution. As they laid hands on Romanus, he looked back, ſaying, I appeal from this thy Tyranny, O Judge unjuſt, unto the righteous Throne of Chriſt that upright Judge; not becauſe I fear thy cruel torments and mercileſs handlings, but that thy judgments may be known to be cruel and bloody. Now when they were come to the place, the tormentors required the child of the mother, for ſhe had taken it up in her Arms; and ſhe only kiſſing it, delivered the Babe; Farewel, ſhe ſaid, my ſweet child. And as the Hangman applied his Sword to the babes neck, ſhe ſang on this manner:

The Chriſtian Child beheaded for confeſſing of Chriſt.

The innocents head being cut off, the mother wrapped it up in her garment, and laid it on her breaſt. On the other ſide a mighty fire was made, whereinto Romanus was caſt, who ſaid that he ſhould not burn: wherewith a great ſtorm aroſe (if it be true) and quenched the fire. The Captain gave in commandment that his Tongue ſhould be cut out. Out was it plucked by the hard roots and cut off: nevertheleſs he ſpake, ſaying, He that ſpeaketh Chriſt, ſhall never want a tongue; think not that the voice that uttereth Chriſt, hath need of the tongue to be the Miniſter. The Captain at this, half out of his Wit, bare in hand that the Hang-man deceived the ſight of the People by ſome ſubtil ſleight and craſty conveyance. Not so (quoth the Hangman) if you suspect my deed, open his mouth and diligently search the roots of his tongue. The Captain at length being confounded with the fortitude and courage of the Martyr, straitly commanded him to be brought back into the prison, and there to be strangled. Where his sorrowful life and pains being ended, he now enjoyeth quiet rest in the Lord, with perpetual hope of his miserable body to be restored again, with his soul, into a better life, where no Tyrant shall have any power: Prudentius in hymnis de coronis Martyrum.

The story of Gordius a Centurion Martyr.

Gordius was a Citizen of Cesarea, a worthy Souldier, and Captain of an hundred men. He in the time of extream Persecution, refusing any longer to execute his charge, did choose of his own accord willing exile, and lived in the desert many years a religious and a solitary life. But upon a certain day, when a solemn Feast of Mars was celebrated in the City of Cesarea, and much People were assembled in the Theater to behold the Games, he left the desert and got him up into the chief place of the Theater, and with a loud voice uttered this saying of the Apostle, Behold I am found of them which sought me not, and to those which asked not for me have I openly appeared. By which words he let it to be understood, that of his own accord he came unto those Games. At this noise, the multitude little regarding the sights, looked about to see who it was that made such exclamation. As soon as it was known to be Gordius, and that the Crier had commanded silence, he was brought unto the Sheriff, who at that instant was present, and ordained the Games. When he was asked the question who he was, from whence, and for what occasion he came thither, he telleth the truth of every thing as it was; I am come, saith he, to publish, that I set nothing by your Decrees against the Christian Religion, but that I profess Jesus Christ to be my hope and safety; and when I understood with what cruelty he handled other men. I took this as a fit time to accomplish my desire. The Sheriff with these words was greatly moved, and revengeth all his displeasure upon poor Gordius, commanding the executioners to be brought out with scourges, while Gibbet, and whatsoever torments else might be devised. Whereunto Gordius answered, saying, that it should be to him an hinderance and damage, if he could not suffer and endure divers torments and punishments for Christ his cause. The Sheriff being more offended with his boldness commanded him to feel as many kind of torments as there were. With all which, Gordius, notwithstanding could not be mastered or overcome; but lifting up his eyes unto Heaven, singeth this saying out of the Psalms, The Lord is my helper, I will not fear the thing that man can do to me: and also this saying, I will fear none evil, because thou Lord art with me.

Gordius of his own accord uttered himself to be a Christian.

The bold courtancy, and courageous spirit of Gordius.

Gordius attempted with fair promises and good gifts.

After this, he against himself provoketh the extremity of the tormentors, and blameth them if they favour him any thing at all. When the Sheriff saw that hereby he could win but little he goeth about by gentleness and inticing words, to turn the stout and valiant mind of Gordius. He promiseth to him great and large offers if he will deny Christ; as to make him a Captain of as many men as any other is, to give him riches, treasure, and what other thing soever he desireth. But in vain (as the Proverb is) pipeth the Minstrel to him that hath no ears to hear, for he deriding the foolish madness of the Magistrate saith, that it lieth not in him to place any in authority, which be worthy to have a place in Heaven. The Magistrate with these words throughly angred and vexed, prepared himself to his condemnation. Whom after that he had condemned, he caused to be had out of the City to be burnt. There run out of the City great multitudes by heaps to see him put to execution, some take him in their arms, and lovingly kiss him, persuading him to take a better way, and save himself, and that with weeping tears. To whom Gordius answered, Weep not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which always make War against the Christians; weep, I say, for them which prepare for us a fire, purchasing Hell fire for themselves in the day of vengeance; and cease off further, I pray you, to molest and disquiet my settled mind. Truly (saith he) I am ready for the name of Christ, to suffer and endure a thousand deaths if need were. Some other came unto him, which persuaded him to deny Christ with his mouth, and to keep his Conscience to himself.

A subtil kind of disswaders.

My tongue (saith he) which by the goodness of God I have, cannot be brought to deny the author and giver of the same; for with the heart we believe unto righteousness, and with the tongue we confess unto salvation. Many more such like words he spake; but especially uttering to them such matter, whereby he might perswade the beholders to death, and to the desire of Martyrdom. After all which, with a merry and glad countenance, never changing so much as his colour, he willingly gave himself to be burnt. Basilius in sermone in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

Not much unlike to the story of Gordius is the story also of Menas an Egyptian, who being likewise a Souldier by his profession, in this Persecution of Diocletian forsook all, and went into the desert, where a long time he gave himself to abstinence, watching and meditation of the Scriptures. At length returning again to the City Cotis, there in the open Theater, as the people were occupied upon their Spectacles or Pastimes, he with a loud voice openly proclaimed himself to be a Christian, and upon the same was brought to Pyrrhus the President; of whom he being demanded of his faith, made this answer, Convenient it is that I should (saith he) confess God, in whom is light and no darkness, forsomuch as Paul doth teach that with heart we believe to righteousness, with Mouth confession is given to salvation. After this the innocent Martyr was most painfully pinched and cruciat with sundry punishments. In all which notwithstanding he declared a constant heart, and faith invincible, having these words in his mouth being in the midst of his torments: There is nothing in my mind that can be compared to the Kingdom of Heaven; neither is all the World, if it were weighed in ballance, able to be conferred with the price of one soul; and said, who is able to separate us from the love of Jesus Christ our Lord? shall affliction or anguish? And moreover, (said he) I have thus learned of my Lord and my King, not to fear them which kill the body and have no power to kill the soul, but to fear him rather, who hath power to destroy both body and soul in Hell fire. To make the story short, after manifold torments born of him, and suffered, when the last sentence of death was upon him pronounced, which was to be beheaded; Menas being then had to the place of Execution, said, I give thee thanks my Lord God, which hast so accepted me to be found a partaker of thy precious death, and hast not given me to be devour'd of my fierce enemies, but hast made me to remain constant in thy pure faith unto this my later end. And so this blessed Souldier fighting valiantly under the Banner of Christ, lost his head, and won his soul. Simeon Metaphrast. tom. 5. Basilius in a certain Sermon of forty Martyrs rehearseth this Story, not unworthy to be noted. There came (saith he) into a certain plain (of which place he maketh no mention) the Emperors Marshal or Officer, with the Edict which the Emperor had set out against the Christians, that whosoever confessed Christ, should after many torments suffer death. And first they did privily suborn certain which should detect and accuse the Christians whom they had found out, or had laid wait for. Upon this the Sword, the Gibbet, the Wheel, and the Whips were brought forth; at the terrible sight whereof, the hearts of all the beholders did shake and tremble. Some for fear did flie, some did stand in doubt what to do; certain were so terrified at the beholding of these Engines, and tormenting instruments, that they denied their faith. Some others began the Game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agony of Martyrdom but vanquished at length, by the intolerable pain of their torments, made shipwrack of their consciences, and lost the glory of their confession. Among others, forty there were at that time, young Gentlemen, all Souldiers, which after the Marshal had shewed the Emperors Edict, and required of all men the obedience of the same, freely and boldly of their own accord confessed themselves to be Christians, and declared to him their names. The Marshal somewhat amazed at this their boldness of speech, standeth in doubt what was best to do. Yet forthwith he goeth about to win them with fair words, advertising them to consider their youth, neither that they should change a sweet and pleasant life, for a cruel and untimely death: after after that he promiseth them Money and honourable Offices in the Emperors name. But they little esteeming all these things, brake forth into a long and bold Oration, affirming that they did neither desire life, dignity, nor money, but only the Celestial Kingdom of Christ, saying further, that they are ready for the love and faith they have in God, to endure the affliction of the Wheel, the Cross and the Fire. The rude Marshal being herewith offended, devised a new kind of punishment. He spied out in the middle of the City a certain great Pond, which lay full upon the cold Northern Wind, for it was in the Winter-time, wherein he caused them to be put all that Night; but they being merry, and comforting one another, received this their appointed punishment, and said, as they were putting off their Cloaths: We put off (said they) now not our Cloaths, but we put off the old man, corrupt with the deceit of Concupiscence; We give thee thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparel we may also put off by thy grace the sinful man; for by means of the Serpent we once put him on, and by the means of Jesus Christ we now put him off. When they had thus said, they were brought naked into the place where they left most vehement cold, insomuch that all the parts of their bodies were stark and stiff therewith. Assoon as it was day, they yet having breath, were brought into the fire, wherein they were consumed, and their ashes thrown into the flood. By chance there was one of the company more lively, and not so near dead as the rest, of whom the Executioners taking pity, said unto his Mother standing by, that they would save his life. But she, with her own hands taking up her Son, brought him to the Pile of Wood, where the residue of his fellows (crooked for cold) did lie ready to be burnt, and admonished him to accomplish the blessed journey he had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

In this fellowship and company of Martyrs cannot be left out and forgot the story of Cyrus. This Cyrus was a Physician born in Alexandria, which flying into Egypt, in the Persecution of Diocletian and Maximian, led a solitary life in Arabia, being much spoken of for his Learning and Miracles, unto whose company after a certain time did Joannes born in the City of Edessa, beyond the River Euphrates, joyn himself, leaving the souldiers life which before that time he had exercised. But whilst as yet the same Persecution raged in a City in Egypt called Canope, there was cast into Prison for the confession of their faith, a certain godly Christian woman, called Athanasia, and her three daughters, Theoctiste, Theodota and Eudoxia; with whom Cyrus was well acquainted: at whose infirmities he much fearing, accompanied with his brother John, came and visited them for their better confirmation; at which time Lirianus was chief Captain and Lieutenant of Egypt, of whose wickedness and cruelty, especially against Women and Maidens, Athanasius maketh mention in his Apologies, and in his Epistle to those that lead a solitary life. This Cyrus therefore and Joannes, being accused and apprehended of the Heathen Men, as by whose perswasions the Maidens and Daughters of Athanasia contumeliously despised the Gods and the Emperors Religion, and could by no means be brought to do sacrifice, were after the publication of their constant confession put to death by the sword: Athanasia also and her three daughters being condemned to death. This History writeth Simeon Metaphrastes.

Sebastian being born in the part of France called Gallia Narbonensis, was a Christian, and was Lieutenant General of the Vaward of Diocletian the Emperor, who also encouraged many Martyrs of Christ by his exhortations unto constancy, and kept them in the faith. He being therefore accused to the Emperor, was commanded to be apprehended, and that he should be brought into the open field, where of his own souldiers he was thrust through the body with innumerable Arrows, and after that his body was thrown into a Jake or Sink. Ambrosius maketh mention of this Sebastian the Martyr in his Commentary upon the hundred and eighteenth Psalm; and Simeon Metaphrastes amongst other Martyrs that suffered with Sebastian numbreth also these following: Nicostratus with Zoe his Wife, Tranquillinus with Martia his Wife, Traglinus, Claudius, Castor, Tibertius, Castellus, Marcus and Marcellinus, with others more.

Basilius in another Sermon also maketh mention of one Barlaam, being a noble and famous Martyr, which abode all the torments of the Executioners even to the point of death; which thing when the Tormentors saw, they brought him and laid him upon the Altar, where they did use to offer sacrifices to their Idols, and put fire and frankincense into his right hand wherein he had yet some strength, thinking that the same his right hand, by the heat and force of the fire, would have scattered the burning Incense upon the Altar, and so have sacrificed. But of that their hope, the pestiferous tormentors were disappointed: for the flame eat round about his hand, and the same endured as though it had been covered with hot Embers, when as Barlaam recited out of the Psalms this saying: Blessed is the Lord my God, which teacheth my hands to fight.

Barlaam. What desired the Heathen had by some means to allure the Christians to offer sacrifice.

To this Narration of Basilius, touching the Martyrdom of Barlaam, we will annex consequently another story of Ambrose. He making a certain exhortation to certain Virgins, in the same Oration commendeth the Martyrdoms of Agricola and Vitalis, who suffered also in the same Persecution under Diocletian and Maximinian (as they affirm) at Bononny. This Vitalis was servant to Agricola, who both together between themselves had made a compact to give their lives with other Martyrs for the Name of Christ. Whereupon Vitalis being sent before of his Master, to offer himself to Martyrdom, fell first into the hands of Persecuters who laboured about him by all means to cause him to deny Christ. Which when he would in no case do, but stoutly persisted in the Confession of his Faith, they began to exercise him with all kind of torments, so unmercifully, that there was no whole skin left on all his body. So Vitalis, in the midst of the agony and painful torments, after he had in a short prayer commended himself to God, gave up his life. After him, the tormentors set upon Agricola his Master whose vertuous manners and gentle conditions, because they were singularly well liked, and known to the enemies, his suffering therefore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abiding the long delay and driving off, and provoking moreover the adversaries to quicker speed at length was fattened unto the Cross, and so finished his Martyrdom which he so long desired. Ambros. in exhortatione ad Virgines.

No less worthy of commemoration is the lamentable Martyrdom of Vincentius, whose History here followeth: This Vincentius was a Spaniard, and a Levite most godly and vertuous, who at this time suffered Martyrdom at Valence under Dacianus the President, as we may gather by Prudentius in his Hymn. Bergomensis in his supplement reciteth these words concerning his Martyrdom, out of a certain Sermon of St. Augustine. Our heart conceived not a vain and fruitless sight (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies) but certainly a great sight and marvellous, and there with singular pleasure received it, when the painful passion of victorious Vincentius was read unto us. Is there any so heavy hearted, that will not be moved in the contemplation of this immoveable Martyr, so manly, or rather so godly, fighting against the craft and subtilty of that Serpent, against the Tyranny of Dacianus, against the horrors of death, and by the mighty Spirit of his God conquering all? But let us in few words rehearse the degrees of his torments, though the pains thereof in many words cannot be expressed. First, Dacianus caused the Martyr to be laid upon the torture, and all the joynts of his body to be distended and racked out, until they crackt again. This being done in most extreme and cruel manner, all the members of his painful and pitiful body were grievously indented with deadly wounds. Thirdly, (that his dolours and griefs might be augmented) they miserably vexed his flesh with iron Combs sharply filed. And to the end the Tormentors might vomit out all their vengeance on the meek and mild Martyrs flesh, the tormentors themselves also were vilely scourged at the Presidents commandment. And lest his passion through want of pains might seem imperfect or else too easie, they laid his body, being all out of joynt, on a grate of iron, which when they had opened with iron hooks, they seared it with fiery Plates, with hot burn-burning Salt, sprinkling the same. Last of all, into a vile Dungeon was this mighty Martyr drawn, the floor whereof first was thick spread with the sharpest shells that might be gotten, his feet then being fast locked in the stocks, there was he left alone without all worldly comfort: but the Lord his God was with him, the Holy Spirit of God (whose office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his heart with joy and gladness. Hast thou prepared a terrible Rack (O cruel tyrant, O devouring Lion) for the Martyrs bed? the Lord shall make that bed soft and sweet unto him. Rackest thou his bones and joynts all asunder? His bones, his joynts, his hairs are all numbred. Tormentest thou his flesh with mortal wounds? the Lord shall pour abundantly into all his sores of his oyl of gladness. Thy scraping combs, thy sharp fleshhooks, thine hot searing irons, thy parched salt, thy stinking prison, thy cutting shells, thy pinching stocks shall turn to this patient Martyr to the best. All together shall work contrary to thine expectation, great plenty of joy shall he reap into the Barn of his soul, out of this mighty harvest of pains that thou hast brought him into. Yea, thou shalt prove him Vincentius indeed; that is, a vanquisher, a triumpher, a conqueror, subduing thy madness by his meekness, thy tyranny by his patience, thy manifold means of tortures by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he is plentifully inriched.

The comfort of the Lord upon his Saints.

In this catalogue or company of such holy Martyrs, as suffered in this foresaid tenth Persecution, many more, and almost innumerable, there be expressed in Authors, beside them whom we have hitherto comprehended, as Philoromus, a man of noble birth, and great possessions in Alexandria, who being perswaded by his friends to favour himself, to respect his Wife, to consider his Children and Family, did not only reject the counsels of them, but also neglected the threats and torments of the Judge, to keep the confession of Christ inviolate unto the death, and losing of his head: *Euseb.lib.*8. cap. 9. *Niceph.lib.*7.*cap.*9. of whom Eusebius beareth witness that he was there present himself.

Of like estate and dignity was also Procopius in Palestina, who after his conversion brake his images of Silver and Gold, and distributed the same to the poor, and after all kind of torments, of racking, of cording, of tearing his flesh, of goring and stabbing in, of firing, at length had his head also smitten off, as witnesseth *Niceph.lib.*8.*cap.*15.

To this may be joyned also Georgius a young man of Cappadocia, who stoutly inveighing against the impious idolatry of the Emperors, was apprehended and cast into Prison, then torn with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, stretched with cords, after that his hands and feet with other members of his body being cut off, at last with a sword had his head cut off. Niceph.ibid.

Georgius martyr, the sundry torments of Georgius.

With these aforenamed, add also Sergius and Bacchius, Panthaleon a Physician in Nicomedia, mentioned in *supplem. lib.*8. Theodorus of the City of Amasia in Hellespont, mentioned of *Vincentius lib.*3. Faustus a Martyr of Egypt, mentioned of *Niceph. lib.*8. *cap.*5. Gereon, with three hundred and eighteen fellow Martyrs, which suffered about Colour, Petr. de nat. lib. 9. *cap.*49. Hermogenes the President of Athens, who being converted by the constancy of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, suffered also for the like faith. Item, Samonas Gurias and Abibus, mentioned in Simeon Metaphrast. Hieron also, with certain of his Confessors, under Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphrastes, Judes and Domuas, who suffered with many other Martyrs above mentioned at Nicomedia, as recordeth Metaphrastes. Evelasius, Maximinus, the Emperors officers, whom Fausta the Virgin in her torments converted. Also Thirsus, Lucius, Callinicius, Apollonius, Philemon, Asilas, Leonides, with Arrianus, President of Thebaide. Cyprianus likewise, a Citizen of Antioch, who after he had continued a long time a filthy Magician or Sorcerer, at length was converted and made a Deacon, then a Priest, and at last the Bishop of Antioch, *Vincent. lib.*12. *cap.*120. of whom partly we touched somewhat before. This Cyprian with Justina a Virgin suffered among the Martyrs. Item Glicerios at Nicomedia, Felix a Minister, Fortunatus, Achilleus, Deacons in the City of Valent. Arthemius of Rome, Ciriacus Deacon to Marcellus the Bishop, Carpophorus Priest at Thuscia, with Abundus his Deacon. Item, Claudius Sirinus Antoninus which suffered with Marcellinus the Bishop, Sabel. Enead. lib. 8. Cucusatus in the City of Barcinona. Felix Bishop of Apulia, with Adauctus and Januarius his Priest, Fortunatus and Septimus his Readers: who suffered in the City Venusina under Dioclesian, *Bergom.lib.*8.

It were too long a travel or trouble to recite all and singular names of them particularly, whom this Persecution of Dioclesian did consume. The number of whom being almost infinite, is not to be collected or expressed. One story yet remaineth not to be forgotten of Cassianus, whose pitiful story being described of Prudentius we have here inserted, rendring Meter for Meter, as followeth.

The lamentable history of Cassianus Martyr. Ex Aurel. Pruden. lib. Peristeph.

THrough Forum, as in Italy, I passed once to Rome,
Into a Church by chance came I, and stood fast by a Tomb;
Which Church sometime a place had been, where causes great in law
Were scand and tried, and judgment given, to keep bruit men in awe.
This place Sylla Cornelius, first built, he rais'd the frame,
And call'd the same Forum, and thus that City took the name.
In prayer fervent as I stood, casting mine eye aside,
A picture in full piteous mood (imbrude) by chance I spi'd;
A thousand wounded marks full bad, all mangled rent and torn;
The skin appear'd as though it had been jagg'd and prickt with thorn;
A scull of pictured boys did band about that loathsome sight,
That with their sharpened gads in hand, his members thus had dight.
These gads were but their pens, wherewith their Tables written were,
And such as Scholars often sith, unto the Schools do bear.
Whom thou seest here thus pictur'd sit, and firmly dost behold,
No fable is, I do thee wit, unaskt a Prelate told
That walkt there by; but doth declare, the History of one,
Which written, would good record bear, what faith was long agone,
A skilful Schoolmaster this was, that here sometime did teach;
The Bishop once of Brixia was, and Christ full plain did preach.
He knew well how to comprehend, long talk in a few lines,
And it at length how to amend, by order and by times.
His sharp precepts and his stern looks, his beardless boys did fear,
When hate in heart (yet for their books) full deadly they did bear.
The child that learns, I do ye weet, terms aye his Tutor cru'l;
No discipline in youth seems sweet, count this a common rule.
Behold the raging time now here, oppressing so the faith,
Doth persecute Gods children dear, and all that Christ bewraith.
This trusty teacher of the swarm, profest the living God;
The chief good thing they count their harm, perhaps he shakes his rod.
What Rebel (askt the President) is he I hear so loud?
Unto our youth an instrument, they say, and loe they bowd.
Go, bring the Caitiff forth, he bids, and make no long delay;
Let him be set the boys amids; they do as he doth say.
Let him be given unto them all, and let them have their will,
To do to him what spight they shall, so that they will him kill.
Even as they list let them him fray, and him deride so long,
Till weariness provokes their play, no longer to prolong.
Let them, I say, then uncontrould, both prick and scorch his skin;
To bathe their hands let them be hold, in the hot blood of him.
The Scholars hereat make great game, it pleaseth them full well;
That they may kill and quench the flame, they thought to them a hell.
They bind his hands behind his back, and naked they him strip;
In Bodkin wise at him they nack, they laugh to see him skip.
The private hate that each one hath in heart, it now appears,
They pour it forth in gawdy wrath, they wreak them of their tears.
Some cast great stones, some other break their tables on his face;
Lo, here thy Latin and thy Greek (oh barren boys of grace)
The blood runs down his cheeks, and doth imbrue the boxen leaves,
Where notes by them were made (though loth) and well proponed theams.
Some whet, some sharp their pensels points serving to write withal;
Some other gage his flesh and joynts, as with a pointed nail.
Sometime they prick, sometime they rent, this worthy Martyrs flesh,
And thus by turns they do torment this confessor afresh.
Now all with one consent on him their bloody hands they lay,
To see the blood from limb to limb drop down they make a play.
More painful was the pricking pang, of children oft and thick,
Than of the bigger boys that stang, and near the heart did stick.
For by the feeble strokes of th'one, death was denied his will,
Of smart that made him wo begon, he had the better skill.
The deeper strokes the great ones gave, and nearer toucht the quick,
The welcomer he thought the same, whom longing death made sick.
God make you strong, he saith, I pray, God give you might at will,
And what you want in years, I say, let cruelty fulfil.
But whilst the Hangman breatheth still, and me with you doth match,
That weakly work, yet want no will, my life for to dispatch;

My

No leſs admirable than wonderful was the conſtancy alſo of Women and Maidens, who in the ſame perſecution gave their bodies to the tormentors, and their lives for the Teſtimony of Chriſt, with no leſs boldnes of ſpirit, than did the men themſelves above ſpecified, to whom how much more inferior they were of bodily ſtrength, ſo much more worthy of praiſe they be, for their conſtant ſtanding. Of whom ſome examples here we mind (Chriſt willing) to infer, ſuch as in our Stories and Chronicles ſeem moſt notable, firſt beginning with Eulalia, whoſe ſtory we have taken out of the foreſaid Prudentius, as followeth.

Eulalia martyr.

In the Weſt part of Spain, called Portugal, is a City great and Populous, named Emerita, wherein dwelt, and was brought up a Virgin, born of Noble Parentage, whoſe name was Eulalia, which Emerita although for the ſituation thereof, was both rich and famous, yet more adorned and famous was the renown thereof, by the Martyrdom, Blood, and Sepulchre of this bleſſed Virgin Eulalia. Twelve years of age was ſhe, and not much above, when ſhe refuſed great and Honorable offers in Marriage, as one not skilful, nor yet delighting in Courtly dalliance, neither yet taking pleaſure in Purple and gorgeous Apparel, or elſe in Pretious Balms, or Coſtly Ornaments and Jewels: But forſaking and deſpiſing all theſe and ſuch like Pompous allurements, then ſhewed ſhe her ſelf moſt buſie in preparing her journey to her hoped inheritance, and heavenly Patronage. Which Eulalia, as ſhe was modeſt and diſcreet in behaviour, ſage and ſober in conditions, ſo was ſhe alſo witty and ſharp in anſwering her Enemies. But when the furious rage of perſecution inforced her to joyn her ſelf amongſt Gods Children in the houſhold of faith, and when the Chriſtians were commanded to offer incenſe and ſacrifice to Devils or dead Gods: Then began the bleſſed ſpirit of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a prompt and ready wit, though forthwith (as a couragious Captain) to give a charge upon this ſo great and diſordered a battel: And ſo ſhe ſilly woman, pouring out the Bowels of her innocent heart before God, more provoketh thereby the force and rage of her Enemies againſt her. But the godly care of her Parents, fearing leſt the willing mind of this Damoſel, ſo ready to die for Chriſts cauſe, might make her guilty of her own death, hid her and kept her cloſe at their houſe in the Country, being a great way out of the City. She yet miſliking that quiet life, and alſo deteſting to make ſuch delay, ſoftly ſtealeth out of the doors (no man knowing thereof) in the night; and in great haſt leaving the common way, openeth the hedge gaps, and with weary feet (God knoweth) paſſed through the thorny and briary places, accompanied yet with ſpiritual guard: And although dark and dreadful was the ſilent night, yet had ſhe with her, the Lord and guider of light. And as the children of Iſrael coming out of Egypt, had by the mighty power of God, a cloudy pillar for their guid in the day, and a flame of fire in the night; ſo had this Godly virgin, travelling in this dark night, when ſhe flying and forſaking the place where all filthy Idolatry abounded, and haſtened her Heavenly journey, was not oppreſſed with the dreadful darkneſs of the night: But yet ſhe before the day appeared in this her ſpeedy journey, with her ſelf conſidered and muſed on a thouſand matters and more.

Ex Aurel. Prudentio, lib. periſteph.

The chaſt and continent behaviour of Eulalia.

Eulalia giveth the onſet, denying to ſacrifice to Devils.

Eulalia kept ſecret by her parents.

In the morning betime, with a bold courage ſhe goeth unto the tribunal or Judgment-ſeat, and in the midſt of them all with a loud voice crying out, ſaid: I pray you what a ſhame is it for you thus raſhly and without adviſement to deſtroy and kill mens Souls, and to throw their bodies alive againſt the rocks, and cauſe them to deny the omnipotent God? Would you know (O you unfortunate) what I am? Behold, I am one of the Chriſtians, an Enemy to your deviliſh ſacrifices, I ſpurn your Idols under my feet, I confeſs God omnipotent with my heart and mouth. Iſis, Apollo, and Venus, what are they? Maximinus himſelf, what is he? The one a thing of nought, for that they be the works of mens hands; the other but a caſtawy, becauſe he worſhippeth the ſame work. Therefore frivolous are they both, and both not worthy to be ſet by: Maximinus is a Lord of ſubſtance, and yet he himſelf falleth down before a ſtone, and voweth the honour of his dignity unto thoſe that are much inferior to his Vaſſals. Why then doth he oppreſs ſo tyrannically, more worthy ſtomachs and courages than himſelf? He muſt needs be a good guid and an upright Judge, which feedeth upon innocent blood, and breathing in the bodies of Godly men, doth rent and tear their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in deſtroying and ſubverting the faith.

Eulalia diſproveth the heathen Judge.

The godly confeſſion of Eulalia.

Go to therefore thou Hang-man, burn, cut and mangle thou theſe earthly members. It is an eaſie matter to break a brittle ſubſtance, but the inward mind ſhalt thou not hurt for any thing thou canſt do. The Pretor then or Judge, with theſe words of hers, ſet in a great rage, ſaith, Hang-man take her and pull her out by the hair of her Head, and torment her to the uttermoſt, let her feel the power of our country Gods, and let her know what the imperial Government of a Prince is. But yet, O thou ſturdy girle, fain would I have thee (if it were poſſible) before thou die, to revoke this thy wickedneſs. Behold what pleaſures thou maieſt enjoy by the honourable houſe thou cameſt of, thy fallen houſe and progeny followeth thee to death with lamentable tears, and the heavy nobility of thy kindred maketh doleful lamentation for thee. What meaneſt thou? Wilt thou kill thy ſelf ſo young a flower, and ſo near theſe Honourable marriages and great Doweries thou maiſt injoy? Doth not the gliſtering and golden pomp of the bride-bed move thee? Doth not the reverend piety of thine anceſtors prick thee? Whom is it not, but that this thy raſhneſs and weakneſs grieveth? Behold here the furniture ready prepared for thy terrible death: Either ſhalt thou be beheaded with this ſword, or elſe with theſe wild beaſts ſhalt thou be pulled in pieces, or elſe thou being caſt into the fiery flames, ſhalt be (although lamentably bewailed of thy Friends and kinſfolks) conſumed to aſhes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to eſcape all this? If thou wilt but take and put with thy fingers a little ſalt and incenſers into the Cenſers, thou ſhalt be delivered from all theſe puniſhments. To this Eulalia made no anſwer, but being in a great fury, ſhe ſpitteth in the Tyrants face, ſhe throweth down the Idols, and ſpurneth abroad with her feet the heap of incenſe prepared to the Cenſers. Then without further delay the Hang-men with both their ſtrengths took her, and puld one joynt from another, and with the talons of wild beaſts ſcotched her ſides to the hard bones: She all this while ſinging and praiſing God in this wiſe; Behold, O Lord, I will not forget thee: What a pleaſure is it for them, O Chriſt, that remember thy triumphant victories, to attain unto theſe high dignities? and ſtill calleth upon that holy name, all ſtained and imbrued with her own blood. This ſang ſhe with a bold ſtomach, neither lamentingly nor yet weepingly, but being glad and merry abandoning from her mind all heavineſs and grief, when as out of a warm fountain, her mangled members with freſh blood bathed her white and fair skin. Then proceed they to the laſt and final torment, which was not only the goring and wounding of her mangled body with the Iron grate and hurdle, and terrible harrowing of her fleſh, but burned on every ſide with flaming Torches, her tormented breaſts and ſides: Her hair hanging about her ſhoulders in two parts divided (wherewith her ſhame-fac'd chaſtity and virginity was covered) reaching down to the the ground. But when the cracking flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her hair, and reacheth the crown of her head: then ſhe deſiring ſwift death, opened her mouth and ſwallowed the flame, and ſo reſted ſhe in Peace.

Ex Prudent. Then ſaid Prudentius and Ado, alſo Aquilinus add moreover, writing of a white Dove iſſuing out of her mouth at her departing, and of the fire quenched about her body, alſo of her body covered miraculouſly with ſnow, with other things more, whereof let every reader uſe his own Judgment.

As ye have heard now the Chriſtian life, and conſtant death of Eulalia, much worthy of praiſe and commendation: So no leſs commendation is worthy to be given to bleſſed Agnes, that conſtant damſel and martyr of God, who as ſhe was in Rome of honorable Parents begotten, ſo lieth ſhe there as honorably intombed and buried. Which Agnes for her unſpotted and undefiled virginity, deſerved no leſs praiſe, and commendation than for her willing death and Martyrdom. Some writers make of her a long diſcourſe, more in my judgment than neceſſary, reciting divers and ſundry ſtrange miracles by her done in the proceſs of her Hiſtory; which partly for tediouſneſs, partly for the doubtfulneſs of the author (whom ſome father upon Ambroſe) and partly for the ſtrangneſs and incredibility thereof, I omit, being ſatisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of her, as followeth: She was (ſaith he) young and not marriageable, when firſt ſhe being dedicated to Chriſt, boldly reſiſted the wicked Edicts of the Emperor; leſt that through Idolatry ſhe might have denied and forſaken the holy faith; but yet firſt proved by divers and ſundry policies to induce her to the ſame (as now with the flattering and inticing words of the Judge, now with the threatnings of the ſtorming Executioner) ſhe ſtood notwithſtanding ſtedfaſt in all couragious ſtrength: And willingly offered her body to hard and painful torments, not refuſing (as ſhe ſaid) to ſuffer whatſoever it ſhould be, yea though it were death it ſelf. Then ſaid the cruel tyrant, If to ſuffer pain and torment be ſo eaſie a matter and lightly regarded of thee, and that thou accounteſt thy life nothing worthy, yet the ſhame of thy dedicated or vowed virginity is a thing more regarded I know, and eſteemed of thee. Wherefore this is determined, that unleſs thou wilt make obeyſance to the Altar of Minerva, and ask forgiveneſs of her for thy arrogancy, thou ſhalt be ſent or abandoned to the common ſtews or brothel-houſe. Agnes the virgin with more ſpirit than vehemency inveigheth againſt both Minerva and her virginity: The youth in skuls flock and run together, and crave that they may have Agnes their ludibrious prey. Then, ſaith Agnes, Chriſt is not forgetful of thoſe that be his, that he will ſuffer violently to be taken from them their golden and pure chaſtity, neither will he leave them ſo deſtitute of help: He is always at hand and ready to fight for ſuch as are ſhamefac'd and chaſt Virgins, neither ſuffereth he his gifts of holy integrity or chaſtity to be polluted. Thou ſhalt, ſaith ſhe, willingly bath thy ſword in my blood if thou wilt, but thou ſhalt not defile my body with filthy luſt for any thing thou canſt do. She had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but he commanded that ſhe ſhould be ſet naked at the corner of ſome ſtreet (which place at that time, ſuch as were ſtrumpets commonly uſed) the greater part of the multitude both ſorrowing and ſhaming to ſee ſo ſhameleſs a ſight, went their ways, ſome turning their heads, ſome hiding their faces. But one amongſt the reſt, with uncircumciſed eyes beholding the damſel, and that in ſuch opprobrious wiſe; behold a flame of fire like unto a flaſh of lightning falleth upon him, and ſtriketh his eyes out of his head: whereupon he for dead falling unto the ground, ſprawleth in the kennel-durt; whoſe companions taking him up, and carrying him away, bewayled him as a dead man: But the Virgin for this her miraculous delivery from the danger and ſhame of that place, ſingeth praiſes to God and Chriſt.

There be (ſaith Prudentius) that report, how that ſhe being deſired to pray unto Chriſt for the party, that a little before with fire from Heaven for his incontinency was was ſtricken, was reſtored by her prayer both unto his perfect health and ſight. But bleſſed Agnes after that ſhe had climbed this her firſt greeſe and ſtep unto the heavenly pallace, forthwith began to climb another: For fury ingendring now the mortal wrath of her bloody Enemy, wringing his hands he crieth out ſaying: I am undone, O thou the Executioner draw out thy ſword, and do thine office that the Emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes ſaw a ſturdy and cruel fellow (to behold) ſtand behind her, or approaching near to her with a naked ſword in his hand: I am now gladder, ſaith ſhe, and rejoyce, that ſuch a one as thou, being a ſtout, fierce, ſtrong, and ſturdy ſoldier art come, than one more feeble, weak, and faint ſhould come, or elſe any other young man ſweetly imbalmed, and wearing gay apparel, that might deſtroy me with funeral ſhame. This, even this, is he, I now confeſs, that I do love. I will make haſt to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing deſire. I will willingly receive into my paps the length of his ſword, and into my breſt will draw the force thereof even unto the hilts, that thus I being married unto Chriſt my ſpouſe, may ſurmount and eſcape all the darkneſs of this world, that reacheth even unto the ſkies. O eternal Governour, vouchſafe to open the gates of Heaven, once ſhut up againſt all the inhabitants of the earth, and receive (oh Chriſt) my ſoul that ſeeketh thee. Thus ſpeaking and kneeling upon her knees ſhe prayeth unto Chriſt above in Heaven, that her neck might be the readier for the ſword, now hanging over the ſame. The executioner then with his bloody hand finiſhed her hope, and at one ſtroke cutteth off her head, and by ſuch ſhort and ſwift death doth he prevent her of the pain thereof.

Agnes deſirous of Martyrdom.

The pray of Agnes.

Agnes beheaded.

I have oftentimes before complained, that the ſtories of Saints have been powdered and ſauced with divers untrue additions, and fabulous inventions of men, who either of a ſuperſtitious devotion, or of a ſubtil practiſe have ſo mangled-mangled their ſtories and lives, that almoſt nothing remaineth in them ſimple and uncorrupt, as in the uſual portues wont to be read for dayly ſervice, is manifeſt and evident to be ſeen; wherein few Legends there be able to abide the touch of Hiſtory, if they were truly tryed. This I write upon the occaſion ſpecially of good Katharine, whom now I have in hand: In whom although I nothing doubt, but in her life was great holineſs, in her knowledge excellency, in her death conſtancy: Yet that all things be true that be ſtoried of her, neither do I affirm, neither am I bound ſo to think: So many ſtrange fictions of her be fained diverſly of divers writers, whereof ſome ſeem incredible, ſome alſo impudent. As where Petrus de natalibus writing of her converſion declareth, how that Katharine ſleeping before a certain picture or table of the crucifix, Chriſt with his Mother Mary appeared unto her: And when Mary had offered her unto Chriſt to be his wife, he firſt refuſed her for her blackneſs. The next time ſhe being baptiſed, Mary appearing again, offered her to marry with Chriſt, who then being liked, was eſpouſed to him and married, having a Golden ring the ſame time put on her finger in her ſleep, &c. Bergomenſis writeth thus, that becauſe ſhe in the ſight of the people openly reſiſted the Emperor Maxentius to his face, and rebuked him for his cruelty, therefore ſhe was commanded and committed upon the ſame to priſon, which ſeemeth hitherto not much to digreſs from truth. It followeth moreover, that the ſame night an Angel came to her, comforting and exhorting her to be ſtrong and conſtant unto the Martyrdom, for that ſhe was a Maid accepted in the ſight of God, and that the Lord would be with her for whoſe honour ſhe did fight, and that he would give her a mouth and wiſdom which her Enemies ſhould not withſtand: With many other things more which I here omit. As this alſo I omit concerning the fifty Philoſophers, whom ſhe in diſputation convicted, and converted unto our Religion, and dyed Martyrs for the ſame. Item, of the converting of Porphyrius, kinſman to Maxentius, and Fauſtina the Emperors wife. At length (ſaith the ſtory) after ſhe proved the rack, and the four ſharp cutting wheels, having at laſt her head cut off with the ſword, ſo ſhe finiſhed her Martyrdom, about the year of our Lord (as Antoninus affirmeth) three hundred and ten. Simeon Metaphraſtes, writing of her, diſcourſeth the ſame more at large, to whom they may reſort which covet more therein to be ſatisfied.

Katharine reſiſteth the Emperor openly to his face.

appear) the Emperor his Deputy, or other like Officer (who abuſed the Decrees and Laws of the Emperor againſt the Chriſtians, to his own lucre and gain) violently took from this Julitta all her Goods, Lands, Chattels, and Servants, contrary to all equity and right. She made her pitiful complaint to the Judges: a day was appointed when the Cauſe ſhould be heard. The ſpoiled woman, and the ſpoiling Extortioner ſtood forth together; the woman lamentably declareth her cauſe, the man frowningly beholdeth her face. When ſhe had proved that of good right the Goods were her own, and that wrongfully he had dealt with her: the wicked and blood-thirſty Wretch preferring vile worldly ſubſtance, before the precious ſubſtance of a Chriſtian body, affirmed her action to be of no force, for that ſhe was an Outlaw in not obſerving the Emperors gods, ſince her Chriſtian Faith hath been firſt abjured. His allegation was allowed as good and reaſonable. Whereupon Incenſe and Fire were prepared for her to worſhip the gods, which unleſs ſhe would do, neither the Emperors Protection, nor Laws, nor Judgment, nor Life ſhould ſhe enjoy in that Common weal. When this Hand-Maid of the Lord heard theſe words, ſhe ſaid, Farewel Life, welcome Death; farewel Riches, welcome Poverty. All that I have, if it were a thouſand times more, would I rather loſe, than to ſpeak one wicked and blaſphemous word againſt God my Creator. I yield thee thanks moſt hearty, O my God, for this gift of Grace, that I can contemn and deſpiſe this frail and tranſitory World, eſteeming Chriſtian Profeſſion above all Treaſures. Henceforth when any queſtion was demanded, her anſwer was, I am the Servant of Jeſus Chriſt. Her Kindred and Acquaintance flocking to her, advertiſed her to change her mind. But that vehemently ſhe refuted, with deteſtation of their Idolatry. Forthwith the Judge with the ſharp Sword of Sentence, not only cutteth off all her Goods and Poſſeſſions, but judgeth her alſo to the fire moſt cruelly. The joyful Martyr imbraceth the Sentence as a thing moſt ſweet and delectable. She addreſſeth her ſelf to the flames, in countenance, geſture and words, declaring the joy of her heart, coupled with ſingular conſtancy. To the women beholding her, ſententiouſly ſhe ſpake, Stick not, O ſiſters, to labour and travel after true Piety and Godlineſs. Ceaſe to accuſe the fragility of Feminine nature. What? are not we created of the ſame matter that men are? Yea, after Gods Image and Similitude are we made, as lively as they. Not fleſh only God uſed in the creation of the Woman, in ſign and token of her infirmity and weakneſs, but bone of bones is ſhe, in token that ſhe muſt be ſtrong in the true and living God, all falſe gods forſaken; conſtant in Faith, all Infidelity renounced; patient in Adverſity, all worldly eaſe refuſed. Wax weary (my dear Siſters) of your lives led in darkneſs, and be in love with my Chriſt, my God, my Redeemer, my Comforter, which is the true Light of the World. Perſwade your ſelves, or rather the Spirit of the living God perſwade you, that there is a World to come, wherein the Worſhippers of Idols and Devils ſhall be tormented perpetually, the Servants of the High God ſhall be crowned eternally. With theſe words ſhe imbraced the fire, and ſweetly ſlept in the Lord.

There have been moreover beſide theſe above recited, divers godly women and faithful Martyrs, as Barbara a Noble woman in Thuſcia, who after miſerable Priſonment, ſharp Cords, and burning Flames put to her ſides, was at laſt beheaded. Alſo Fauſta the Virgin which ſuffered under Maximinus, by whom Euelaſius a Ruler of the Emperors Palace, and Maximinus the Preſident were both converted, and alſo ſuffered Martyrdom, as witneſſeth Metaphraſtes. Item, Juliana a Virgin of ſingular beauty in Nicomedia, who after divers Agonies ſuffered likewiſe under Maximinus. Item, Anaſia a Maid of Theſſalonica, who under the ſaid Maximinus ſuffered, Metaph. ibid. Juſtina which ſuffered with Cyprianus Biſhop of Antioch, not to omit alſo Tecla; although moſt Writers do record that ſhe ſuffered under Nero. Platina in vita Caii maketh alſo mention of Lucia and Agatha. All which holy Maids and Virgins glorified the Lord Chriſt with their conſtant Martyrdom, in this tenth and laſt Perſecution of Diocleſian.

During the time of which Perſecution, theſe Biſhops of Rome ſucceeded one after another, Caius who ſucceeded next after Xiſtus before mentioned, Marcellinus, Marcellus (of whom Euſebius in his ſtory maketh no mention) Euſebius, and then Miltiades: all which died Martyrs in the tempeſt of this Perſecution. Firſt, Marcellinus after the Martyrdom of Caius, was ordained Biſhop; he being brought by Diocleſian to the Idols, firſt yielded to their Idolatry, and was ſeen to Sacrifice: wherefore being Excommunicated by the Chriſtians, he fell into ſuch Repentance, that he returned again to Diocleſian, where he ſtanding to his former Confeſſion, and publickly condemning the Idolatry of the Heathen, recovered the Crown of Martyrdom, ſuffering with Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus.

Marcellus likewiſe was urged of Maxentius to renounce his Biſhoprick and Religion, and to Sacrifice with them to Idols; which when he conſtantly refuſed, was beaten with Cudgels, and ſo expelled the City. Then he entring into the houſe of Lucina a widow, aſſembled there the Congregation; which when it came to the ears of Maxentius the Tyrant, he turned the houſe of Lucina into a ſtable, and made Marcellus the Keeper of the Beaſts; who with the ſtink thereof and miſerable handling, was put to death. Euſebius fate Biſhop of Rome, as Enſeb. in Chro. ſaith, ſeven months, Marianus Scotus ſaith eight months, Damaſus affirmeth ſix years. Sabellicus alledgeth certain Authors that ſay, that he was ſlain by Maximianus, but correcteth that himſelf, affirming that Maximianus died before him.

Miltiades by the teſtimony of Platina, and others that follow him, ſat three years and ſeven months, and ſuffered under Maximianus. But that ſeemeth not to be true, as both Sabellicus doth rightly note, affirming that the ſame cannot ſtand by the ſupputation of time: for ſo much as the ſaid Galerius Maximianus reigned but two years, and died before Miltiades. Alſo Euſebius manifeſtly expreſſeth the example of a Letter of Conſtantine written to this Miltiades Biſhop of Rome, plainly convicting that to be falſe which Platina affirmeth.

In the Book collected of general Councils, among the decretal Epiſtles, there is a long tractation about the judgment and condemnation of Marcellinus: whereof the Maſters and Patrons of Popery in theſe our days take great hold to prove the Supremacy of the Pope to be above all general Councils, and that he ought not to be ſubject to the condemnation of any perſon or perſons, for that there is written, Nemo unquam judicavit pontificem, nec præſul ſacerdotem ſuum, quoniam prima ſedes non judicabitur a quequam, &c. Although this ſentence of Miltiades ſeemeth apparently to be patched in rather by ſome Hildibrandus than by Miltiades, both for that it hangeth with little order of ſenſe upon that which goeth before; and again, becauſe that Prima ſedes here mentioned, was not yet ordained nor attributed to the See of Rome before the Council of Nice, where the order and placing of Biſhops was firſt eſtabliſhed. But to let this ſentence paſs, yet notwithſtanding the circumſtance and proceeding of this judgment, if it be rightly weighed, maketh very little to the purpoſe of theſe men. Neither is it true that the Biſhops of this Council of Sinueſſe, did not condem Marcellinus, for the words of the Council be plain, Subſcripſerunt igitur in ejus damnationem & damnaverunt eum extra civitatem; that is, They ſubſcribed therefore to his Condemnation, and condemned him to be expelled out of the City. Moreover by the ſaid Council were brought in the forty two Witneſſes againſt Marcellinus. In the ſaid Council, the Verdict of the ſame witneſſes was demanded, and alſo received. Furthermore, Quirinus one of the Biſhops there openly proteſted, that he would not depart the Council, before the malice of the Biſhops was revealed: What doth all this declare, but that the Biſhop of Rome was called there, and did appear before the Judgment Seat of the Council, and there ſtood ſubject to their Sentence and Authority, by the which he was expelled out of the City? As for the words of the Council, whereupon our Papiſts ſtand ſo much, Non enim noſtro, ſed tuo ipſius judicio condemnaberis, &c. Item, Tuo ore judica cauſam tuam, &c. Theſe words import not here the Authority of the Roman Biſhop to be above the Council, neither do they declare what the Council could not do, but what they would and wiſhed rather to be done; that is, that he ſhould rather acknowledge his Crime before God and them, them, with a voluntary yielding of his heart, then that the Confeſſion of ſuch an hainous Fact ſhould be extorted from him through their condemnation, for that they ſaw to be expedient for his Souls health; otherwiſe their condemnation ſhould ſerve him to ſmall purpoſe; and ſo it came to paſs. For he being urged of them to condemn himſelf, ſo did: proſtrating himſelf and weeping before them. Whereupon immediately they proceeded to the ſentence againſt him, condemning and pronouncing him to be expelled the City. Now whether by this may be gathered that the Biſhops of Rome ought not to be cited, accuſed and condemned by any perſon or perſons, let the indifferent Reader judge ſimply.

The Biſhop of Rome condemned by the Council.

As touching the decretal Epiſtles, which be intituled under the names of theſe foreſaid Biſhops, who ſo well adviſeth them, and with judgment will examine the ſtile, the time, the argument, the hanging together of the matter, and the Conſtitutions in them contained (little ſerving to any purpoſe, and nothing ſerving for thoſe troubleſome days then preſent) may eaſily diſcern them, either in no part to be theirs, or much of the ſame to be clouted and patched by the doings of others, which lived in other times; eſpecially ſeeing all the conſtitutions in them for the moſt part tend to the ſetting up, and to exalt the See of Rome above all other Biſhops and Churches, and to reduce all Cauſes and Appeals to the ſaid See of Rome. So the Epiſtle of Caius beginning with the Commendation of the Authority of his See endeth after the ſame tenor, willing and commanding all difficult queſtions in all Provinces whatſoever emerging, to be referred to the See Apoſtolical. Moreover the greateſt part of the ſaid Epiſtle from this place (Quicunque illi ſunt, ita obcæcati, &c. to the end of this period, Quoniam ſicut ait B. Apoſtolus, magnum eſt Pietatis, &c.) is contained in the Epiſtle of Leo, unto Leo the Emperor: and ſo rightly agreeth in all points with the ſtile of Leo, that evident it is the ſame to be borrowed out of Leo, and to be patched into the Epiſtle of Caius out of Leo.

The decretal Epiſtles and conſtitutions of theſe Biſhops of Rome examined

The chief ſcope of the conſtitutions decretal, to magnifie the Church of Rome.

The Epiſtle of Caius.

A great part of the Epiſtle of Caius taken out of the Epiſtle of Leo, to Leo the Emperor.

Likewiſe the Epiſtle of Marcellinus, to get more Authority with the Reader, is admired with a great part of Pauls Epiſtle to the Epheſians, word for word. And how it is like that Marcellinus, which died in the twentieth year of Diocleſian, could write of conſubſtantiality of the Divine Perſons, when that controverſie and term of conſubſtantiality was not heard of in the Church before the Nicen Council, which was twenty three years after him? But eſpecially the two Epiſtles of Marcellus bewray themſelves, ſo that for the confuting thereof needeth no other probation more than only the reading of the ſame. Such a glorious ſtile of ambition therein doth appear, as it is eaſie to be underſtood, not to proceed either from ſuch an humble Martyr, or to ſavour any thing of the miſery of ſuch a time. His words of his firſt Epiſtle written unto the Brethren of Antioch, and alledged in the Popes Decrees by Gratianus are theſe:

The Epiſtle of Marcellinus.

The Epiſtles decretal of Marcellus.

24. q. 1. Rogamus vos fratres.

We deſire you Brethren, that you do not teach nor conceive any other thing but as ye have received of the bleſſed Apoſtle Saint Peter, and of other Apoſtles and Fathers. For of him ye were firſt of all inſtructed, wherefore you muſt not forſake your own Father and follow others. For he is the Head of the whole Church, to whom the Lord ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, &c. Whoſe Seat was firſt with you in Antioch, which afterward by the Commandment of the Lord, was tranſlated from thence to Rome, of the which Church of Rome I am this day placed (by the Grace of God) to be the Governor. From the which Church of Rome, neither ought you to ſeparate your ſelves, ſeeing to the ſame Church all manner of Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, being of any importance (Gods Grace ſo diſpoſing) are commanded to be referred: by the ſame to be ordered regularly, from whence they took their firſt beginning, &c. And followeth conſequently upon the ſame, And if your Church of Antioch, which was once the firſt, will not yield her ſelf unto the See of Rome, there is no other Church elſe that will not ſubject it ſelf to our Dominion: to whom all other Biſhops whoſoever, as they muſt needs do (according to the Decrees of the Apoſtles and of their Succeſſors) ought to fly, as to have their Head, and muſt Appeal to the ſame, and there to have their Redreſs and their Protection; from whence they took their firſt Inſtruction and Conſecration, &c.

In what chapter or leaf of all the Bible doth the Lord command the See of Peter to be tranſlated from Antioch to Rome?

The Church of Rome ſueth to the Church of Antioch to yield unto her.

Whether this be like matter to proceed from the ſpirit of Marcellus that bleſſed Martyr in thoſe ſo dreadful days, I ſay no more, but only deſire the (gentle Reader) to judge.

The ſecond Epiſtle of Marcellus written to Maxentius.

In his ſecond Epiſtle moreover, the ſaid Marcellus writing to Maxentius the bloody Tyrant, firſt reprehendeth him for his cruelty, ſharply admoniſhing him how and what to do: to learn and ſeek the true Religion of God, to maintain his Church, to honour and reverence the Prieſts of God, and eſpecially exhorteth him to charity, and that he would ceaſe from Perſecution, &c. All this is poſſible and like to be true. But now mark (good Reader) what blanched ſtuff here followed withall: as where he alledging the Statutes and Sanctions of his Predeceſſors, declareth and diſcuſſeth that no Biſhop nor Miniſter ought to be perſecuted or deprived of his goods. And if they be, then ought they to have their poſſeſſions and places again reſtored by the Law, before they were bound by the Law to anſwer to their Accuſations laid in againſt them: and ſo after that, in convenient time, to be called to a Council; the which Council notwithſtanding without the Authority of the holy See, cannot proceed regularly, albeit it remain in his power to aſſemble certain Biſhops together. Neither can he regularly condemn any Biſhop, appealing to this his Apoſtolical See, before the Sentence definitive do proceed from the foreſaid See, &c. And it followeth after, And therefore (ſaith he) let no Biſhop of what Crime ſoever he be attached, come to his Acceuſation, or be heard, but in his own ordinary Synod at his convenient time: the Regular and Apoſtolical Authority being joyned withall. Moreover in the ſaid Epiſtle writing unto Maxentius, he decreeth that no Lay-men, or any ſuſpected Biſhop ought to accuſe Prelates of the Church: So that if they be either Lay-men, or men of evil Converſation, or proved manifeſt Enemies, or incenſed with any hatred, their Accuſations againſt any Biſhops ought not to ſtand. With other ſuch matters more, concerning the diſpoſition of judicial Court. Which matter, if Pope Gregory the ſeventh had written unto Henry the third Emperor, or if Pope Alexander the third had written to the Emperor Frederick the firſt, it might have ſtood with ſome reaſon and opportunity of time. But now for Marcellus to write theſe Decrees in ſuch Perſecution of the Church, to Maxentius the Heathen and moſt cruel Emperor, how unlike it is to be true, and how it ſerved then to purpoſe, the Reader may ſoon diſcern. And yet theſe be the Epiſtles and Conſtitutions decretal, whereby (under the pretenſed Title of the Fathers) all Churches of late time, and all Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes have been, and yet are in this Realm of England to this day governed, directed, and diſpoſed.

The Epiſtle of Maximus to Maximus blanched.

The Church of England governed by the Popes Canon Law without ſufficient ground of antiquity.

The like diſcuſſion and examination I might alſo make of the other Epiſtles that follow of Euſebius and Miltiades, which all tend to the ſame ſcope, that no Prelate or Biſhop ought to come to his anſwer (or Ad litem conteſtatam, as the words of their writing do term it) before they be orderly and fully reſtored again to their poſſeſſions. Who moreover in the ſaid their Epiſtles ſtill harp upon this Key of the Scripture, Tu es Petrus, & ſuper hanc petram ædificabo Eccleſiam meam. Declaring moreover that this priviledge of judging all men, and to be judged of no man, but only to be left to the judgment of the Lord, was given to this foreſaid holy See of Rome, from time of the Apoſtles, and chiefly left with Peter the holy Key-keeper? ſo that although the election of the Apoſtles was equal, yet this was chiefly granted to S. Peter, to have Prehemineence above the reſt. Concluding in the end hereby, Quod ſemper majores cauſæ, ſicut ſunt Epiſcoporum, & potiorum curæ negotiorum, ad unam beati Principis Apoſtolorum Petri ſedem confluerent; that is, That always all greater Cauſes, as be the matters of Biſhops, and ſuch other cares of weighty Importance, ſhould be brought to the See of Saint Peter, the bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles, &c. Theſe be the words of Miltiades and Euſebius, whereby it may partly be ſmelled of him that hath any Noſe, what was the meaning of them which forged theſe Writings and Letters upon theſe ancient holy Martyrs.

The Epiſtles decretal of Euſebius and Miltiades.

Ex Epiſt. decretal. Miltiadis.

This I cannot but marvel at, in the third Epiſtle of Euſebius the Biſhop of Rome, that whereas Marcellinus his his late Predeceſſor before, in his own time and remembrance did fall ſo horribly, and was condemned for the ſame juſtly to be expulſed the City by the Council of three hundred Biſhops: yet notwithſtanding the foreſaid Euſebius in his third Epiſtle alledging that place of Tu es Petrus, bringeth in for a proof of the ſame, and ſaith, Quia in ſede Apoſtolica extra maculam ſemper eſt Catholica ſervata Religio, &c. that is, For in the Apoſtolical See always the Catholick Religion hath been preſerved without any ſpot or blemiſh.

Miltiades the laſt Biſhop of Rome in danger of Perſecution.

But howſoever the Forgers of theſe decretal Epiſtles have forgotten themſelves, moſt certain it is, that theſe holy Biſhops, unto whom they were and are aſcribed, lived perfect good men, and died bleſſed Martyrs. Of whom this Miltiades was the laſt among all the Biſhops of Rome here in the Weſt Church of Europe, that ever was in danger of Perſecution to be martyred, yet to this preſent day.

The end of theſe Perſecutions in all the Weſt Churches.

And thus have ye heard the ſtories and names of ſuch bleſſed Saints, which ſuffered in the time of Perſecution, from the nineteenth year of Dioclefian to the ſeventh and laſt year of Maxentius, deſcribed with the deaths alſo and plagues upon theſe Tormentors and cruel Tyrants, which were the Captains of the ſame Perſecution. And here cometh in (bleſſed be Chriſt) the end of theſe Perſecutions here in theſe Weſt Churches of Europe, ſo far as the Dominion of bleſſed Conſtantinus did chiefly extend.

The Perſecution under Licinius, Hermilus, Stratonicus, Martyrs. Theodorus Captain, Martyr.

Yet notwithſtanding in Aſia all Perſecution as yet ceaſed not for the ſpace of four years, as above is mentioned by the means of wicked Licinius, under whom divers there were holy and conſtant Martyrs, that ſuffered grievous Torments; as Hermilus a Deacon, and Stratonicus a Keeper of the Priſon, both which after their puniſhments ſuſtained, were ſtrangled in the Flood Iſter, Metaſt. Alſo Theodorus the Captain, who being ſent for of Licinius, becauſe he would not come, and becauſe he brake his gods in pieces, and gave them to the poor, therefore was faſtened to the Croſs, and after being pierced with ſharp Pricks or Bodkins in the ſecret parts of his body, was at laſt beheaded. Add to theſe alſo Miles, who being firſt a Souldier, was afterward made Biſhop of a certain City in Perſia; where he ſeeing himſelf could do no good to convert them, after many tribulations and great afflictions among them, curſed the City and departed. Which City ſhortly after by Sapores King of Perſia was deſtroyed.

Miles Martyr. The Kings of Perſia were commonly called by the name of Sapores.

Perſecution in Perſia. Acindinus, Pegaſius, Anempodiſtus, Epidephorus, Simeon Archbiſhop, Cteſiphon Biſhop Martyrs. 128 Martyrs in Perſia. The ſtory of Simeon Archbiſhop of Seleucia. Ex Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 8, 9, 10.

In the ſame Country of Perſia, about this time ſuffered under Sapores the King (as recordeth Simeon Metaſthenes) divers valiant and conſtant Martyrs, as Acindimus, Pegaſius, Anempodiſtus, Epidephorus, alſo Simeon Archbiſhop of Seleucia, with Cteſiphon another Biſhop of Perſia, with other Miniſters and religious men of that Region, to the number of one hundred twenty eight. Of this Simeon and Cteſiphon thus writeth Sozomen, lib. 2. That the Idolatrous Magicians in Perſia, taking counſel together againſt the Chriſtians, accuſed Simeon and Cteſiphon to Sapores the King, for that they were grateful and accepted unto the Roman Emperor, and bewraid to him ſuch things as were done in the Land of Perſia. Whereupon Sapores, being moved, took great diſpleaſure againſt the Chriſtians, oppreſſing them with Taxes and Tributes unto their utter impoveriſhing, killing all their Prieſts with the Sword: after that calleth for Simeon the Archbiſhop, who there before the King declared himſelf a worthy and a valiant Captain of Chriſts Church. For when Sapores had commaded him to be led to ſuffer Torments, he neither ſhrunk for any fear, nor ſhewed any great humble ſuit of ſubmiſſion for any pardon: whereat the King partly mavelling, partly offended, asked Why he did not kneel down as he was wont before to do? Simeon to this anſwered, For that, ſaith he, before this time I was not brought unto you in Bonds to betray the true God, as I am now; and ſo long I refuſed not to accompliſh that which the Order and Cuſtom of the Realm of me required; but now it is not lawful for me ſo to do, for now I come to ſtand in defence of our Religion and true Doctrine. When Simeon thus had anſwered, the King perſiſting in his purpoſe, offereth to him the choice either to worſhip with him after his manner (promiſing to him many great Gifts, if he would ſo do) or if he would not, threatneth to him and to all the other Chriſtians within his Land, deſtruction. But Simeon, neither allured with his Promiſes, nor terrified with his Threatnings, continued conſtant in his Doctrine profeſſed, ſo as neither he could be induced to Idolatrous Worſhip, nor yet to betray the truth of his Religion. For the which cauſe he was committed into Bonds, and there commanded to be kept, to the Kings pleaſure further known.

The worthy anſwer of Simeon unto the King.

The conſtancy of Simeon.

The fall of Uſthazares.

It befel in the way as he was going to the Priſon, there was ſitting at the Kings Gate a certain Eunuch, an old Tutor or School-Maſter of the Kings, named Uſthazares, who had been once a Chriſtian, and afterward falling from his Profeſſion, fell with the Heatheniſh multitude to their Idolatry. This Uſthazares ſitting at the door of the Kings Palace, and ſeeing Simeon paſſing by led to the priſon, roſe up and reverenced the Biſhop. Simeon again with ſharp words (as the time would ſuffer) rebuked him, and in great anger cried out againſt him, which being once a Chriſtian, would ſo cowardly revolt from his Profeſſion, and to return again to the Heatheniſh Idolatry. At the hearing of theſe words the Eunuch forthwith burſting out into tears, laying away his Courtly Apparel, which was ſumptuous and coſtly, and putting upon him a black and mourning Weed, ſitteth before the Court Gates weeping and bewailing, thus ſaying with himſelf, Woe is me, with what hope, with what face ſhall I look hereafter for my God, which have denied my God, when as this Simeon my familiar Acquaintance, thus paſſing by me, ſo much diſdaineth me, that he refuſeth with one gentle word to ſalute me?

The fruit of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline and Chaſtiſement.

The repentance of Uſthazares.

Theſe words being brought to the ears of the King (as ſuch Tale-carriers never lack in Princes Courts) procured againſt him no little Indignation. Whereupon Sapores the King ſending for him, firſt with gentle words and courtly Promiſes began to ſpeak him fair, asking him, What cauſe he had ſo to mourn, and whether there was any thing in his houſe, which was denied him, or which he had not at his own will and asking? Whereunto Uſthazares anſwering again, ſaid, That there was nothing in that earthly houſe, which was to him lacking, or whereunto his deſire ſtood. Yea would God (ſaid he) O King, any other grief or calamity in all the World, whatſoever it were, had happened to me rather than this, for the which I do moſt juſtly mourn and ſorrow! For this ſorroweth me, that I am this day alive, who ſhould rather have died long ſince, and that I ſee this Sun, which againſt my heart and mind, for your pleaſure diſſemblingly I appeared to Worſhip; for which cauſe double-wiſe I am worthy of death: Firſt, for that I have denied Chriſt. Secondly, becauſe I did diſſemble with you. And incontinent upon theſe words, ſwearing by Him that made both Heaven and Earth, affirmed moſt certainly, that although he had played the Fool before, he would never be ſo mad again, as inſtead of the Creator and Maker of all things, to Worſhip the Creatures which he had made and cheated. Sapores the King being aſtonied at the ſo ſudden alteration of this man, and doubting with himſelf whether to be angry with thoſe Inchanters or with him; whether to intreat him with gentleneſs or with rigor: at length in this mood commanded the ſaid Uſthazares his old ancient Servant, and firſt Tutor and bringer up of his youth, to be had away, and to be beheaded. As he was going to the place of Execution, he deſired of the Executioners a little to ſtay, while he might ſend a meſſage unto the King, which was this (ſent in by certain of the Kings moſt truſty Eunuchs) deſiring him, that for all the old and faithful Service he had done to his Father, and to him, he would now requite him with this one office again, to cauſe to be cried openly by a publick Crier in theſe words following, That Uſthazares was beheaded, not for any Treachery or Crime committed againſt the King or the Realm, but only for that he was a Chriſtian, and would not at the Kings pleaſure deny his God. And ſo according unto his requeſt, it was performed and granted. For this cauſe did Uſthazares ſo much deſire the cauſe of his death to be publiſhed: becauſe that as his ſhrinking back from Chriſt, was a great occaſion to many Chriſtians to do the like; ſo now the ſame, hearing that Uſthazares died for no other cauſe but only for the Religion of Chriſt, ſhould learn likewiſe by his example to be fervent and conſtant in that which they profeſs. And thus the bleſſed Eunuch did conſummate conſummate his Martyrdom. Of the which his ſaid Martyrdom, Simeon being in priſon hearing, was very joyful and gave God thanks; who in the next day following, being brought forth before the King, and conſtantly refuſing to condeſcend unto the Kings requeſt, to worſhip viſible creatures, was likewiſe by the commandment of the King beheaded, with a great number more, which the ſame day alſo did ſuffer, to the number (as is ſaid) of an hundred and more; all which were put to death before Simeon. he ſtanding by and exhorting them with comfortable words: Admoniſhing them to ſtand firm and ſtedfaſt in the Lord; preaching and teaching them concerning death, Reſurrection, and true piety; and proved by the Scriptures that to be true which he had ſaid, declaring moreover that to be true life indeed, ſo to die, and that to be death indeed, to deny or betray God for fear of puniſhment: And added further, that there was no man alive, but needs once muſt die: For ſo much as to all men is appointed neceſſarily here to have an end. But thoſe things, which after this life follow hereafter, to be eternal, which neither ſhall come to all men after one ſort. But as the condition and trade of life in divers men doth differ, and is not in all men like: So the time ſhall come, when all men in a moment ſhall render and receive according to their doings in this preſent life immortal rewards: Such as have here done well, of life and glory; ſuch as have done contrary of perpetual puniſhment. As touching thereof our well doing, here is no doubt but of all other our holy actions and vertuous deeds, there is no higher or greater deed, than if a man here loſe his life for his Lord God. With theſe words of comfortable exhortation the holy Martyrs being prepared, willingly yielded up their lives to death. After whom at laſt followed Simeon, with two other Prieſts or Miniſters of his Church: Abedecalaas and Ananias, which alſo with him were partakers of the ſame Martyrdom.

For in the upper part of his neck they made a hole to thruſt in their hand, and pluckt out his tongue out of his mouth, and ſo he was put to death. The cruel Martyrdom of Puſices.

The Daughter of Puſices Martyr.

The next year following, upon the ſame day, when the Chriſtians did celebrate the remembrance of the Lords paſſion, which we call good friday before Eaſter (as witneſſeth the ſaid Sozomenus) Sapores the King directed out a cruel and ſharp Edict throughout all his land, condemning to death all them, whoſoever confeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians. By reaſon whereof an innumerable multitude of Chriſtians, through the wicked procuring of the malignant Magicians, ſuffered the ſame time by the ſword, both in City and in Town: Some being ſought for, ſome offering themſelves willingly, leſt they ſhould ſeem by their ſilence to deny Chriſt. Thus all the Chriſtians, that could be found, without pity were ſlain, and divers alſo of the Kings own Court and houſhold. Amongſt whom was alſo Azades an Eunuch, one whom the King did intirely love and favour; which Azades after that the King underſtood to be put death, being greatly moved with the ſorrow thereof, commanded after that no Chriſtians ſhould be ſlain, but them only which were the Doctors and Teachers of Chriſtian Religion.

In the ſame time it happened that the Queen fell into a certain diſeaſe; upon the occaſion whereof, the cruel Jews, with the wicked Magicians, falſly and maliciouſly accuſed Trabula, the ſiſter of Simeon the Martyr, a Godly Virgin, with another ſiſter alſo of hers, that they had wrought privy charms to hurt the Queen, for the revenging of the death of Simeon. This accuſation being received and believed, innocent Trabula, with the others were condemned, and with a ſaw cut in ſunder by the middle; whoſe quarters were then hanged upon ſtakes, the Queen going between them, thinking thereby to be delivered of her ſickneſs. This Trabula was a Maid of a right comely beauty and very amiable, to whom one of the Magicians caſt great love, much deſiring and labouring by gifts and rewards, ſent into the priſon to win her to his pleaſure; promiſing that if ſhe would apply to his requeſt, ſhe ſhould be delivered and ſet at liberty. But ſhe utterly refuſing to conſent unto him, or rather rebuking him for his incontinent attempt, did chooſe rather to die, than to betray either the Religion of her mind, or the Virginity of her body. Sozom.

Now for ſo much as the King had commanded that no Chriſtians ſhould be put to death, but only ſuch as were the teachers and leaders of the flock; The Magicians and Archmagicians left no diligence untried to ſet forward the matter. Whereby great affliction and perſecution was among the Biſhops and teachers of the Church which in all places went to ſlaughter, eſpecially in the country of Diabenor; for that part of Perſia above all other was moſt Chriſtian. Where Acepſimas the Biſhop with a great number of his flock and Clergy were apprehended and taken: Upon the apprehenſion of whom, the Magicians, to ſatisfie the Kings commandment, diſmiſſed all the reſt, only depriving them of their living and goods. Only Acepſimas the Biſhop they retained, with whom one Jacobus a Miniſter, or Prieſt of his Church was alſo joyned; not of any compulſion, but only as himſelf ſo deſired and obtained of thoſe Magicians that he might follow him, and be coupled in the ſame bonds to ſerve the aged Biſhop, and to relieve (ſo much as he might) his calamities, and heal his wounds. For he had been ſore ſcourged before of the Magicians, after they had apprehended him, and brought him to worſhip the Sun: Which thing, becauſe he would not do, they caſt him into priſon again, where this Jacobus was waiting upon him. At the ſame time likewiſe Athalas a Prieſt or Miniſter, alſo Azadanes and Abdieſus Deacons, were impriſoned, and miſerably ſcourged for the teſtimony of the Lord Jeſus. After this the Archimagus, eſpying his time, complaineth unto the King of them, having authority and commiſſion given him (unleſs they would worſhip the Sun) to puniſh them as he pleaſed. This commandment received of the King the Maſter Magus doth declare to them in priſon. But they anſwered again plainly, that they would never be either betrayers of Chriſt, or worſhippers of the Sun; whereupon without mercy they were put to bitter torments; where Acepſimas ſtrongly perſiſting in the confeſſion of Chriſt, indured to death. The other being no leſs rent and wounded with ſcourges yet continued marvelouſly alive; and becauſe they would in no caſe turn from their conſtant ſentence, were turned again into priſon. Of whom Athalas in the time of his whipping, was ſo drawn and rackt with pulling, that both his arms being looſed out of the joynts, hanged down from his body: Which he ſo carried about without uſe of any hand to feed himſelf, but as he was fed of others.

Miſerable, and almoſt innumerable were the ſlaughters under the reign of this Sapores, of Biſhops, Miniſters, Deacons, Religious men, holy Virgins, and other Eccleſiaſtical perſons, ſuch as did then cleave to the Doctrine of Chriſt, and ſuffered for the ſame, the names of the Biſhops beſides the other multitude taken in the perſecution, are recited in Sozom. lib. 2. and in Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 37. in this order following: Barbaſimes, Paulus, Gaddiabes, Sabinus, Mareas, Mocius, Johannes, Hormiſdas, Papas, Jacobus, Romas, Maares, Agas, Bochres, Abdas, Abieſus, Joannes, Abramius, Agdelas, Sabores, Iſaac, Dauſas, Bicor alſo with Maureanda his fellow Biſhop, and the reſt of his Churches under him, to the number of two hundred and fifty perſons, which were the ſame time apprehended of the Perſians, &c. Briefly, to comprehend the whole multitude of them that ſuffered in that perſecution, the manner of their apprehenſion, the cruelneſs of their torments, how, and where they ſuffered, and in what places, it is not poſſible for any Hiſtory to diſcharge. Neither are the Perſians themſelves (as Zozemenus recordeth) able to recite them. In ſum, the multitude and number of them whom they are able to recite by name, cometh to the ſum of ſixteen thouſand men and women.

The number of Martyrs that suffered in Persia were 16. thousand.

The rumor and noise of this so miserable affliction of the Christians in the Kingdom of Persia, coming to the ears of Constantinus the Emperor, put him in great heaviness, studying and revolving with himself, how to help the matter, which indeed was very hard for him to do. It so befel the same time, that certain Ambassadors were then at Rome from Sapores King of Persia; to whom Constantinus did easily grant and consent, satisfying all their requests and demands: thinking thereby to obtain the more friendship at the Kings hands, that at his request he would be good to the Christians; to whom he writeth his Epistle in their behalf, and sendeth the same by his messengers, beginning thus:

Constantinus the Emperor writeth to the King of Persia in the behalf of the afflicted Christians.

The copy and effect of the Epistle of Constantine to Sapores.

Divinam fidem servans veritatis lucem sortior. Veritatis luce doctus divinam fidem cognosco, Per ea igitur, quibus illa res agendas confirmat, sanctissimam religionem cognitam reddo & hunc me cultum doctorem cognitionis Sancti Dei habere confiteor, &c. Eusebius, De vitâ Constantini. lib. 4. The contents whereof, briefly do tend to this effect. Declaring unto him how he should stand much beholden to him, if at his request he would shew some quiet and rest to the Christians, in whose Religion there was nothing which he could justly blame. For so much as in their sacrifices they use to kill nothing, nor to shed blood, but only to offer up unbloody Sacrifices, to make their prayers unto God; who delighteth not in bloodshedding; but only in the Soul that loveth Virtue, and followeth such doctrine and knowledge, which is agreeing unto true piety. And therefore such men as do lead him, and learn so to believe and to worship God, are more to be commended. Moreover, he assureth him to find God more merciful unto him, if he would imbrace the Godly piety and truth of the Christians. And for example thereof, bringeth in the stories of Galienus and Valerianus, who so long as they were favourers of the Christians, did prosper and flourish. But as soon as they moved any persecution against them, it happened to them as it did to all other Emperors before them, that all went backward with them: As specially might appear by Valerianus, who after he had raged so cruelly against the Christians, was eftsoons overcome of the Persians; the revenging hand of God falling upon him, Where he led ever a miserable life, in wretched Captivity. Further also for the more evidence of the same, he referreth the examples of those Emperors and Tyrants in his time, whom he vanquished and subdued only by his faith in Christ, for the which faith God was his helper, and gave him the victory in many battels, and triumph over great Tyrants; whereby he hath so enlarged the Dominion of the Roman Monarchy, from the West ocean unto the uttermost parts well-near of all the East. To the doing and working whereof, he neither called to him the help of any charmer, or divination of southsayer, nor used the killing of any sacrifice; but only the following of the cross, and prayer made to Almighty God, without any other bloody sacrifice, was the armour wherewith he overcame, &c. And in the end of the Epistle addeth these words. What joy (saith he) what gladness would it be to my heart, to hear the state also of the Persians to flourish, as I wish it to do, by imbracing this sort of men, the Christians, I mean? So that both you with them, and they with you in long prosperity may enjoy much felicity together as your hearts would desire, and in so doing no doubt ye shall. For so shall you have God, which is the Author and Creator of all this universal world, to be merciful and gracious to you. These men therefore I commend unto you upon your Kingly honour; and upon your clemency and piety, wherewith you are indued, I commit them unto you, desiring you to embrace and receive them according to your humanity and benignity; agreeing and convenient to your estate: Who in so doing shall now both procure to your self grace through your faith, and also shall declare to me a great pleasure and benefit worthy of thanks.

The general care of godly Constantine over all Christians in all Places.

This example wrote Constantinus to King Sapores; such care had this godly Prince for them that believed in Christ, not only in his own Monarchy, but also in all places of the world: Neither is it to be doubted, but this intercession of the Emperor, did something mitigate the heat of the Persians persecution, although thereof we read no certain thing in our Histories.

Other forrein Persecutions in Persia.

Of other troubles and persecutions we read, which hapned afterward in the said Country of Persia, under Isdigerdes the King, but these followed long after about the time of the Emperor Theodosius. At which time suffered Andas their Bishop, and Hormisda, a great noble mans son, and of great reputation among the Persians; whom when the King understood to be a Christian, and to deny to turn from his Religion, condemned him to keep his Elephants naked. In process of time, the King looking out, and seeing him all swarted and tanned in the Sun, commanded him to have a shirt put on, and to be brought before him; whom then the King asked, if he would deny Christ. Hormisda hearing this, tore off his shirt from his body and cast it from him, saying If ye think that I will deny my faith to Christ for a shirt, have here your gift again, &c. And so was upon that expelled the Country: Theodor. lib. 5.

The story of Hormisda, Martyr. Ex Theodor. lib. 5. cap. 39.

The faithful constancy of Hormisda.

Hormisda banished the country of Persia.

Another there was that same time, named Suenes, which had under him an hundred servants. The King taking displeasure with him for that he would not alter from his Religion and Godly truth, asked who was the worst of all his servants, and him the King made ruler of all the rest, and coupling him with his Masters wife, brought also Suenes under his subjection, thinking thereby to subdue also the faith of Suenes: But it was builded upon a sure foundation.

Suenes Martyr.

The constancy of Suenes.

Of Benjamin the Deacon, thus writeth the said Theodorer in his first Book, that after two years of his imprisonment, at the request of the Roman Legate he was delivered; who afterward contrary to the Kings commandment preached and taught the Gospel of Christ, and was most miserably excarnificate, having twenty sharp pricks of reeds thrust under his nails; but when he did laugh at that, then in his privy yard he had a sharp reed thrust in with horrible pain; after that a certain long stalk ragged and thorny, being thrust into his body by the nether part, was forced into him; with the horribleness of the pain whereof, the valiant and invincible souldier of the Lord gave over his life. Theod. ibid. And thus much concerning the Martyrs and persecutions among the Persians, although these persecutions belong not to this time, which came (as it is said) long after the days of Constantinus, about the year of our Lord, 425.

The story of Benjamin. Deacon and Martyr.

The Martyrdom of Benjamin.

Likewise under Julian the wicked Apostata, certain there were which constantly suffered Martyrdom by the heathen Idolaters: as Emilianus who was burned in Thracia and Domitius which was slain in his cave. Theodorus also for singing of a Psalm at the removing of the body of Babilas (whereof mention is made before) being apprehended, was so examined with exquisite torments, and so cruelly excruciate from morning almost to noon, that hardly he escaped with life. Who being asked afterward of his friends, how he could abide so sharp torments, said, That at the first beginning he felt some pain, but afterward there stood by him a young man, who as he was sweating, wiped away his sweat, and refreshed him with cold water oft-times: Wherewith he was so delighted, that when he was let down from the engin, it grieved him more than before: Ruff. 5. cap. 26. Artemius also, the Captain of the Egyptian souldiers, the same time lost his head for his Religion indeed: Although other causes were pretended against him: Theodor. Niceph. lib. 10. cap. 11.

Artemius Martyr.

Add unto these moreover Eusebius and Nestabus, two brethren, with Nestor also, who for their Christianity were dragged through the streets and murthered of the Idolatrous people of Gaza: Sozom. lib. eod. cap. 11.

Eusebius, Nestabus, brethren Nestor. Martyrs.

But especially the cruelty of the Arethusians, a people of Syria, exceeded against the Christian Virgins, whom they set out naked before the multitude to be scorned; after that being shaven, they covered them with swill and draffe wont to be given to their Hogs, and so caused their bowels and flesh to be devoured of the hungry swine. This rage and fury of the wicked Arethusians, Sozomenus supposeth to come of this, because that Constantius before had broken them from their Country manner of setting forth and exposing their Virgins filthily to whomsoever lusted, and destroyed the Temple of Venus in Heliopolis, restraining the people there from their filthiness and vile whordom. Sozom. lib. 5. cap. 10.

Eusebius, Nestabus, with other men of Cesarea, Martyrs.

Miserable cruelty against the Christian Virgins of Arethusia.

The people mad to be pluckt from their old customs though it be never so wicked.

Of the lamentable ſtory, or rather tragedy of Marcus Arethuſius their Biſhop, thus writeth the ſaid Sozomenus, and alſo Theodoretus in his third Book in theſe words as follow.

The ſtory of Marcus Arethuſius.

This tragedy (ſaith he) of Marcus Arethuſius, doth require the eloquence and worthineſs of Eſchilus and Sophocles, which may, as the matter deſerveth, ſet forth and beautifie his great afflictions. This man, at the commandment of Conſtantinus, pulled down a certain Temple dedicated to Idols, and in ſtead thereof built up a Church where the Chriſtians might congregate. The Arethuſians remembring the little good will that Julianus bare unto him, accuſed him as a Traytor and Enemy to him. At the firſt, according as the Scripture teacheth, he prepared himſelf to flie: But when he perceived that there were certain of his kinſmen or friends apprehended in his ſtead, returning again of his own accord, he offered himſelf to thoſe that thirſted for his blood. Whom when they had gotten, as men neither pitying his old age and worn years, nor abaſhed at his vertuous converſation, being a man ſo adorned both with Doctrine and manners, firſt ſtript him naked, and pitifully beat him: then within a while after, they caſt him into a foul filthy ſink, and from thence being brought, they cauſed boys to thruſt him in with ſharpned ſticks made for the nonce to provoke his pain the more. Laſtly, they put him in a basket, and being anointed with honey and broth, they hung him abroad in the heat of the Sun, as meat for waſps and flies to feed upon. And all this extremity they ſhewed unto him, for that they would inforce him to do one of theſe things; that is, either to build up again the Temple which he had deſtroyed, or elſe to give ſo much money as ſhould pay for the building of the ſame: But even as he purpoſed with himſelf to ſuffer and abide their grievous torments, ſo refuſed he to do that they demanded of him. At length they taking him to be but a poor man, and not able to pay ſuch a ſum of money, promiſed to forgive him the one half, ſo that he would be contented to pay the other half. But he hanging in the basket wounded pitifully with the ſharpned ſticks of boys and children, and all to be bitten with waſps and flies, did not only conceal his pain and grief, but alſo derided thoſe wicked ones, and called them baſe, low, and terrene people, and he himſelf to be exalted and ſet on high. At length they demanding of him but a ſmall ſum of money, he anſwered thus; It is as great wickedneſs to confer one half penny in caſe of impiety, as if a man ſhould beſtow the whole. Thus they being not able to prevail againſt him, let him down, and leaving him, went their way, ſo that every man might learn at his mouth the example of true piety and faithfulneſs.

The true conſcience of Marcus Arethuſius.

Great cruelty ſhewed.

Covetouſneſs the cauſe of cruelty.

A notable ſaying.

Although the tractation of theſe aforeſaid ſtories and perſecutions of Perſia, above premiſed, do ſtray ſomewhat out of the order and courſe of time and place, as which came neither in the time of Conſtantine, nor be pertinent to the Monarchy of Rome: Yet becauſe in this preſent Hiſtory we are in hand with the holy Martyrs and Saints of Chriſt; for ſo much as theſe alſo gave ſuch a faithful teſtimony of the Lord Jeſus with their blood, I thought therefore not to paſs them over without ſome teſtimony in this our Catalogue of holy Martyrs. And here an end of theſe perſecutions of the Primitive Church.

It may peradventure be marvelled of ſome, reading the Hiſtory of theſe ſo terrible perſecutions above ſpecified, why God Almighty director of all things, would ſuffer his own people and faithful ſervants, believing in his own and only begotten ſon Jeſus, ſo cruelly to be handled, ſo wrongfully to be vexed, ſo extremely to be tormented and put to death, and that the ſpace of ſo many years together, as in theſe foreſaid perſecutions may appear. To the which admiration I have nothing to anſwer, but to ſay with the words of Hierome, Non debemus ſuper hac rerum iniquitate perturbari, videntes, &c. We ought not to be moved with this iniquity of things, to ſee the wicked to prevail againſt the body: For ſo much as in the beginning of the World, we ſee Abel the juſt to be killed of wicked Cain, and afterward Jacob being thruſt out, Eſau to Reign in his fathers houſe: In like caſe the Egyptians with brick and tile afflicted the ſons of Iſrael; yea, and the Lord himſelf, was he not crucified of the Jews, Barabas the thief being let go? Time would not ſuffice me to recite and reckon up how the godly in this world go to wrack, the wicked flouriſhing and prevailing: Hieor. Briefly, howſoever the cauſe hereof proceedeth, whether for our ſins here in this life, or how elſe ſoever; yet this is to us, and may be to all men a ſufficient ſtay, that we are ſure theſe afflictions and perſecutions of God his people in this world, not to come by any chance or blind fortune, but by the provident appointment and forewarning of God. For ſo in the old Law, by the affliction of the children of Iſrael, he hath prefigured theſe perſecutions of the Chriſtians. So by the words of Chriſts own mouth in the Goſpel he did forewarn his Church of theſe troubles to come. Again, neither did he ſuffer theſe ſo great afflictions to fall upon his ſervants, before that he had premoniſhed them ſufficiently by ſpecial revelation in the Apocalyps of John his ſervant; in the which Apocalyps he declared unto his Church before, not only what troubles were coming at hand towards them; where and by whom they ſhould come, but alſo in plain number, if the words of the prophetie be well underſtood, aſſigneth the true time, how long the ſaid perſecutions ſhould continue, and when they ſhould ceaſe. For as there is no doubt, but by the beaſt with ſeven heads, bearing the Whore of Babylon, drunken with the blood of Saints, is ſignified the City of Rome: So in my Judgment the power of making of forty two months (in the thirteenth of the Apocalyps) is to be expounded, taking every month for a Sabbath of years, that is, reckoning a month for ſeven years, ſo that forty and two ſuch Sabbaths of years being gathered together, make up the years juſt, between the time of Chriſts death to the laſt year of the perſecution of Maxentius, when Conſtantinus fighting under the banner of Chriſt, overcame him, and made an end of all perſecution within the Monarchy of Rome. The number of which years by plain computation, come to two hundred ninety and four; to the which two hundred ninety and four years, if ye add the other ſix years, under the perſecution of Licinius in Aſia, then it filleth up full the three hundred years. And ſo long continued the perſecution of Chriſts people, under the heathen Tyrants and Emperors, of the Monarchy of Rome, according to the number of the forty and two months which the beaſt had power to make, ſpecified in the thriteenth of the Apocalyps. For the better explication whereof, becauſe the matter being of no ſmall importance, greatly appertaineth to the publick utility of the Church; and leſt any ſhould miſdoubt me herein, to follow any private interpretation of mine own: I thought good to communicate to the Reader, that which hath been imparted unto me, in the opening of theſe myſtical numbers in the foreſaid Book of Revelation contained, by occation as followeth.

Perſecution cometh by no chance.

The perſecuting time of the Primitive Church under the beaſt, laſted 300. years.

The Iſraelites 300. years.

As I was in hand with theſe Hiſtories, and therein conſidered the exceeding rage of theſe perſecutions, the intolerable torments of the bleſſed Saints, ſo cruelly rackt, rent, torn, and pluckt in pieces with all kind of tortures, pains and puniſhments that could be deviſed, more bitter than any death it ſelf: I could not without great ſorrow and paſſion of mind, behold their ſorrowful afflictions, or write of their bloody paſſions. Wherein much like it hapned to me as did to Titus Livius; who writing of the wars of Carthage, was ſo moved in the writing thereof, Ac ſi in parte aliqua laboris ac periculi ipſe pariter fuiſſet. Further, I proceed in the ſtory; and the hotter the perſecutions grew, the more my grief with them and for them increaſed: Not only pitying their woful caſe, but almoſt reaſoning with God, thus thinking like a fool with my ſelf, why God of his goodneſs would ſuffer his children and ſervants ſo vehemently to be cruciated and afflicted? If mortal things were governed by heavenly providence (as muſt needs be granted) why did the wicked ſo rage and flouriſh, and the godly go ſo to wrack? If ſins deſerved puniſhment, yet neither were they ſinners alone, and why was their death above all other ſo ſharp and bitter? At leaſt why would the Lord ſuffer the vehemency of theſe ſo horrible perſecutions to indure ſo long time againſt his poor Church, ſhewing unto them no certain determined end of their tribulations, whereby they knowing the appointed determination of Almighty God, with more conſolation might indure out the ſame? As the Iſraelites in the captivity of Babylon had ſeventy years limited unto them: And under Pharoah they were promiſed a deliverance out: Alſo under the Syrian Tyrants threeſcore and two weeks were abridged unto them. Only in theſe perſecutions I could find find no end determined, nor limitation ſet for their deliverance. Whereupon much marveling with my ſelf, I ſearched the Book of Revelation, to ſee whether any thing there, might be found; where although I well perceived the Beaſt there deſcribed to ſignifie the Empire of Rome, which had Power to overcome the Saints; yet concerning the time and continuance of theſe Perſecutions under the Beaſt, I found nothing to ſatisfie my doubt. For albeit I read there of forty two months, of a time, times, and half a time, of one thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days; yet all this by computation coming but to three years and a half, came nothing near the long continuance of theſe Perſecutions, which laſted three hundred years. Thus being vexed and turmoiled in ſpirit, about the reckoning of theſe numbers and years: it ſo hapned upon a Sunday in the morning, I lying in my bed, and muſing about theſe numbers, ſuddenly it was anſwered to my mind, as with a Majeſty, thus inwardly ſaying within me, Thou Fool, count theſe months by Sabbaths, as the weeks of Daniel are counted by Sabbaths. The Lord I take to witneſs, thus it was. Whereupon thus being admoniſhed, I began to reckon the forty two months by Sabbaths: firſt of months, that would not ſerve: then by Sabbaths of years, wherein I began to feel ſome probable underſtanding. Yet not ſatisfied herewith, to have the matter more ſure, eſtſoons I repaired to certain Merchants of mine acquaintance: of whom one is departed a true faithful Servant of the Lord, the other two be yet alive, and witneſſes hereof. To whom the number of theſe foreſaid forty two months being propounded and examined by Sabbaths of years, the whole ſum was found to ſurmount unto two hundred ninety and four years, containing the full and juſt time of theſe foreſaid Perſecutions, neither more nor leſs.

Hieron. in Aba. cap. 1.

The wicked in this world do moſt flouriſh and prevail.

Now this one Claſpe being opened, the other numbers that follow are plain and manifeſt to the Intelligent Reader to be underſtood. For where mention is made of three years and a half, of one time, two times and half a time, alſo of one thouſand two hundred and threeſcore days, all theſe come to one reckoning and ſignifie forty and two months, by which months, as is ſaid, is ſignified the whole time of theſe Primitive Perſecutions, as here in order may appear.

The myſtical Numbers in the Apocalyps opened.

1. One thouſand two hundred and ſixty. Rev. 11. 12.

Firſt, where mention is made, Apocalyps, Chapter eleven, that the two Prophets ſhall Propheſie 1260 days; and alſo that the woman flying into the Deſert, ſhall there be fed 1260 days: who knoweth not that 1260 days make three years and a half? that is, months ——— 42

2. Three days and a half. Rev. 11.

Secondly, where we read, Chap. 11. the bodies of the two foreſaid Prophets ſhall lie in the ſtreets of the great City unburied the ſpace of three days and a half, and after the ſaid three days and a half they ſhall revive again, &c. let the hours of theſe three days and a half, (which be 42) be reckoned every day for a Sabbath of years, or elſe every day for a month, and they come to months ——— 42

3. A time, times, and half a time. Rev. 12.

Thirdly, whereas in the ſame Book is expreſſed that the Woman had two wings given her to fly unto the Deſert for a time, times and half a time: give for one time one year, or one day: for two times, two years or two days; for half a time, half a year, or half a day; and ſo it is manifeſt, that theſe three years and a half, mount to months ——— 42

4. Forty two months or three years and a half. Rev. 11.

Fourthly, account theſe forty two months aforeſaid (which the Beaſt had Power to make, Apoc. 11.) by Sabbath of years; that is, ſeven years for a month, or every month for ſeven years, and it amounteth to the ſum of years ——— 294

And ſo have ye the juſt years, days, times, and months of theſe foreſaid Perſecutions under the Beaſt, neither ſhorter nor longer, reckoning from the death of John Baptiſt under Herod the Roman King, to the end of Maxentius, and of Licinius, the two laſt great Perſecutors, the one in the Weſt, the other in the Eaſt: who were both vanquiſhed by godly Conſtantinus. And ſo peace was given to the Church, albeit not in ſuch ample wiſe, but that divers Tumults and Troubles afterward inſued, yet they laſted not long: and the chief brunt, to ſpeak of theſe Roman Perſecutions which the Holy Ghoſt eſpecially conſidered above all other in this his Revelation thus ended in the time of Conſtantinus. Then was the great Dragon the Devil, to wit, the fierce rage and power of his malicious perſecuting, tied ſhort for a thouſand years after this, ſo that he could not prevail in any ſuch ſort; but that the Power and Glory of the Goſpel by little and little increaſing and ſpreading with great joy and liberty, ſo prevailed that at length it got the upper hand and repleniſhed the whole Earth, rightly verifying therein the water of Ezechiel, which iſſuing out of the right ſide of the Altar, the further it ran, the deeper it grew, till at length it repleniſhed the whole Ocean Sea, and healed all the Fiſhes therein. No otherwiſe the courſe of the Goſpel proceeding of ſmall and hard beginnings, kept ſtill his ſtream: the more it was ſtopped, the ſwifter it ran: by blood it ſeeded, by death it quickened, by cutting it multiplied, through violence it ſprung: till at laſt out of Thraldom and Oppreſſion ſo braſt forth into perfect liberty, and flouriſhed in all Proſperity: had it ſo been that the Chriſtians wiſely and moderately could have uſed this liberty, and not abuſed the ſame, forgetting their former Eſtate to their own pride, pomp, and worldly eaſe, as it came afterward to paſs: whereof more is to be ſeen and ſaid (the Lord willing) in place and time convenient. Ezech. 47.

And thus much touching the prophetical numbers in the Apocalyps. Wherein is to be noted, and magnified, the eternal Wiſdom and high Providence of Almighty God, ſo diſpoſing and governing his Church, that no adverſity or perturbation happeneth at any time to it, which his provident wiſdom doth not fore-ſee before, and preordain; neither doth he preordain or determine any thing, which he doth not moſt truly perform, both fore-ſeeing the beginning of ſuch perſecutions, and limiting the end thereof, how long to continue, and when to ceaſe. In much like ſort we read in the Books of Geneſis, how the ſtock of Iſrael was four hundred years in the Land of Egypt. During the ſpace of which four hundred years, after the death of Joſeph (who beareth a plain figure of Chriſt) they were hardly intreated, and cruelly afflicted of the Egyptians, about the ſpace of three hundred years, reckoning from after the death of Joſeph, to their deliverance out of the bondage of Egypt: ſemblably as theſe Chriſtians, after Chriſts time ſuffered the like bondage under the Roman Tyrants. The perſecuted Iſraelites bearing a figure of the perſecuted Church of Chriſt.

Thus much by the way I thought to inſinuate, leſt any ſhould muſe or take any offence in himſelf to ſee or read of the Church ſo long and ſo many years, to be under ſo miſerable and extream Afflictions: wherein neither chance nor fortune, nor diſpoſition of man, hath had any place, but only the fore-counſel and determination of the Lord ſo governed and diſpoſed the ſame: who not only did ſuffer them to fall, and foreſaw thoſe Perſecutions before they fell, but alſo appointed the times and years how long they ſhould laſt, and when they ſhould have an end, as by the foreſaid forty two months in the thirteenth and eleventh Chapters of St. Johns Apocalyps hath been declared. Which months, containing two hundred ninety and four years, if they be rightly gathered, make the full time between the firſt year of the Perſecution of Chriſt under the Jews and Herod, till the laſt year of Perſecution under Licinius; which was from the Nativity of Chriſt, in the year of our Lord three hundred twenty and four: from the firſt Perſecution of Chriſt, in the year of our Lord, two hundred ninety and four, as is aforeſaid. After the which year according to the preordinate Council of God, when his ſeverity had been ſufficiently declared upon his own houſe, it pleaſed him to ſhew mercy again, and to bind up Satan the old Serpent, according to the twentieth Chapter of the Revelation, for the ſpace of a thouſand years; that is, from this time of Licinius, to the time of John Wickliffe and John Huſſe. During all which time, albeit certain Conflicts and Tumults have been among Chriſtian Biſhops themſelves in the Church: yet no univerſal murthering Perſecution was ſtirring before the Preaching of John Wickliffe, of Huſſe, and ſuch others, as in the further proceſs of this Hiſtory (Chriſt willing and aiding us) ſhall more appear hereafter. From the firſt Perſecution of the Primitive Church to the laſt Perſecution two hundred ninety and four years. Univerſal Perſecution ceaſeth for one thouſand years in the Church. Apoc. 10. From the time of Licinius to Wickliffe one thouſand years. Satan bound up for a thouſand years. The time of Satans binding opened.

Thus having at large diſcourſed theſe horrible Perſecutions paſt, and heavy Afflictions of Chriſtian Martyrs now by the Grace of God, coming out of this Red-Sea of bloody Perſecution, leaving Pharaoh and his Hoſt behind: let us ſing glorioufly to the worthy Name of our God, who through the blood of the Lamb after long and tedious Afflictions, at length hath viſited his people with comfort, hath tied up Satan ſhort, hath ſent his meek Moſes (gentle Conſtantine I mean) by whom it hath ſo pleaſed the Lord to work Deliverance to his Captive people, to ſet his Servants at liberty, to turn their mourning into joy, to magnifie the Church of his Son, to deſtroy the Idols of all the World, to grant life and liberty (and would God alſo not ſo much riches) unto them which before were the the abjects of all the World, and all by the means of godly Conſtantinus, the meek and moſt Chriſtian Emperor, of whoſe divine Victories, againſt ſo many Tyrants and Emperors, Perſecutors of Chriſts people, and laſtly, againſt Licinius, in the year of our Lord, three hundred twenty and four, of whoſe other noble Acts and Proweſſes, of whoſe bleſſed Vertues and his happy Birth and Progeny, part we have comprehended before, part now remaining (Chriſt willing) to be declared.

Doulogia. This Conſtantine was the Son of Conſtantius the Emperor, a good and vertuous Child of a good and vertuous Father; born in Britany (as ſaith Eutropius) whoſe Mother was named Helena, Daughter indeed of King Coilus: although Ambroſius in his Funeral Oration of the death of Theodoſius ſaith, ſhe was an Inholders Daughter. The good qualities of Conſtantinus He was a moſt bountiful and gracious Prince, having a deſire to nouriſh Learning and good Arts, and did oftentimes uſe to read, write, and ſtudy himſelf: He had marvelous good ſucceſs and proſperous atchieving of all things he took in hand, which then was (and truly) ſuppoſed to proceed of this, for that he was ſo great a Favourer of the Chriſtian Faith. The cauſe of all his proſperous Succeſs. Which Faith when he had once embraced, he did ever after moſt devoutly and religiouſly reverence, and command by ſpecial Commiſſion and Proclamation, that every man ſhould profeſs the ſame Religion throughout all the Roman Monarchy. Conſtantine ſometimes by means of his wife was an Idolator. The worſhipping of Idols, (whereunto he was addict by the allurement of Fauſta his wife, inſomuch that he did ſacrifice to them) after the diſcomfiture of Maxentius in battel, he utterly abjured: but his Baptiſm he deferred even unto his old age, becauſe he had determined a journey into Perſia, and thought in Jordan to have been baptized, Euſeb. lib. 4. de vita Conſtant. Euſeb. lib. 4. De vita Conſtantini.

As touching his natural diſpoſition and wit, he was very eloquent, a good Philoſopher, and in diſputation ſharp and ingenious. He was accuſtomed to ſay, that an Emperor ought to refuſe no labour for the utility of the Common-weal; yea, and to adventure the mangling of his body for the remedy thereof; but if otherwiſe it may be holden, to cheriſh the ſame. This do Aurelius, Victor, Pomponius Letus, and Ignatius write of him. And Aelius Lampridius ſaith, writing upon the life of Heliogabalus; that Conſtantinus was wont to ſay, That an Empire was given by the determinate purpoſe of God, that he to whom it was given, ſhould ſo imploy his diligence, as he might be thought worthy of the ſame at the hands of the Giver; which ſame ſaying alſo Auguſtine noteth in his third Book againſt Creſconius, Epiſt. 49. & 50. Auguſt. contra Creſcon. Epiſt. 49. 50.

The common ſaying of Conſtantinus.

He firſt entred into the Empire by the mercifulneſs of God, minding after long waves of doleful Perſecution to reſtore unto his Church peace and tranquility, in the year of our Lord three hundred and eleven, as Euſebius accounteth in his Chronicle. His Reign continued, as Eutropius affirmeth, thirty years, Letus ſaith thirty and two years, lacking two months. Great peace and tranquility injoyed the Church under the Reign of this good Emperor, which took great pain and travel for the Preſervation thereof. The effect of ſome of his Conſtitutions. Firſt, yea, and that before he had ſubdued Licinius, he ſet forth many Edicts for the reſtitution of the goods of the Church, for the revoking of the Chriſtians out of exile, for taking away the diſſention of the Doctors out of the Church, for the ſetting of them free from publick Charges, and ſuch like, even as the Copy of his Conſtitutions here under declareth, which Euſebius in his tenth Book and fifth Chapter repeateth in this wiſe.

The Reign of Conſtantinus.

The Copy of an Epiſtle of Conſtantinus, ſent to his Subjects inhabiting in the Eaſt.

Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

VIctor Conſtantinus Maximus Auguſtus, to our loving Subjects inhabiting throughout the Eaſt parts, ſendeth greeting. The thing it ſelf, which in the ſure and moſt firm law of Nature is contained, doth give unto all men (even as God hath ordained the ſame) ſufficient perceivance and underſtanding, both of ſuch things as man ought to fore-ſee, as alſo what things preſently he ought to meditate. Neither is there any thing therein to be doubted of ſuch as have their minds directed to the ſcope or mark of perfect underſtanding: ſo that the perfect comprehending of ſound reaſon, and the perceivance thereof be compared with the knowledge of God, being the true and perfect vertue. Wherefore let no wiſe man be troubled, although he ſees divers men of divers diſpoſitions: for Wiſdom which ſpringeth of vertue, cannot abide or acquaint her ſelf with fond Idiots, unleſs that (on the other ſide) the malice of perverſe filthineſs prolong her days, and cauſe the ſame Idioty to ſurvive. Wherefore ſurely the crown and price of vertue lieth open unto all men, and the moſt mighty God ordereth the judgment of the ſame. I undoubtedly (as manifeſtly as poſſible is) will indeavour my ſelf to teſtifie and confeſs unto you all the hope which is in me. I think verily that the Emperors which before this time have lately been, even for their tyranny had the Empire taken from them: and my Father only exerciſing and uſing all meekneſs and lenity in his affairs, calling upon God the Father with great devotion and humility, hath been exalted to the ſame: and all the reſt, as men wanting their wits, and in compariſon as ſavage Beaſts, gather did give themſelves to like cruelty, than to any lenity and gentleneſs towards their Subjects: in which tyranny every one for his time being nuzzelled, utterly ſubverted the true and unfallible Doctrine; and ſo great malice was there kindled in their breaſts, that when all things were in peaceable tranquility, they made and raiſed moſt cruel and bloody inteſtine or civil Wars. It is credibly informed us, that in thoſe days Apollo gave Anſwers, but not by any mans mouth, but out of a certain Cave and dark place (ſaying) That he was much diſquieted by thoſe that were the juſt men and livers upon the earth; ſo that he could or would not for them declare the truth of ſuch things as others demanded. And hereby it came to paſs, that ſuch falſe Divinations were given from the Golden Tables in Apollos Temple. And this thing did his Prophetical Prieſt complain of, when he took up again the hair of his head, that other had contemptuouſly caſt down; and ſaid, That the neglecting of his divination was the cauſe of ſo many evils amongſt men. But let us ſee what was the end hereof. We now boldly, and without fear, invocate and worſhip the Omnipotent God. When I was a Child, I heard, that he which then was chief Emperor of Rome, unhappy, yea, moſt unhappy man, being ſeduced and brought into error by his Souldiers, curiouſly inquired who were thoſe juſt men upon the earth that Apollo meant? And one of his Prieſts which was near about him, made anſwer, That they were the Chriſtians. This anſwer unto him being as delectable as honey unto the mouth, drew the Sword (given unto him to be a Revenger of evil Doers and Malefactors) againſt the Profeſſors of the irreprehenſible Sanctimony and Religion; and ſtraightway he gave forth a Commiſſion (to bloody Homicides, as I may well call them) and gave Commandment to all the Judges that they ſhould indeavour themſelves with all the cunning they had, to the deviſing of more grievous and ſharper Puniſhments againſt the poor Chriſtians. Then, then I ſay, a man might have ſeen how greatly the honeſt Profeſſors of that Religion were moleſted with cruelty, and daily ſuffered no ſmall Injuries and Contumelies, and that alſo they ſuffered and ſuſtained the ſame with ſuch temperance, as though they had had no Injuries at all done unto them. Which temperance and patience of theirs was the cauſe why the furious Citizens were the more mad and raging againſt them. What Fires, what Tortures, what kind of Torments were there, but they without reſpect either of Age or Sex were inforced to feel them?

The law of nature made perfect, compared with the knowledge of God.

Lithe the nurſe of Ignorance, and Ignorance the enemy to Wiſdom.

Tyranny deſerveth Emperors.

Bloody Tyrants make civil Wars.

Apollo gave anſwer out of a Cave in the ground, that he was diſquieted by the Chriſtians.

The Sword given to be avenged upon Malefactors.

A great commendation of the Chriſtians.

Then did the Earth, without doubt, her ſelf bewail her Children, and the round World which containeth all things, being ſprinkled and imbrued with their blood, made doleful lamen- lamentation for them, and the day it ſelf provoked to mourn, was made amazed for them. But what is this to purpoſe? Now the very barbarous Nations rejoyce for their ſakes which received and harboured them, when they were afraid and fled from us, keeping them, as it were, in moſt loving and amiable Captivity: and they ſaved not only their lives, but alſo were a defence for their Religion. And now alſo the Roman Nation remembreth and hath before their eyes this blame and ſpot, which the Chriſtians that were of that time worthily gave unto them, when they by them were baniſhed (as unfit members of that Common-wealth) amongſt the barbarous people. What needeth to make further rehearſal of the mourning lamentation, which the Heathen people themſelves throughout all the world made for the pitiful murther and ſlaughter of them? After this it came to paſs, that they which were Authors of all theſe miſchiefs died alſo, and were committed for their reward to the moſt filthy and horrible dungeon of Hell. They being ſo intangled with inteſtine and civil Wars, left alive neither Name nor Kinſmen for their own, which thing undoubtedly had not chanced unleſs the wicked Divinations of Apollo's Oracles had deceived and bewitched them. To thee therefore now I pray: Oh moſt mighty God, that thou wilt vouchſafe to be merciful, and pardon all the Eaſt Parts and Inhabitants of the ſame, being oppreſſed with Calamity: and that by me thy Servant thou wilt of thy goodneſs help and relieve the ſame. And theſe things rashly crave I not at thy hands, O Lord, moſt mighty and holieſt God of all. For I being perſwaded by the only Oracles, have both begun and alſo finiſhed wholſome and profitable things: and further, by the bearing and ſhewing of thine Enſign, have overcome a mighty and ſtrong Hoſt; and when any neceſſity of the Common-weal (to my charge committed) requireth thereunto (following thoſe ſigns and tokens of thy Vertues) I boldly go forth and fight againſt mine Enemies: and for this cauſe have I ſacrificed my Soul unto thee, purified and cleanſed both with thy love and fear. Yea truly, thy Name do I ſincerely love, and thy Power do I reverence, which by many Tokens and Wonders haſt ſhewed and confirmed thereby my Belief and Faith. Therefore will I do my endeavour, and bend my ſelf thereunto, that I may re-edifie thy moſt holy Houſe, which thoſe wicked and ungodly Emperors have with ſo great ruine laid waſte; thy people do I deſire to bring and eſtabliſh in firm peace and tranquility, and that for the publick utility of all the Inhabitants of the Earth. Thoſe which yet err, and are out of the way, enjoy the benefit of peace and quietneſs, with and amongſt the number of the faithful ſort: for I truſt the reſtitution of the like ſociety and participation may be a means to bring them alſo that err into the perfect way of verity. Let no man therefore be grievous one unto another, but what every man thinketh beſt, that let him do: for ſuch as are wiſe, ought throughly to be perſwaded, that they only mean to live holily, and as they ſhould do, whom the Spirit of God moveth to take their delight and recreation in reading his holy Will: and if others wilfully will go out of the way, cleaving to the Synagogues of falſe Doctrine, they may at their own peril. As for us, we have the moſt worthy Houſe or Congregation of Gods verity, which he according to his own goodneſs and nature hath given us. And this alſo we wiſh unto them, that with like participation and common conſent, they may feel with us the ſame delectation of mind. For this our Religion is neither new, nor newly invented, but it is as old as we believe the Creation of the World to be, and which God hath commanded to be celebrated with ſuch Worſhip as both ſeemed and pleaſed him: but all living men are lyars, and are deceived with divers and ſundry Illuſions. Thou, O God, for Chriſt thy Sons ſake, ſuffer not this wickedneſs again to root: thou haſt ſet up a clear burning light, that thereby as many as thou haſt choſen may come unto thee, theſe thy Miracles approve the ſame. It is thy Power that keepeth us in innocency and fidelity. The Sun and the Moon run their appointed courſe. Neither yet in ranging-wiſe wander the Stars to what place of the World they liſt themſelves. The days, years, months, and times keep their appointed turns. The Earth abideth firm and unmoveable at thy Word: and the Wind at the time (by thee directed) ſtormeth and bloweth. The ſtreaming watry Floods ebb in time according as they flow. The raging Sea abideth within her bounded limits: and for that the Ocean Sea ſtretcheth out her ſelf in equal length and breadth with the whole Earth, this muſt be wrought with ſome marvelous Workmanſhip of thine own hand. Which thing, unleſs it were at thy Will made and diſpoſed: without all doubt ſo great difference and partition between, would ere this time have brought utter ruine and deſtruction both to the life of man, and to all that belongeth to man beſide. Which for that they have ſuch great and huge Conflicts amongſt themſelves, as alſo the inviſible Spirits have; we give thee thanks, O Lord moſt mighty, God of all gods, that all Mankind hath not been deſtroyed thereby. Surely even as greatly as thy benignity and gentleneſs is manifeſted by divers and ſundry Benefits beſtowed upon us, ſo much alſo is the ſame ſet forth and declared in the Diſcipline of thy eternal Word, to thoſe that be heavenly wiſe, and apply themſelves to the attainment of ſincere and true Vertue. But if any ſuch there be that little regard, or have but ſmall reſpect unto the conſideration thereof, let them not blame or lay a fault in others that do the ſame: for that Phyſick whereby Health is obtained, is manifeſtly offered unto all men. Now therefore let no man go about to ſubvert that, which experience it ſelf doth ſhew (of neceſſity) to be pure and good. Let us therefore altogether uſe the participation of this Benefit beſtowed upon us; that is to ſay, the Benefit of Peace and Tranquility, ſetting apart all Controverſie. And let no man hurt, or be prejudicial to his Fellow for that thing wherein he thinketh himſelf to have done well. If by that, which any man knoweth and hath experience of, he thinketh he may profit his Neighbour, let him do the ſame; if not, let him give over and remit it till another time: for there is a great diverſity betwixt the willing and voluntary imbracing of Religion, and that when a man is thereunto inforced and coacted. Of theſe things have I made a more large Diſcourſe, than indeed the ſcope of mediocrity requireth; eſpecially becauſe I would not have my Faith (touching the verity) to be hid; for that I hear there be ſome which complain that the old accuſtomed haunting of their Temples, and that the power of ſuch Darkneſs is cut off and taken away. Which thing ſurely I would take in better part, were it not that the violent Rebellion of flagitious Error were ſo fixed in many mens hearts, whereby they thirſt after the utter ſubverſion of the Common-weal and Empire.

The Earth bewailed the Martyrs death.

Conſtantinus neither for fear diſſembleth his Faith, neither through policy defaceth Gods glory.

Such was the goodneſs of this Emperor Conſtantinus, or rather ſuch was the providence of Almighty God toward his Church in ſtirring him up, that all his care and ſtudy of mind was ſet upon nothing elſe, but only how to benefit and inlarge the commodities of the ſame. Neither was it to him enough to deliver the Church and people of God from outward vexation of forreign Tyrants and perſecutors. No leſs beneficial was his godly care alſo in quieting the inward diſſentions and diſturbance within the Church, among the Chriſtian Biſhops themſelves; according as we read of Moſes the deliverer of the Iſraelites, in agreeing the brethren together when he ſaw them at variance: Exod. 2. No leſs alſo did his vigilant ſtudy extend in erecting, reſtoring, and inriching the Churches of God in all Cities, and in providing for the Miniſters of the ſame. And therefore writing to Anilinus his cheif Captain, declareth his will and mind to him in letters concerning the goods which did appertain to the Chuches of the Chriſtians, that he ſhould procure vigilantly for the ſame: that all ſuch goods, houſes, and gardens, belonging before to the right of Churches, ſhould again be reſtored in all ſpeedy wiſe, and that he therein might be certified with ſpeed, &c.

The letter of Conſtantinus to Anilinus his Captain.

Moreover, he writing to the ſaid Anilinus in another letter, ſignifieth unto him in this effect: that for ſo much as the contempt of God his reverend Religion, is and hath been ever the greateſt decay to the name and people of Rome, as contrarily the maintaining and reverencing the ſame hath ever brought proſperity to all Common weals: therefore he in conſideration thereof hath taken that order, and giveth to him in charge, that through that Province where he hath to do, which was in Africa where Cecilianus was Biſhop, he ſhould there

Another letter of Conſtatine to Miltiades Biſhop of Rome.

Furthermore the ſaid Conſtantinus in an other Letter writing to Miltiades Biſhop of Rome, and to Marcus, declareth in his Letters to them how Cecilianus Biſhop of Carthage hath been accuſed unto him by divers of his Colleagues and fellow Biſhops. Wherefore his will is, that the ſaid Cecilianus with ten Biſhops his Accuſers, with ten other his Defendants ſhould repair up to him at Rome; where in the preſent aſſiſtance of the foreſaid Miltiades, Rheticus, Maternus, Marinus, and of other their fellow Colleagues, the cauſe of Cecilianus might be heard and rightly examined, ſo that all Schiſm and Diviſion might be cut off from among them, wherein the fervent deſire of Conſtantinus to peace and unity may well appear.

The letter of Conſtantine to Chreſtus Biſhop of Syracuſa.

Upon the like cauſe and argument alſo, he writeth to Chreſtus Biſhop of Syracuſa; being ſo deſirous to nouriſh peace and concord in the Church, that he offereth to him, with his under Miniſters and three Servants, his free carriage to come up to him unto the Council of other Biſhops, for the agreeing of certain matters belonging to the Church.

He writeth alſo another Letter to the forenamed Cecilianus Biſhop of Carthage.

The edict of Conſtantinus to the rulers of the Province of Paleſtine.

To the Provinces likewiſe of Paleſtina and thoſe parts about, he directeth his Edict in the behalf of the Chriſtians, for the releaſing of ſuch as were in Captivity, and for the reſtoring again of them which had ſuſtained any loſs in the former Perſecution before, and for the refreſhing of ſuch as heretofore had been oppreſſed with any ignominy or moleſtation for their confeſſion ſake; declaring in the ſaid Edict how that this whole body, life and ſoul, and whatſoever is in him, he oweth to God and to the ſervice of him, &c.

The letter of Conſtantine to Euſebius. The Council of Nice. The effect of the letter of Conſtantine to Alexander and Arrius. Ex Euſeb. de vita Conſtant. lib. 2.

Moreover an other Letter he writeth to Euſebius for the edifying of new Chriſtian Churches, and reſtoring of them which had been waſted before by foreign Enemies. And after he had collected the Synod of Nice for the ſtudy of peace and unity of the Church, he writeth upon the ſame to Alexander and Arrius. In which his Letters he moſt lamentably uttered the great grief of his heart, to ſee and hear of their contention and diviſion, whereby the peace and common harmony of the Church was broken, the Synod provoked and reſiſted, the holy people of the Lord divided into parts and tumults, contrary to the office of good and circumſpect men, whoſe duty were rather to nouriſh concord, and to ſeek tranquility. And though in ſome ſmall points and light trifles they did diſagree from others; yet the example of Philoſophers might teach them, who although in ſome part of a ſentence or piece of a queſtion, ſome might diſſent from others, yet in the unity of their Profeſſion they did all joyn as fellows together. In like caſe were it their duty in ſuch fruitleſs queſtions (or rather pieces of queſtions) to keep them in the conceptions of their minds in ſilence unto themſelves, and not to bring them forth into publick Synods, to break therefore from the communion of the reverend Council: declaring moreover in the ſaid Epiſtle, the firſt origin and occaſion of this their contentious diſſention to riſe upon vain and trifling terms, vile cauſes and light queſtions, and pieces rather of queſtions; about ſuch matters as neither are to be moved, nor to be anſwered unto, being moved; more curious to be ſearched, and perilous to be expreſſed, than neceſſary to be enquired. Magiſque puerilibus ineptiis, quam ſacerdotum ac cordatorum virorum prudentiæ convenientia; as he there doth term them. Wherefore by all manner of means he doth labour them, doth intreat them, and perſwade them, not only with reaſons, but alſo with tears and ſighing ſobs, that they would reſtore peace again unto the Church, and quietneſs to the reſt of his life (which otherwiſe would not be ſweet unto him) and they would return again to the communion of the reverend Council; who in ſo doing ſhould open his way and purpoſed journey into the Eaſt parts: which otherwiſe hearing of their diſcord and diſſenſion, would be ſorry to ſee with his eyes that which grieveth him now to hear with his ears: with much more in the ſame Epiſtle contained, but this is the effect of the whole, Euſebius, de vita Conſtant. lib. 2. Thus much I thought ſummarily to comprehend, whereby the divine diſpoſition and ſingular gentle nature of this meek and religious Conſtantine might more notoriouſly appear to all Princes, for them to learn by his example what zeal and care they ought to bear toward the Church of Chriſt, and how gently to govern, and how to be beneficial to the ſame.

Conſtantine ſet forth a ſpectacle to all Princes to follow.

Many other Edicts and Epiſtles written to other places and parties, be expreſſed at large in the ſecond Book of Euſebius, De vita Conſtantini; wherein the zealous care and Princely beneficence of this noble Emperor toward the Church of Chriſt may appear: whereof in a brief recapitulation ſuch Specialties we have collected as here followeth, and is to be ſeen in Sozo. lib. 1. cap. 8, 9.

A brief recapitulation of ſuch benefits as wrought by Conſtantine upon Chriſts Church.

Firſt, he commanded all them to be ſet free, whoſoever for the confeſſion of Chriſt had been condemned to baniſhment, or to the Mines of metal, or to any publick or private labour to them inflicted. Such as were put to any infamy or ſhame among the multitude, he willed them to be diſcharged from all ſuch blemiſh of ignominy. Souldiers which before were deprived either of their place, or put out of their wages, were put to their liberty either to ſerve again in their place, or quietly to live at home. Whatſoever honour, place, or dignity had been taken away from any man, ſhould be reſtored to them again. The Goods and Poſſeſſions of them that had ſuffered death for Chriſt, howſoever they were alienated, ſhould return to their Heirs or next of Kin, or for lack of them ſhould be given to the Church. He commanded moreover that only Chriſtians ſhould bear Office; the other he charged and reſtrained, that neither they ſhould Sacrifice nor exerciſe any more Divinations and Ceremonies of the Gentiles, nor ſet up any Images, nor keep any Feaſts of the Heathen Idolators. He corrected moreover and aboliſhed all ſuch unlawful manners and unhoneſt uſages in the Cities as might be hurtful any ways to the Church; as the cuſtom that the Egyptians had in the flowing of Nilus, at what time the people uſed to run together like bruit Beaſts, both Men and Women, and with all kind of Filthineſs and Sodomitry to pollute their Cities in celebrating the increaſe of that River. This abomination Conſtantine extinguiſhed, cauſing that wicked Order called Androgyne, to be killed: by reaſon whereof the River afterward (through the benefit of God) yielded more increaſe in his flowing, to the greater fertility of the ground, than it did before.

Where wickedneſs is punished, there goodneſs followeth.

Among the Romans was an old Law, that ſuch as were barren, having no fruit of Children, ſhould be amerced of half their Goods. Alſo, that ſuch as being above the years of twenty and five unmarried, ſhould not be numbred in the ſame Priviledges with them that were married, neither ſhould be Heirs to them, to whom notwithſtanding they were next in kin. Theſe Laws, becauſe they ſeemed unreaſonable (to puniſh the defect of Nature, or gift of Virginity by mans Law) he abrogated and took away. An other Order was among the Romans, that they which made their Wills being ſick, had certain preſcribed and conceived words appointed to them to uſe, which unleſs they followed, their Wills ſtood in no effect. This Law alſo Conſtantine repealed, permitting to every man in making his Teſtament to uſe what words or what Witneſſes he would. Likewiſe among the Romans he reſtrained and took away the cruel and bloody ſpectacles and fights, where men were wont with Swords one to kill another. Of the barbarous and filthy faſhion of the Arethuſians in Phenicia, I have mentioned before, where they uſed to expoſe and ſet forth their Virgins to open Fornication before they ſhould be married: which cuſtom alſo Conſtantine removed away. Where no Churches were, there he commanded new to be made; where any were decayed, he commanded them to be repaired; where any were too little, he cauſed them to be enlarged, giving to the ſame, great Gifts and Revenues, not only of ſuch Tributes and Taxes coming to him from certain ſundry Cities, which he transferred unto the Churches, but alſo out of his own Treaſures. When any Biſhops required any Council to be had, he ſatisfied their Petitions; and what in their Councils and Synods they eſtabliſhed, being godly and honeſt, he was ready to confirm the ſame.

The liberality of Conſtantine in giving to Churches.

The

The armour of his Souldiers, which were newly come from gentility, he garniſhed with the arms of the Croſs, whereby they might learn the ſooner to forget their old ſuperſtitious Idolatry. Moreover, like a worthy Emperor he preſcribed a certain form of prayer, in ſtead of a Catechiſm for every man to have, and to learn how to pray and to invocate God. The which form of prayer is recited in the fourth Book of Euſebius De vita Conſtantini, in words as followeth:

Euſeb. lib. 4. de vita Conſtant. The form of prayer appointed of Conſtantine for his Souldiers.

Te ſolum novimus Deum, te regem cognoſcimus, te adjutorem invocamus, abs te victorias referimus, per te victorias inimicorum conſtituimus, tibi præſentium bonorum gratiam acceptam ferimus, & per te futura quoque ſperamus, tibi ſupplices ſumus omnes: imperatorem noſtrum Conſtantinum, ac pientiſſimos ejus filios, in longiſſima vita incolumes nobis ac victores cuſtodire ſupplices oramus, per Chriſtum Dominum noſtrum: Amen. In Engliſh.

The Souldiers Prayer.

We acknowledge thee only to be our God, we confeſs thee to be our King, we invocate and call upon thee our only Helper, by thee we obtain our Victories, by thee we vanquiſh and ſubdue our Enemies, to thee we attribute whatſoever preſent Commodities we enjoy, and by thee we hope for good things to come: unto thee we direct all our Suits and Petitions, moſt humbly beſeeching thee to conſerve Conſtantine our Emperor and his noble Children in long life to continue, and to give them Victory over all their Enemies, through Chriſt our Lord: Amen.

The Sunday appointed to be kept holy.

In his own Palace he ſet up an houſe peculiar for Prayer and Doctrine, uſing alſo to pray and ſing with his people. Alſo in his Wars he went not without his Tabernacle appointed for the ſame. The Sunday he commanded to be kept holy of all men, and free from all judiciary Cauſes, from Markets, Marts, Fairs, and all other manual Labours, only Husbandry excepted: eſpecially charging that no Images or Monuments of Idolatry ſhould be ſet up.

Liberties and privileges granted to the Clergy.

Men of the Clergy and of the Miniſtery in all places he indued with ſpecial Priviledges and Immunities, ſo that if any were brought before the civil Magiſtrate, and liſted to appeal to the Sentence of his Biſhop, it ſhould be lawful for him ſo to do, and that the Sentence of the Biſhop ſhould ſtand in as great force as if the Magiſtrate or the Emperor himſelf had pronounced it.

¶ But here is to be obſerved and noted by the way, that the Clerks and Miniſters then newly creeping out of Perſecution, were in thoſe days neither in number ſo great, nor in order of life of the like diſpoſition to theſe in our days now living.

The proviſion and liberality of Conſtantine in maintaining Schools.

No leſs care and proviſion the ſaid Conſtantinus alſo had for the maintenance of Schools pertaining to the Church, and to the nouriſhing of good Arts and liberal Sciences, eſpecially of Divinity: not only with Stipends and Subſidies furniſhing them, but alſo with large Priviledges and Exemptions defending the ſame, as by the words of his own Law is to be ſeen and read as followeth, Medicos, Grammaticos, & alios Profeſſores literarum, & Doctores legum, cum uxoribus & liberis, &c. In Engliſh; Phyſicians, Grammarians, and other Profeſſors of liberal Arts, and Doctors of the Law, with their Wives and Children, and all other their Poſſeſſions which they have in Cities, we command to be freed from all civil Charges and Functions, neither to receive foreign ſtrangers in Provinces, nor to be burthened with any publick Adminiſtration, nor to be cited up to civil Judgment, nor to be drawn out or oppreſſed with any Injury. And if any man ſhall vex them, he ſhall incur ſuch puniſhment as the Judge at his diſcretion ſhall award him. Their Stipends moreover and Salaries we command truly to be paid them, whereby they may more freely inſtruct others in Arts and Sciences, &c.

The priviledge granted by Conſtantine to Univerſities and Schools.

The provident care of Conſtantine to have the Scripture in Churches.

Over and beſides this, ſo far did his godly Zeal and Princely Care and Proviſion extend to the Church of Chriſt, that he commanded and provided Books and Volumes of the Scripture, diligently and plainly to be written and copied out, to remain in publick Churches to the uſe of Poſterity. Whereupon writing to Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia in a ſpecial Letter (recorded in the fourth Book of Euſeb. De vita Conſtant.) he willeth him with all diligence to procure fifty Volumes of Parchment well bound and compacted, wherein he ſhould cauſe to be written out of the Scripture in a fair legible hand, ſuch things as he thought neceſſary and profitable for the Inſtruction of the Church, and alloweth him for that buſineſs two publick Miniſters: he alſo writeth concerning the ſame to the General of his Army, to ſupport and further him with ſuch Neceſſaries, as thereunto ſhould appertain, &c.

Euſeb. lib. 4. de vita Conſtant.

¶ In viewing, peruſing, and writing this ſtory, and in conſidering the Chriſtian Zeal of this Emperor, I wiſh that either this our printing and plenty of Books had been in his days, or that this ſo heroical heart toward Chriſtian Religion, as was in this ſo excellent Monarch, might ſomething appear in inferior Princes reigning in theſe our printing-days, &c.

A wiſh of the author admonitory to Princes.

The liberality of Conſtantine towards the poor and needy.

The liberal hand of this Emperor born to do all men good, was no leſs alſo open and ready toward the needy Poverty of ſuch, which either by loſs of Parents or other occaſions were not able to help themſelves: to whom he commanded and provided due ſubvention both of Corn and Rayment to be miniſtred out of his own Coffers to the neceſſary relief of the poor Men, Women, Children, Orphans, and Widows, Euſeb. de vita Conſtant. lib. 4.

Conſtantine remitteth the fourth part of his rents and revenues.

Finally, among all the other Monuments of his ſingular Clemency and Munificence, this is not to be pretermitted; that through all the Empire of Rome and Provinces belonging to the ſame, not only he diminiſhed ſuch Taxes, Revenues and Impoſt, as publickly were coming to him, but alſo clearly remitted and releaſed to the Contributors the fourth part of the ſame.

Donation of Conſtantine.

This preſent place would require ſomething to be ſaid of the Donation of Conſtantine, whereupon as upon their chiefeſt Anchor-hold, the Biſhops of Rome do ground their ſupream Dominion and Right over all the political Government of the Weſt parts, and the Spiritual Government of all the other Sees and Parts of the World. Which donation to be falſely feigned and forged, and not to proceed from Conſtantine, many Arguments might here be inferred, if leiſure from other matters would ſuffer me.

Reaſons and arguments proving the donation of Conſtantine to be falſified.

1. Firſt, for that no ancient Hiſtory, nor yet Doctor, maketh any mention thereof.

2. Nauclerus reporteth it to be affirmed in the Hiſtory of Iſidorus. But in the old Copies of Iſidorus no ſuch thing is to be found.

3. Gratianus the Compiler of the Decrees, reciteth that Decree, not upon any ancient Authority, but only under the Title of Palea.

4. Gelaſius is ſaid to give ſome teſtimony thereof, in Diſt. 15. Sancta Romana. But that Clauſe of the ſaid diſtinction touching that matter in the old ancient Books is not extant.

5. Otho Phryſingenſis, who was about the time of Gratian, after he hath declared the Opinion of the Favourers of the Papacy, affirming this donation to be given of Conſtantine to Silveſter the Pope, inducеth conſequently the Opinion of them that favour the Empire, affirming the contrary.

6. How doth this agree, that Conſtantine did yield up to Silveſter all the Political Dominion over the Weſt, when as the ſaid Conſtantine at his death, dividing the Empire to his three Sons, gave the Weſt part of the Empire to one, the Eaſt part to the ſecond, the middle part to the third?

7. How is it like that Theodoſius after them, being a juſt and a religious Prince, would or could have occupied the City of Rome, if it had not been his right, but had belonged to the Pope, and ſo did many other Emperors after him?

8. The phraſe of this Decree, being conferred with the phraſe and ſtile of Conſtantine in his other Edicts and Letters above ſpecified, doth nothing agree.

9. Seeing the Papiſts themſelves confeſs that the Decree of this Donation was written in Greek, how agreeth that with truth, when as both it was written not to the Grecians, but to the Romans, and alſo Conſtantine himſelf for lack of the Greek-Tongue, was fain to uſe the Latine-Tongue in the Council of Nice?

10. The contents of this Donation (whoſoever was the Forger thereof) doth bewray it ſelf: for if it be true which there is confeſſed, that he was baptized at Rome of Silveſter, and the fourth day after his Baptiſm this Patrimony was given (which was before his battel againſt Maximinus or Licinius, in the year of our Lord three hundred and ſeventeen, as Nicephorus recordeth) how then accordeth this with that which followeth in the Donation, for him to have Juriſdiction given over the other four Principal Sees

Euſ. Euſeb. lib. 4. de vita Conſtant.

Sees of Antioch, Alexandria, Conſtantinople, and Hieruſalem? when as the City of Conſtantinople was not yet begun before the death of Maximinus or Licinius, and was not finiſhed before the eight and twentieth year of the Reign of Conſtantine, in the year of our Lord three hundred thirty and nine; or if it be true, as Hierome counteth, it was finiſhed the three and twentieth year of his Reign, which was the year our of Lord three hundred thirty and four, long after this donation by their own account.

11. Furthermore, where in the ſaid Conſtitution it is ſaid that Conſtantine was baptized at Rome of Silveſter; and thereby was purged of Leproſie; the Fable thereof agreeth not with the truth of Hiſtory, for ſo much as Euſebius, lib. 4. de vita Conſtantini, Hieronymus in Chron. Ruffin. lib. 2. *cap.*11. Socrates, lib. 1. *cap.*39. *Theod.lib.*1. cap. 31. Sozomenus, lib. 2. cap. 34. do all together conſent that he was baptized not at Rome, but at Nicomedia; and that moreover, as by their teſtimony doth appear, not of Silveſter, but of Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, not before his battel againſt Maximinus or Licinius, but in the thirty firſt year of his Reign, a little before his death.

12. Again, whereas Conſtantine in this donation appointed him to have the Principality over the other four Patriarchal Sees, that maketh Conſtantine contrary to himſelf; who in the Council of Nice afterward agreed with other Biſhops, that all the four Patriarchal Sees ſhould have equal Juriſdiction, every one over his own Territory and Precinct.

13. In ſum, briefly to conclude: who ſo deſireth more abundantly to be ſatisfied touching this matter, let him read the Books of Marſilius Patavinus, intituled, Defenſor pacis, in the year of our Lord, 1324. of Laurentius Valla, Anno 1440. of Antoninus Archbiſhop of Florence, who in his Hiſtory plainly denieth the tenor of this donation to be found in the old Books of the Decrees. Of Cuſanus Cardinalis, lib. 3. cap. 2. writing to the Council of Baſil, Anno 1460. of Aeneas Silvius In dialogo: of Hier. Paulus Cattalanus, Anno 1496. of Raphael Wolateranus, Anno 1500. of Lutherus, Anno 1537. &c. All which, by many and evident probations, diſpute and prove this donation taken out of a Book, De geſtis Silveſtri, and tranſlated (as they fain) by one Bartholomeus Picernus out of Greek into Latine; not to proceed from Conſtantinus, but to be a thing untruely pretenſed, or rather a Fable imagined, or elſe to be the deed of Pipinus or Charles, or ſome ſuch other, if it were ever the deed of any.

Commendation of Conſtantine the Emperour.

And thus haſt thou, (beloved Reader) briefly collected the Narration of the noble Acts and heavenly Vertues of this moſt famus Emperor Conſtantine the great; a ſingular Spectacle for all Chriſtian Princes to behold and imitate, and worthy of perpetual Memory in all Congregations of Chriſtian Saints: whoſe fervent Zeal and Piety in general, to all Congregations and to all the Servants of Chriſt, was notable; but eſpecially the affection and reverence of his heart toward them was admirable, which had ſuffered any thing for the Confeſſion of Chriſt in the Perſecutions before; them had he principally in price and veneration, inſomuch that he imbraced and kiſſed their Wounds and Stripes, and their Eyes, being put out. And if any ſuch Biſhops or any other Miniſters brought to him any Complaints one againſt another (as many times they did) he would take their Bills of Complaint and burn them before their faces; ſo ſtudious and zealous was his Mind to have them agree, whoſe diſcord was to him more grief than it was to themſelves. All the vertuous Acts and memorable Doings of this divine and renowned Emperor to comprehend or commit to Hiſtory, it were the matter alone of a great Volume: wherefore contented with theſe above premiſed, becauſe nothing of him can be ſaid enough, I ceaſe to diſcourſe of him any further.

Conſtantine kiſſed the wounds of them that ſuffered for Chriſt.

Conſtantine burneth the Bills of complaints, and breaketh ſtrife among the Biſhops.

One thing yet remaineth not to be omitted, wherein (as by the way of a note) I thought good to admoniſh the learned Reader, ſuch as love to be converſant in reading of ancient Authors; that in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Euſebius, where in the lower end of the Book is added a certain Oration, Ad conventum Sanctorum, under the name of Euſebius Pamphilius, here is to be underſtood, that the ſaid Oration is wrongfully intituled upon the name of Euſebius, which in very truth is the Oration of Conſtantinus himſelf. For the probation whereof, (beſide the ſtile and matter therein contained, and tractation heroical lively declaring the religious vein of Conſtantine) I alledge the very teſtimony of Euſebius himſelf in his fourth Book De vita Conſtantini, where he in expreſs words not only declareth that Conſtantine wrote ſuch an Oration, intituled, Ad conventum Sanctorum, but alſo promiſeth in the end of his Book, to annex the ſame: declaring moreover what difficulty the Interpreters had to tranſlate the ſame from the Roman Speech, to their Grecian Tongue, Euſeb. de vita Conſtantini, *lib.*4. *pag.*211.

Note, that the oration Ad conventum is wrongly aſcribed to Euſebius, which indeed is the oration of Conſtantine.

And here an end of theſe lamentable and doleful Perſecutions of the Primitive Church, during the ſpace of three hundred years from the Paſſion of our Saviour Chriſt, till the coming of this Conſtantinus; by whom as by the elect Inſtrument of God, it hath ſo pleaſed his Almighty Majeſty, by his determinate purpoſe, to give reſt after long trouble to his Church, according to that Saint Cyprian declareth before to be revealed of God unto his Church: that after darkneſs and ſtormy tempeſt, ſhould come peaceable, calm, and ſtable quietneſs to his Church, meaning this time of Conſtantine now preſent. At which time it ſo pleaſed the Almighty, that the murthering malice of Satan ſhould at length be reſtrained, and himſelf tied up for a thouſand years, through his great mercy in Chriſt, to whom therefore be Thanks and Praiſe now and for ever. Amen.

Satan bound up for a thouſand years.

The End of the Firſt Book.

THE

THE SECOND BOOK,

CONTAINING

The next Three hundred Years following, with ſuch things ſpecially touched as have happened in England, from the time of King Lucius, to Gregorius, and ſo after to the time of King Egbert.

BY theſe Perſecutions hitherto in the Book before precedent thou mayeſt underſtand (Chriſtian Reader) how the fury of Satan and rage of men have done what they could to extinguiſh the Name and Religion of Chriſt: for what thing did lack that either death could do, or torments could work, or the gates of Hell could deviſe, all was to the uttermoſt attempted. And yet all the fury and malice of Satan, all the wiſdom of the world and ſtrength of men, doing, deviſing, practiſing what they could; notwithſtanding the Religion of Chriſt (as thou ſeeſt) hath had the upper hand: which thing I wiſh thee greatly (gentle Reader) wiſely to note and diligently to ponder in conſidering theſe former Hiſtories. And becauſe thou canſt not conſider them, nor profit by them, unleſs thou do firſt read and peruſe them; let me crave therefore thus much at thine hands, to turn and read over the ſaid Hiſtories of thoſe Perſecutions above deſcribed, eſpecially above all the other Hiſtories of this preſent Volum, for thy eſpecial edification, which I truſt thou ſhalt find not unworthy the reading.

A Petition to the Reader diligently to read over the former Book of the Ten Perſecutions.

Now becauſe the tying up of Satan giveth to the Church ſome reſt, and to me ſome leiſure to addreſs my ſelf to the handling of other Stories, I mind therefore (Chriſt willing) in this preſent Book, leaving a while the tractation of theſe general affairs pertaining to the univerſal Church, to proſecute ſuch Domeſtical Hiſtories as more nearly concern this our Country of England and Scotland done here at home, beginning firſt with King Lucius, with whom the Faith firſt began here in this Realm, as the ſentence of ſome writers doth hold. And for ſo much as here may riſe, yea and doth riſe a great controverſie in theſe our Popiſh days, concerning the firſt origine and planting of the Faith in this our Realm, it ſhall not be greatly out of our purpoſe ſomewhat to ſtay and ſay of this queſtion, Whether the Church of England firſt received the Faith from Rome or not? The which although I grant ſo to be, yet being ſo granted, it little availeth the purpoſe of them which would ſo have it. For be it that England firſt received the Chriſtian Faith and Religion from Rome, both in the time of Eleutherius their Biſhop 180 years after Chriſt, and alſo in the time of Auguſtine whom Gregory ſent hither, 600 years after Chriſt, yet their purpoſe followeth not thereby, that we muſt therefore fetch our Religion from thence ſtill as from the chief well-head and fountain of all godlineſs. And yet as they are not able to prove the ſecond, ſo neither have I any cauſe to grant the firſt: that is, That our Chriſtian Faith was firſt derived from Rome, which I may prove by ſix or ſeven good conjectural reaſons. Whereof the firſt I take of the teſtimony of Gildas our Countryman, who in his Hiſtory affirmeth plainly, that Britain received the Goſpel in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, under whom Chriſt ſuffered. Lib. de victoria Aurelii Ambroſii. And ſaith moreover, that Joſeph of Arimathea, after diſperſion of the Jews, was ſent of Philip the Apoſtle from France to Britain, about the year of our Lord 63, and here remained in this land all his time; and ſo with his fellows laid the firſt foundation of Chriſtian Faith among the Britain people, whereupon other Preachers and Teachers coming afterward, confirmed the ſame and increaſed it.

The firſt planting of Chriſtian Faith in England.

Queſtion.

Whether Chriſtian Religion in this Realm came firſt from Rome.

Anſwer.

1. Gildas.

The ſecond reaſon is out of Tertullian, who living near about, or rather ſomewhat before the time of this Eleutherius, in his Book Contra Judæos, manifeſtly importeth the ſame; where the ſaid Tertullian teſtifying how the Goſpel was diſperſed abroad by the ſound of the Apoſtles; and there reckoning up the Medes, Perſians, Parthians, and dwellers in Meſopotamia, Jewry, Cappadocia, Pontus, Aſia, Phrygia, Egypt, Pamphilia, with many more, at length cometh to the Coaſt of the Moorians, and all the borders of Spain, with divers Nations of France; and there amongſt all other reciteth alſo the parts of Britain, which the Romans could never attain to, and reporteth the ſame now to be ſubject to Chriſt; as alſo reckoneth up the places of Sarmatia, of the Danes, the Germans, the Scythians, with many other Provinces and Iſles to him unknown; in all which places (ſaith he) reigneth the name of Chriſt, which now begunneth to be common. This hath Tertullian. Note here how among other divers believing Nations, he mentioneth alſo the wildeſt places of Britain to be of the ſame number, and theſe in his time were Chriſtened, who was in the ſame Eleutherius time, as is above ſaid. Then was not Pope Eleutherius the firſt which ſent the Chriſtian Faith into this Realm, but the Goſpel was here received before his time either by Joſeph of Arimathea, as ſome Chronicles record, or by ſome of the Apoſtles, or of their Scholars, which had been here preaching Chriſt before Eleutherius wrote to Lucius.

2. Ex Tertul. contra Judæos.

My third Probation I deduct out of Origen, Hom. 4. in Ezechielem, whoſe words be theſe, Britanniam in Chriſtianam conſentire religionem. Whereby it appeareth that the Faith of Chriſt was ſparſed here in England before the days of Eleutherius.

3. Ex Origene hom. 4. in Ezech.

For my fourth Probation I take the teſtimony of Beda, where he affirmeth, that in his time, and almoſt a thouſand years after Chriſt here in Britain, Eaſter was kept after the manner of the Eaſt Church, in the full of the Moon, what day in the week ſo ever it fell on, and not on the Sunday, as we do now. Whereby it is to be collected, that the firſt Preachers in this land have come out from the Eaſt part of the world, where it was ſo uſed, rather than from Rome.

4. Ex Bedâ.

Fifthly, I may alledg the words of Nicephorus, lib. 2. cap. 40. where he ſaith that Simon Zelotes did ſpread the Goſpel of Chriſt to the Weſt Ocean, and brought the ſame unto the Iſles of Britain.

5. Ex Nicephi. lib. 2. c. 40.

Sixthly, may be here added alſo the words of Petrus Cluniacenſis, who writing to Bernard, affirmeth that the Scots in his time did celebrate their Eaſter, not after the Roman manner, but after the Greeks, &c. And as the ſaid Britains were not under the Roman order in the time of this Abbot of Cluniack; ſo neither were they nor would be under the Roman Legat, in the time of Gregory, nor would admit any primacy of the Biſhop of Rome to be above them.

6. Ex Pet. Cluniacenſi ad Bernardum.

For the ſeventh argument moreover I may make my Probation by the plain words of Eleutherius, by whoſe Epiſtle written to King Lucius we may underſtand that Lucius had received the Faith of Chriſt in this land, before the King ſent to Eleutherius for the Romen Laws; for ſo the expreſs words of the Letter do manifeſtly purport, as hereafter followeth to be ſeen. By all which conjectures it may ſtand probably to be thought that the Britains were taught firſt by the Grecians of the Eaſt Church, rather than by the Romans.

7. Ex Epiſt. Eleutherii ad Lucium.

Peradventure Eleutherius might help ſomething either to to convert the King, or elſe to increaſe the faith then newly ſprung among the People, but that he preciſely was the firſt, that cannot be proved. But grant he were, as indeed the moſt part of our Engliſh ſtories confeſs, neither will I greatly ſtick with them therein; yet what have they got thereby when they have caſt all their gain? in few words to conclude this matter, if ſo be that the Chriſtian Faith and Religion was firſt derived from Rome to this our Nation by Eleutherius, then let them but grant to us the ſame Faith and Religion which then was taught at Rome, and from thence derived hither by the ſaid Eleutherius, and we will deſire no more; for then neither was any Univerſal Pope above all Churches and Councils, which came not in before Bonifacius time, which was 400 years after; neither any name or uſe of the Maſs, the parts whereof how and by whom they were compiled, hereafter in this Book following appeareth to be ſeen. Neither any ſacrifice Propitiatory for the ſowring of Purgatory was then offered upon hallowed Altars, but only the Communion frequented at Chriſtian Tables, where Oblations and Gifts were offered as well of the People as of the Prieſts to God, becauſe they ſhould appear neither empty nor unkind before the Lord, as we may underſtand by the time of Cyprian. Neither was then any Tranſubſtantiation heard of, which was not brought in before a thouſand years after. Neither were then any Images of Saints departed ſet up in Churches; yea, a great number of the Saints worſhipped in this our time were not as yet born, nor the Churches wherein they were worſhipped were yet ſet up, but came in long after, eſpecially in the time of Irene and Conſtans the Emperor. Likewiſe neither Relicks nor Peregrinations were then in uſe. Prieſts Marriage was then as lawful (and no leſs received) as now; neither was it condemned before the days of Hildebrand, almoſt a thouſand years after that. Their ſervice was then in the vulgar tongue, as witneſſeth Hierome; the Sacraments miniſtred in both kinds as well to Lay-men as to Prieſts, the witneſs whereof is Cyprian. Yea and temporal men which would not then communicate at Eaſter, Whitſontide, and Chriſtmaſs, were not then counted for Catholicks, the Popes own diſtinction can teſtifie. In Funerals, Prieſts then flocked not together, ſelling Trentals and Diriges for ſweeping of Purgatory; but only a Funeral Concion was uſed, with Pſalms of praiſes and ſongs of their worthy deeds, and Hallelujah ſounding on high, which did ſhake the guilded Ceelings of the Temple, as witneſſeth Nazianzen, Ambroſe, with Hierome, &c.

What difference between the late Church of Rome and the old Church of Rome, and in what matters.

In the Supper of the Lord, and at Baptiſm, no ſuch Ceremonies were uſed, as now of late have been intruded: inſomuch that as in this Story is ſhewed hereafter; both Auguſtine and Paulinus baptiſed then in Rivers, not in hallowed Fonts, as witneſſeth Fabianus. The Portues of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, with Mattens and Evenſong of the day; again, neither the Orders and Religions of Monks and Friers were not yet dreamed of, to the ſpace almoſt of a thouſand years after, &c. So that, as I ſaid, if the Papiſts would needs derive the Faith and Religion of this Realm from Rome, then let them ſet us and leave us there where they had us; that is, let them ſuffer us to ſtand content with that Faith and Religion, which then was taught and brought from Rome by Eleutherius (as now we differ nothing from the ſame) and we will deſire no better. And if they will not, then let the wiſe Reader judge where the fault is, in us, or them, which neither themſelves will perſiſt in the Antiquity of the Romiſh Religion which they ſo much brag of, neither will they permit us ſo to do.

Fabian. cap. 119 & 120.

And thus much by the way to ſatisfie the foreſaid objection, whereby we may have now a more ready paſſage into the order and courſe of the Hiſtory. Being therefore granted unto them which they ſo earneſtly ſtick upon, that the Chriſtian Faith and Religion of this Realm was brought from Rome, firſt by Eleutherius, then afterward by Auguſtine; thus write the Chronicles of that matter.

Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome.

Auguſtine a The faith of Chriſt brought into this Realm.

About the time and year of the Lord 180. King Lucius ſon of Coilus, which builded Colcheſter, King of the Britains, who then were the Inhabiters and Poſſeſſors of this Land (which now we Engliſh men call England) hearing of the Miracles and Wonders done by the Chriſtians at that time in divers places (as Monumetenſis writeth) directed his Letters to Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome, to receive of him the Chriſtian Faith; although about the computation of the year and time, great difference there is in Authors when this ſhould be. Nauclerus ſaith it was Anno 156. but that cannot be, for ſo much as Eleutherius was not yet Biſhop by the ſpace of twenty years after that. Henricus de Erfordia ſaith, it was Anno 169. in the nineteenth year of Verus Emperor; but that agreeth not with approved Hiſtories, which all conſent that Verus reigned not nineteen years; and if he had, yet that year cometh not to the year of our Lord 169. but to the year 181. Some others ſay, that Eleutherius was made Biſhop in the ſixth year of Commodus, which was the year of our Lord 180. but that ſeemeth to go too far, but let the Authors agree as they can. Let us return to Eleutherius the good Biſhop, who hearing the requeſt of this King, and glad to ſee the godly towardneſs of his well diſpoſed mind, ſendeth him certain Teachers and Preachers called Fugatius, or by ſome Faganus, and Damianus, or Dimianus, which converted firſt the King and People of Britain, and baptiſed them with the Baptiſm and Sacrament of Chriſts Faith. The Temples of Idolatry and all other Monuments of Gentility they ſubverted, converting the People from their divers and many Gods, to ſerve one living God. Thus true Religion with ſincere faith increaſing, Superſtition decayed, with all other Rites of Idolatry. There were then in Britain 28 Head Prieſts which they called Flamines, and three Archprieſts among them, which were called Arch-Flamines, having the overlight of their manners, and as Judges over the reſt. Theſe 28 Flamines they turned to 28 Biſhops, and the three Arch-Flamines to three Archbiſhops, having then their ſeats in three principal Cities of the Realm; that is, in London, in York, and in Glamorgantia, Videlicet in urbe legionum, by Wales. Thus the Countries of the whole Realm being divided every one under his own Biſhop, and all things ſetled in a good order; the foreſaid King Lucius ſent again to the ſaid Eleutherius for the Roman Laws, thereby likewiſe to be governed, as in Religion now they were framed accordingly; unto whom Eleutherius again writeth after the tenor of theſe words enſuing:

Faganus. Damianus.

Eight and twenty Biſhops within this Realm. Three archBiſhops.

The Epiſtle of Eleutherius, Biſhop of Rome, ſent to King Lucius.

Ex veteſto codice regum antiquorum

Anno 169. a paſſione Chriſti ſcripſit Dominus Eleutherius Papa Lucio Regi Britanniæ, ad correctionem Regis & procerum Regni Britanniæ, and ſo forth as followeth in Engliſh.

The Epiſtle of Eleutherius to King Lucius.

Ye require of us the Roman Laws, and the Emperors to be ſent over to you, which you may practiſe and put in ure within your Realm. The Roman Laws and the Emperors we may ever reprove, but the Laws of God we may not. Ye have received of late through Gods mercy in the Realm of Britanny, the Law and Faith of Chriſt; ye have with you within the Realm, both the parts of the Scripture. Out of them by Gods grace, with the Council of your Realm take ye a Law, and by that Law (through Gods ſufferance) rule your Kingdom of Britain. For you be Gods Vicar in your Kingdom, according to the ſaying of the Pſalm, Deus judicium tuum Regi da, &c. that is, O God give thy judgment to the King, and thy righteouſneſs to the Kings ſon, &c. He ſaid not, the judgment and righteouſneſs of the Emperor, but thy judgment and juſtice; that is to ſay, of God. The Kings ſons be the Chriſtian people and folk of the Realm, which be under your government, and live and continue in peace within your Kingdom, as the Goſpel ſaith, Like as the Hen gathereth her Chickens under her wings, ſo doth the King his People. The people and folk of the Realm of Britain be yours: whom if they be divided, ye ought to gather in concord and peace, to call them to the Faith and Law of Chriſt, and to the holy Church, to cheriſh and maintain them, to rule and govern them, and to defend them always from ſuch as would do them wrong, from malicious men and enemies. A King hath his name of ruling, and not of having a Realm. You ſhall be a King while you rule well; but if you do otherwiſe, the name of a King ſhall not remain with you, and you ſhall loſe it, which God forbid. The Almighty God grant you ſo to rule the Realm of Britain, that you may Reign with him for ever, whoſe Vicar you be in the Realm,

The King Gods Vicar within his own Kingdom.

After

Lucius firſt chriſtned of the Britains. Ex Monumetenſi & alib.

After this manner (as you have heard) was the Chriſtian Faith either firſt brought in, or elſe confirmed in this Realm of Britain by the ſending of Eleutherius, not with any Croſs or Proceſſion, but only at the ſimple Preaching of Fagan and Damian, through whoſe Miniſtry this Realm and Iſland of Britain was eftſoons reduced to the Faith and Law of the Lord, according as was propheſied by Iſaiah, as well of that as other Iſlands more, where he ſaith, Chap. 42. He ſhall not faint nor give over, till he hath ſet judgment in earth, and Iſlands ſhall wait for his Law, &c. The Faith thus received of the Britains continued among them and flouriſhed the ſpace of 216 years, till the coming of the Saxons, who then were Pagans; wherefore more followeth hereafter to be ſaid, the Lord Chriſt aſſiſting thereunto. In the mean time ſomething to ſpeak of this ſpace before, which was betwixt the time of Lucius, and the firſt coming in of the Saxons: Firſt, it is to be underſtood that all this while as yet, the Emperors of Rome had not received the Faith, what time the Kings of Britain and the ſubjects thereof were converted now, as is ſaid, to Chriſt; for the which cauſe much trouble and perturbation was ſought againſt them, not only here in Britain, but through all parts of Chriſtendom by the Heathen Infidels. Inſomuch that in the Perſecution only of Diocleſian and Maximinian, reigning both together within one month, 17000 Martyrs are numbred to have ſuffered for the name of Chriſt, as hath been hitherto in the Book before ſufficiently diſcourſed.

Thus therefore, although the foreſaid Lucius the Britain King, through the merciful Providence of God was then Chriſtened, and the Goſpel received generally almoſt in all the land, yet the ſtate thereof, as well of the Religion as of the Commonwealth, could not be quiet, for that the Emperors and Nobles of Rome were Infidels, and enemies to the ſame; but eſpecially for this cauſe, it ſo happening that Lucius the Chriſtian King died without iſſue. For thereby ſuch trouble and variance fell among the Britains (as it happeneth in all other Realms, and namely in this Realm of England, whenſoever Succeſſion lacketh) that not only they brought upon them the Idolatrous Romans, and at length the Saxons, but alſo inwrapped themſelves in ſuch miſery and deſolation, as yet to this day amongſt them remaineth. Such a thing it is where a Prince or a King is in a Kingdom, there to lack Succeſſion, as eſpecially in this caſe may appear. For after the death of Lucius, when the Barons and Nobles of the land could not accord within themſelves upon Succeſſion of the Crown, the Romans ſtept in and got the Crown into their own hands, whereupon followed great miſery and ruin to the Realm. For ſometimes the Idolatrous Romans, ſometimes the Britains reigned and ruled as violence and victory would ſerve; one King murthering another, till at length the Saxons came and deprived them both, as in proceſs hereafter followeth to be ſeen.

Henr. Hunting. lib. 1. What incommodity cometh by lack of Succeſſion.

In the mean ſeaſon touching the ſtory of King Lucius, here is to be reproved the fable of ſome Writers falſly feigning of him that he ſhould after his Baptiſm received, put off all his Kingly honour, forſake the land, and be made a Preacher, who after long travel in Preaching and teaching in France, in Germany, in Auguſta, and in Suevia, at length was made Doctor and Rector of the Church of Cureac, where (as this Fable ſaith) he ſuffered Martyrdom. But this fancy of whomſoever it firſt did ſpring, diſagreeth from all our Engliſh Stories, who with a full conſent do for the moſt part concord in this, that the ſaid Lucius after he had founded many Churches, and given great riches and liberties to the ſame, deceaſed with great tranquillity in his own land, and was buried at Glouceſter the fourteenth year after his Baptiſm, as the Book of Flores Hiſtoriarum doth count, which was the year of our Lord, as he ſaith 101, and reckoneth his converſion to be in the year 87. In ſome I find his deceaſe to be the fourth, and in ſome the tenth year after his Baptiſm, and ſome hold that he reigned all the ſpace of 77 years. And thus much concerning King Lucius.

The deceaſe of King Lucius. Ex Florilegio.

Now to proceed in order of the ſtory, briefly to touch the ſtate of the foreſaid land of Britain, between the time of King Lucius, and the entring of the Saxons, who were the Kings thereof, and in what order they ſucceeded, or rather invaded one after another, this Catalogue here under written will ſpecifie.

By this Table may appear a lamentable face of a Commonwealth ſo miſerably rent and divided into two ſorts of people, differing not ſo much in Country as in Religion; for when the Romans reigned, they were governed by the Infidels; when the Britains ruled, they were governed by Chriſtians. Thus what quietneſs was or could be in the Church in ſo unquiet and doubtful days, may eaſily be conſidered.

Albeit notwithſtanding all theſe foreſaid Heathen Rulers of the Romans which here governed, yet (God be praiſed) we read of no Perſecution during all theſe Ten Perſecutions above mentioned, that touched the Chriſtian Britains, before the laſt Perſecution only of Diocleſian and Maximinus Herculeus, which here then exerciſed much cruelty. This Perſecution, as it was the laſt among the Roman Chriſtians, ſo it was the firſt of many and divers that followed after in this Church and Realm of England; whereof we will hereafter Entreat (Chriſt willing) as order of the matter ſhall lead us. In the mean time this rage of Diocleſian as it was univerſally through all the Churches in the world, fierce and vehement, ſo in this Realm of Britain alſo it was ſo ſore, that as all our Engliſh Chronicles do teſtifie and record, all Chriſtianity almoſt in the whole land was deſtroyed, Churches were ſubverted, all Books of the Scriptures burned, many of the faithful, both men and women were ſlain. Among whom the firſt and chiefeſt was Albanus, then Julius, Aaron, and Amphibalus, of whom ſufficiently hath been ſaid before. What were the others, or how many they were that ſuffered beſides, Stories make no rehearſal. And thus much thereof.

The Britains never touched with any Perſecution before the time of Diocleſian.

Now as concerning the Government of theſe above-named Kings of Britain, although I have little or nothing to note which greatly appertaineth to the matter of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, yet this is not to be paſt over. Firſt, how in the order of theſe Kings cometh Conſtantinus the Great and worthy Emperor, who was not only a Britain born by his Mother Helena, being King Coilus daughter, but alſo by the help of the Britains Army (under the power of God) which the ſaid Conſtantine took with him out of Britain to Rome, obtained with great victory peace and tranquillity to the whole univerſal Church of Chriſt, having three Legions with him out of this Realm of choſen and able Souldiers, whereby the ſtrength of the land was not a little impaired and endangered, as afterwards in this Story followeth.

Conſtantine the Great born and bred in Britain.

The cauſe how this Realm of Britain was firſt weakned.

After him likewiſe Maximian following his ſteps, took with him alſo (as Stories record) all the power and ſtrength

ſtrength which was left, and whatſoever he could make of able and fighting men to ſubdue France; beſides the Garriſons which he had out with him before, ſending for more to the number of an hundred thouſand Souldiers at once to be ſent to him out of Britain into France. At which time alſo Conanus his partner, being then in France, ſent over for Virgins from Britain, to the number of 11000, who with Urſula, the Prince Dionets daughter being ſhipped over, many periſhed in the Sea, ſome were taken of the Infidels marching upon the borders; with whom becauſe they would not be polluted, all were deſtroyed, being miſerably diſperſed (ſome one way, ſome another) ſo that none eſcaped.

Britain ſpoiled of Souldiers, Urſula with 11000 Virgins.

Thus poor Britain being left naked and deſtitute on every ſide, as a maimed body without might or ſtrength, was left open to his enemies, not able to ſuccour it ſelf without help of foreign friends; to whom they were then conſtrained to fly, eſpecially to the Romans, to whom the Britains ſent this word or meſſage, Ætio ter conſuli gemitus Britannorum. Repellunt nos Barbari ad mare: repellit nos mare ad Barbaros. Hinc oriuntur duo funerum genera, quia aut jugulamur, aut ſubmergimur. But the Romans then began to forſake them, whereby they were in nearer danger to be oppreſſed by Gwanus and Melga, had not Gwetelinus the Archbiſhop of London made over to leſſer Britain, and obtaining their help, had brought Conſtantinus the Kings brother to reſcue his Country againſt the Infidels. This Conſtantinus was brother to Aldroenus, King of little Britain, and father to Conſtance, Aurelius Ambroſius, and Uter, who after reigned Kings in Britain.

Gwetelinus Archbiſhop of London. Ex Chronico Monumetenſi. Conſtantinus, Conſtans, Aurelius Ambroſius, Uter Pendragon. The Saxons ſent for to Britain.

Thus by the means of the good Archbiſhop and Conſtantinus, the ſtate of the Religion and Realm of Britain was in ſome mean quiet and ſafety, during the time of the ſaid Conſtantine, and of the good Archbiſhop. But as the Realm of Britain almoſt from the beginning was never without Civil war, at length came wicked Vortigerne, who cruelly cauſing Conſtance his Prince to be murthered, ambitiouſly invaded the Crown; who then fearing the other two Brethren of Conſtance, which were Aurelius and Uter, being then in little Britain, did ſend over for the aid of the Saxons, being then Infidels; and not only that, but alſo married with an Infidel, the daughter of Hengiſt, called Rowen. Whereupon the ſaid Vortigerne not long after by the ſaid Hengiſt and the Saxons was with like treachery diſpoſſeſſed of his Kingdom, and the people of Britain driven out of their Country, after that the Saxons had ſlain of their chief Nobles and Barons at one meeting (joyning together ſubtilty with cruelty) to the number of 271; ſome ſtories ſay 460. This wicked act of the Saxons was done at Almesbury, or at a place called Stonehenge. By the monument of which ſtones there hanging, it ſeemeth that the noble Britains there were buried.

A wicked murther of the Saxons.

This fabulous ſtory of the Welchmen, of bringing theſe ſtones from Ireland by Merlin, I paſs over. Some Stories record that they were ſlain being laid to a Banquet. Others ſay that it was done at a talk or aſſembly, where the Saxons came with privy Knives contrary to promiſe made; with the which Knives they giving a privy watch-word in their Saxon ſpeech, Neme your ſexes, ſlew the Britains unarmed. And thus far concerning the Hiſtory of the Britains. As this great Plague could not come to the Britains without Gods permiſſion, ſo Gildas ſheweth in his Chronicle the cauſe thereof, writing thus, Quod Britones propter avaritiam & rapinam principum, propter iniquitatem & injuſtitiam judicum, propter deſidiam prædicationis Epiſcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidiſſe, &c.

The Entring and Reigning of the Saxons in the Realm of England,

Aurelius and Uter, ſons to Conſtantinus.

THIS was the coming in firſt of the Angles or Saxons into this Realm, being yet Unchriſtened and Infidels, which was about the year of our Lord, as William Malmsbury teſtifieth, 469; the Captains of whom were Hengiſtus and Horſus. Although the ſaid Hengiſt and Saxons at their firſt coming, for all their ſubtil working, and cruel attempt, had no quiet ſetling in Britain, but were driven out divers times by the valiantneſs of Aurelius Ambroſius, and his Brother Uter above mentioned, who reigned after that among the Britains; yet notwithſtanding they were not ſo driven out, but that they returned again, and at length poſſeſſed all, driving the Britains (ſuch as remained) into Cambria, which we call now Wales. Hengiſtus (as ſome Chronicles record) reigned three and forty years, and died in Kent. Galfridus in ſuo Britannico ſaith, that he was taken in War by Aurelius Ambroſius, and beheaded at Coningsburgh, after he had reigned nine and thirty years.

Ex Galfrido Monumetenſi Britannico.

After the death of Hengiſt, his Son Oſca reigned four and twenty years, leaving his Son Octa, to whoſe reign with his Son Imenricus, Hiſtories do attribute three and fifty years, who alſo were ſlain by Uter Pendragon. Ex Polychr. lib. 5. cap. 4. Polychronicon. lib. 5. cap. 4.

The Saxons after they were ſetled in the poſſeſſion of England, diſtributed the Realm among themſelves firſt in ſeven parts, every part to have his King; that is, the firſt to be the King of Kent; the ſecond to be King of Suſſex and Southery, holding his Palace at Ciceſter; the third King was of Weſtſex; the fourth King of Eſſex; the fifth King was of the Eaſtangles, that is, of Cambridgeſhire, Norfolk and Suffolk; the ſixth King of Merceland, or Mercia, and in his Kingdom were contained the Countries of Lincoln, Leiceſter, Huntington, Northampton, Oxford, Derby, Warwick, &c. the ſeventh King had all the Countries beyond Humber, and was called King of Northumberland. Seven Kings ruling in England.

Of the Seven Kingdoms, although they continued not long, but at length joyned all in one, coming all into the poſſeſſion and ſubjection of the Weſtſaxons; yet for the ſpace they continued (which was with continual trouble and wars among themſelves) this is the race and order of them, as in this Table particularly followeth to be ſeen.

A TABLE deſcribing the Seven Kingdoms of the Saxons reigning here in ENGLAND.

IN the time of Vortiger above mentioned, began the Reign of the Saxons in this Land, the which coming out of three ſorts of the German people (to wit) the Saxons, the Jutes and Angles, repleniſhed the Land, of them called now Anglia. Of whom firſt Hengiſtus reigned in Kent, which Country of Kent he had obtained by Rowen his daughter, of King Vortiger, which was about the year of our Lord (as ſome do count) 476, or (as I find) in the computation of our Engliſh Tables 456, in ſome 463. After Hengiſt came in Octha, with Eoſa, or Iſſe his Kinſman; who afterward ſucceeded the ſaid Hengiſt in Kent. Not long after came in another company of the Saxons, with Elle their Captain, which planted themſelves in Southſax. And after them again another Garriſon of the Saxons, with Cerdice their Captain, which did occupy the Weſt part of the Land, called by them Weſtſaxon. And ſo likewiſe the other multitude of the Saxons after them, which as yet being Unchriſtened and Infidels, divided the whole Land among themſelves into Seven Kingdoms, as in this Table followeth.

Unto the time of Edrick all the Biſhops of Canterbu. were Italians.

Some Chronicles do place theſe two, Nidredus and Wilhardus after Edrick, and give to them ſeven years, ſome again do omit them.

Between the reign of Alrick & Cuthred, ſome ſtories do inſert the reign of Eadbert, which reigned two years.

In the reign of this Baldred, the Kingdom of Kent was tranſlated to Egbertus, otherwiſe called Egbrict, King of the Weſtſaxons; who ſubduing the foreſaid Baldred, in the year 832, gave the ſaid Kingdom to Athelſtan his younger Son. After whoſe deceaſe it came to Ethelwolf the Elder Son of Egbrict, and ſo was united to the Weſtſaxons; who then began to be the Monarch of the whole land. This Kingdom began near about the year of our Lord 456, and continued 342 years, and had fifteen Kings.

| Ida. 12 | This Ida of his Wife had ſix Children, Adda, Elricus, Oſmerus, Theodledus; of Concubines other ſix. |
| | After Ida the Kingdom of Northumberland was divided into two Provinces, Deira and Bernicia. |
| Alle or Elle, Deirorum. 30 | This Alle was the Son of Iſſe, and reigned in Deira. |
| Adda, Bernicorum. 7 | Some Chronicles ſet under Adda, to reign in Bernicia, theſe Kings, Glappa or Claſſa, Theonulfus, or Huſſa, or Theodwalnus, Frithulfus, Theodricus. |
| Alricus, or Alfricus Deirorum. 5 | This Alfricus was the Son of Ida, and reigned five years. |
| Ethelfridus Bernicorum. | This Ethelfridus was he that ſlew the Monks of Bangor, to the number of 2200, which came to pray for the good ſucceſs of the Britains; and by his Wife Accan, the daughter of Elle, he had ſeven Sons, Eaufridus, Oſualdus, Oſwius, Oſlacus, Oſmundus, Oſa, Offa. Flor. Hiſtor. |
| Edwinus Northumberland ſlain. 17 | This Edwinus was the firſt of the Northumberland Kings, which was converted and Chriſtened by Paulinus Biſhop of London. |
| Oſricus Deirorum ſlain. | Theſe two are put out of the race of Kings, becauſe they revolted from the Chriſtian faith, and were both ſlain miſerably by Cedwalla a Britain, which then reigned in Northumberland, and in Mercia. |
| Eaufridus Bernicia, ſlain. | |
| Oſwaldus, of Northumberland, ſlain. | This Oſwaldus, called S. Oſwald, fought with Cedwalla and Penda with a ſmall army, and by ſtrength of prayer vanquiſhed them in the field. He ſent for Aedanus into Scotland to preach in his Country, and as he preached in Scotiſh, the King expounded in Engliſh. He was a great giver of alms to the poor. Of his other acts more appeareth hereafter. |
| Oſwius, Northumberland. 28 | This Oſwius fighting againſt Penda, vowed to make his Daughter Elfred a Nun, giving with her twelve Lordſhips to build twelve Monaſteries, ſix in Bernicia, ſix in Deira. |
| Oſwinus reigned together with Oſwius in Deira, ſlain. 7 | The ſame Oſwius in the beginning of his reign took one Oſwinus the Son of Edwin to be his partner over the Country of Deira. Afterward cauſing him to be killed, took to him another called Edelwald, the Son of Oſwald. Of this Oſwinus more followeth hereafter to be declared. |
| Egfridus Northumberland, ſlain. 15 | This Egfrid married Aetheldrida, who being twelve years married to him, could after by no means be allured to lie with him, but obtaining of him licenſe, was made Nun, and then Abbeſs of Ely. She made but one meal a day, and never wore linnen. At laſt the ſame Egfrid, fighting againſt the Scots, |

| Alfridus, Northumberland, ſlain. 20 | | Scots, was ſlain in the field by a train of the Scots, fayning themſelves to fly. Of this Alfride, Beda in his Hiſtory teſtifieth, that he was exactly and perfectly ſeen in the holy Scriptures, and recovered much that his Predeceſſors had loſt before. Bed. lib. 4. c. 24. Some ſay he reigned not 18 years. |
| Oſredus, Northumberland, ſlain. 11 | | Oſred began his reign being but eight years old, and reigned the ſpace of ten years. |
| Kenredus, North. 2 | | |
| Oſricus, North. 20 | | Some affirm that Oſricus reigned but 11 years. |
| Celulfus, Northumberl. made a Monk. 9 | | This Celulfe after he had reigned eight years, was made a Monk. To him Beda wrote his Story. |
| Egbertus, or Eadbertus, Northumberla. Monk. 21 | | |
| Oſulfus, Northumberland, ſlain. 1 | | |
| Mollo, or Ethelwold, Northumb. 11 | | Mollo by the ſubtil train of Alfredus was made away, which Alfredus alſo himſelf after he had reigned ten years, was expulſed by his own people. |
| In ſome Chronicles ſix years. | | In ſome Chronicles this Alfredus reigned but eight years. |
| Altredus, Nowhumber. expulſed. 10 | | |
| Ethelbertus, or Edelredus, Northumberland, expulſed. 5 | | |
| Alfwoldus, Northumberland, ſlain. 17 | | |
| Oſredus. | | |
| Ethelbertus, or Adelwaldus, North. ſlain. 16 | | |

After this Ethelbert, the Kingdom of Northumberland ceaſed the ſpace of 25 years, till Egbertus King of the Weſtſaxons ſubdued alſo them, as he did the other Saxons to his Dominion. After the which Egbert K. of the Weſtſaxons ſucceeded in Northumberland his Son.

Richſt. Gurthrid. } Danes.
Egebert.

After the reign of theſe foreſaid Danes, the Kingdom of Northumberland came into the hands of the Weſtſaxons, in the time of Athelſtane, and his Brother Edmund. It began firſt in the year 547, and ſo endured 409 years. It contained Yorkſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, the Biſhoprick of Durham, Copeland, and others.

Malmesb. de vitis Pont.* After him was Erkenwaldus, of whom writeth Beda, that he being diſeaſed in his legs that he could not go nor ride, yet would be carried about in a Litter to preach in his Dioceſs, &c. Although William Malmesbury writing of the Biſhops of London in his Book De vitis Pont. ſaith that Mauritius, firſt the Kings Chancellor, then Biſhop there, did firſt begin this ſo large and famous building of the Church of St. Paul in London; which work after him Richard his Succeſſor did proſecute, beſtowing all the rents of his Biſhoprick upon the ſame, and yet was ſcarcely ſeen. Yet herein may be anſwered peradventure, that the Church builded before by King Ethelbert and King Sigebert, might be overthrown by the Danes, and afterward was re-edified by theſe Biſhops above mentioned.

| St. Edmund, Martyred. | 165 | |

After the death of St. Edmund, being ſlain of the Infidel Danes, the Kingdom remained with the Danes fifty years, till at length Edward King of the Weſtſaxons expulſed the Danes, and joined it to his Kingdom. It began about the year of our Lord 561, and continued near about 377 years, Fabian numbreth but twelve Kings, but in others I find more.

The Metropolitan See of this Province of Eaſtangles was firſt at a Town called Dunmoke, or Dunwich, which in times paſt hath been a famous and populous Town, with a Mayor and four Bailiffs, and alſo divers Pariſh-Churches and Hoſpitals, whereunto great Priviledges by divers Kings have been granted: which Town is now fallen into ruin and decay, and more than half conſumed by the eating in of the Sea, as alſo greatly impoveriſhed by loſs of the Haven, which heretofore hath flouriſhed with divers tall Ships belonging to the ſame, (the inhabitants thereof being not able of themſelves to repair it without the help of other good people); where the firſt Biſhop was Felix, a Burgundian, who ſat there fourteen years. After this, unto the time of Egebert King of Weſtſax, this Province was ever ruled by two Biſhops, whereof the one had his See at Dunmoke, now called Dunwich; the other at Hemaham, where twelve ſat one after another. From thence it was tranſlated to Thetford, where ſat three Biſhops. At laſt by Biſhop Herbert it was removed to Norwich, where he erected a Monaſtery of Monks.

This Dunwich lieth upon the Sea-ſide in Suffolk.

§ And thus ſtandeth the order and race of the Saxon Kings, reigning together with the Britains in this Realm. Now followeth the deſcription of the Britain Kings, reigning with the Saxons in like manner.

Although the miſerable Britains thus were bereaved of their land, by the cruel ſubtilty of the Saxons, yet were they not ſo driven out or expelled, but that a certain Kingdom remained among them in one part of the land, namely about Cornwall, and the parts of Cambria, which is divided in two parts, Southwales called Demetia, and Northwales called Venedocia. The ſaid Britains moreover through the valiant acts of their Kings, ſometimes reigned alſo in other Countries, diſplacing the Saxons, and recovering again their own, ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs, till the time of Carecius, when as the Britains being depoſed by Gormundus (whoſe help they themſelves ſent for out of Ireland againſt Carecius their wicked King) utterly loſt their Land and Kingdom; being thence driven utterly into Wales and Cornwal, in the year of our Lord 570. What the order of theſe Kings was, what were their acts, their names and times when they reigned, in this brief Table under written is expreſſed. Wherein firſt is to be premoniſhed that Conſtantinus ſecundus had three Children, to wit, Conſtans, which was made a Monk in Winchester, and after made a King; the ſecond was Aurelius Ambroſius; ſius; the third was Uter Pendragon. This being premiſed, we will now enter the deſcription of our Table, beginning with Vortiger.

A Table declaring the Kings of Britain which reigned together with the Saxons, after their coming into their land.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Kings of Britain which here reigned in the time of the Saxons. | Vortiger. | Conſtantinus 3. |
| | Vortimer. | Aurelius. |
| | Vortiger again. | Conanus. |
| | Aurelius Ambroſius. | Vortiperius. |
| | Uter Pendragon. | Malgo. |
| | Arthur. | Carecius. |

Here is to be underſtood that theſe Britain Kings above mentioned did not ſo reign here in this land, from the time of Vortiger, that they had the full Government over all the whole Realm, but only over parcels or parts, ſuch as by force of Arms they could either hold or win from the Saxons; which coming in daily, and growing upon them, did ſo repleniſh the land with multitudes of them, that the Britains at length were neither able to hold that which they had, nor to recover that which they loſt; leaving example to all Ages and Countries, what it is firſt to let in foreign Nations into their Dominion, but eſpecially what it is for Princes to joyn in Marriage with Infidels, as this Vortiger did with Hengiſts daughter, which was the mother of all this miſchief; giving to the Saxons not only ſtrength, but alſo occaſion and courage to attempt that which they did. Neither was this unconſidered before of the Britain Lords and Nobility, who worthily being therewith offended, juſtly depoſed their King, and Enthroned Vortimer his Son in his room. By the which Vortimer being a puiſſant Prince, the Saxons were then repulſed, and driven again into Germany, where they ſtayed a while till the death of Vortimer, whom Rowen daughter of Hengiſt cauſed traiterouſly to be poyſoned. Then Vortiger being reſtored again to his Kingdom, through the entreaty of Rowen his wife, ſent into Germany again for Hengiſt, who eſtſoons making his return, came in with a Navy of 300 Ships well appointed. The Nobles of Britain hearing this, prepared themſelves on the contrary ſide in all forceable wiſe to put them off. But Hengiſt through Rowen his daughter ſo laboured the King, excuſing himſelf, and ſaying that he brought not the multitude to work any violence either againſt him or againſt his Country, but only thinking that Vortimer had yet been alive, whom he minded to impugn for the Kings ſake, and to take his part. And now forſomuch as he heareth of the death of Vortimer his enemy, he therefore committeth both himſelf and his people to his diſpoſition, to appoint how few or how many of them he would to remain within his land; the reſt ſhould return. And if it ſo pleaſed the King to appoint day and place where they might meet and talk together of the matter, both he and his would ſtand to ſuch order as the King with his Council ſhould appoint. With theſe fair words the King and his Nobles well contented, did aſſign to them both day and place, which was in the Town of Ambry, where he meant to talk with them; adding this condition withal, that each part ſhould come without any manner of weapon. Hengiſt ſhewing himſelf well agreed thereto, gave privy intelligence of his ſide, that each man ſhould carry with him ſecretly in his Hoſe a long Knife, with their watch-word alſo given unto them when they ſhould draw their Knives, wherewith every Saxon ſhould (and ſo did) kill the Britain with whom he talked, as is above declared. The Britain Lords being ſlain, the Saxons took Vortiger the King and bound him; for whoſe ranſome they required to be delivered to them the Cities of London, York, Lincoln, Wincheſter, with other the moſt ſtrongeſt holds within the land; which being to them granted, they begin to make ſpoil and havock of the Britain Nation, deſtroying the Citizens, plucking down Churches, killing up the Prieſts, burning the Books of the holy Scripture, leaving nothing undone that tyranny could work, which was about the year of our Lord 462. The King ſeeing this miſerable ſlaughter of the people fled into Wales.

This while Aurelius Ambroſius, and Uter Pendragon, Brethren to King Conſtans above mentioned, whom Vortiger wickedly cauſed to be killed, were in little Britain. To whom the Britains ſent word deſiring their aid in helping their Country. Aurelius underſtanding the woful ſtate of the Realm, ſpeedeth him over to ſatisfie their deſire, and to reſcue (what in him was) their neceſſity. Who at his firſt coming eſtſoons being Crowned for their King, ſeeketh out wicked Vortiger, the cauſe of all this trouble and murther of King Conſtans his Brother. And finding him in Wales in a ſtrong Tower, wherein he had immured himſelf, ſetteth him and his Caſtle on fire. That done he moved his power againſt the Saxons, with whom and with Elle Captain of the Southſaxons (who then was newly come over) he had divers Conflicts.

Vortiger burned in his Tower.

Our Engliſh old Chronicles make record that Horſus the Brother of Hengiſt was ſlain before in the time of Vortimer. The ſame alſo do record that this Hengiſt was taken priſoner in the field, fighting againſt Aurelius Ambroſius; who then conſulting with his Nobles and Barons what was to be done with him, the Biſhop of Glouceſter, called Eldadus, ſtanding up, gave this counſel, ſaying, That if all men would deliver him, yet he with his own hands would cut him in pieces; alledging the example of Samuel againſt Agag King of the Amalekites, taken by King Saul in the field, whom the ſaid Samuel cauſed to be cut in pieces. Even ſo (ſaith he) do you to this Agag here; that as he hath made many a woman widow, and without children, ſo his mother may be made this day of him likewiſe. And ſo was Hengiſt taken out of their City by Eldo Conſul or Mayor of Glouceſter, and there was beheaded, if truth or credit be to be given to theſe our old Britain Stories, whereof I have nothing certainly to pronounce, but that I may ſuſpect the truth thereof, which was about the year of our Lord 480. *Henr. A certain ancient written Hiſtory I have in Latin, compiled in the fourteenth year of King Richard the Second, and by him cauſed to be written as the Title declareth; which becauſe it beareth no name of the Author, I call it by the name of him of whom I borrowed this Book, with many other likewiſe without name, Hiſtoria Cariana. This Hiſtory recordeth that Hengiſt died in Kent the two and thirtieth year of his reign; which if it be true, then is it falſe that he was taken at Cuninburgh, and ſlain in the North. This Aurelius Ambroſius before mentioned, is thought of Polydorus Virgilius, citing the authority of Beda, to deſcend of the ſtock of the Romans; which as it is not unpoſſible to be true, ſo this is certain by the full accord of all our old written Stories, that both the ſaid Aurelius and his Brother Uter Pendragon, being the Sons of Conſtantinus, Brother to Ambonius King of little Britain, were nurſed and brought up in England in their tender age, and inſtructed by Guitelinus Archbiſhop of London, and after the murther of Conſtans their Elder Brother were conveyed from hence to little Britain; whereby it is manifeſt that they were born in this land; and though their Father were a Roman, as Polidorus pretendeth, yet like it is that they were Britains born, and had a Britain to their Mother.

The uncertainty of our old Britain ſtories.

Ex Hiſtoria Cariana.

Aurelius Ambroſius King.

After the death of Aurelius, who (as the Story ſaith) was poyſoned by the crafty means of Paſcentius Son of Vortiger (ſuborning one under the weed of a Monk to play the Phyſician, and ſo to poyſon him); next ſucceeded his Brother Uter, Sirnamed Pendragon, about the year of our Lord 497, who fighting againſt Octa and Coſa, took them and brought them to London there to be kept; but they breaking out of priſon returned into Germany for more aid. In this mean time daily recourſe was of Saxons, with great Companies coming out of Saxony, with whom the Britains had divers and ſundry conflicts, ſometimes winning, ſometimes loſing. Not long after Octa and Coſa renewing their power in Germany, in all moſt ſpeedy haſt did return again and joyn with the other Saxons againſt the Britains. Here began the ſtate of miſerable Britain more and more to decay, while the Idolatrous Saxons prevailed in number and ſtrength againſt the Chriſtian Britains; oppreſſing the people, throwing down Churches and Monaſteries, murthering the Prelates, ſparing neither age nor perſon, but waſting Chriſtianity almoſt through the whole Realm. To theſe miſeries it fell moreover, that Uter their King was ſick and could not come out; notwithſtanding being grieved with the lamentable deſtruction of his people, he cauſed his Bed to be brought into the Camp, where God gave him Victory, Octa and Cosa there being ſlain. After this Victory in ſhort ſpace Uter died of poyſon (as is ſaid) put into a fountain, whereof the King was wont to drink, about the year of our Lord 516. Flor.Hiſt.

{Ann. 516.}

About which time and year came in Stuph and Wigarius two Nephews of Certhice King of Weſtſaxons, with their companies, ſo violently upon the Britains, that they of the Weſt part of the Realm were not able to reſiſt them.

King Arthur

Then the merciful providence of Almighty God raiſed up for them King Arthur, the ſon of Uter, who was then Crowned after him, and victorioully reigned. To this Arthur the old Britain Hiſtories do aſcribe twelve great Victories againſt the Heathen Saxons; whoſe notorious and famous Conqueſts mentioned in the Britain Stories, I leave as I find them, referring them to the credit of their Authors in whom they are found. Notwithſtanding, as I do not think contrary, but God by the foreſaid Arthur gave to the Britains ſome ſtay and quietneſs during his life, and certain of his ſucceſſors; ſo touching certain of his great Victories and Conqueſts, not only over this Land, but alſo over all Europe, I judge them more fabulous, than that any credit ſhould be given unto them; and more worthy to be joyned with the Iliads of Homer, than to have place in any Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. After Arthur next King of the Britains was Conſtantinus the third. After him Aurelius Conanus. Then Vortiporius; after whom followed Malgo, noted in ſtories to be a Sodomite. And after him the laſt King of the Britains was Carecius, all given to Civil War, execrable to God and Man. Who being chaſed out by the Britains themſelves, the Land fell to poſſeſſion of the Saxons, about the year of our Lord 568, by whom all the Clergy and the Chriſtian Miniſters of the Britains were then utterly driven out: inſomuch that Theonus Archbiſhop of London, and Thadeoſeus Archbiſhop of York, ſeeing their Churches all waſted, and Pariſhes diſperſed with their carriages and monuments, left their Sees in Britain, and fled into Cambria, which we now call Wales. Touching which matter, and touching alſo the cauſe of this deſolation and ruine of the Britains Kingdom, the firſt fountain and origine thereof partly before is declared; where was ſhewed in the time of Conſtantinus Magnus and Maximian, how theſe Noble Princes with other more, atchieving their venturous affairs in other Countries, took with them great Multitudes and Armies out of Britain; through the occaſion whereof the Land was greatly impaired and deprived of the moſt chief and principal Nobles, being carried away to ſerve in Foreign Wars (which was no ſmall cauſe, why the Realm of Britain being ſo waſted) was the leſs able to help it ſelf againſt their enemies. Although this was not the chief occaſion, but other cauſes there were greater, wherefore God by his juſt judgment ſuffered this plague and overthrow to fall upon that people; as here out of an old Author, and partly out of Gildas I have found it, ſo I thought to annex it in his own words, firſt in Latine, then afterward Engliſhing the ſame for the more credit of that which ſhall be alledged, in tenor as followeth:

Conſtaminus the third, Aurelius Conanus, Vortiporius, Malgo, Carecius Kings of Britain.

The Archbiſhop of London and the Archbiſhop of York, fly into Wales.

Ex Hiſtoria quadam Cantienſi.

Nobiliores totius Regni prædictos Duces ſequuti fuerunt, & ignobiles remanebant, qui cum vicem nobilium obtinere cœpiſſent, extulerunt ſe ultra quod dignitas expetebat. Et ob affluentiam divitiarum ſuperbi cœperunt tali & tantæ fornicationi indulgere, qualis nec inter gentes audita eſt. Et, ut Gildas hiſtoricus teſtatur, non ſolum hoc vitium, ſed omnia quæ humanæ naturæ accidere ſolent, & præcipue quod totius boni evertit ſtatum, odium veritatis, amor mendacii, ſuſceptio mali pro bono, veneratio nequitiæ pro benignitate, exceptatio Sathanæ pro Angelo lucis: ungebantur reges, non propter dominium, ſed qui cæteris crudeliores eſſent. Si quis vero eorum mitior, & veritati aliquatenus proprior videretur, in hunc quaſi Britanniæ ſubverſorem omnia odia telaque torquebantur. Omnia quæ Deo placebant & diſplicebant æquali lance inter eos pendebantur. Et non ſolum hoc ſeculares viri, ſed & ipſe grex Dominii, ejuſque paſtores ſine diſcretione faciebant. Non igitur admirandum eſt degeneres tales patriam illam amittere, quam prædicto modo maculabant.

The cauſes of the deſtruction of the Britains declared.

In Engliſh thus:

In Engliſh thus.

The Nobles of this Realm, following the Princes and Captains above named; by reaſon thereof the vulgar and raſcal ſort remained behind at home. Who, when they had gotten the rooms and places of the Nobles, they advanced themſelves above that their dignity required. And through their abundance of riches, they ſurpriſed with pride, began to fall into ſuch and ſo great fornication, as was never heard of even among the Gentiles. And as Gildas the Hiſtoriographer witneſſeth, not into vice only, but alſo into all manner of wickedneſs, whereto mans nature is inclined: and eſpecially into that which is the overthrow of all good eſtates: the hatred of the truth, love of lies, imbracing of evil inſtead of goodneſs, regarding of miſchief inſtead of vertue, receiving of the Devil inſtead of an Angel of light. They anointed Kings, not ſuch as could well rule a Commonwealth, but thoſe which exceeded all other in cruelty. And if any might be perceived to be ſomewhat more humble or meek, or to be more inclined to favour the truth than the reſidue, him did every one hate and backbite as the overthrower and deſtroyer of Britain. All things whether they pleaſed or diſpleaſed God, they regarded alike. And not ſecular men only did thus, but alſo the Congregation of the Lord and their Biſhops and Teachers without any difference at all. Therefore it is not to be marvelled that ſuch people ſo degenerating and going out of kind ſhould loſe that Country, which they had after this manner defiled.

And thus much hitherto concerning the Hiſtory of the Britains, till (by the grace of Chriſt) the order of time ſhall bring us hereafter to the Treatiſe of Cedwalla and Calwalladrus. Now remaineth it, in returning again to the matter of the Saxons, to diſcourſe particularly, that which before in the Table above we have ſummarily comprehended.

In this order and race of the Saxon Kings above ſpecified, which had thus thruſt out the Britains, and now divided their Land in ſeven Kingdoms; as there were many naughty and wicked Kings (whoſe pernicious examples, being all ſet on War and bloodſhed, are greatly to be deteſted and eſchewed of all true godly Princes) ſo ſome there were again (although but few) very ſincere and good. But none almoſt from the firſt to the laſt, which was not either ſlain in war, or murthered in peace, or elſe conſtrained to make himſelf a Monk. Such was the rage then, and the tyranny of that time. Whether we ſhould impute it to the corruption of Mans Nature, or to the juſt judgment of Gods hand, ſo diſpoſing the matter, that as they had violently and falſly diſpoſſeſſed the Britains of their right; ſo they moſt miſerably were not only vexed of the Danes, and conquered at laſt by the Normans; but alſo more cruelly devoured themſelves, one warring ſtill againſt another, till they were never able to help themſelves, nor yet to reſiſt others. Of them which are noted for good among theſe Saxon Kings, the firſt and principal is Ethelbertus, or Ethelbrict the firſt King in Kent above ſpecified: who by the means of Auſtin, and partly through his Wife named Berda, firſt received and preferred the Chriſtian Faith in all this Land of the Engliſh Saxons, whereof more followeth hereafter to be ſaid (the Lord ſo permitting) as place and opportunity ſhall require. The next place I give to Oſwaldus of Northumberland, who not only did his endeavour in furthering the faith of Chriſt amongſt his People; but alſo being King, diſdained not himſelf to ſtand up, and interpret to his Nobles and Subjects the preaching of Aidanus, preaching Chriſt to them in his Scotiſh language. In the ſame commendation alſo like as in the ſame line, cometh his Uncle Edwin King of Northumberland, a good Prince, and the firſt receiver of Chriſts faith in that Land, by the means of his Wife, and Paulinus Biſhop. Add to theſe alſo Sigebert, firſt chriſtened of the King of the Eaſtangles, and Sebert, firſt chriſtened King of Eſſex: of whom the one was a great furtherer of Religion, and ſetter up of Schools; the other, which is Sebert or Serbricht, was Nephew to Ethelbert of Kent, under whom he ruled in Eſſex. By the which Ethelbert, in the time of the ſaid Sebert, the Church of Pauls was builded at London, and Chriſtian Faith much enlarged, &c. Of the ſame name there was alſo another Ethelbert King of the Eaſtangles, a good Prince; who by the advice of his Council perſwaded to marriage (though againſt his will)

This Ethelbert being a Chriſtian was married unto Ethelbert upon the condition that ſhe ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy her religion.

Whereupon Offa, through repentance thereof, made the firſt Peter-pence to be given to S. Peters Church in Rome.

In the Catalogue of theſe good Kings is alſo to be numbred Kenelmus King of the Mercians, and Edmundus King of the Eaſtangles; of the which two, the firſt was falſly and abominably circumvented and beheaded, by the means of his cruel Siſter and his Tutor, as he was in his hunting at Corfecaſtle. The other which is called King Edmund the Martyr, was ſlain at Bury, or (as ſome write) at the Caſtle of Haleſdon by the Danes: upon what occaſion, Hiſtories do vary. The Author of Flores Hiſtoriarum ſaith, it was by reaſon of one Lothbroke a Dane, who being of the Kings blood, and being with his Hawk on the Sea ſide in a little Boat, was driven by the force of the Weather into the Coaſt of Northfolk, where he being preſented to King Edmund, was retained in the Court with great favour; till at length one Berick the Kings Falconer, envying and deſpighting him for his great dexterity in that faculty, privily did murther him in a Wood. This being at laſt ſpied, as Murther lightly will come out, Berick was ſet in Lothbroke's Boat alone, without all tackling, to be committed into the Sea; and, as it chanced, was driven into Denmark, who there being ſeen in Lothbroke's Boat, was ſtrictly examined of the party. He then to excuſe himſelf, falſly ſaid he was ſlain by the commandment of the King. Upon the occaſion whereof, Inguar and Hubba, ſons to the ſaid Lothbroke, gathering an Army of Danes, invaded firſt Northumberland, after that burſting into Northfolk on every ſide, ſent this Meſſage to King Edmund after this tenor: Signifying that King Inguar the victorious Prince (dread both by Sea and Land) as he had ſubjected divers other Lands under him, ſo arriving now to the Coaſts of Northfolk, where he intendeth to Winter, chargeth and commandeth him to divide with him his old treaſures, and his fathers riches, and ſo to rule under him; which if he would not do, but would contemn his power ſo ſtrongly furniſhed with ſuch an Army, he ſhould be judged as unworthy both of Kingdom and Life, &c. The King hearing this Meſſage, not a little aſtoniſhed hereat, calling his Council about him, conſulted with them, eſpecially with one of his Biſhops being then his Secretary, what was beſt to be done; who fearing the Kings life, exhorteth him by words and divers examples to agree to the Meſſage. At this the King a while holding his peace, at length thereto made anſwer again in theſe words, ſaying, Go (ſaith he) tell your Lord, and let him know that Edmundus the Chriſtened King, for the love of this temporal life, will not ſubject himſelf to a Pagan Duke, unleſs before he become a Chriſtian, &c. The Meſſenger taking his Anſwer was not ſo ſoon out of the Gates, as Inguar meeting him and bidding him to be ſhort in declaring his anſwer, cauſed all the Kings Garriſon to be ſet round about. Some ſay, that the King flying to Thetford there pitcht a Field with the Danes; but the Danes prevailing, the good King from thence did fly to the Caſtle of Haleſdon above mentioned; where he being purſued of the Danes, was there taken, and at length being bound to a ſtake, there, of the raging Danes was ſhot to death. And thus much for the good Kings.

Now as concerning thoſe Kings which made themſelves Monks, which in number be ſeven or eight, although the example be rare and ſtrange, and much commended of the Chroniclers of that time; yet I cannot raſhly aſſent to their commendation, albeit the caſe thereof is no matter of our Hiſtory. Firſt, in altering their eſtate from Kings to Monks, if they did it to find more eaſe, and leſs trouble thereby, I ſee not how that excuſe ſtandeth with the office of a good man, to change his publick vocation for reſpect of private commodity. If fear of jeopardy and danger did drive them thereunto, what praiſe or commendation deſerve they in ſo doing? let the Monkiſh Hiſtories judge what they liſt. Me ſeemeth ſo much praiſe as they deſerve in providing their own ſafety, ſo much they deſerve again to be diſcommended in forſaking the Commonwealth. If they did it (as moſt like it is) for holineſs ſake, thinking in that kind of life to ſerve and pleaſe God better, or to merit more toward their ſalvation than in the eſtate of a King, therein they were far deceived; not knowing that the ſalvation which cometh of God, is to be meaſured and eſteemed, not by Mans merits, or by any perfection of life, or by difference of any vocation, more of one than another, but only by the free grace of the Goſpel, which freely juſtifieth all them that faithfully believe in Chriſt Jeſus. But here will be ſaid again; peradventure, in the ſolitary life of Monkery be fewer occaſions of evils than in Kings Courts, wherefore that life ſerveth more to holineſs, and is more to be preferred than the other. To this Anſwer, To avoid the occaſions of evil is good where ſtrength lacketh to reſiſt; but otherwiſe, where duty and charge bindeth to tarry; there to avoid the occaſions of evil, where rather they are to be reſiſted, rather declareth a weakneſs of the Man than deſerveth any praiſe. As is it truly ſaid of Tully, Out of Aſia (ſaith he) to live a good life is no Godamercy; but in Aſia, where ſo great occaſions of evils abound, there to live a good man, that is praiſe worthy. With the like reaſon I may infer, if a Man be called to be a King, there not to change the vocation for avoiding of occaſions, but rather to reſiſt occaſions, and to keep his vocation, declareth a good and perfect Man. But of theſe by-matters hitherto ſufficient.

A queſtion. Whether Kings which made themſelves Monks did well in ſo doing or not?

Anſwer. Where vocation binds to tarry, but to reſiſt the occaſions of evil it is a good mans part.

Theſe things now thus premiſed, concerning the order and reign of Kings, as is above prefixed; conſequently it remaineth to enter the tractation of ſuch things, as in the time and reign of the aforeſaid Kings happened in the Church; firſt putting the Reader again in mind of the former Perſecutions within the Realm, partly before touched in the time of the Britain Kings, which eſpecially were three or four before the coming of Auſtin into England.

Four Perſecutions in Britain before the coming of Auſtin into England.

1. The firſt was under Dioclefian, and that not only in England, but generally throughout all the Roman Monarchy, as is above ſpecified. In this Perſecution Albanus, Julius, Aaron, with a great number more of other good Chriſtian Britains were Martyred for Chriſts Name.

The Perſecution of Dioclefian about the year of our Lord 210.

2. The ſecond Perſecution or deſtruction of Chriſtian Faith, was by the invading of Gnavius and Melga, whereof the firſt was Captain of the Huns, the other of the Picta. Theſe two Tyrants, after the cruel ſlaughter of Urſula, and other 11000 noble Virgins made their Rode into Britain, hearing the ſame to be deſtitute of the ſtrength of Men. At what time they made miſerable murther of Chriſts Saints, ſpoiling and waſting Churches, without mercy either of Women or Children, ſparing none.

The Perſecution of Gnavius and Melga.

3. The third Perſecution came by Hengiſt and the Saxons; who likewiſe deſtroyed and waſted the Chriſtian Congregations within the Land, like raging Wolves flying upon the Sheep, and ſpilling the blood of Chriſtians, till Aurelius Ambroſius came, and reſtored again the Churches deſtroyed.

The Perſecution of Hengiſt in Britain.

4. The fourth deſtruction of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion was by Gurmundus a Pagan King of the Africans; who joyning in League with the Saxons, wrought much grievance to the Chriſtians of the Land. Inſomuch that Theonus Biſhop of London, and Thadiocens Biſhop of York, with the reſt of the People, ſo many as were left, having no place wherein to remain with ſafety, did fly ſome to Cornwall, and ſome to the Mountains of Wales about the year of our Lord 550. and this Perſecution remained to the time of Ethelbert King of Kent, in the year five hundred eighty nine.

The fourth deſtruction of Chriſtian faith in Britain by Gurmundus in the year 595. This Gurmundus, as ſome ſtories record, leaving his Kingdom at home to his brother, ſaid he would poſſeſs no Kingdom but which he ſhould win with his Sword.

In the Reign of this Ethelbert, which was then the fifth King of Kent, the Faith of Chriſt was firſt received of the Saxons or Engliſh Men, by the means of Gregory Biſhop of Rome, in manner and order as here followeth, out of old Hiſtories collected and recorded.

First then to joyn the order of our Hiſtory together; the Chriſtian Faith firſt received of King Lucius, indured in Britain till this time, near upon the ſeaſon of 400 years and odd, when by Gurmundus Africanus, (as is ſaid) fighting with the Saxons againſt the Britains, it was near extinct in all the Land, during the ſpace of about forty years. So that the firſt ſpringing of Chriſts Goſpel in this Land, was in the year of our Lord 180. The coming of the Saxons was in the year of 449. or 469. The coming of Auſtin was in the year 596. From the firſt entring in of the Saxons to their compleat Conqueſt, and the driving out of the Britains (which was about King Lucius died 418 years before the coming of Auſtin.

The computation of times concerning the continuance and decay of Chriſts Goſpel between the Britains and the Saxons.

about the later time of Cadwalader) were two hundred and forty years. In ſum, from Chriſt to Lucius were one hundred and eighty years. The continuance of the Goſpel from Lucius to the entring of the Saxons, was three hundred and two years. The decay of the ſame to the entring of Auſtin, was one hundred forty three years, which being added together make from Lucius to Auſtin four hundred forty five years; from Chriſt to Auſtin they make five hundred ninety eight years. In this year then five hundred ninety eight, Auſtin being ſent from Gregory, came into England; the occaſion whereupon Gregory ſent him hither was this:

{Anno 598.}

Beda. Polychron. lib. 1. ca. 8. Malmesburienſ. de regib. Henr. Hunt. lib. 5. Fabian. p. 5. cap. 119. Liber bibliothecæ Torn.

In the days of Pelagius Biſhop of Rome, Gregory chancing to ſee certain Children in the Market-place of Rome (brought thither to be ſold out of England) being fair and beautiful of viſage, demanded out of what Country they were? And underſtanding they were heatheniſh out of England, lamented the caſe of the Land, being ſo beautiful and Angelical, ſo to be ſubject under the Prince of darkneſs. And asking moreover out of what Province they were? It was anſwered out of Deira, a part of Northſaxons; whereof, as it is to be thought, that which we now call Deirham taketh his name. Then he alluding to the name of Deira, Theſe people (ſaith he) are to be delivered De Dei ira, which is, From Gods Wrath. Moreover underſtanding the Kings name of that Province to be Alle (above mentioned) alluding likewiſe to his name, There (ſaith he) ought Alleluja to be ſung to the living God. Whereupon he being moved, and deſirous to go and help the Converſion of that Country, was not permitted of Pelagius and the Romans for that time to accompliſh his deſire. But afterward, being Biſhop himſelf next after Pelagius, he ſent thither the foreſaid Auſtin with other Preachers near about to the number of forty. But by the way, how it happened I cannot ſay, as Auſtin with his company were paſſing in their journey, ſuch a ſudden fear entred into their hearts that (as Antoninus ſaith) they returned all. Others write that Auſtin was ſent back to Gregory again, to releaſe them of that Voyage ſo dangerous and uncertain, amongſt ſuch a barbarous people, whoſe language they neither knew, nor were able to reſiſt their rudeneſs. Then Gregory, with pithy perſwaſions confirming and comforting him, ſent him again with Letters both to the Biſhop of Arelatenſis, willing him to help and aid the ſaid Auſtin and his company, in all whatſoever his need required. Alſo other Letters he directed to the foreſaid Auſtin, and to his fellows, exhorting them to go forward boldly to the Lords work, as by the tenor of the ſaid Epiſtle here following may appear.

Ex Henr. Huntin. l. 3.

GRegorius Servus Servorum Dei, ſervis Domini noſtri. Quia melius fuerat bona non incipere, quam ab iis quæ cæpta ſunt cogitatione retrorſum redire, &c.

In Engliſh:

The Epiſtle of Gregory to them which went to preach in England.

GRegory the ſervant of Gods ſervants, to the ſervants of the Lord. Forſomuch as it is better not to take good things in hand, than after they be begun to think to revolt back from the ſame again, therefore now you may not nor cannot (dear Children) but with all fervent ſtudy and labour muſt needs go forward in that good buſineſs, which through the help of God you have well begun. Neither let the labour of your journey, nor the ſlanderous tongues of men appall you, but that with all inſtance and fervency ye proceed and accompliſh the thing which the Lord hath ordained you to take in hand; knowing that your great travel ſhall be recompenced with reward of greater glory hereafter to come. Therefore as we ſend here Auſtin to you again, whom alſo we have ordained to be your Governour, ſo do you humbly obey him in all things, knowing that it ſhall be profitable ſo for your ſouls, whatſoever at his admonition ye ſhall do. Almighty God with his grace defend you, and grant me to ſee in the eternal Country the fruit of your labour; ſo that although I cannot labour as I would with you, yet I may be found partaker of your retribution, for that my will is good to labour in the ſame fellowſhip with you together. The Lord God keep you ſafe, moſt dear and welbeloved Children. Dated the Tenth before the Kalends of Auguſt, in the Reign of our Sovereign Lord Mauricius moſt vertuous Emperor, the fourteenth of his Empire.

The Biſhop of Rome calleth the Emperor his Lord.

Thus they emboldned and comforted through the good words of Gregory, ſped forth their journey till they came at length to the Iſle of Thenet, lying upon the Eaſt ſide of Kent. Near to the which landing place was then the Manory or Palace of the King, not far from Sandwich (Eaſtward from Canterbury) which the Inhabitants of the Iſle then called Richbourgh, whereof ſome part of the ruinous Walls is yet to be ſeen. The King then Reigning in Kent, was Ethelbert, as above appeareth, the fifth King of that Province, who at that time had married a Wife a French Woman, being chriſtened, named Berda, whom he had received of her Parents upon this condition, that he ſhould permit her with her Biſhop committed unto her, called Lebardus, to enjoy the freedom of her Faith and Religion; by the means whereof he was more flexible, and ſooner induced to embrace the preaching and Doctrine of Chriſt. Thus Auſtin being arrived, ſent forth certain meſſengers and interpreters to the King, ſignifying that ſuch a one was come from Rome, bringing with him glad tidings to him and all his people of life and ſalvation eternally to Reign in Heaven, with the only true and living God for ever, if he would ſo willingly hearken to the ſame, as he was gladly come to preach and teach it unto him.

Auſtin and his company come to England.

What goodneſs cometh to have a good and godly Wife.

The King who had heard of this Religion before by means of his Wife, within a few days after cometh to the place where Auſtin was, to ſpeak with him; but that ſhould be without the Houſe, after the manner of his Law. Auſtin againſt his coming, as ſtories affirm, erected up a Banner of the Crucifix (ſuch was then the groſneſs of that time) and preached to him the Word of God. The King anſwering again, ſaith in effect as followeth, The words be very fair that you preach and promiſe; nevertheleſs, becauſe it is to me uncouth and new, I cannot ſoon ſtart away from my Country Law wherewith I have been ſo long inured, and aſſent to you. Albeit, yet notwithſtanding for that ye are come (as ye ſay) ſo far for my ſake, ye ſhall not be moleſted by me, but ſhall be right well intreated, having all things to you miniſtred neceſſary for your ſupportation. Beſides this, neither do we debar you, but grant you free leave to preach to our People and Subjects, to convert whom ye may to the faith of your Religion.

The King's anſwer to Auſtin.

The King ſtaieth upon old cuſtom.

When they had received this comfort of the King, they went with Proceſſion to the City of Dorobernia, or Canterbury, ſinging Allelujah with the Letany, which then by Gregory had been uſed at Rome in the time of the great Plague reigning then at Rome mentioned in old ſtories. The words of the Letany were theſe, Deprecamur te Domine in omni miſericordia tua, ut auferatur furor tuus & ira tua a civitate iſta, & de domo ſancta tua quoniam peccavimus, Allelujah; that is, We beſeech thee, O Lord, in all thy mercies, that thy fury and anger may ceaſe from this City, and from thy holy Houſe, for we have ſinned, Allelujah. Thus they entring into the City of Dorobernia, the head City of all that Dominion at that time, where the King had given them a Manſion for their abode: there they continued preaching and baptiſing ſuch as they had converted in the Eaſt ſide of the City in the old Church of Saint Martin (where the Queen was wont to reſort) unto the time that the King was converted himſelf to Chriſt. At length, when the King had well conſidered the honeſt converſation of their life, and moved with the Miracles wrought through Gods hand by them, he heard them more gladly; and laſtly, by their wholeſome exhortations and example of godly life, he was by them converted and chriſtened in the year above ſpecified five hundred eighty ſix, and the thirty ſixth year of his Reign. After the King was thus converted, innumerable other daily came in and were adjoyned to the Church of Chriſt; whom the King did ſpecially embrace, but compelled none; for ſo he had learned, that the faith and ſervice of Chriſt ought to be voluntary, and not coacted. Then he gave to Auſtin a place for the Biſhops See at Chriſts Church in Dorobernia, and builded the Abby of S. Peter and Paul in the Eaſt ſide of the ſaid City, where after Auſtin and all the Kings of Kent were buried, and that place is now called St. Auſtin.

The Letany of Auſtin.

Miracles wrought by God for the converſion of the Land.

Auſtin made Archbiſhop.

In this while Auſtin ſailed into France unto the Biſhop Arelatenſis, called Ethereus, by him to be conſecrated Archbiſhop by the commandment of Gregory, and ſo was. Alſo the ſaid Auſtin ſent to Rome Laurentius one of his company, to declare to Gregory how they had ſped, and what they had done in England; ſending withal to have the counſel and advice of Gregory concerning nine or ten queſtions, whereof ſome are partly touched before.

The tenor of his Queſtions or Interrogations, with the Anſwers of Gregory to the ſame, here follow in Engliſh briefly tranſlated.

Ex decreto Gregorii primi. lib. 11. concil. tom. 3.

The Queſtions of Auſtin an Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſent to Gregory, with the Anſwer again of Gregory to the ſame.

The firſt Interrogation.

The firſt interrogation.

MY firſt Queſtion (reverend Father) is concerning Biſhops, how they ought to behave themſelves toward their Clerks; or of ſuch Oblations, as the faithful offer upon the Altar, what portions or dividents ought to be made thereof?

The Anſwer

The Anſwer.

How a Biſhop ought to behave himſelf in the Congregation, the holy Scripture teſtifieth, which I doubt not but you know right well, eſpecially in the Epiſtles of St. Paul to Timothy, wherein he laboureth to inform the ſaid Timothy how to behave his converſation in the houſe of the Lord. The manner is of the See Apoſtolick to warn and charge all ſuch as be ordained Biſhops, of all their ſtipend, or that which is given to make four partitions. One to the Biſhop for Hoſpitality and receiving comers in; another to the Clergy; the third to the Poor; the fourth to the repairing of Churches. But becauſe your brotherhood inſtructed with rules of Monaſtical Diſcipline, cannot live ſeparated from your Clerks about you, therefore in the Engliſh Church (which now through the Providence of God is brought to the faith of Chriſt) you muſt obſerve this Inſtitution concerning your Converſation, which was in the firſt Fathers in the beginning of the Primitive Church; among whom there was not one, which counted any thing to be his own proper of all that he did poſſeſs: but all was common among them.

Diſtribution of the Church Goods.

The ſecond Interrogation.

The 2d. interrogation.

I deſire to know and to be inſtructed, whether Clerks, that cannot contain, may marry: and if they do marry, whether then they ought to return to the Secular State again or no?

The Anſwer

The Anſwer.

If there be any Clerks out of Holy Orders, which cannot contain, let them have their Wives, and take their ſtipends or wages without. For we read it ſo written of the foreſaid Fathers, that they divided to every perſon according as their work was. Therefore as concerning the ſtipend of ſuch, it muſt be provided and thought upon. And they muſt be alſo holden under Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, to live a godly Converſation, to imploy themſelves in ſinging Pſalms, and to refrain their tongue, heart and body (by the grace of God) from all things unſeemly and unlawful. As for the vulgar and common ſort which live after the common condition of men, to deſcribe what partitions to make, what Hoſpitality to keep, or what works of Mercy to exhibite, to ſuch I have nothing to ſay, but to give (as our Maſter teacheth) in all our deeds of mercy of that which aboundeth: Of that (ſaith he) which aboundeth or is overplus, give Alms, and behold all things be clean unto you.

The gloſs upon the 12 q. 1. Parag. Si qui. ſaith that this now holdeth not and alledgeth the Extra de Cler. coniug. cap. Fab. &c. Whereby ſee, how the Popes Decrees be repugnant to themſelves.

Luke 11.

The third Interrogation.

The 3d. interrogation

Seeing there is but one Faith, how happeneth it then the Ceremonies and Cuſtoms of Churches to be ſo divers: as in the Church of Rome there is one cuſtom and manner of Maſs, and the French Church hath another?

The Anſwer.

The anſwer

The Cuſtom of the Church of Rome, what it is you know, wherein you remember that you have been brought up from your youth; but rather it pleaſeth me better, that whether it be in the Church of Rome, or any French Church, where ye find any thing that ſeemeth better to the ſervice and pleaſing of God, that ye chooſe the ſame, and ſo infer and bring into the Engliſh Church (which is yet new in the faith) the beſt and pickedſt things choſen out of many Churches; for things are not to be beloved for the place ſake, but the place is to be beloved for the things that be good; wherefore ſuch things as be good, godly, and religious, thoſe chooſe out of all Churches, and induce to your people, that they may take root in the minds of Engliſh men.

Note a worthy ſaying of Gregory.

The fourth Interrogation.

The 4th. interrogation

I pray you, what puniſhment judge you for him that ſhall ſteal or pilfer any thing out of the Church?

The Anſwer.

The Anſwer

This your brotherhood may ſoon diſcern by the perſon of a Thief, how it ought to be corrected. For ſome there be, that having ſufficient to live upon, yet do ſteal. Others there be which ſteal of meer neceſſity. Wherefore conſidering the quality and difference of the crime, neceſſary it is, that ſome be corrected by loſs of goods, ſome by ſtripes, ſome others more ſharply, and ſome more eaſie; yea, and when ſharper correction is to be executed, yet that muſt be done with Charity, and with no fury; for in puniſhing offenders, this is the cauſe and end wherefore they are puniſhed, becauſe they ſhould be ſaved, and not periſh in Hell fire. And ſo ought Diſcipline to proceed in correcting the faithful, as do good Fathers in puniſhing their Children, whom both they chaſten for their evil, and yet being chaſtened, they look to have them their Heirs, and think to leave them all they have, notwithſtanding they correct them ſometimes in anger. Therefore this Charity muſt be kept in mind; and in the correction there is a meaſure to be had, ſo that the mind never do any thing without the rule of reaſon. Ye add moreover, with what recompence of meaſure things ought to be required again, which be ſtollen out of Churches? But God forbid that the Church ſhould ever require again, with increaſe, that which is loſt in outward things, and to ſeek her gain by endamaging others.

The fifth Interrogation.

The 5th. interrogation

Item, Whether two brethren may marry two ſiſters, being far off from any part of kindred?

The Anſwer.

The anſwer

This in no part of Scripture is forbidden, but it may well and lawfully be done.

The ſixth Interrogation.

The 6th. interrogation

Item, To what degree of kindred may the marrimony of the faithful extend with their kindred, or whether it is lawful to marry with the Stepmother and her kinsfolks?

The Anſwer.

The anſwer

A certain terrene law amongſt the old Romans doth permit, that either brother or ſiſter, or the ſon and daughter of two brethren may marry together. But by the experience we learn, that the iſſue of ſuch Marriage doth never thrive, nor come forward. Alſo the holy Law of God forbiddeth to reveal the turpitude of thy blood or kindred. Wherefore neceſſary it is, that in the third or fourth degree the faithful may lawfully marry; for in the ſecond (being an unlawful) they muſt needs refrain. To be coupled with the ſtepmother is utterly abominable, for it is written in the

In what degree of kindred a man may marry.

the law: Thou ſhalt not reveal the turpitude of thy father. For ſo much then as it is ſo written in the law: And they ſhall be two in one fleſh; the ſon then that preſumeth to reveal the turpitude of his Step-mother, which is one fleſh with his father, what doth he then but reveal the turpitude of his own father? Likewiſe it was forbidden and unlawful to marry with thy kinſwoman, which by her firſt Marriage was made one fleſh with thy brother; for the which cauſe John the Baptiſt alſo loſt his head, and was crowned a Martyr. Who, though he died not for the confeſſion of Chriſt, yet for ſo much, as Chriſt ſaith, I am the truth: therefore in that John Baptiſt was ſlain for the truth, it may be ſaid his blood was ſhed for Chriſt.

By this rule the Marriage of King Henry with Queen Katharine Dowager was unlawful.

The ſeventh Interrogation.

The 7th. Interrogation. Item, Whether ſuch as ſo be coupled together in filthy and unlawful Matrimony ought to be ſeparated, and denied the partaking of the holy Communion?

The Anſwer.

The Anſwer Becauſe there be many of the Nation of Engliſhmen, which being yet in their infidelity, were ſo joyned and coupled in ſuch execrable Marriage; the ſame coming now to faith, are to be admoniſhed hereafter to abſtain from the like, and that they know the ſame to be a grievous ſin: that they dread the dreadful judgment of God, leſt for their carnal delectation they incur the torments of eternal puniſhment. And yet notwithſtanding they are not to be ſecluded therefore from the participation of Chriſts body and blood: leſt we ſhould ſeem to revenge thoſe things in them, which they before their Baptiſm through ignorance did commit. For in this time the Holy Church doth correct ſome faults more fervently, ſome faults ſhe ſuffereth again through manſuetude and meekneſs; ſome wittingly and willingly ſhe doth wink at and diſſemble; that many times the evil, which ſhe doth deteſt, through bearing and diſſembling ſhe may ſtop and bridle. All they therefore which are come to the faith, muſt be admoniſhed that they commit no ſuch offence. Which thing if they do, they are to be deprived of the Communion of the Lords Body and Blood. For like as in them that fall through ignorance, their default in this caſe is tolerable: ſo in them again it is ſtrongly to be inſued, which knowing they do nought, yet fear not to commit.

A diſcreet ſaying of Gregory to be noted.

The eighth Interrogation.

The 8th. Interrogation. Item, In this I deſire to be ſatisfied, after what manner I ſhould deal or do with the Biſhops of France, and of Britain?

The Anſwer.

The Anſwer As touching the Biſhops in France, I give you no authority or power over them. For the Biſhops of Aralas, or Orleance hath by the old time of our Predeceſſors received the Pall, whom now we ought not to deprive of his authority. Therefore when your brotherhood ſhall go unto the Province of France, whatſoever ye ſhall have there to do with the Biſhop of Orleance, ſo do, that he loſe nothing of that which he hath found and obtained of the ancient ordinance of our fore-elders. But as concerning the Biſhops of Britain, we commit them all to your brotherhood, that the ignorant may be taught, the infirm by perſwaſion may be confirmed, the wilful by authority may be corrected.

Queſt. 25. cap. 2. in Gallicanum.

The ninth Interrogation.

The 9th. Interrogation. Whether a woman being great with child, ought to be baptiſed; or after ſhe hath children, after how long time ſhe ought to enter into the Church? Or elſe, that which ſhe hath brought forth, leſt it ſhould be prevented with death, after how many days it ought to receive Baptiſm? Or after how long time after her Child-birth is it lawful for her Husband to reſort to her? Or elſe, if ſhe be in her monthly courſe, after the diſeaſe of women, whether then ſhe may enter into the Church, and receive the Sacrament of the holy Communion? Or elſe her Husband after the lying with his Wife, before he be waſhed with water, whether is it lawful for him to enter the Church, and to draw nigh to the myſtery of the holy Communion? All which things muſt be declared and opened to the rude multitude of Engliſhmen.

The Anſwer.

The Anſwer The childing or bearing Woman, why may ſhe not be baptiſed, ſeeing that the fruitfulneſs of the fleſh is no fault before the eyes of Almighty God? For our firſt Parents in Paradiſe, after they had tranſgreſſed, loſt their immortality by the juſt judgment of God, which they had taken before. Then becauſe Almighty God would not mankind utterly to periſh, becauſe of his fall (although he loſt now his immortality for his treſpaſs) yet of his benign pity, left notwithſtanding to him the fruit and generation of iſſue. Wherefore the iſſue and generation of mans nature, which is conſerved by the gift of Almighty God, how can it be debarred from the grace of holy Baptiſm?

The Anſwer

As concerning the Churching of Women, after they have travelled, where ye demand after how many days they ought to go to the Church, this you have learned in the old law, that for a Man child thirty three days, after a Woman child ſixty and three days be appointed her to keep in: albeit this you muſt take to be underſtood in a Myſtery. For if ſhe ſhould the hour after her travel enter into the Church to give thanks, ſhe committed therein no ſin: for why? the luſt and pleaſure of the fleſh, and not the travel and pain of the fleſh is ſin. In the conjunction of the fleſh is pleaſure, but in the travel and bringing forth of the child is pain and groaning: as unto the Mother of all it is ſaid, In ſorrow thou ſhalt travel. Therefore if we forbid the Woman after her labour to enter into the Church, then what do we elſe but count the ſame puniſhment given unto her for ſin? Therefore for the Woman after her labour to be baptiſed, either that which ſhe hath travelled forth (if preſent neceſſity of death doth ſo require) yea, in the ſelf ſame hour, either ſhe that hath brought forth, either that which is born in the ſame hour when it is born, to be baptiſed we do not forbid.

The churching of Women.

He ſpeaketh here after the cuſtom of that time.

Moreover, for the Man to company with his Wife, that he muſt not, before the Child that is born be wained. But now there is a lewd and naughty Cuſtom, riſen in the condition of married folks, that Mothers do contemn to nurſe their own children which they have born, but ſet them to other Women out to nurſe, which ſeemeth only to come of the cauſe of incontinency: for while they will not contain themſelves, therefore they put from them their Children to nurſe, &c.

Mothers that nurſe not their children reprehended.

As concerning the Women in their menſtruous courſe, whether ſhe ought to enter the Church? To this I anſwer: She ought not to be forbid. For the ſuperfluity of nature in her ought not to be imputed for any fault, neither is it juſt that ſhe ſhould be deprived of her acceſs to the Church, for that which ſhe ſuffered againſt her will. And if the woman did well, preſuming in touching the Lords Coat in the time of her bloody Iſſue; why then may not that be granted unto all women infirmed by the fault of nature, which is commended in one perſon done in her infirmity? Therefore to receive the Myſtery of the Holy Communion, it is not forbidden them. Albeit if ſhe dare not ſo far preſume in her great infirmity, ſhe is to be praiſed, but if ſhe do receive, ſhe is not to be judged: for it is a point of a good mind in ſome manner to acknowledge her ſins there, where is no ſin: becauſe many times that is done without fault, which cometh of fault. As when we be hungry, we eat without fault, notwithſtanding it cometh by the fault of our firſt father to us that we are hungry. &c.

Where ye aſk, if a man after the company with his Wife may reſort to the Church, or to the holy Communion, before he be purged with water? The law given to the old people, commanded that a man (after the company with his Wife) both ſhould be purified with water, and alſo ſhould tarry the Sun-ſet before he came to the Congregation. Which ſeemeth to be underſtood ſpiritually: for then moſt true it is, that the man companieth with the woman, when his mind through delectation is joyned to unlawful Concupiſcence in his heart and cogitation. At that time, before the ſaid fire of Concupiſcence ſhall be removed, let the perſon think himſelf unworthy the entrance to the Congregation, through the vicioufneſs of his filthy will. But of this matter ſundry Nations have every one their ſundry cuſtoms: ſome one way, and ſome another. The ancient manner of the Romans from our forefathers, hath been, that in ſuch caſe, firſt they purge themſelves ſelves with water, then for a little they abſtain reverently, and ſo reſort to the Church, &c.

After many other words debated of this matter, thus he ferreth. But if any perſon not for voluptuouſneſs of the fleſh, but for procreation of children do company with his Wife, that man concerning either the coming to the Church, or the receiving the Myſteries of the Lords Body and Blood, is to be left to his own judgment; for he ought not to be forbid of us to come, which when he lieth in the fire, will not burn, &c.

There is another queſtion alſo to theſe adjoyned, with his anſwer likewiſe to the ſame, concerning pollutions in the night: but I thought theſe at this preſent to our Engliſh ears ſufficient.

To return now to the ſtory again; Gregory after he had ſent theſe reſolutions to the queſtions of Auſtin, ſendeth moreover to the Church of England more coadjutors and helpers, as Melitus, Juſtus, Paulinus and Ruffianus, with Books and ſuch other implements as he thought neceſſary for the Engliſh Church. He ſendeth moreover to the foreſaid Auſtin a Pall with Letters, wherein he ſetteth an order between the two Metropolitan Sees, the one to be at London, the other to be at York. Notwithſtanding, he granteth to the ſaid Auſtin during his life, to be the only chief Archbiſhop of all the Land: and after his time, then to return to the two foreſaid Sees of London and York, as is in the ſame Letter contained, the Tenor whereof here followeth in his own words, as enſueth.

The Copy of the Epiſtle of Gregory, ſent to Auſtin into England.

REverendiſſimo & ſanctiſſimo fratri Auguſtino coepiſcopo, Gregorius ſervus ſervorum Dei. Cum certum ſit, pro omnipotente Deo laborantibus ineffabilia æterni Regis præmia reſervari, nobis tamen eis neceſſe eſt bonorum beneficia tribuere, ut in ſpiritualis operis ſtudio ex remuneratione valeant multiplicius inſudare, &c.

As followeth here in Engliſh:

TO the reverend and vertuous brother Auguſtine, his fellow Biſhop, Gregorius the ſervant of the ſervants of God. Although it be moſt certain, that unſpeakable rewards of the heavenly King be laid up for all ſuch as labour in the Word of the Almighty God: yet it ſhall be requiſite for us to reward the ſame alſo with our benefits, to the end they may be more encouraged to go forward in the ſtudy of their ſpiritual work. And for ſo much now, as the new Church of Engliſhmen is brought to the grace of Almighty God, through his mighty help, and your travel, therefore we have granted to you the uſe of the Pall, only to be uſed at the ſolemnity of your Maſs: ſo that it ſhall be lawful for you to ordain twelve Biſhops, ſuch as ſhall be ſubject to your Province or Dition. So that hereafter always the Biſhop of the City of London ſhall be ordained and conſecrated by his own proper Synod; and ſo to receive the Pall of honour from the holy and Apoſtolick See, wherein I here (by the permiſſion of God) do ſerve. And as touching the City of York, we will ſend alſo a Biſhop thither, whom you may think meet to ordain. So that if that City with other places bordering thereby, ſhall receive the Word of God, he ſhall have power likewiſe to ordain twelve Biſhops, and have the honour of a Metropolitan; to whom alſo, if God ſpare me life, I intend by the favour of God, to ſend a Pall: this provided, that notwithſtanding he ſhall be ſubject to your brotherly appointment. But after your deceaſe, the ſame Metropolitan, ſo to be over the Biſhops whom he ordereth, that he be in no wiſe ſubject to the Metropolitan of London after you. And hereafter, betwixt theſe two Metropolitans of London and York, let there be had ſuch diſtinction of Honour, that he ſhall have the priority, which ſhall in time firſt be ordained. With common counſel, and affection of heart, let them go both together, diſpoſing with one accord ſuch things as be to be done for the zeal of Chriſt. Let them foretbink and deliberate together prudently, and what they deliberate wiſely, let them accompliſh concordly, nor jarring, nor ſwarving one from the other. But as for your part, you ſhall be endued with authority, not only over thoſe Biſhops that you conſtitute, and over the other conſtituted by the Biſhop of York; but alſo you ſhall have all other Prieſts of whole Britain, ſubject unto our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: to the end that through your preaching and holineſs of life, they may learn both to believe rightly, and to live purely, and ſo in directing their life, both by the rule of true faith and vertuous manners, they may attain, when God ſhall call them, the fruition and kingdom of Heaven. God preſerve you in health, reverend brother. The tenth before the Kalends of July, in the Reign of our ſovereign Lord Mauricius moſt vertuous Emperor.

Gregory calleth the Emperor his Lord.

Beſides this, the ſaid Gregory ſendeth alſo another Letter to Mellitus concerning his judgment, what is to be done with the idolatrous Temples and Phanes of the Engliſh men newly converted, which Phanes he thinketh not beſt to pluck down, but to convert the uſe thereof, and ſo let them ſtand. And likewiſe of their Sacrifices, and killing of Oxen, how the ſame ought to be ordered, and how to be altered, diſputing by the occaſions thereof, of the ſacrifices of the old Egyptians, permitted of God unto the Iſraelites, the end and uſe thereof being altered, &c.

A Letter of Gregory to Mellitus.

He ſendeth alſo another Letter to the foreſaid Auſtin, wherein he warneth him not to be proud or puft up for the Miracles wrought of God by him, in converting the People of England, but rather to fear and tremble, leſt ſo much as he were puft up by the outward work of Miracles, ſo much he ſhould fall inwardly through the vain glory of his heart: and therefore wiſely exhorteth him to repreſs the ſwelling glory of his heart, with the remembrance of his ſins, rather againſt God, whereby he rather hath cauſe to lament, than to rejoice for the other. Not all the elect of God (ſaith he) work Miracles, and yet have they their names written in the Book of Life. And therefore he ſhould not count ſo much of thoſe Miracles done, but rather rejoyce with the Diſciples of Chriſt, and labour to have his name written in the Book of Life, where all the Elect of God be contained, neither is there any end of that rejoycing. And whatſoever Miracles it hath pleaſed God by him to have been done, he ſhould remember they were not done for him, but for their converſion, whoſe ſalvation God ſought thereby, &c.

A Letter of Gregory to Auſtin.

Item, he directed another Epiſtle to King Ethelbert, as is expreſſed at large in the Chronicle of Henry Huntington. lib. 3. in the which Epiſtle, firſt he praiſeth God, then commendeth the goodneſs of the King, by whom it pleaſed God ſo to work ſuch goodneſs of the People. Secondly, exhorteth him to perſiſt and continue in the godly profeſſion of Chriſts faith, and to be fervent and zealous in the ſame; in converting the multitude; in deſtroying the Temples and works of idolatry, in ruling and governing the people in all holineſs and godly converſation, after the godly example of the Emperor Conſtantine the great. Laſtly, comforting him with the promiſes of life and reward to come, with the Lord that reigneth and liveth for ever; premoniſhing him beſides, of the terrors and diſtreſſes that ſhall happen (though not in his days) yet before the terrible day of Gods judgment. Wherefore he willeth him always to be ſolicitous for his ſoul, and ſuſpectful of the hour of his death, and watchful of the judgment, that he may be always prepared for the ſame, when that judgment ſhall come. In the end he deſireth him to accept ſuch preſents and gifts which he thought good to ſend unto him from Rome, &c.

A Letter of Gregory to King Ethelbert.

Auſtin thus receiving his Pall from Gregory, as is aboveſaid, and now of a Monk being made an Archbiſhop, after he had baptiſed a great part of Kent; he afterward made two Archbiſhops or Metropolitans, by the commandment of Gregory, as witneſſeth Polychron, one at London, another at York.

§ Anno § 600. Polychron. li 5. cap. 9. Fabian. part. 5. cap. 119.

Mellitus, of whom mention is made before, was ſent ſpecially to the Eaſtſaxons in the Province of Eſſex, where after he was made Biſhop of London, under Sigebert, King of Eſſex; which Sigebert, together with his Uncle Ethelbert firſt builded the Church and Minſter of St. Paul in London, and appointed it to Mellitus for the Biſhops See. Auſtin (aſſociate with this Mellitus and Juſtus through the help of Ethelbert) aſſembled and gathered together the Biſhops and Doctors of Britain in a place, which taking the name of the ſaid Auſtin, was called Auſtins Oke. In this Aſſembly he charged the ſaid Biſhops, that they ſhould preach with him the Word of God to the Engliſh men, and alſo that they ſhould among themſelves reform certain Rites and Uſages in their Church, ſpecially for keeping of their Eaſtertide, baptiſing after the manner of Rome, and ſuch other like. To this the Scots and Britains would not agree, refuſing to leave the Cuſtom which they ſo long time had continued, without the aſſent of them all which uſed the ſame. Here the ſtories both of Beda, Ceſtrenſis in Polychron. Huntingtonenſis, Fornalenſis, Fabianus, and others more, write of a certain Miracle wrote upon a blind Engliſhman; whom when the Britains could not help, Auſtin kneeling down, and praying, reſtored the blind man to ſight before them all, for a confirmation (as theſe Authors ſay) of his opinion in keeping of Eaſter. But concerning the credit of this Miracle, that I leave to the Authors of whom I had it.

Archbiſhops of London and of York made by Auſtin. Mellitus Biſhop of London.

The Britains and Scots uſed not the Rites of Rome.

Then Auſtin gathered another Synod, to the which came ſeven Biſhops of Britain, with the wiſeſt men of that famous Abbey of Bangor. But firſt they took counſel of a certain wiſe and holy man amongſt them what to do; and whether they ſhould be obedient to Auſtin or not. And he ſaid, If he be the ſervant of God, agree unto him. But how ſhall we know that, ſaid they? To whom he anſwered again, If he be meek and humble of heart, by that know that he is the ſervant of God. To this they ſaid again, And how ſhall we know him to be humble and meek of heart? By this (quoth he) ſeeing you are the greater number, if he at your coming into your Synod riſe up, and courteouſly receive you, perceive him to be an humble and a meek man; but if he ſhall contemn and deſpiſe you (being as ye are) the greater part, deſpiſe you him again. Thus the Britain Biſhops entring into the Council, Auſtin after the Romiſh manner keeping his Chair would not remove. Whereat they being not a little offended, after ſome heat of words, in diſdain and great diſpleaſure departed thence. To whom then Auſtin ſpake, and ſaid, That if they would not take peace with their brethren, they ſhould receive War with their enemies; and if they diſdained to preach with them the way of life to the Engliſh Nation, they ſhould ſuffer by their hands the revenge of death. Which not long after ſo came to paſs by the means of Ethelfride, King of Northumberland, who being yet a Pagan, and ſtirred with a fierce fury againſt the Britains, came with a great Army againſt the City of Cheſter, where Brocmaile the Conſul of that City, a friend and helper of the Britains ſide, was ready with his force to receive him. There was at the ſame time at Bangor in Wales an exceeding great Monaſtery, wherein was ſuch a number of Monks, as Galfridus with other Authors, do teſtifie, that if the whole company were divided into ſeven parts, in every of the ſeven parts were contained not ſo few as three hundred Monks; which all did live by the ſweat of their brows, and labour of their own hands, having one for their Ruler, named Dino. Out of this Monaſtery came the Monks of Cheſter, to pray for the good ſucceſs of Brocmaile, fighting for them againſt the Saxons. Three days they continued in faſting and prayer. When Ethelfride the foreſaid King, ſeeing them ſo intentive to their prayers, demanded the cauſe of their coming thither in ſuch a company, and when he perceived it was to pray for their Conſul; Then (ſaith he) although they bear no weapon, yet they fight againſt us, and with their prayers and preachings they perſecute us. Whereupon after that Brocmaile being overcome, did flie away, the King commanded his men to turn their weapons againſt the ſilly unarmed Monks, of whom he ſlew the ſame time, or rather martyred, eleven hundred, only fifty perſons of that number did fly and eſcape away with Brocmaile, the reſt were all ſlain. The Authors that write of this lamentable Murther, declare and ſay how the foreſpeaking of Auſtin was here verified upon the Britains, which becauſe they would not joyn peace with their friends, he ſaid ſhould be deſtroyed of their enemies. Of both theſe parties the Reader may judge what he pleaſeth; I cannot ſee but both together were to be blamed. And as I cannot but accuſe the one, ſo I cannot defend the other. Firſt Auſtin in this matter can in no wiſe be excuſed; who being a Monk before, and therefore a Scholar and profeſſor of humility, ſhewed ſo little humility in this Aſſembly, to ſeven Biſhops and an Archbiſhop, coming at his commandment to the Council, that he thought ſcorn once to ſtir at their coming in. Much leſs would his Phariſaical Solemnity have girded himſelf, and waſhed his brethrens feet after their travel, as Chriſt our great Maſter did to his Diſciples; ſeeing his Lordſhip was ſo high, or rather ſo heavy, or rather ſo proud, that he could not find in his heart to give them a little moving of his body, to declare a brotherly and an humble heart. Again, the Britains were as much or more to blame, who ſo much neglected their ſpiritual duty, in revenging their temporal injury, that they denied to joyn their helping labour, to turn the idolatrous Saxons to the way of life and ſalvation, in which reſpect all private caſes ought to give place, and to be forgotten. For the which cauſe, although lamentable to us, yet no great marvel in them, if the ſtroke of Gods puniſhment did light upon them, according to the words of Auſtin, as is before declared. But eſpecially the cruel King in this fact was moſt of all to blame ſo furiouſly to fly upon them which had neither weapon to reſiſt him, nor yet any will to harm him. And ſo likewiſe the ſame or like happened to himſelf afterward. For ſo was he alſo ſlain in the field by Chriſtian Edwin, who ſucceeded him, as he had ſlain the Chriſtians before, which was about the year of our Lord ſix hundred and ten. But to return to Auſtin again, who by report of Authors was departed before this cruelty was done; after he had baptiſed and chriſtened ten thouſand Saxons or Angles in the Weſt River, that is called Swale, beſide York on a Chriſtmas day, perceiving his end to draw near, he ordained a Succeſſor named Laurentius to rule after him the Archbiſhops See of Dorobornia. Where note by the way, (Chriſtian Reader) that whereas Auſtin baptiſed then in Rivers, it followeth, there was then no uſe of Fonts. Again, if it be true that Fabian ſaith, he baptiſed ten thouſand in one day; the Rite then of baptiſing at Rome was not ſo ceremonial, neither had ſo many Trinkets at that time, as it hath had ſince: or elſe it could not be that he could baptiſe ſo many in one day.

Baptiſing in Rivers, not in Fonts.

Baptiſing among the old Romans was not ſo [illegible] many ceremonies as ſince.

In the mean ſeaſon, about this time departed Gregory, Biſhop of Rome, of whom it is ſaid, that of the number of all the firſt Biſhops before him in the Primitive time, he was the baſeſt; of all them that came after him, he was the beſt. About which time alſo died in Wales, David, Archbiſhop firſt of Kaerleon, who then tranſlated the See from thence to Menevia, and therefore is called David of Wales. Not long after this alſo deceaſed the foreſaid Auſtin in England, after he had ſit there fifteen or ſixeeen years; by the which count we may note it, not to be true that Henry Huntington and others do witneſs, that Auſtin was dead before that Battel of Ethelfride againſt the Monks of Bangor. For if it be true that Polychronicon teſtifieth of this murther, to be done about the year of our Lord ſix hundred and nine, and the coming of Auſtin firſt into the Realm to be Anno five hundred ninety ſix, then Auſtin enduring ſixteen years, could not be dead at this Battel. Moreover Galfridus Monumetenſis declareth concerning the ſame Battel, that Ethelbert the King of Kent, being (as is ſaid) converted by Auſtin to Chriſts faith: after he ſaw the Britains to diſdain and deny their ſubjection unto Auſtin, neither would aſſiſt him with preaching to the Engliſh Nation; therefore ſtirred up he the foreſaid Ethelfride to war againſt the Britains; but that ſeemeth rather ſuſpicious than true, that he being a Chriſtian King, either could ſo much prevail with a Pagan Idolater, or elſe would attempt ſo far to commit ſuch a cruel deed; but of uncertain things I have nothing certainly to ſay, much leſs to judge.

Computation of time examined.

Galfrid. Monumetenſis.

About this preſent time above preſixed, which is Anno ſix hundred and ten. I read in the ſtory of Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis, the Writer of Polychronicon, of John the Patriarch of Alexandria, whom for his rare example of hoſpitality and bountifulneſs to the poor, I thought no leſs worthy to have place amongſt good men, than I ſee the ſame now to be followed of few. This John (being before belike a hard and ſparing man)

Anno 610.

Polybron. lib. 5. c. 10. A ſtory of John Patriarch of Alexandria.

Mercy may live a maiden, for no man will marry her. This John was ſo bountiful in giving, that he afraid to live in a manner with the Lord, whether the Lord ſhould give more, or he ſhould diſtribute more of that which was given.

as he was at his prayer, upon a time, (it is ſaid) there appeared to him a comely Vigin, having on her head a garland of Olive leaves, which named her ſelf Mercy, ſaying to him, and promiſing, that if he would take her to wife, he ſhould proſper well. This, whether it were true or not, or elſe invented for a morality; I would wiſh this flouriſhing damſel to be married to more than to this John, that ſhe ſhould not live ſo long a Virgin as now ſhe doth, becauſe no man will marry her. But to return to this Patriarch, who after that day (as the ſtory recordeth) was ſo merciful and ſo beneficial, eſpecially to the poor and needy, that he counted them as his Maſters, and himſelf as a ſervant and ſteward unto them: This Patriarch was wont commonly twice a week to ſit at his door all the day long, to take up matters, and to ſet unity where was any variance. One day it hapned, as he was ſitting all the day before his gate, and ſaw no man come, he lamented, that all that day he had done no good: To whom his Deacon ſtanding by, anſwered again, that he had more cauſe to rejoyce, ſeeing he had brought the City in that order and in ſuch peace, that there needed no reconcilement amongſt them. Another time as the ſaid John the Patriarch was at ſervice, and reading the Goſpel in the Church, the people (as their uſed manner is) went out of the Church to talke and jangle: He perceiving that, went out likewiſe, and ſat amongſt them; whereat they marvelled to ſee him do ſo. My children (ſaid he) where the flock is, there ought the Shepheard to be: Wherefore either come you in, that I may alſo come in with you; or elſe if you tarry out, I will liſewiſe tarry out together with you, &c.

The acts of Gregory the firſt.

As touching the acts and deeds of Gregory, above mentioned, how he withſtood the ambitious pride of John Patriarch of Conſtantinople, which would be the univerſal Prieſt, and only chief Biſhop of all others, declaring him to be no leſs than the forerunner of Antichriſt, that would take that name upon him: How, and with what reaſons he anſwered again the letters of the Emperor Mauricius in that behalf, ſufficient relation is made thereof in the firſt entry and beginning of this Book. This Gregory among many other things induced into the Church (the ſpecialties whereof hereafter ſhall follow, Chriſt willing, more at large) firſt began and brought in this title among the Roman Biſhops, to be called, Servus Servorum Dei: Putting them in remembrance thereby, both of their humbleneſs, and alſo of their duty in the Church of Chriſt. Moreover, as concerning his act for the ſole life of Prieſts firſt begun, and then broken again: Alſo concerning the order of Gregories maſs Book to be received in all Churches: Hereof who ſo luſteth to read more, ſhall find the ſame in other places hereafter, namely, when we come to the time of Pope Adrian the firſt.

Whereupon the Roman Biſhops uſe in their ſtile Servus Servorum Dei.

Sabinianus Biſhop of Rome.

Boniface the third Biſhop of Rome.

After the death of Gregory above mentioned, firſt came Sabinianus, who, as he was a malicious detractor of Gregory, and of his Works, ſo he continued not long, ſcarce the ſpace of two years. After whom ſucceeded next Bonifacius the third, which albeit he Reigned but one year, yet in that one year he did more hurt than Gregory with ſo much labors, and in ſo many years, could do good before. For that, which Gregory kept out, he brought in, obtaining of Phocas the wicked Emperor, for him and his ſucceſſors after him, that the See of Rome above all other Churches ſhould have the preeminence, and that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould be the univerſal head of all Churches of Chriſt in Chriſtendom: Alledging for him this frivolous reaſon, that Saint Peter had and left to his ſucceſſors in Rome, the keys of binding and looſing, &c. And thus began firſt Rome to take an head above all other Churches, by the means of Boniface the third, who, as he lacked no boldneſs nor ambition to ſeek it, ſo neither lacked he an Emperor fit and meet to give ſuch a gift. This Emperors name was Phocas, a man of ſuch wickedneſs and ambition (moſt like to his own Biſhop Boniface) that to aſpire to the Empire, he murthered his own Maſter, the Emperor Mauricius and his Children. Thus Phocas coming up to be Emperor, after his deteſtable villany done, thinking, to ſtabliſh his Empire with friendſhip and favour of his people, and eſpecially with the Biſhop of Rome, quickly condeſcended to all his petitions, and ſo granted him (as it is ſaid) to be that he would, the univerſal and head Biſhop over all Chriſtian Churches. But as blood commonly requireth blood again, ſo it came to paſs on the ſaid Phocas. For as he had cruelly ſlain the Lord and Emperor Mauricius before, ſo he in like manner (of Heraclius the Emperor ſucceeding him) had his hands and feet cut off, and ſo was caſt into the Sea. And thus wicked Phocas, which gave the firſt Supremacy to Rome, loſt his own. But Rome would not ſo ſoon loſe his Supremacy once given, as the giver loſt his life: For ever ſince, from that day it hath holden, defended, and maintained the ſame ſtill, and yet doth to this preſent day, by all force and policy poſſible. And thus much concerning Boniface, whom by the words of Gregory, we may well call the runner before Antichriſt. For as Gregory brought in their ſtile, Servus Servorum Dei; This Boniface brought in their heads firſt, Volumus ac mandamus, Statuimus ac præcipimus. That is: We will and command, We enjoyn and charge you, &c.

Mention was made a little before of Ethelbert King of Kent, and alſo of Ethelfrid, King of Northſaxon or Northumbria. This Ethelbert having under his ſubjection all the [illegible] Saxon Kings unto Humber, after he had firſt received himſelf, and cauſed to be received of others, the Chriſtian faith by the Preaching of Auſtin, confirmed afterward in the ſame faith, amongſt other coſtly deeds, with the help of Sigebert King of Eſſex his nephew then Reigning under him, began the foundation of Pauls Church within the City of London, and ordained it for the Biſhops See of London. For the Archbiſhops See which before time had been at London, was by Auſtin and this Ethelbert at the prayer of the Citizens of Dorobernia tranſlated to the ſaid City: Malmesburienſis lib. de Pontific. Wherefore ſuch authors as ſay, that Pauls was builded by Sigebert, ſay not amiſs, which Sigebert was the King of Eſſex, in which Province ſtandeth the City of London. This Ethelbert alſo founded the Church of Saint Andrew in the City of Dorubres in Kent, now called Rocheſter, of one Roſ, diſtant from Dorobernia four and twenty miles. Of this City Juſtus was Biſhop, ordained before by Auſtin. Moreover the forenamed Ethelbert ſtirred up a dweller or Citizen of London, to make a Chapel or Church of Saint Peter in the Weſt end of London, then called Thorny, now the Town of Weſtminſter, which Church or Chapel was after by Edward the Confeſſor inlarged or new builded: Laſtly, of Henry the third it was newly again reedified and made as it is now, a large Monaſtery, &c. After theſe Chriſtian and worthy acts, this Ethelbert, when he had Reigned the courſe of fifty and ſix years, changed this mortal life about the year of our Lord, 616. whom ſome ſtories ſay to be ſlain in a fight between him and Ethelfrid King of Northſaxons.

In the mean time the foreſaid Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, after the cruel murther of the Monks of Bangor, eſcaped not long unto his hire: For after he had Reigned four and twenty years he was ſlain in the field of Edwin, who ſucceeded in Northumberland after him.

Blood revenged with blood.

This Edwin being the ſon, not of Ethelfrid (as Galfridus Monumetenſis ſaith) but rather Alla (as Giraldus Cambrenſis ſeemeth to witneſs more truly) was firſt a Panim or Idolater; afterward by Paulinus was Chriſtened, and the firſt Chriſtened King in Northumberland. The occaſion of which his calling or converſion, as is in ſundry ſtories contained, was this.

Edwin firſt Chriſtened King in Northumberland. Giraldus Cambrenſis.

Edwin being yet a Pagan, married the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, called Edelburge a Chriſtian woman, otherwiſe called Tace. But before this marriage, Edwin being yet young, Ethelfrid the King conceiving envy againſt him, perſecuted him ſo ſore, that he was forced to flie to Redwaldus, King of Eaſtangles, as in the table of the Kings is expreſſed; The which Redwaldus what for fear, what with bribes being corrupted of Ethelfrid, at length privily had intended to have betrayed Edwin. But as Gods Will was, Edwin having warning thereof by a ſecret friend of his, was moved to flie, and ſo ſave himſelf, being promiſed alſo of his friends to be ſafely conveyed away, if he would thereto agree. To whom Edwin ſaid, Whether ſhall I flie, that have ſo long fleen the hands of mine Enemies, through all Provinces of the Realm? And if I muſt needs be ſlain, I had rather he ſhould do it, than another unworthy perſon. Thus

The order and manner of the converſion of Edwin to the faith of Chriſt.

The trouble of Edwin.

he remaining by himſelf alone and ſolitary, ſitting in a great ſtudy, there appeared unto him ſuddenly a certain ſtranger to him unknown, and ſaid; I know well the cauſe of thy thought and heavineſs. What wouldſt thou give him that ſhould deliver thee out of this fear, and ſhould reconcile King Redwald to thee again? I would give him (ſaid Edwin) all that I ever could make. And he ſaid again: And what if I make thee a mightier King than was any of thy Progenitors? He anſwered again as before. Moreover (ſaith he) And what if he ſhew thee a better kind and way of life, than ever was ſhewed to any of thine Anceſtors before thee; wilt thou obey him and do after his counſel? Yea, (ſaid Edwin) promiſing moſt firmly with all his heart ſo to do. Then he laying his hand upon his head: When (ſaid he) this token hapneth unto thee, then remember this time of thy tribulation, and the promiſe which thou haſt made, and the word which now I ſay unto thee. And with that he vaniſhed out of his ſight ſuddenly. After this ſo done, as Edwin was ſitting alone by himſelf penſive and ſad, his foreſaid freind, which moved him before to flie, cometh to him, bidding him be of good cheer; For the heart (ſaid he) of King Redwaldus, which had before intended thy deſtruction, is now altered through the counſel of the Queen, and is fully bent to keep his promiſe with you, whatſoever ſhall fall thereupon. To make the ſtory ſhort, Redwaldus the King (although Fabian following Henry Huntington, ſaith it was Edwin) with all convenient ſpeed aſſembled an hoſt; wherewith he ſuddenly coming upon Ethelfrid, gave battel unto him about the borders of Mercia, where Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, with Reiner, Redwaldus ſon, was ſlain in the field. By reaſon whereof Edwin (his Enemies now being deſtroyed) was quietly placed in the poſſeſſion of Northumberland. All this while yet Edwin remained in his old Paganiſm, albeit his Queen (as is above declared) King Ethelberts daughter, a Chriſtian woman, with Paulinus the Biſhop, ceaſed not to ſtir and perſwade the King to Chriſtian faith. But he taking counſel with his Nobles and Counſellers upon the matter, was hard to be won. Then the Lord, who diſpoſeth all things after his purpoſe to bring all good things to paſs, ſent another trouble upon him, by means thereof to call him: For by affliction God uſeth commonly to call them whom he will ſave, or by whom he will work ſalvation unto others. So his divine wiſdom thinketh good to make them firſt to know themſelves before they come to know him, or to teach him to others. So it was with Paul (who was ſtricken down before he was lifted up) with Conſtantinus, Edwinus, and many more. How long was Joſeph in priſon before he bare rule? How hardly eſcaped this our Queen now being (Queen Elizabeth) by whom notwithſtanding it hath pleaſed God to reſtore this his Goſpel now Preached amongſt us? In what conflicts and agonies inwardly in his ſpirit was M. Luther, befor he came to preach the juſtification of Chriſt openly? And ſo be all they moſt commonly, which come to any lively feeling or ſenſible working of Chriſt the Lord.

The marvellous calling of Edwin.

Edwin miraculouſly delivered.

W. Malmesburienſis, lib. de reg.

This Queen was Ethelburge, daughter to King Ethelbert the chriſtened King of Kent.

God calleth commonly by affliction and trouble.

But to return to Edwin again. The occaſion of his trouble was this. Quicelinus with Kinegilſus his brother, Kings of Weſtſaxons (as above is mentioned in the table of the Saxon Kings) conſpiring the death of Edwin, now King of Northumberland, upon envy and malice ſent upon an Eaſter day, a ſword-man, named Emner, privily to ſlay the ſaid Edwin. This ſword-man or cut-throat, came to a City beſide the water of Darwent in Derbiſhire, there to wait his time: And laſtly, found the King ſmally accompanied, and intended to have run the King thorow with a ſword invenomed. But one Lilla, the Kings truſty ſervant, diſgarniſhed of a ſhield or other weapon to defend his Maſter, ſtart between the King and the ſword, and was ſtricken thorow the body and died, and the King was wounded with the ſame ſtroke. And after he wounded alſo the third, which was a Knight, and ſo was taken, and confeſſed by whom he was ſent to work that treaſon. The other Knight that was ſecondly wounded, died, and the King lay after long ſick ere he were healed.

Another danger of Edwin.

{Anno 627} Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 12. Henr. Hunt. lib. 3.

Fabianus part. 5. A part of a truſty ſervant.

After this, about Whitſontide, the King being ſtantly whole of his wound, aſſembled his hoſt, intending to make war againſt the King of Weſtſaxons, promiſing to Chriſt to be Chriſtened if he would give him victory over his Enemies: and in token thereof cauſed his daughter, born of Edelburge the ſame Eaſter day when he was wounded, named Euſted, to be Baptiſed, with twelve others of his family, of Paulinus. Thus Edwin proceeded to the battel againſt Quiceline and Kinegilſus with Kenwolcus and other Enemies, who in the ſame battel being all vanquiſhed and put to flight, Edwin through the power of Chriſt returneth home victor. But for all this victory and other things given to him of God, as he was in wealth with the world, he forgat his promiſe made, and had little mind thereof, ſave only that he by the Preaching of Paulinus, forſook his Maumetry; and for his excuſe ſaid, that he might not clearly deny his old Law, which his Forefathers had kept ſo long, and ſuddenly be Chriſtened without authority and good advice of his counſel.

Edwin forgetteth his promiſe to Chriſt. Proſperity forgetful. Old cuſtoms in matters of Religion not to be followed, but only truth. Old cuſtom letteth Edwin to be Chriſtened.

About the ſame ſeaſon Pope Boniface the fifth ſent alſo to the ſaid Edwin letters exhortatory, with ſundry preſents from Rome to him, and to Edelburge the Queen: But neither would that prevail. Then Paulinus ſeeing the King ſo hard to be converted, poured out his Prayers unto God for his converſion; who the ſame time had revealed to him by the holy Ghoſt, the oracle above mentioned, which was ſhewed to the King, when he was with Redwaldus, King of the Eaſtangles. Whereupon Paulinus coming after to the King on a certain day, and laying his hand upon the Kings head, asked him if he knew that token. The King hearing this, and remembring well the token, was ready to fall down at his feet. But Paulinus not ſuffering that, did lift him up again, ſaying unto him: Behold, O King, you have vanquiſhed your Enemies, you have obtained your Kingdom; now perform the third thing which you promiſed, that is, to receive the faith of Chriſt, and to be obedient to him. Whereupon the King conferring with his Counſel and his Nobles, was Baptiſed of Paulinus at York, with many of his other Subjects with him. In ſo much that Coifie, the chief of the Prelates of his old Maumetry, armed himſelf with his Idolatrous Biſhops, and beſtrod good Horſes, which before by their old law they might not do, nor ride but only a Mare: and ſo deſtroyed all the Altars of the Maumetry, and their Temple of Idols, which was at Godmundham, not far from York. And this was in the eleventh year of his Reign.

A miracle of God in the converſion of King Edwin.

The part of a godly Biſhop exemplified in Paulinus.

Edwin baptiſed. He was baptiſed in S. Peters Church at York, which he firſt cauſed to be made of wood, which after by S. [illegible] was builded of ſtone.

From that time forth, during the life of Edwin, which was the term of ſix years more, Paulinus Chriſtened continually in the rivers of Gwenie and Swala, in both provinces of Deira, and in Bernicia, uſing the ſaid Rivers for his Fonts, and Preached in the ſhire of Linceſeie, where he builded alſo a Church of ſtone at Lincoln.

{Anno 628.}

Note Paulinus chriſtened in Rivers.

In this time was ſo great peace in the Kingdom of Edwin after his converſion, that a woman laden with Gold, might have gone from the one ſide of the Sea to the other, and no man moleſt her. Moreover by the high way ſides, through all his Kingdom he cauſed by every Well or ſpring to be chained a diſh or boll of braſs, to take up water for the refreſhing of ſuch as went by the way, which bolls of braſs there remained ſafe, that no man touched them during all the life of the ſaid Edwin. Such was then the tender care and ſtudy of Chriſtian Princes, for the refreſhing of their Subjects. But that was then the braſen world, which now is grown to Iron and Lead, called Ætas ferrea, or rather Plumbea.

What true juſtice of a good Prince may do in a realm. Great peace and truth among the people in the days of Edwin.

This Edwin who firſt brought in the faith, in the North parts continuing after his baptiſm ſix years, at length was ſlain in battel by Cedwalla, King of the Britains, and by wicked Penda, King of the Mercians, with his ſon Offricus alſo, in the field called Hatfield.

{Anno 634.}

This Paulinus was the firſt Archbiſhop of York, and as he was of Juſtus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ordained Archbiſhop of the See of York; ſo he again after the deceaſe of Juſtus, ordained Honorius to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Archbiſhop of Canterbury and York, the one ordaineth the other.

Ex Flor. Hiſt.

Paulinus after the death of godly Edwin, ſeeing unmerciful Cedwalla or Cedwallon, with his Britains, and wicked Penda with the Idolatrous Mercians, to ſpoyl the land in ſuch ſort, as they made no ſpare neither of age, nor Sex, nor Religion, was compelled to fly with Edelburge the Queen and Euſted her daughter by water into Kent, where the ſaid Archbiſhop Paulinus, remained Biſhop of Rocheſter, the ſaid ſpace of nineteen years. And ſo the Church of Northumberland, lacked a Biſhop for the ſpace of thirty

thirty years after. Notwithſtanding he left there one James his Deacon, a good man, who continued there Baptiſing and Preaching in the North parts, till that peace being recovered, and the number of the faithful increaſing, the Church came again to his ſtay. Hunting. lib.2.

James a godly Deacon. A Deacon then might baptiſe.

By means of this Edwin, Erpwaldus King of the Eaſtangles, ſon to Redwaldus above mentioned, was reduced to Chriſts faith.

Erpwaldus otherwiſe named Corpwaldus King of Eaſtangles converted to the faith of Chriſt.

After the deceaſe of Edwin and his ſon Offrick, both ſlain in battel, Reigned Oſricus and Eaufridus, the one in Deira, the other in Bernicia. Oſricus was the ſon of Elfricus which was brother to Ethelfrid. Eaufridus was the Eldeſt ſon of Ethelfrid; for Ethelfrid had three ſons, to wit, Eaufridus, Oſwaldus, and Oſricus. Theſe two Kings of Deira and Bernicia, Oſricus, and Eufrid, being firſt chriſtened in Scotland, after being Kings, returned to their Idolatry; and ſo in the year following were ſlain one after the other by the foreſaid Cedwalla and wicked Penda, as is in the table above expreſſed.

S. Oſwald King of Northumberland.

After whom ſucceeded in Northumberland, the ſecond ſon of Ethelfrid, named Oſwaldus, having rule on both the provinces, as well Deira, as Bernicia. Whereof when the foreſaid Cedwalla (or Cadwallo) the Britain King had underſtanding, who before had made havoke of the Saxons, and thought to have rooted them utterly out of England; he kept King Penda with a mighty hoſt of the Britains, thinking to ſlay alſo Oſwald as he had before ſlain his brother Eufrid, and King Edwin before them. But Oſwald, when he was warned of the great ſtrength of this Cedwal and Penda, made his Prayers to God, and beſought him meekly of help to withſtand his Enemy, for the ſalvation of his people. Thus after Oſwald had prayed for the ſaving of his people, the two hoſts met in a field named Deneſbury, ſome ſay Hevenfield, where was fought a ſtrong battel. But finally, the army and power of Penda and Cedwal, which were far exceeding the number of Oſwalds hoſt, was chaſed, and moſt part ſlain of Oſwaldus: After he reigned over the Britains two and twenty years, leaving after him a ſon, whom Gaufridus called Cadwaladrus, the laſt King of the Britains.

Strength of prayer overcometh armies.

Penda beaten in the field.

Of this Oſwald much praiſe and commendation is written in Authors, for his fervent zeal in Chriſts Religion, and merciful pity towards the poor, with other great vertues more. As touching the miracles of S. Oſwald, what it pleaſed the people of that time to report of him, I have not here to affirm. This I find in ſtories certain, that he being well and vertuouſly diſpoſed, to the ſetting forth of Chriſt's faith and Doctrine, ſent into Scotland for a certain Biſhop there called Aidanus, which was a famous Preacher. The King at what time he was in Scotland baniſhed, had learned the Scotiſh Tongue perfectly: Wherefore as this Aidanus Preached in his Scotiſh Tongue to the Saxons, the King himſelf interpreting that which he had ſaid, diſdained not to preach and expound the ſame unto his Nobles and Subjects in the Engliſh Tongue.

The commendation of King Oſwald.

King Oſwald diſdained not to expound and preach the Goſpel to his People.

Moreover, towards the poor and needy his pity and tenderneſs was ſuch, being notwithſtanding of ſo high and princely calling, that upon a time being then Eaſter day, he ſitting with the ſaid Aidanus at meat, and ſerved after the manner of Kings, in ſilver: There cometh to him one of the Servitors, bringing him word that there was a great multitude of poor People ſitting in the ſtreet, which deſired ſome Alms of the King. He hearing this, commandeth not only the meat prepared for his table to be carried unto them, but alſo taking a ſilver platter which ſtood before him, brake it in pieces and ſent it amongſt them, and ſo relieved his poor Subjects, not only with the meat of his table, but with diſhes alſo. Aidanus the Biſhop, ſeeing this and marvelling thereat, taketh him by the hand, wiſhing and praying in this wiſe: This hand (ſaith he) I pray God may continue and never putrifie. What the ſtories ſay more concerning this hand of Oſwald, I intend not to meddle further than ſimple, true, and due probability will bear me out. In thoſe days, and partly by the means of the ſaid Oſwald, Kinigilſus King of the Weſtſaxons was converted to Chriſts faith; eſpecially through the godly labour of Berinus, which was ſent by Pope Honorius to Preach in England, and was then made Biſhop of Dorcheſter. To whom Quicelinus, brother of Kinigilſus, after he had alſo received Baptiſm of the ſaid Berinus, gave to him the ſaid City to make there his See. And as Guido witneſſeth, the ſaid Quicilinus gave after to the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſeven miles compaſs of land, to build there the Biſhops See, the which was accompliſhed and finiſhed by Kenwalkus his ſon.

Of this Berinus, Malmesbury, Polychronicon, with divers other writers do report a thing ſtrange and miraculous; which if it be a Fable, as no doubt it is, I cannot but marvel that ſo many authors ſo conſtantly agree in reporting and affirming the ſame: The matter is this, This Berinus beeng ſent as is ſaid, by Honorius to Preach in England, promiſeth him to travel to the uttermoſt borders thereof, and there to Preach the Goſpel, where the name of Chriſt was never heard: Thus he ſetting forward in his journey, paſſeth through France, and ſo to the Sea ſide; where he found a paſſage ready, and the wind ſerved ſo fair, that he was called upon in ſuch haſte, that he had no leaſure to remember himſelf to take all things with him which he had to carry: At length he was on the ſea ſayling and almoſt in the middle courſe of his paſſage, he remembred himſelf of a certain relick left behind him for haſte, which Honorius had given him at his coming out. Malmesburienſis calleth it Corporalia, Hiſtoria Iornalenſis calleth it Pallulam ſuper quam corpus Chriſti conſecrarat; which we call a Corporas or ſuch a like thing, and what elſe incloſed within it I cannot tell. Here Berinus in great ſorrow could not tell what to do: If he ſhould have ſpoken to the heathen Mariners to turn their courſe back again, they would have mocked him, and it had been in vain. Wherefore as the ſtories write, he boldly ſteppeth into the Sea, and walking on foot back again, taketh with him that which was left behind, and ſo returneth to his company again, having not one thred of his garments wet. Of his miracle, or whether I ſhould call it a fable rather, let the Reader judge as he thinketh; becauſe it is not written in the Scripture, we are not bound to believe it. But if it were true, it is then thought to be wrought of God, not for any holineſs in the Man or in the Corporas, but a ſpecial gift for the converſion of the Heathen, for whoſe ſalvation God ſuffereth oft many wonders to be done. This Berinus, being received in the ſhip again with a great admiration of the Mariners, who were therewith converted and baptiſed, was driven at laſt by the weather to the coaſt of the Weſtſaxons, where Kinigilſus and his brother Quicilinus above mentioned did reign. Which two Kings the ſame time by the Preaching of Berinus were converted and made Chriſtian men, with the people of the Country, being before rude and barbarous. It happened the ſame time when the foreſaid Kings ſhould be Chriſtened, that Oſwaldus (mentioned a little before) King of Northumberland, was then preſent, and the ſame day married Kinigilſus his daughter, and alſo was Godfather to the King.

Thus Oſwald after he had Reigned nine years in ſuch holineſs and perfectneſs of life, as is above ſpecified, was ſlain at length in the field called Marſfield by wicked Penda, King of the Mercians: Which Penda at length after all his Tyranny was overcome and ſlain by Oſwy brother to Oſwald next King after Oſwald of Northumberland, notwithſtanding he had thrice the people which Oſwy had. This Penda being a Panim, had three ſons. Wolferus, Weda, and Egfridus. To the ſecond ſon Weda, Oſwy had before time married his daughter, by conſent of Penda his Father: The which Weda by help of Oſwy was made King of Southmercia, the which Lordſhip is ſevered form Northmercia by the River of Trent. The ſame Weda moreover, at what time he married the daughter of Oſwy, promiſed to him that he would become a Chriſtian man: Which thing he performed after the death of Penda his father; but afterward within three years of his Reign, he was by reaſon of his wife ſlain. And after him the Kingdom fell to Wolferus the other brother; who being wedded to Ermenilda daughter of Ercombert King of Kent, was ſhortly after chriſtened; ſo that he is counted the firſt chriſtened King of Mercia. This Wolferus conquered Kenwalchus King of Kent, and got the Iſle of Wight, which after he gave to Sigbert King of the Eaſtangles, upon condition he would be chriſtened. And thus the Eaſtangles which before had expulſed Melitus their Biſhop, as is declared, recovered again the Chriſtian faith under Sigbert their

But to return again to Oſwy, from whom we have a little digreſſed, of whom we ſhewed before how he ſucceeded after Oſwald in the Province of Bernicia, to whom alſo was joyned Oſwine his Coſin over the Province of Deira, and there, with his fellow Oſwy Reigned the ſpace of ſeven years. This Oſwine was gentle and liberal to his people, and no leſs devout toward God: Who upon a time had given to Aidanus the Biſhop above mentioned, a princely Horſe with the Trappers, and all that appertained thereto, becauſe he ſhould not ſo much travel on foot, but ſometimes eaſe himſelf withal. Thus Aidanus the Scotiſh Biſhop as he was riding upon his kingly Horſe, by the way meeteth him a certain poor man, asking and craving his charity. Aidanus having nothing elſe to give him, lighted down and giveth to him his Horſe trapped and garniſhed as he was. The King underſtanding this, and not contented therewith, as he was entring to dinner with the ſaid Aidanus: What meant you Father Biſhop (ſaid he) to give away my Horſe I gave you, unto the begger? Had not I other Horſes in my ſtable that might have ſerved him well enough, but you muſt give away that which of purpoſe was picked out for you amongſt the chiefeſt? To whom the Biſhop made anſwer again, ſaying, or rather rebuking the King: What be theſe words (O King ſaith he) that you ſpeak? Why ſet you more price by an Horſe, which is but the ſole of an Horſe, than you do by him which is the ſon of Mary, yea, which is the ſon of God? He ſaid but this, when the King forthwith ungirding his ſword from about him (as he was then newly come in from Hunting) falleth down at the feet of the Biſhop, deſiring him to forgive him that, and he would never after ſpeak word to him for any treaſure he ſhould afterward give away of his. The Biſhop ſeeing the King ſo meekly affected, he then taking him up, and chearing him again with words, began ſhortly after to weep and to be very heavy. His Miniſter asking the cauſe thereof, Aidanus anſwered in his Scotiſh Language, ſaying to him: I weep (ſaith he) For that this King cannot live long. This people is not worthy to have ſuch a Prince, as he is to Reign amongſt them. And ſo as Aidanus ſaid, it came to paſs. For not long after Oſwy the King of Bernicia diſdaining at him, when Oſwine either was not able, or not willing to joyn with him in battel, cauſed him Traytorouſly to be ſlain. And ſo Oſwy with his Son Egfrid, reigned in Northumberland alone.

In the time, and alſo in the houſe of this Oſwy King of Northumberland, was a certain man named Benedict, who was the bringer up of Bede from his youth, and took him to his inſtitution when he was but ſeven years old, and ſo taught him during his life. This Benedict or Benet, deſcending of a noble ſtock and rich kin, and in good favour with Oſwy, forſook ſervice, houſe, and all his kindred to ſerve Chriſt, and went to Rome (where he had been in his life time five times) and brought from thence Books into Monaſteries, with other things which he thought then to ſerve for devotion. This Benedict, ſurnamed Biſhop, was the firſt that brought in the Art and uſe of glaſing into this Land; for before that, Glaſs-windows were not known either in Churches or in Houſes.

In the Reign of the foreſad Oſwy and Egfrid his ſon, was Botulphus Abbat, which builded in the Eaſt part of Lincoln an Abbey. Alſo Aidanus, Finianus, and Colmannus, with three Scotiſh Biſhops of Northumberland holy Men, held with the Britains againſt the Romiſh order for the keeping of Eaſter day. Moreover Cuthbertus, Jarumannus, Cedda, and Wilfridus lived the ſame time: Whom as I judge to be Biſhops of holy converſation, ſo I thought it ſufficient here only to name them. As touching their miracles wherefore they were made Saints in the Popes Kalender, ſeeing they are not written in the Goſpel, nor in my Creed, but in certain old Chronicles of that age, ſo they are no matter of my Faith: Notwithſtanding as touching their converſation, this I read, and alſo do credit, that the Clergy both of Britain and England, at that time p'ied nothing that was worldly, but gave themſelves to Preaching and Teaching the Word of our Saviour, and followed the life that they Preached by giving of good example. And over that, as our Hiſtories accord, they were ſo voyd of covetouſneſs, that they received no poſſeſſions or territories which were forced upon them.

{Anno 664.}

About this ſeaſon or not much before, under the Reign of Oſwy and Oſwine Kings of Northumberland, another Synod or Council was holden againſt the Britains and the Scotiſh Biſhops, for the right obſerving of Saſter at Sternhalt. At what time Agilbertus Biſhop Weſt-Saxons came to Northumberland, to inſtitute Wilfrid Abbat of Ripon, where this queſtion for Eaſter day began to be moved: For Colman, then Biſhop of Northumberland, followed not the coſtom of Rome, nor of the Saxons, but followed the Britains and the Scotiſh Biſhops, his Predeceſſors in the ſame See before. Thus on the one ſide was Colman the Archbiſhop of York, and Hilda the Abbeſs of Sternhalt, which alledged for them the doings and examples of their Predeceſſors, both godly and reverend Biſhops, as Aidanus, Finianus, Archbiſhops of that See of York before them, and divers more, who had uſed always to celebrate the Eaſter from the fourteenth day of the firſt month, till the eight and twentieth of the ſame. And ſpecially, for that S. John the Evangeliſt at Epheſus kept and obſerved that day, &c. On the other ſide was Agilbert Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, James the Deacon of Paulinus above mentioned, Wilfrid Abbat of Ripon, and King Alfrid, Oſwies ſon, with his Queen, holding on the ſame ſide. The full contents of which diſputation here followeth, according as in the ſtory of Beda at large is deſcribed, with their reaſons and arguments on both ſides, as enſueth, &c.

Controverſie about Eaſter day.

Ex Beda. lib. 2. cap. 23.

The queſtion of Eaſter and of ſhaving, and other eccleſiaſtical matters being moved, it was determined, that in the Abbey which is called Sternhalt, of the which Hilda a devout woman was Abbeſs, a Convocation ſhould be had, and this queſtion there determined. To the which place came both the Kings, the Father and the Son, Biſhop Colman with his Clergy of Scotland, Agilbert, with Agathon and Wilfrid Prieſts. James and Roman were on their ſides; Hilda the Abbeſs with her company was on the Scotiſh part, and the reverend Biſhop Cedda was appointed Prolocutor for both parties in that Parliament. King Oſwy began firſt with an Oration, declaring that it was neceſſary for ſuch as ſerved one God, to live in one uniform order, and that ſuch as looked for one Kingdom in Heaven, ſhould not ſuffer in celebration of the heavenly Sacraments, but ſhould rather ſeek for the true Tradition, and follow the ſame. This ſaid, he commanded his Biſhop Colman to declare what the rite and cuſtom was in this behalf that he uſed, and from whence it had the original. Then Colman, obeying his Princes commandment, ſaid: The Eaſter which I obſerve, I received of my Anceſtors that ſent me hither a Biſhop, the which all our Forefathers, being men of God, did celebrate in like manner: And leſt it ſhould be contemned or deſpiſed of any man, it is manifeſtly apparent to be the very ſame which the holy Evangeliſt S. John (a Diſciple eſpecially beloved of the Lord) did accuſtomably uſe in all Churches and Congregations where he had authority. When Colman had ſpoken many things to this effect, the King commanded Agilbert to declare his opinion in this behalf, and to ſhew the order that he then uſed, from whence it came, and by what authority he obſerved the ſame. Agilbert requeſted the King that his Scholar Wilfrid a Prieſt might ſpeak for him, in as much as they both with the reſt of his Clergy were of one opinion herein, and that the ſaid Wilfrid could utter his mind better, and more plainly in the Engliſh Tongue, than he himſelf could. Then Wilfrid at the Kings commandment began on this ſort, and ſaid: The Eaſter which we keep, we have ſeen at Rome, whereas the holy Apoſtles, Peter and Paul, did live and teach, did ſuffer and were buried. The ſame alſo is uſed in Italy and in France; The which Countries we have travelled for Learning, and have noted it to be celebrated of them all. In Aſia alſo and in Africk, in Egypt and in Greece, and finally in all the world, the ſame manner of Eaſter is obſerved that we uſe, ſave only by theſe here preſent with their accomplices, the Picts and the Britains: With the which two (and yet not altogether agreeing) they condeſcend and ſtrive fooliſhly in this order againſt the univerſal world. To whom Colman replied, ſaying: I marvel you will call this order fooliſh, that ſo great an Apoſtle as was worthy to lie in the Lords lap, did did uſe, whom all the World doth well know, to have lived moſt wiſely. And Wilfrid anſwered, God forbid that I ſhould reprove S. John of his Folly, who kept the rites of Moſes Law, according to the letter (the Church being yet Jewiſh in many points) and the Apoſtles not as yet able to abdicate all the obſervations of the law before ordained. As for example, they could not reject Images invented of the Devil, the which all men that believe on Chriſt, ought of neceſſity to forſake and deteſt, leſt they ſhould be an offence to thoſe Jews that were amongſt the Gentiles. For this cauſe did S. Paul circumciſe Timothy, for this cauſe did he ſacrifice in the Temple, and did ſhave his head with Aquila and Priſcilla, at Corinth: All which things were done to none other purpoſe, than to eſchew the offence of the Jews. Hercupon alſo ſaid James to Paul, Thou ſeeſt Brother, how many thouſand Jews do believe, and all theſe be Zealous (notwithſtanding) of the law. Yet ſeeing the Goſpel is ſo manifeſtly Preached in the World, it is not lawful for the faithful to be Circumciſed, neither to offer ſacrifice of carnal things to God. Therefore John according to the cuſtom of the Law, the fourteenth day of the firſt month at evening, did begin the Celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter, nothing reſpecting whether it were celebrated in the Sabbath, or in any other Ferial day. But Peter when he Preached at Rome, remembring that the Lord did ariſe from death on the firſt day after the Sabbath, giving thereby an hope to the world of the Reſurrection, thought good to inſtitute Eaſter on that day, and not after the uſe and precepts of the law (that was) the fourteenth day of the firſt month: Even ſo John looking for the Moon at night, if it did ariſe, and the next day after were Sunday, which then was called the Sabbath, then did he celebrate the Eaſter of the Lord in the evening, like as we uſe to do even at this day. But if Sunday were not the next day after the fourteenth day, but fell on the ſixteenth day, or ſeventeenth, or on any other day unto the one and twentieth, he tarried always for it, and did begin the holy Solemnity of Eaſter on the evening next before the Sabbath. And ſo it came to paſs, that Eaſter was always kept on the Sunday, and was not celebrated but from the fifteenth day unto the one and twentieth: Neither doth this tradition of the Apoſtle break the Law, but fulfil the ſame. In the which it is to be noted, that Eaſter was inſtituted from the fourteenth day of the firſt month at evening, unto the one and twentieth day of the ſame month at evening; the which manner all S. Johns ſucceſſors in Aſia after his death did follow, and the Catholick Church throughout the whole World. And that this is the true Eaſter, and only of all Chriſtians to be obſerved, it was not newly decreed, but confirmed by the Council of Nice, as appeareth by the eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. Whereupon it is manifeſt that you (Colman) do neither follow the example of S. John, as ye think, nor of S. Peter, whoſe tradition you do willingly reſiſt, nor of the Church, nor yet of the Goſpel, in the celebration of Eaſter. For S. John, obſerving Eaſter according to the Precepts of the Law, kept it not on the firſt day after the Sabbath; but you preciſely keep it only on the firſt day after the Sabbath. Peter did celebrate Eaſter from the fifteenth day of the Moon to the one and twentieth day, but you keep Eaſter from the fourteenth unto the twentieth day; ſo that you begin Eaſter oftentimes the thirteenth day at night, of which manner neither the Law nor the Goſpel maketh any mention. But the Lord in the fourteenth day, either did eat the old Paſſover at night, or elſe did celebrate the Sacraments of the New Teſtament, in the remembrance of his death and paſſion. You do alſo utterly reject from the celebration of Eaſter, the one and twentieth day, the which the Law hath chiefly willed to be obſerved: And therefore as I ſaid, in the Keeping of Eaſter, you neither agree with S. John, nor with Peter, nor with the Law, nor yet with the Goſpel. Then Colman again anſwered to theſe things, ſaying: Did then Anatholius a godly man, and one much commended in the foreſaid eccleſiaſtical ſtory, againſt the Law and the Goſpel, who writeth that the Eaſter was to be kept from the fourteenth day unto the twentieth? Or ſhall we think that Columba, our reverend Father and his ſucceſſors, being men of God, who obſerved the Eaſter after this manner, did againſt the holy Scripture? Whereas ſome of them were men of ſuch godlineſs and vertue, as was declared by their wonderful miracles. (And I hereby nothing doubting of their holineſs) do endevour to follow their life, order and diſcipline. Then ſaid Wilfrid: It is certain that Anatholius was both a godly man, and worthy of great commendation; but what have you to do with him ſeeing you obſerve not his Order? For he following the true rule in keeping his Eaſter, obſerveth the circle of nineteen years; the which either you know not, or if you do, you comdemn the common order obſerved in the univerſal Church of Chriſt. And moreover, the ſaid Anatholius doth ſo count the fourteenth day, in the obſervation of Eaſter, as he confeſſeth the ſame to be the fifteenth day at night, after the manner of the Egyptians, and likewiſe noteth the twentieth day, to be in the feaſt of Eaſter, the one and twentieth in the evening: The which diſtinction that you know not, by this may appear, for that you keep the Eaſter, on the thirteenth day before the full Moon. Or otherwiſe I can anſwer you touching your Father Columba and his ſucceſſors, whoſe Order you ſay you follow, moved thereto by their miracles, on this wiſe, that the Lord will anſwer to many that ſhall ſay in the day of Judgment, that in his name they have prophelied and caſt out Divels, and have done many Miracles, &c. That he never knew them. But God forbid that I ſhould ſay ſo of your Fathers, becauſe it is much better to believe well of thoſe we know not, than ill. Whereupon I deny not but they were the ſervants of God, and holy Men, which loved the Lord of a good intent, though of a rude ſimplicity: And I think that the Order which they uſed in the Eaſter, did not much hurt them, ſo long as they had none amongſt them that could ſhew them the right obſervation of the ſame for them to follow. For I think, if the truth had been declared unto them, they would as well have received it in this matter as they did in others. But you and your Fellows, if you refuſe the Order of the Apoſtolical See, or rather, of the univerſal Church, which is confirmed by the holy Scripture; without all doubt you do ſin. And though your Forefathers were holy Men, what is their fewneſs, being but a corner of an Iſland, to be preferred before the univerſal Church, of Jeſus Chriſt, diſperſed throughout the whole World? And if Columba your Father (and ours alſo, being of Chriſt Jeſus) were mighty in miracles, is he therefore to be preferred before the Prince of the holy Apoſtles? To whom the Lord ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church, and the gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt it, and I will give thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Wilfrid having thus ended his argument, the King ſaid to Colman: Is it true that the Lord ſpake theſe things to S. Peter? And Colman anſwered, Yea. Then ſaid the King, Can you declare any thing that the Lord gave to Colman? Colman anſwered, No. Then quoth the King, Do both of you agree and conſent in this matter without any controverſie, that theſe words were principally ſpoken to Peter, and that the Lord gave him the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven? And they both anſwered, Yea. Then concluded the King on this wiſe, For ſo much as S. Peter is the Door-keeper of Heaven, I will not gainſay him; But in that I am able, I will obey his Orders in every point, leſt when I come to the gates of Heaven, he ſhut them againſt Me.

Upon this ſimple and rude reaſon of the King, the multitude eſtſoons conſented, and with them alſo Cedda was contented to give over, only Colman the Scot, being then Archbiſhop of York, in diſpleaſure left the Realm, and departed into Scotland, carrying with him the bones of Aidanus. Bed. lib. 3. cap. 25. And thus much concerning this matter of Eaſter.

After the deceaſe of Oſwy, Egfrid his Son was King after him in Northumberland fifteen years. By this Egfrid Cuthbert was promoted to the Biſhoprick of the Iſle of Farne: And Wilfrid which before had been Archbiſhop of York, was diſplaced through the means of Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Cedda poſſeſſed that See. Wilfrid, when he was put out, went to Rome, and complained of him to Agathon the Biſhop, and was well allowed in ſome things. But the King and Theodorus had their ſuch Proctors and Friends, that he returned without ſpeeding of his cauſe. Wherefore he returned into the South-Saxons, and builded an Abbey in Siſeſie, and Preached unto the South-Saxons, fifteen years. The King of Wherefore Wolferus now being licensed by Ethelwold the King, preached unto his Nobles and people of South-Sax, and converted them to Christ. In the mean time of whose baptising, the rain which before they lacked three years together, was given them plentifully, whereby their great Famine slacked, and the Country was made fruitful, which before was dried up with barrenness: insomuch that (as in some stories it is said) the people pestured with Famine, would go forty together upon the Rocks by the Sea-side, and taking hands together would throw themselves down to the Sea. Moreover, where they lacked before the Art of Fishing, the foresaid Wilfride taught them how with Nets to fish.

Near about this time in the year of our Lord, 666. the detestable Sect of Mahumet began to take strength and place. Although Polychronicon differing a little in years, accounteth the beginning of this Sect somewhat before, but the most diligent Searchers of them which write now, refer it to this year, which well agreeth with the number of that Beast, signified in the Apocalypse, χξ΄, that is, 666. Of this Mahumet came the Kingdom of Agarens (whom he after named Sarazens) to whom he gave sundry Laws, patched of many Sects and Religions together: he taught them to pray ever to the South; and as we keep the Sunday, so they keep the Friday, which they call the day of Venus. He permitted them to have as many Wives as they were able to maintain; to have as many Concubines as they list; to abstain from the use of Wine, except on certain solemn days in the year; to have and worship only one God Omnipotent, saying that Moses and the Prophets were great men, but Christ was greater, and greatest of all the Prophets, as being born of the Virgin Mary by the Power of God, without mans seed, and at last was taken up to Heaven, but was not slain, but another in his likeness for him, with many other wicked Blasphemies in his Law contained. At length this Kingdom of the Saracens began to be conquered of the Turks, and in process of time wholely subdued to them.

Ex Polycron. Ex Giraldo Cambrensi. Ex Stephano Cantuariensi.

But now to return again to the time of our English Saxons: In this mean season Theodorus was sent from Italy into England, by Vitellianus the Pope, to be Archbishop of Canterbury, and with him divers other Monks of Italy, to set up here in England Latine Service, Masses, Ceremonies, Letanies, with such other Romish ware, &c. This Theodorus being made Archbishop and Metropolitan of Canterbury, began to play the Rex, placing and displacing the Bishops at his pleasure. As for Cedda and Wilfride Archbishops of York, he thrust them both out, under the pretence that they were not lawfully consecrated, notwithstanding they were sufficiently authorized by their Kings, and were placed against their wills. Wherefore Wilfride, as is before touched, went up to Rome, but could have no redress of his Cause. Yet to shew what modesty this Wilfride used against his Enemy being so violently molested as he was, because the words of his complaint are expressed in William Malmesbury, I thought here to express the same both for the commendation of the party, and also for the good Example of others, in case any such be, whom good Examples will move to well-doing. This Wilfride therefore, having such injury and violence offered unto him by the hands of Theodore, although he had just cause to do his uttermost; yet in prosecuting his Complaint how he tempered himself, what words of modesty he used, rather to defend his Innocency, than to impugne his Adversary, by this his suggestion offered up to the Bishop of Rome, may appear, whose words in effect were these, Quid autem acciderit, ut Theodorus sanctiss. Archiepiscopus (me superstite in fide, quam licet indignus dispensabam) absque consensu cujuslibet Episcopi ex sua authoritate (mea humilitate non acquiescente) ordinaverit tres Episcopos: omittere magis quam urgere, pro ejusdem viri reverentia, condecet. Quem quidem, pro eo quod ab hac Apostolicæ sedis summitate directus est, accusare non audeo, &c. In English: How it chanceth that Theodorus the most holy and reverend Archbishop (my self being alive in the See, which I thought unworthy did rule and dispose) hath of his own Authority without the consent of any Bishop (neither having any simple voice agreeing to the same) ordained three Bishops, I had rather pass over in silence, than to stir any further therein, because of the reverence of that man, and no less thought I it my duty so to do. The which man for that he hath been directed by the See Apostolical, I will not, nor dare not here accuse, &c. Thus the cause of the said Wilfride albeit it was sufficiently known in the Court of Rome, to be well allowed for just and innocent; yet it was not then redressed. In such estimation was this Theodorus then among the Romans. Upon this Controversie of these two Bishops I may well here infer the words of William Malmesbury, not unworthy in my mind to be noted, which be these in his Latine story, Ubi videri & doleri potest humana miseria, quod videlicet quantumlibet quis sanctitate polleat, non ad plenum pervicaces mores exuat, &c. That is, In the which Theodore (saith he) the weak and miserable infirmity of man be seen and also lamented; considering, that although a man be never so holy, yet in the same man is found something, whereby it may be perceived that he hath not utterly put off all his stubborn conditions, &c.

In the time of this Theodorus, and by the means of him, a Provincial Synod was holden at Thetford, mentioned in the story of Beda: the Principal Contents whereof were these:

First, That Easter-day should be uniformly kept and observed through the whole Realm, upon one certain day, videlicet prima, 14. Luna mensis primi.

Secondly, That no Bishop should intermeddle within the Dioceses of another. 2

Thirdly, That Monasteries consecrated unto God should be exempt and free from the Jurisdiction of the Bishops. 3

Fourthly, That the Monks should not stray from one place (that is) from one Monastery to another, without the licence of their Abbot: also to keep the same Obedience which they promised at their first entring. 4

Fifthly, That no Clergy-man should forsake his own Bishop, and be received in any other place, without Letters Commendatory of his own Bishop. 5

Sixthly, That foreign Bishops and Clergy-men coming into the Realm, should be content only with the benefit of such Hospitality, as should be offered them: neither should intermeddle any further within the Precinct of any Bishop, without his special permission. 6

Seventhly, That Synods Provincial should be kept within the Realm at least once a year. 7

Eighthly, That no Bishop should prefer himself before another, but must observe the time and order of his Consecration. 8

Ninethly, That the number of Bishops should be augmented, as the number of the people increaseth, 9

Tenthly, That no Marriage should be admitted, but that which was lawful; no Incest to be suffered; neither any man to put away his Wife for any cause, except only for Fornication, after the rule of the Gospel. And these be the principal Chapters of that Synod, &c. 10

In the next year following was the ſixth general Council kept at Conſtance, whereat this Theodore was alſo preſent under Pope Agatho: where marriage was permitted to Greek Prieſts, and forbidden to the Latine. In this Council the Latine Maſs was firſt openly ſaid by John Portuenſis the Popes Legat, before the Patriarch and Princes at Conſtantinople, in the Temple of Saint Sophie.

{ Anno 705. }

After the deceaſe of Alfride King of Northumberland (from whom it was digreſſed) ſucceeded his Son Oſredus, reigning eleven years, after whom reigned Kenredus two years, and next Oſricus after him eleven years.

Oſredus, Kenredus, Oſricus Kings of Northumberland. The Kingdom of Britain ceaſeth Iva or Ive, or Ina King of Weſt-Saxons. Polychron. lib. 5. cap 21.

In the time and reign of theſe four Kings of Northumberland, King Iva or Ina reigned in Weſt-Sax, who ſucceeding after Cadwallader, the laſt King of Britains, began his Reign about the year of our Lord, 689. and reigned with great valiantneſs over the Weſt-Saxons the term of 37 years. Concerning whoſe Acts and Wars maintained againſt the Kentiſh-Saxons and other Kings, becauſe I have not to intermeddle withall, I refer the Reader to other Chroniclers.

S. Cuthlake a Popiſh Saint.

About the ſixth year of the Reign of this Iva, or Ive, Polychronicon and others make mention of one Cuthlacus, whom they call S. Cuthlake a Confeſſor, who about the four and twentieth year of his age, renouncing the Pomp of the World, profeſſed himſelf a Monk in the Abbey of Repingdon, and the third year after went to Crowland, where he led the life of an Hipchorite. In the which Iſle and place of his burying was builded a fair Abbey, called afterward for the great reſort and gentle entertainment of Strangers, Crowland the courteous. But why this Cuthlake ſhould be ſainted for his doings, I ſee no great cauſe; as neither do I think the fabulous Miracles reported of him to be true: as where the vulgar people are made to believe, that he incloſed the Devil in a boyling-Pot, and cauſed wicked Spirits to erect up houſes, with ſuch other Fables and lying Miracles. Among which lying Miracles alſo may be reckoned that which the ſtories mention in the eleventh year of the Reign of Iva, to be done of one Brithwald or Drithelme, who, being dead a long ſeaſon, was reſtored to life again, and told many wonders of ſtrange things that he had ſeen, cauſing thereby great Alms and deeds of Charity to be done of the people: and ſo he, diſpoſing of his goods given in three parts, went to the Abbey of Mailroos, where he continued the reſt of his life.

Crowland the courteous.

What ſtrange fights this Brithwald or Drithelme did ſee after his death, read the ninth Book of Henry Huntington.

Moreover, about the ſixteenth year of the ſaid Iva, Ethelbred King of Mercia, after he had there reigned thirty years, was made a Monk, and after Abbot of Bardney.

King Ethelbred made Abbot of Bardney.

And about the eighteenth year of the Reign of Ive, died the worthy and learned Biſhop Adelmus, firſt Abbot of Malmesbury, afterwards Biſhop of Schirborne, of whom William Malmesbury writeth plenteouſly with great commendation, and that not unworthily, as I ſuppoſe: eſpecially for the noble praiſe of Learning and Vertue in him above the reſt of that time (next after Beda) as the great number of Books and Epiſtles, with Poems by him ſet forth, will declare. Although concerning the Miracles which the ſaid Author aſcribeth to him; as firſt in cauſing an Infant of nine days old to ſpeak at Rome, to declare Pope Sergius, which was then ſuſpected the Father of the ſaid Child; alſo in hanging his Caſule upon the Sunbeams: Item, in making whole the Altar-ſtone of marble brought from Rome: Item, in drawing a length one of the Timber pieces, which went to the building of the Temple in Malmesbury: Item, in ſaving the Mariners at Dover, &c. As concerning theſe and ſuch other Miracles, which William Malmesbury to him attributeth, I cannot conſent to him therein: but think rather the ſame to be Monkiſh devices, forged upon their Patrons to maintain the dignity of their houſes. And as the Author was deceived (no doubt) in believing ſuch Fables himſelf, ſo may he likewiſe deceive us through the dexterity of his ſtile and fine handling of the matter; but that further experience hath taught the World now adays more wiſdom, in not believing ſuch practiſes. This Adelmus was Biſhop of Schirborne, which See after was united to the See of Winton. In which Church of Wincheſter the like Miracles alſo are to be read of Biſhop Adelwold and S. Swithine, whom they have canonized likewiſe for a Saint.

Moreover, near about the five and twentieth of Ive, by the Report of Beda, Saint John of Berverly, which was then Biſhop of York, died, and was buried at the Porch of the Minſter of Deirwood or Beverley. In the which Porch it is recorded in ſome Chronicles, that as the ſaid John upon a time was praying, being in the Porch of Saint Michael in York, the Holy Ghoſt in the ſimilitude of a Dove ſate before him upon the Altar in brightneſs ſhining above the Sun. This brightneſs being ſeen of others, firſt cometh one of his Deacons running unto the Porch, who beholding the Biſhop there ſtanding in his Prayers, and all the place repleniſhed with the Holy Ghoſt, was ſtricken with the light thereof, having all his face burnt, as it were, with hot burning fire. Notwithſtanding the Biſhop by and by cured the face of his Deacon again, charging them (as the ſtory ſaith) not to publiſh what he had ſeen during his life time, &c. Which tale ſeemeth as true as that we read about the ſame time done of S. Egwine, in Polychron, Abbot of Euſham and Biſhop of Worceſter (then called Wicts) who upon a time when he had fettered both his feet in Irons faſt locked for certain ſins done in his youth, and had caſt the Key thereof into the Sea, afterward a Fiſh brought the Key again into the Ship, as he was ſailing homeward from Rome.

But to leave theſe Monkiſh Phantaſies, and return to the right courſe again of the ſtory: In the time of this foreſaid Ive, began firſt the right Obſerving of Eaſter-day to be kept of the Picts and of the Britains. In the obſervation of which day (as is largely ſet forth in Beda and Polychronicon, lib. 5. cap. 17. & 22.) three things are neceſſary to be obſerved: Firſt, the full Moon of the firſt month, that is, of the month of March. Secondly, the Dominical letter. Thirdly, the Equinoctial day, which Equinoctial was wont to be counted in the Eaſt Church, and eſpecially among the Egyptians, to be about the ſeventeenth day of March. So that the full Moon on the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day being obſerved, the next Dominical day following that full Moon, is to be taken for Eaſter-day. Wherein are diligently to be noted two things: Firſt, the fulneſs of the Moon muſt be perfectly full, ſo that it be the beginning of the third week of the Moon, which is the fourteenth or fifteenth day of the Moon. Secondly, it is to be noted, that the ſaid perfect fulneſs of the Moon, beginning the third week, muſt happen either in the very evening of the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day: for elſe if it happen either on the Equinoctial day before the evening, or before the Equinoctial day, then it belongeth to the laſt month of the laſt year, and not to the firſt month of the firſt year, and ſo ſerveth not to be obſerved.

A general rule ſerving for the obſervation of Eaſter-day.

This rule of Eaſter ſeemeth to be taken out of the Book of Numbers. And they going out of Ramiſſe the fifteenth day of the firſt month, the next day after held their Eaſter, &c.

This rite and uſage in keeping Eaſter-day being received in the Latine Church, began now to take place among the Picts and Britains, through the buſie travel of Theodorus Cuthlacus, but namely of Elbert the holy Monk, as they term him, and of Colfrid Abbot of Sirwin in Northumberland, which wrote to Narcanus, or Naitonus the King of Picts, concerning the ſame: who alſo among other things writeth of the ſhaven Crowns of Prieſts, ſaying, that it was as neceſſary for the vow of a Monk, or the degree of a Prieſt, to have a ſhaven Crown for reſtraint of their luſt; as for any Chriſtian man to bleſs him againſt Spirits, when they come upon him, Beda lib. 5. The Copy of which Letter as it is in Beda I have here annexed, not for any great reaſon therein contained, but only to delight the Reader with ſome paſtime, in ſeeing the fond ignorance of that Monkiſh age: the Copy of the Letter thus proceeded.

Why Prieſts Crowns were ſhaven

Beda de geſt. lib. 5.

Of the ſhaving of Prieſts, out of the fifth Book of Beda, the 21. Chapter.

The Copy of a Monkiſh Letter of Elfride to King of Naito for the ſhaving of Prieſts crowns.

CConcerning the ſhaving of Prieſts (whereof you writ alſo unto me) I exhort you that it be decently obſerved according to the Chriſtian Faith. We are not ignorant that the Apoſtles were not all ſhaven after one manner, neither doth the Catholick Church at this day agree in one uniform manner of ſhaving, as they do in Faith, Hope and Charity. Let us conſider the former time of the Patriarchs, and we ſhall find that Job (an example of Patience) even in the very point of his Afflictions, did ſhave his head: and he proveth alſo, that in the time of his Proſperity, he uſed to let his hair grow. And Joſeph an excellent

How proveth he that the Apoſtles, Job and Joſeph were ſhaven. Much faid, nothing proved.

excellent Doctor and Executor of Chaſtity, Humility, Piety, and other Vertues, when he was delivered out of priſon and ſervitude, was ſhaven: whereby it appeareth, that whilſt he abode in priſon he was unſhaven. Behold both theſe, being men of God, did uſe an order in the habit of body one contrary to the other, whoſe Conſciences notwithſtanding within did well agree in the like Grace of Vertues. But to ſpeak truly and freely, the difference of ſhaving hurteth not ſuch as have a pure Faith in the Lord, and ſincere Charity towards their Neighbour: eſpecially for that there was never any Controverſie amongſt the Catholick Fathers about the diverſity thereof, as there hath been of the difference of the Celebration of Eaſter and of Faith. But of all theſe ſhavings that we find, either in the Church or elſe-where, there is none in mine opinion ſo much to be followed and imbraced, as that which he uſed on his head, to whom the Lord ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, and the Gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt it, and I will give thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. And contrariwiſe there is no ſhaving ſo much to be abhorred and deteſted, as that which he uſed, to whom the ſame S. Peter ſaid, Thy money be with thee to thy deſtruction, becauſe thou thinkeſt to poſſeſs the Gift of God by thy money, therefore thy part and lot is not in this word. Neither ought we to be ſhaven on the crown only, becauſe S. Peter was ſo ſhaven, but becauſe Peter was ſo ſhaven in remembrance of the Lords Paſſion: therefore we that deſire by the ſame Paſſion to be ſaved, muſt wear the ſign of the ſame Paſſion with him upon the top of our head, which is the higheſt part of our body. For as every Church, that is made a Church by the death of the Saviour, doth uſe to bear the ſign of the holy Croſs in the front, that it may the better by the defect of that Banner, be kept from the invaſions of evil Spirits; and by the often admonition thereof is taught to crucifie the fleſh with the concupiſence of the ſame: in like manner it behoveth ſuch as have the vows of Monks, and degrees of the Clergy, to bind themſelves with a ſtricter bit of continency for the Lords ſake. And as the Lord bare a Crown of Thornes on his head in his Paſſion, whereby he took and carried away from us the thorns and pricks of our ſins: ſo muſt every one of us, by ſhaving our heads, patiently bear, and willingly ſuffer the mocks and ſcorns of the world for his ſake, that we may receive the Crown of eternal Life, which God hath promiſed to all that love him, and ſhall by ſhaving their corporal crowns, bear the Adverſity, and contemn the Proſperity of this World. But the ſhaving which Simon Magus uſed, what faithful man doth not deteſt, together with his Magical Art? The which at the firſt appearance hath a ſhew of a ſhaven crown, but if you mark his neck, you ſhall find it curtailed in ſuch wiſe, as you will ſay, it is rather meet to be uſed of the Simoniſts, than of the Chriſtians. And ſuch (of fooliſh men) be thought worthy of the Glory of the eternal Crown; whereas indeed for their ill living, they are worthy not only to be deprived of the ſame, but alſo of eternal Salvation. I ſpeak not this againſt them that uſe this kind of ſhaving, and live Catholickly in Faith and good Works, but ſurely I believe there be diverſe of them be very holy and godly men; amongſt the which is Adamnan, the Abbot and worthy Prieſt of the Columbians: who when he came Ambaſſador from his Country unto King Alfrid, deſired greatly to ſee our Monaſtery: where he declared a wonderful Wiſdom, Humility, and Religion both in his manners and words. Amongſt other talk, I asked him, Why he that did believe to come to the Crown of Life that ſhould never have end, did uſe contrary to his belief a definite Image of a Crown on his head? And if you ſeek (quoth I) the Fellowſhip of S. Peter, why do you uſe the faſhion of his Crown whom S. Peter did accurſe, and not of his rather with whom you deſire to live eternally? Adamnan anſwered, ſaying, You know right well Brother, though I uſe Simons manner of ſhaving, after the cuſtom of my Country, yet do I deteſt, and with all my heart abhor his Infidelity. I deſire notwithſtanding to imitate the Footſteps of the holy Apoſtle as far forth as my power will extend. Then ſaid I, I believe it is ſo: but then it is apparent you imitate thoſe things which the Apoſtle Peter did from the bottom of your heart, if you uſe the ſame upon your face that you know he did; for I ſuppoſe your Wiſdom underſtandeth that it is right deſcent to differ in the trimming your face or ſhaving, from his, whom in your heart you abhor. And contrariwiſe, as you deſire to imitate the doings of him whom you deſire to have a * Mediator between God and you, ſo it is meet you imitate the manner of his apparel and ſhaving. Thus much ſaid I to Adamnan, who ſeemed then well to like our Churches: inſomuch that he returning into Scotland, reformed many of his Churches there after our Celebration, albeit he could not do ſo amongſt the Monks, with whom he had ſpecial Authority. He endeavoured alſo to have reformed their manner of ſhaving if he had been able. And now (O King) I exhort your Majeſty to labour together with your people, over whom the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords hath made you Governor, to imitate likewiſe in all theſe points the Catholick and Apoſtolical Churches. So ſhall it come to paſs, that in the end of this your Temporal Kingdom, the moſt bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles ſhall open you the Gates of the heavenly Kingdom, together with the other Elect of God. The Grace of the eternal King preſerve you moſt dearly beloved Son in Chriſt, long time to Reign over us, to the great tranquility of us all.

When this Letter was read before King Naiton with other of his learned men, and diligently tranſlated into his proper Language, he ſeemed to rejoyce very much at the Exhortation thereof, inſomuch as riſing up from among his Noblemen, he kneeled on the ground, and gave God thanks that he had deſerved to receive ſo worthy a Preſent out of England, and ſo cauſed it forthwith by publick Proclamation to be written out, learned, and obſerved throughout all the Provinces of the Picts, defacing the Errors that had been uſed there by the ſpace of 704 years. For all the Miniſters of the Altar and all Monks were ſhaven on the Crown, and all the people rejoyced for the new Diſcipline of the moſt bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtle S. Peter, which they had received.

¶ By this Monkiſh Letter above prefixed, void of all Scripture, of all probation and truth of Hiſtory, thou maiſt note, gentle Reader, how this vain tradition of ſhaven Crowns hath come up, and upon how light and trifling occaſion: which in very deed was none other but the dreaming phantaſies of Monks of that time, falſly grounded upon the example of Peter, when by no old Monument of any ancient Record they can ever prove, either Peter or Simon Magus to have been ſhaven. Moreover, in the ſaid Letter alſo is to be noted, how the Scottiſh Clergy at that ſeaſon, did wear no ſuch Prieſtly crowns as our Engliſh Church-men then did.

But to cut off this matter of ſhaving, more worthy to be laughed at, than to be ſtoried; let us now again return where as we left at King Ive, of whom William Malmeſbury and Fabian in his Chronicle do record, that when the foreſaid Ive had ruled the Weſt-Saxons by the term of thirty ſeven years, by the importunate perſwaſion and ſubtil policy of his wife Ethelburga, he was allured to go to Rome, there to be made a Monk. Which Ethelburga after ſhe had a long time laboured him to leave the World, and could not bring about her purpoſe, upon a ſeaſon, when the King and ſhe had reſted them in a fair Palace richly hanged, and were upon the morrow thence departed; ſhe by her commandment, cauſed the Palace to be repleniſhed with all kind of filth and dung, and Hogs and vile Beaſts therein to be laid, as well in the Chambers, as other Houſes of Office; and in their own Chamber where they did lie, there was a Sow laid with her young Pigs. And when ſhe knew that this Palace was thus deformed, being a certain ſpace out of the Town, ſhe beſought the King to viſit the ſaid Palace. And when ſhe had brought him thereunto, ſhe ſaid to him, I pray you my Lord, behold now this houſe, where are now the rich Tapets and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Apparel, that we left here this other day? And where be the Delicacies and pleaſant Servitors and coſtly Diſhes that you and I lately were ſerved with? Be not all theſe paſſed and gone? My Lord (ſaid ſhe) in like manner ſhall we vaniſh away, as ſuddenly as you ſee theſe worldly things be paſſed. And our bodies, which now be delicately kept, ſhall fall and turn into the filth of the earth. Wherefore have in mind my words that before time to you I have often ſhewed and Diverſity of Rites hurteth not the Church.

See how theſe ſhavelings would father their ſhaving upon Peter, which is neither found in Scripture, nor any approved ſtory, but only in painted clothes.

Why Prieſts and Monks be ſhaven in the crown.

The ſhaving of the crown what it repreſenteth.

How doth the ſight of the croſs defend Churches from evil ſpirits, when it cannot keep them from evil Prieſts?

If ſhaving of the crown doth teach men patience in ſuffering, how cometh it that we ſee none more waſpiſh and ireful than theſe ſhorn generations of Monkiſh vipers?

Simon Magus ſhaven, as he ſaith.

The difference between the ſhaving of Peter and Simon Magus.

In outward habit Chriſtians ought not to reſemble wicked doers.

* There is but one Mediator between God and man, Chriſt Jeſus.

The Scottiſh Monks and the Engliſh Monks differed in their ſhaving.

If Peter ſhall let in the elect of God into Heaven, Chriſt then ſerveth in little ſtead.

and told, and buſie you to purchaſe that Palace that ever ſhall indure in joy without tranſmutation.

King Ive reſigning his kingdom, went to Rome and became a Monk.

By means of theſe words and other, the Queen turned ſo the Kings mind, that ſhortly after he reſigned the Governance of his Kingdom unto Ethelardus his Nephew; and for the love of Chriſt, took on him the habit of a poor man, and ſetting apart all the Pomp and Pride of this wicked World, aſſociated himſelf in the fellowſhip of poor men, and travelled to Rome with great devotion, when he had been King of Weſt-Saxons (as before is ſaid) thirty ſeven years. After whoſe departing, the ſaid Erhelburga his wife, went unto Barking, ſeven miles from London, wherein the Nunnery of Barking, before-of Erkenwald founded, ſhe continued and ended the reſt of her life, when ſhe had been Abbeſs of the place a certain time. The ſaid Malmesbury in his ſtory alſo teſtifieth, that this Ive was the first King that granted a peny of every fire-houſe through his Dominion, to be paid unto the Court of Rome, which afterward was called Romeſcot, or Peterpence, and long after was paid in many places of England.

Ethelburga the Queen made Nun of Barking.

Peterpence firſt granted and paid to Rome.

The Laws made by King Ive to his people.

This Ive, like as for his time he was worthy and valiant in his Acts; ſo was he the firſt of the Saxon Kings (that I read of) which ſet forth any Laws to his Country: the rehearſal of which Laws, to the number of fourſcore and odd, were not unprofitable here to be inſerted, together with other Laws of the Weſt-Saxon Kings after him, before the time of William the Conqueror; in caſe it were not for the length and prolixity of this preſent Volume. And thus much concerning the Reign of King Ive, King of the Weſt-Saxons by the way. Now to repair again to the courſe of Northumberland Kings ſomething intermitted.

Next unto the foreſaid Oſricus, followed Celulfus, whom he had adopted, Brother to Kenred above ſpecified. This Celulfus, as he was himſelf learned, ſo were in his time divers learned men then flouriſhing in England, among whom was Beda, who unto the ſame King Celulfus offered his ſtory, intituled, Anglorum Hiſtoria, not only to be ratified by his Authority, but alſo to be amended, as Malmesburienſis writeth, by his knowledge and learning.

Celulfus King of Northumberland.

Beda.

Anno 729. The life of Beda briefly deſcribed.

And for ſo much as I have here entred into the mention of Beda, a man of worthy and venerable memory, becauſe of the certifying of the truth of that man: and for that I ſee all Writers, (as touching his life) do not agree, ſome ſaying that he was no Engliſh man born: I thought ſo much to report of him, as I find by his own words teſtified of himſelf in the later end of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, offered to the ſaid Celulfus above mentioned, the words of whom be theſe.

Thus much (by the help of God) I Beda, the Servant of Chriſt, and Prieſt of the Monaſtery of Peter and Paul at Wire, have compiled and digeſted concerning the Britain Hiſtory. And ſo the ſame Beda proceeding further in his Narration, declareth that he being born in the Territory of the ſaid Monaſtery, being of the age of ſeven years, was committed of his Parents and Friends, to the Tuition and Education of Benedict (of whom above relation is made) and of Celfrid, Abbots of the foreſaid Monaſtery. In the which place or Monaſtery he continuing from that time forth, all his life long, gave himſelf and all his whole ſtudy to the meditating of holy Scripture. Whatſoever time or leiſure he had from his daily Service in the Church, that he ſpent either in learning or teaching, or writing ſomething. About the nineteenth year of his age, he was made Deacon, the thirtieth year of his age he was made Prieſt. From the which time, to the age of nine and fifty years, he occupied himſelf in interpreting the Works of the ancient Fathers for his own uſe, and the neceſſity of others: and in writing of Treatiſes: which came in all to the number of ſeven and thirty Volumes, which he digeſted into threeſcore and eighteen Books.

This Benedict Maſter to Beda was the firſt that brought in the uſe of Glaſs-windows into England. Alſo the ſaid Benedict brought from Rome with him, John the Archcanter, who firſt taught in England to ſing in the quire after the manner of Rome.

The number of the works and books written by Beda.

Some ſay, that he went to Rome, either there to defend his Books to be conſonant to Catholick Doctrine: or elſe if they ſhould be found faulty, to amend and correct the ſame, as he ſhould thereto be commanded. Albeit the Reporter of this his life dare not certainly affirm that ever he was at Rome; but that he was invited and called thither to come, both it is manifeſt in ſtories, and alſo this Epiſtle of Pope Sergius doth ſufficiently prove; declaring moreover in what price and eſtimation Beda was accepted, as well in the Court of Rome, as in other places beſides. The Epiſtle of Sergius ſent to Celfride thus proceedeth, in tenor and form as followeth in Latine.

The Epiſtle of Pope Sergius ſent to Celfride, Abbot of Wire Abbey, requiring Beda to be ſent up to him to Rome, for the Fame of his worthy Learning.

The famous learning of Beda.

So notable and famous was the Learning of this foreſaid Beda, that the Church of Rome (as by this Letter appeareth) both ſtood in need of his help, and alſo required the ſame, about the diſcuſſing of certain Cauſes and Controverſies appertaining to Learning. Moreover, the whole Latine Church at that time gave him the maſtery in Judgment and Knowledge of the holy Scriptures. In all his Explanations, his chieteſt ſcope and purpoſe did ever drive to inſtruct and inform his Reader, ſimply, and without all curiouſneſs of ſtile, in the ſincere love of God and of his Neighbour. As touching the holineſs and integrity of his life, it is not to be doubted. For how could it be, that he ſhould attend to any vicious Idleneſs, or had any leiſure to the ſame, who in reading and digeſting ſo many Volumes, conſumed all his whole Cogitations in writing upon the Scriptures? for ſo he teſtifieth of himſelf in the third Book of Samuel, ſaying in theſe words, If my Treatiſes and Expoſitions, ſaith he, bring with them no other utility to the Readers thereof; yet to my ſelf they conduce not a little thus, that while all my ſtudy and cogitation was ſet upon them, in the mean while of ſlippery inticements and vain cogitations of this world I had little mind. Thus in this travel of ſtudy he continued till the age of ſixty two years: at length, drawing to his later end, being ſick ſeven weeks together, beſides other occupyings of his mind, and other ſtudies which he did not intermit; he tranſlated alſo the Goſpel of S. John into Engliſh. At length, with great comfort of ſpirit, he departed this life, pronouncing many comfortable ſayings to them that ſtood about him, upon Aſcention-day, the ſame year when Nothelmus was inſtituted Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And thus much concerning the ſtory of Beda.

Beda commended for integrity of life.

Saint Johns Goſpel tranſlated into Engliſh by Beda.

This Celulfus, King of Northumberland, afore mentioned, after he had reigned eight years was made a Monk in the Abbey of Farne, otherwiſe called Lindefar, or Holy Iland: where by his means licence was given to the Monks of that Houſe to drink Wine or Ale, which before, by the Inſtitution of Aidanus above mentioned, drunk nothing but Milk and Water. After whom ſucceeded Egbert his Couſin, Brother to Egbert (the ſame time being Biſhop of York) which brought again thither the Pall, that his Predeceſſors had forgone, ſince the time that Paulinus had left the See, and fled to Rocheſter

Celulfus of a King made a Monk.

Egbert King of Northumberland.

as is before declared. The ſaid Egbert alſo erected a noble Library in York, whoſe Example I wiſh other Biſhops now would follow.

{Anno 747.} About the beginning of the Reign of this Egbert, was Cuthbert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who collected a great Synod of Biſhops and Prelates, in the year of our Lord, 747. in the month of September, near to the place called Clocneſho. In the which Synod aſſembled theſe Decrees were Enacted.

Ex Malmesb. lib. de geſtis pontif. Anglo.

Cuthbert Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

1. Firſt, That Biſhops ſhould be more diligent in ſeeing to their Office, and in admoniſhing the people of their faults.

2. That they ſhould live in a peaceable mind together, notwithſtanding they were in place diſſevered aſunder.

3. That every Biſhop once a year ſhould go about all the Pariſhes of his Dioceſs.

4. That the ſaid Biſhops every one in his Dioceſs ſhould moniſh their Abbots and Monks to live regularly: and that Prelates ſhould not oppreſs their Inferiors, but love them.

5. That they ſhould teach the Monaſteries which the ſecular men had invaded, and could not then be taken from them, to live regularly.

6. That none ſhould be admitted to Orders, before his life ſhould be examined.

7. That in Monaſteries the reading of holy Scripture ſhould be more frequented.

8. That Prieſts ſhould be no Diſpoſers of Secular buſineſs.

9. That they ſhould take no money for baptiſing Infants.

10. That they ſhould both learn and teach the Lords Prayer and Creed in the Engliſh-Tongue.

11. That all ſhould joyn together in their Miniſtery after one uniform Rite and Manner.

12. That in a modeſt Voice they ſhould ſing in the Church.

13. That all Holy and Feſtival days ſhould be celebrated at one time together.

14. That the Sabbath-day be reverendly obſerved and kept.

15. That the ſeven Hours Canonical every day be obſerved.

The Rogation days had not then that ſuperſtition in them which they had afterward.

16. That the Rogation-days, both the greater and leſſer ſhould not be omitted.

17. That the Feaſt of S. Gregory and S. Auſtin our Patron ſhould not be omitted.

18. That the Faſt of the four times ſhould be kept and obſerved.

19. That Monks and Nuns ſhould go regularly apparelled.

20. That Biſhops ſhould ſee theſe Decrees not to be neglected.

21. That the Church-men ſhould not give themſelves unto drunkenneſs.

22. That the Communion ſhould not be neglected of the Church-men.

23. Item, that the ſame alſo ſhould be obſerved of Lay-men, as time required.

24. That Lay-men firſt ſhould be well tried before they entred into Monkery.

25. That Alms be not neglected.

26. That Biſhops ſhould ſee theſe Decrees to be notified to the people.

27. They diſputed of the profit of Alms.

28. They diſputed of the profit of ſinging Pſalms.

29. That the Congregation ſhould be conſtitute, after the ability of their Goods.

30. That Monks ſhould not dwell among Lay-men.

31. That publick Prayer ſhould be made for Kings and Princes.

Boniface an Engliſh man Archbiſhop of Mentz.

Theſe Decrees and Ordinances being thus among the Biſhops concluded, Cuthbert the Archbiſhop ſendeth the Copy thereof to Boniface, which Boniface, otherwiſe named Winfride, an Engliſh man born, was then Archbiſhop of Mentz, and after made a Martyr, as the Popiſh ſtories term him.

Ethelbald King of Mercesland.

This Boniface being, as is ſaid, Archbiſhop of Mentz in the time of this foreſaid Synod, wrote a Letter to Ethelbald King of Merceland: which Ethelbald was alſo preſent in the ſame Synod, of whom Beda maketh mention in his Hiſtory, calling him proud Ethelbald, and the greateſt of the Saxon Kings in his time. Firſt this Ethelbald, after the departing of Celulfe into his Monkery, invaded and ſpoiled the Country of Northumberland. Moreover, he exerciſed mortal and horrible War a long ſpace with Cudred, otherwiſe of ſome named Cuthbert, King of Weſt-Saxons: Furthermore, he with other Saxon Kings ſo impugned the Britains, that from that time they never durſt provoke the Saxons any more. At length the ſaid Cudred, refuſing the intolerable Exactions of proud Ethelbald, doth incounter with him in battel: where notwithſtanding the great Power that Ethelbald had to him adjoyned, of the Mercians, of the Eaſt-Saxons, of the Eaſt-Angles, and of the Cantuarites; yet the ſaid Cudred through Gods Power, and the means of a certain valiant Warrior, called Edelhim, a Conſul, overthrew the pride of Ethelbald, after a ſore and terrible conflict. Which Ethelbald nowithſtanding repairing his Power again the next year after, renewed battel with the foreſaid Cudred; in the which battel Ethelbald (after he had reigned one and forty years in Mercia) was ſlain by one Beornered, who after reigned in that Dition but a ſmall time. For Offa, Nephew to the ſaid Ethelbald, expelled the ſaid Beornered, and ſucceeded King in that Province of Mercia, where he reigned nine and thirty years, of whom more followeth hereafter (the Lord Jeſus ſpeeding therein our purpoſe) to be declared, as place and time ſhall require. In the mean ſeaſon, not to forget the Letter before mentioned of Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, ſent unto this Ethelbald; I thought the ſame not unworthy here to be inſerted (at the leaſt the effect thereof) not ſo much for the Authors ſake, as for that ſome good matter, peradventure, may be picked thereout for other Princes to behold and conſider.

Edelhim a ſtrong and valliant warriour.

Pride over thrown.

The Copy and Tenor of the Letter of Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, and Martyr of God (an Engliſh man) ſent to Ethelbald, King of Mercia, freely and yet charitably admoniſhing him of his Adulterous life, and Oppreſſion of Churches.

REgi & filio chariſſimo, & in Chriſti amore cæteris regibus Anglorum præferendo Ethelbaldo, Bonifacius Archiepiſcopus legatus Germanicus Romanæ Eccleſiæ perpetuam in Chriſto charitatis ſalutem. Conſtitemus coram Deo, qui novit an vere atque ex animo dicam: quando proſperitatem veſtram, & fidem, & bona opera audimus, lætamur: quando autem aliquid adverſum vel in eventu bellorum, vel de periculo animarum, de vobis cognoſcimus, triſtamur. Audivimus enim quod Eleemoſynis intentus furta & rapinas prohibes, & pacem diligis, & defenſor viduarum & pauperum es, & inde gratias Deo agimus. Quod vero legitimum matrimonium ſpernis, ſi pro caſtitate faceres, eſſet laudabile: ſed quia in luxu & adulterio & cum ſanctimonialibus volutaris, eſt vituperabile & damnabile. Nam & famam gloriæ veſtræ coram Deo & hominibus confundit, & inter Idolatras conſtituit, quia Templum Dei violaſti. Quapropter fili chariſſime pœnitere, & memorare oportet, quam turpe ſit, ut tu qui multis gentibus, dono Dei dominaris, ad injuriam ejus ſis libidinis ſervus. Audivimus præterea quod opimates pene omnis gentis Merciorum tuo exemplo legitimas uxores deſerant, & adulteras & Sanctimoniales conſtuprent. Quod quam ſit peregrinum ab honeſtate, doceat vos alienæ gentis inſtitutio. Nam in antiqua Saxonia ubi nulla eſt Chriſti cognitio, ſi virgo in materna domo, vel maritata, ſub conjuge fuerit adultera, manu propria ſtrangulatam cremant, & ſupra foſſam ſepultæ corruptorem ſuſpendunt, aut cingulo tenus (veſtibus abſciſſis) flagellant eam caſtæ matronæ & cultellis pungunt; & de villa in villam miſſæ occurrunt novæ flagellatrices, donec interimant. Inſuper & Vinuli, quod eſt fœdiſſimum genus hominum, hunc habent morem, ut mulier viro mortuo ſe in rogo crematis pariter arſura præcipitet. Si ergo gentiles Deum ignorantes, tantum zelum caſtitatis habent, quid tibi convenit fili chariſſime, qui Chriſtianus & Rex es? Parce ergo animæ tuæ: parce multitudini populi tui pereuntis exemplo tuo: de quorum animabus redditurus es rationem. Attende & illud, quia ſi gens Anglorum (ſicut in Francia, & Italia, & ab ipſis Paganis nobis improperatur) ſpretis legitimis matrimoniis per adulteria deficit, naſcituraque ſit ex ea commixtione gens ignava & Dei contemptrix, quæ perditis moribus patriam peſſundet: ſicut ſicut Burgundionibus & Provincialibus, & Hiſpanis contigit, quos Saraceni multis annis infeſtarunt propter peccata præterita? Præterea nunciatum eſt nobis, quod multa privilegia Eccleſiarum & Monaſteriorum auferens, ad hoc audendum duces tuos exemplo provoces. Sed recogita quæſo quam terribilem vindictam Deus in Anteriores Reges exercuit, ejuſdem culpæ conſcios, quam in te arguimus. Nam Celredum præceſſorum tuum ſtuprato rem Sanctimonialium, & Eccleſiaſticorum privilegiorum fractorem ſplendide cum ſuis comitibus epulantem ſpiritus malignus arripuit: & ſine confeſſione & viatico, cum diabolo ſermocinanti, & legem Dei deteſtanti animam extorſit. Oſredum quoque regem Deiorum & Bernicorum, earundem culparum reum, ita effrænatum regem egit, ut regnum & juvenilem ætatem contemptibili morte amitteret. Carolus quoque princeps Francorum, Monaſteriorum multorum everſor, & Eccleſiaſticarum pecuniarum in uſus proprios commutator, longa torſione, & verenda morte conſumptus eſt. Et mox infra: Quapropter fili chariſſime, paternis & obnixis precibus deprecamur, ut non deſpicias conſilium patrum tuorum, qui pro Dei amore celſitudinem tuam appellare ſatagunt. Nihil enim boni regi ſalubrius, quam ſi talia commiſſa cum arguuntur, libenter emendentur, quia per Salomonem dicitur: Qui diligit diſciplinam, diligit ſapientiam. Ideo, fili chariſſime, oſtendentes conſilium, juſſum, conteſtamur & obſecramus per viventem Deum, & per filium ejus Jeſum Chriſtum, & per ſpiritum ſanctum, ut recorderis quam fugitiva ſit vita præſens, & quam brevis & momentanea delectatio ſpurcæ carnis: & quam ignominioſum ſit ut brevis vitæ homo mala exempla in perpetuum poſteris relinquat. Incipe ergo melioribus vitam componere, & præteritos errores juventutis corrigere, ut hic coram hominibus laudem habeas & in futuro æterna gloria gaudeas. Valere celſitudinem tuam, & in bonis moribus proficere optamus.

Nihil actum quod non factum prius.

The corrupt life of Nuns noted.

In this Epiſtle here is to be ſeen and noted, firſt the corruption and great diſorder of life which alway from time to time hath been found in theſe Religious Houſes of Nuns, whoſe profeſſed Vow of co-acted Chaſtity hath yet never been good to the Church, nor profitable to the Common-wealth, and leaſt of all to themſelves. Of ſuch young and wanton Widows S. Paul in his time complaineth, 1 Tim. 5. which would take upon them the wilful Profeſſion of ſingle life, which they were not able to perform, but falling into damnable luxury, deſerved worthily to be reprehended. How much better had it been for theſe laſcivious Nuns not to have refuſed the ſafe yoke of Chriſtian Matrimony, than to intangle themſelves in this their ſuperſtitious Vow of perpetual Maidenhood, which neither was required of them, nor they were able to keep?

Secondly, No leſs are they alſo to be reprehended, which maintained theſe ſuperſtitious Orders of unprofitable Nuns and of other Religions. In the number of whom was this foreſaid Boniface, otherwiſe called Winfride, who, although in this Epiſtle he doth juſtly reprehend the vicious Enormities both of ſecular and of religious Perſons; yet he himſelf is not without the ſame or rather greater reprehenſion, for that he gave the occaſion thereof in maintaining ſuch ſuperſtitious Orders of ſuch laſcivious Nuns and other Religions, and reſtraining the ſame from lawful Marriage. For ſo we find of him in ſtories that he was a great ſetter up and upholder of ſuch blind Superſtition, and of all Popery. Who being admitted by Pope Gregory the ſecond, Archbiſhop of Magunce, and indued with full Authority legantine over the Germans, brought divers Countries there under the Popes Obedience, held many great Councils, ordained Biſhops, builded Monaſteries, canonized Saints, commanded Relicks to be worſhipped, permitted religious Fathers to carry about Nuns with them a preaching. Amongſt all other he founded the great Monaſtery of Fluda in Germany of Engliſh Monks, into the which no women might enter but only Lieba and Tecla, two Engliſh Nuns. Item, by the Authority of the ſaid Archbiſhop Boniface, which he received from Pope Zachary, Childericus, King of France, was depoſed from the Right of his Crown, and Pipinus, betrayer of his Maſter, was confirmed, or rather intruded in. From this Boniface proceeded that deteſtable Doctrine which now ſtandeth regiſtred in the Popes Decrees, Diſt. 40. cap. Si Papa. Which in a certain Epiſtle of his is this, that in caſe the Pope were of moſt filthy living, and forgetful or negligent of himſelf, and of the whole Chriſtianity, in ſuch ſort, that he led innumerable Souls with him to Hell: yet ought there no man to rebuke him in ſo doing, for he hath (ſaith he) power to judge all men, and ought of no man to be judged again.

In the time of this Archbiſhop, Pope Gregory the ſecond, alſo Gregory the third, and Pope Zachary, and before theſe alſo Pope Conſtantine the firſt, wrought great Maſteries againſt the Greek Emperors Philippicus and Leo, and others for the maintaining of Images to be ſet up in Churches. Of whom Philippicus loſt both his Empire, and alſo his eyes: Leo for the ſame cauſe likewiſe was Excommunicate of Gregory the third. This Gregory the third (ſo far as I can conjecture) was he that firſt wrote the four Books of Dialogues in Greek, falſly bearing the name of Gregory the firſt, which Books afterward, Zachary his Succeſſor tranſlated out of Greek into Latine. Item, the ſaid Gregory the third, firſt brought into the Maſs-Canon the Clauſe for Relicks, beginning Quorum ſolennitates hodie in conſpectu, &c. Item, brought into the ſaid Canon the Memorial, the Offering and Sacrifice for the Dead: like as Zachary brought in the Prieſts Veſture and Ornaments, and as the foreſaid Conſtantinus alſo was the firſt that gave his feet to be kiſſed of the Emperors. But to turn again into the courſe of our Engliſh ſtory.

In the time of this Egbert, King of Northumberland, Sigebert or Sigbert reigned in Weſt-Saxony, a man of ſo cruel tyranny to his Subjects (turning the Laws and Cuſtoms of his fore-Fathers after his own Will and Pleaſure) that when he was ſomewhat ſharply advertiſed by one of his Nobles, an Earl called Combranus, to change his manners, and to behave himſelf more prudently toward his people; he therefore maliciouſly cauſed him to be put to cruel death. Wherupon the ſaid King Sigebert continuing his cruel Conditions, by his Subjects conſpiring againſt him, was put from his kingly Dignity, and brought into ſuch deſolation, that wandering alone in a Wood without comfort, was there ſlain, even by the Swineherd of the ſaid Earl, whom before he had ſo wrongfully murthered, as partly is above touched. Whereby is to be ſeen the cruel tyranny of Princes never to proſper well, without the juſt revenge both of God and man.

Sigbert King of Weſtſaxons.

Sigbert ſlain

Cruel tyranny with like cruelty revenged.

Kenulphus King of Weſtſaxons.

This Sigebert being ſlain, in his place ſucceeded Kenulphus, in the year of our Lord, 748. who with the agreement of the Weſt-Saxons, was one of the chief doers againſt Sigebert his Maſter. This Kenulphus kept ſtrongly his Lordſhip againſt Offa, and againſt the power of all his Enemies, till at length after that he had reigned, as Fabian ſaith, one and thirty years, he reſorting to a Paramour which he kept at Merton, was there beſet, and likewiſe ſlain by the train and means of a certain kinſman of the foreſaid Sigebert, named Clito or Cliton, in revengement of King Sigebert's death.

{ Anno } { 748. }

Murther revenged with murther.

Moreover, in the Reign of the foreſaid Egbert, King of Northumberland, and in the eighth year of Kenulphus, King of Weſt-Saxons; Offa, after he had ſlain the Tyrant Beonuredus, which before had ſlain Ethelbald, King of Mercia, and Uncle to this foreſaid Offa, reigned King of that Province.

Offa King of Mercia.

Of this Offa are told many notable Deeds; which becauſe they concern rather Political Affairs, and do not greatly appertain to the purpoſe of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, I omit here to recite; As his Wars and Victories againſt Egbert, King of the Northumbers, as alſo againſt Ethelred King of Eaſt-Angles. Item, againſt Egbert, King of Kent, otherwiſe called Wren, whom (as Fabian ſaith) he took Priſoner, and led bound with him to Mercia. Malmesbury witneſſeth otherwiſe this to be done not by Offa, but by Kenulphus, as Chriſt willing, hereafter ſhall appear. After theſe Victories, Offa had ſuch diſpleaſure unto the Citizens of Canterbury, that he removed the Archbiſhops See, and Lands of Lambrith Archbiſhop of Canterbury (by the agreement of Pope Adrian) unto Litchfield. He alſo chaſed the Britain- or Welſhmen into Wales, and made a famous Ditch between Wale and the utter bounds of Mercia, or middle England, which was called Ofditch, and builded there a Church, which long time after was called Offkirke. This

Lambrith Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Offa

Offa alſo married one of his Daughters to Brightricus that was a King of Weſt-Saxons. And for that in his time was variance between him and the French-men, inſomuch that the paſſage of Merchants was forbidden; therefore he ſent Alcuinus a learned man unto Charles the Great, then King of France, to commune the means of peace: which Charles had after that the ſaid Alcuinus in great favour and eſtimation, and afterwards made him Abbot of Turonia in France.

This Alcuinus is commended for his learning next to Adelmus and Beda above all Saxons.

About the later time of the Reign of Offa, King of Mercia, Ethelbert being then King of Eaſt-Angles (a learned and a right godly Prince) came to the Court of Offa, provoked by the counſel of his Nobles to ſue for the marriage of his Daughter, well accompanied like a Prince with his men about him. Whereupon the Queen conceiving a falſe ſuſpition, and fearing that which was never minded, that Ethelbert with his Company, under the pretence and made matter of marriage, was come to work ſome violence againſt her Husband, and the Kingdom of Mercia; ſo ſhe perſwaded with King Offa and certain of her Council that night, that the next day following, Offa cauſed him to be trained into his Palace alone from his Company, by one called Guimbertus: who took him and bound him, and there ſtruck off his head, which forthwith he then preſented to the King and Queen. And thus the Innocent King Etheldred was wrongfully murthered, about the year of our Lord, 793. but not without a juſt Revenge at Gods hands. For, as the ſtory recordeth, the foreſaid Queen, worker of this Villany, lived not three months after, and in her death was ſo tormented, that ſhe was fain to bite and rent her Tongue in pieces with her own teeth. Offa underſtanding at length the Innocency of this King, and the hainous cruelty of his Fact, gave the tenth part of his goods to holy Church; and to the Church of Hereford, in the remembrance of this Ethelbert, he beſtowed great Lands. Moreover, he builded the Abbey of S. Albans, with certain other Monaſteries beſides. And ſo afterward he went up to Rome for his Penance, where he gave to the Church of S. Peter a peny through every houſe in his Dominion, which was called commonly Romeſhot, or Peter-pence, paid to the Church of S. Peter: and there at length was transformed from a King to a Monk, about the year of our Lord, 749. with Kenredus King of Northumberland above-mentioned, although ſome ſtories deny that he was a Monk.

After Offa King of Mercia, when he had reigned nine and thirty years, ſucceeded his Son Egfretus, who reigned but four months, of whom thus writeth the foreſaid Alcuinus, Non arbitror quod nobiliſſimus juvenis Egfretus propter peccata ſua mortuus ſit: ſed quia pater ſuus, pro confirmatione Regni ejus multum ſanguinem effudit, &c. that is, This Noble young man died not ſo much for offences of his own, as for that his Father had ſpilled much blood to confirm him in his Kingdom.

Egfretus King of Mercia. Alcuinus Oberto patricio. The Fathers fault puniſhed in the Child.

Next to which Egfretus ſucceeded Kenulphus in the ſaid Kingdom of Mercia, which Kenulphus keeping and retaining the hatred of Offa his Predeceſſor againſt the Cantuarits, made War upon them, where he took Egbert their King, otherwiſe called Wren, whom he bound and led Priſoner to Mercia. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after being mollified with Princely Clemency in the Town of Winchcombe, where he had builded the ſame time a Church, upon the day when he ſhould dedicate the ſame in the preſence of thirteen Biſhops, and of Cutbert, whom he had placed in the ſame Kingdom of Canterbury before, and ten Dukes, and many other great Eſtates, King Kenulphus brought the ſaid Egbert King of Kent, out of Priſon into the Church, where he inlarged him out of Impriſonment, and reſtored him to his place againſt At the ſight whereof, not only Cutbert the foreſaid King rejoyced, but alſo all the Eſtates and people being there preſent, made ſuch an Exclamation of joy and gladneſs, that the Church (and not only the Church, but alſo the Streets) rang withall. At which time ſuch bountifulneſs of Gifts and Jewels was then beſtowed, that from the higheſt eſtate to the loweſt, none departed without ſomething given, according as to every degree was thought meet. Although Fabian referreth this ſtory to King Offa, yet cauſes there be why I aſſent rather unto Malmesbury and to Polychronicon, which attribute the ſame to Kenulphus the Second King of Mercia after Offa.

Egbert King of Kent taken priſoner. A Princely example of clemency in a noble King. The church of Winchcombe builded by King Kenulphus. Egbert King of Kent releaſed out of priſon.

A place of Fabian doubted.

A little before in ſpeaking of certain Biſhops of Rome, mention was made of Pope Conſtantine the firſt, Pope Gregory the ſecond, Pope Gregory the third, and of Pope Zachary, which depoſed Childerick, and ſet up Pipinus the French King, &c. Next after this Zachary in order, followed Pope Stephan the ſecond, to whom the foreſaid Pipinus, to gratifie again the See of Rome for this their benefit ſhewed to him, gave and contributed to the ſaid See of Rome, the Exarchat or Princedome of Ravenna, the Kingdom of the Lombards, and many other great Poſſeſſions of Italy, with all the Cities thereto adjoyning unto the borders of Venice. And this donation of Pipin, no doubt, if the truth were rightly tried, ſhould be found to be the ſame, which hitherto falſly hath been thought to be the donation of Conſtantine. For elſe how could it be that the Exarchat of Ravenna could belong all this while to the Emperors of Conſtantinople, if Conſtantine before had given it and all Italy from the Empire of the See of Rome?

Pope Stephan the ſecond.

The donation of Pipinus falſly taken to be the donation of Conſtantine

To this Pipinus, as witneſſeth Polychronicon, was ſent firſt into France, the invention of the Organs out of Grecia, by Conſtantine, Emperor of Conſtantinople, in the year of our Lord, 757.

Ex Polyc. lib. 5. cap. 24.

Next to this Stephan the ſecond, ſucceeded Paul the firſt, who following his Predeceſſors, thundered out great Excommunication againſt Conſtantinus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, for abrogating and plucking down Images ſet up in Temples. Notwithſtanding this Conſtantine neglecting the Popes vain Curſes, perſevered in his bleſſed purpoſe, in deſtroying Idolatry till the end of his life. Then came to be Pope Conſtantinus the ſecond, a Lay-man, and Brother to Deſiderius the King of Lombardy; for the which cauſe he was ſhortly depoſed, and thruſt into a Monaſtery, having his eyes put out.

Pope Paul the firſt. Images again maintained by the Pope againſt the Emperor.

A Lay-man Pope, who was depoſed and had his eyes put out.

In whoſe ſtead ſucceeded Stephan the third, who Ordained after, That no Lay-man ſhould be Pope: condemning moreover the Council of Conſtantinople the ſeventh for Heretical, becauſe in that Council the worſhipping of Images was reproved and condemned. Contrary to the which Council, this Pope not only maintained the filthy Idolatry of Images in Chriſtian Temples, but alſo advanced their Veneration, commanding them moſt ſtrictly to be incenſed, &c. At this time Carolus Magnus, called Charles the Great, a little before mentioned, began to Reign, by whom this Pope cauſed Deſiderius the Lombard King to be deprived.

Pope Stephan the third. The Council of Conſtantine pig the ſeventh condemned of the Pope, for condemning Images.

The Pope alſo ordained, Gloria in excelſis, to be ſung in the Maſs at S. Peters Altar by the Cardinals.

Then in this Race of Popes, after this Stephan the third, cometh Adrianus the firſt, who likewiſe following the ſteps of his Fathers the Popes, added and attributed to the Veneration of Images more than all the other had done before, writing a Book for the adoration and utility proceeding of them, commanding them to be taken for Laymens Kalendars, holding moreover a Synod at Rome againſt Felix, and all others that ſpake againſt the ſetting up of ſuch Stocks and Images. And as Paul the firſt before him made much of the body of Petronilia S. Peters Daughter: ſo this Adrian clothed the body of S. Peter all in ſilver, and covered the Altar of S. Paul with a Pall of gold. This Pope Adrian was he whom we declared in the former part of this Treatiſe, to ratifie and confirm by Revelation the Order of S. Gegories Maſs, above the Order of S. Ambroſe Maſs: for unto this time, which was about the year of our Lord, 780. the Lyturgy of S, Ambroſe was more uſed in the Italian Churches. The ſtory whereof, becauſe it is regiſtred in Durandus, Nauclerus, and Jacobus de Voragine. I thought here to inſert the ſame to this eſpecial purpoſe, for the Reader to underſtand the time when this uſual Maſs of the Papiſts began firſt to be Univerſal and Uniform, and generally in Churches to be received. Thus it followed in the ſtory by the foreſaid Authors ſet forth. Jacobus de Voragine, in the life of Pope Gregory the firſt, telleth a Tale concerning this matter.

Pope Adrian the firſt. Images again maintained by the Pope for be Lay-mens Kalendars.

The body of St. Peter clothed in ſilver.

The order of the Romiſh Maſs-Book whence it came in.

Ex Durando, Nauclero, Jacob. de Voragine, in vita Greg.

In times paſt (ſaith he) when the Service which Ambroſe made, was more frequented and uſed in Churches, than was the Service which Gregory had appointed, the Biſhop of Rome, then called Adrian, gathered a Council together: in the which it was Ordained, That Gregories Service ſhould be obſerved and kept univerſally. Which determination of the Council, Charles the Emperor did diligently put in Execution, while he ran about by divers Provinces, Provinces, and informed all the Clergy, partly with threatnings, and partly with puniſhments to receive that Order. And as touching the Books of Ambroſe Service, he burnt them to aſhes in all places, and threw into priſon many Prieſts that would not conſent and agree unto the matter. Bleſſed Eugenius the Biſhop coming unto the Council, found that it was diſſolved three days before his coming. Notwithſtanding through his Wiſdom, he ſo perſwaded the Lord Pope, that he called again all the Prelates that had been preſent at the Council, and were now departed by the ſpace of three days. Therefore when the Council was gathered again together, in this all the Fathers did conſent and agree, that both the Maſs-Books of Ambroſe and Gregory ſhould be laid upon the Altar of bleſſed Saint Peter the Apoſtle, and the Church-doors diligently ſhut, and moſt warily ſealed up with the Signets of many and divers Biſhops. Again, that they ſhould all the whole night give themſelves to prayer, that the Lord might reveal, open, and ſhew unto them by ſome evident ſign or token, which of theſe two Services he would have uſed in the Temples. Thus they doing in all points as they had determined, in the morning opened the Church-doors, and found both the Miſſals or Maſs-Books open upon the Altar: or rather (as ſome ſay) they found Gregories Maſs-Book utterly plucked aſunder, one piece from another, and ſcattered over all the Church. As touching Ambroſe Book, they only found it open upon the Altar in the very ſame place where they before laid it. This Miracle Pope Adrian, like a wiſe Expounder of dreams, interpreted thus, That as the leaves were torn and blown abroad all the Church over, ſo ſhould Gregories Book be uſed throughout the World. Whereupon they thought themſelves ſufficiently inſtructed and taught of God, that the Service which Gregory had made, ought to be ſet abroad and uſed throughout the World, and that Ambroſe his Service ſhould only be obſerved and kept in his own Church of Mediolanum, where he ſometime was Biſhop.

Et tamen ipſi commentum placet. Terent.

The ſubtilty of Prelates in planting their Popiſh Maſs.

Thus haſt thou heard (Brother Reader) the full and whole Narration of this myſtical Miracle, with the Popes Expoſition upon the ſame, which ſeemeth to be as true as that which Daniel ſpeaketh of, how the Idol Bell did eat up all the meat that was ſet before him all the night, Daniel 14. Concerning the which Miracle, I need not admoniſh thee to ſmell out the blind practiſes of theſe night-Crows, to blind the World with forged inventions in ſtead of true ſtories. Albeit to grant the Miracle to be moſt true and unfallible, yet as touching the Expoſition thereof, another man beſide the Pope percaſe might Interpret this great Miracle otherwiſe, as thus, That God was angry with Gregories Book, and therefore rent it in pieces, and ſcattered it abroad; and the other as good, lay ſound, untouched, and at the leaſt ſo to be preferred. Notwithſtanding, whatſoever is to be thought of this Miracle with the Expoſition thereof, thus the matter fell out, that Gregories Service had only the place, and yet hath to this day in the greateſt part of Europe, the Service of Ambroſe being excluded. And thus much touching the great Act of Pope Adrian for the ſetting up of the Maſs. By the relation whereof, yet this knowledge may come to the Reader, at leaſt to underſtand how that commonly in Chriſtian Nations abroad, as yet no uniform Order of any Miſſal or Maſs-Book was received, as hath been hitherto diſcourſed.

Gregories Maſs taketh place in Europe.

Now from the Popes to return again to the Emperors, from whence we digreſſed: like as Pipinus the Father of Charles (as hath been before ſufficiently told) had given to the See-Papal all the Princedom of Ravenna, with other Donations and Revenues and Lands in Italy; ſo this Carolus following his Fathers devotion did confirm the ſame, adding moreover thereunto, the City and Dominion of Venice, Hiſtria, the Dukedom Forojulienſe, the Dukedom Spoletanum, and Beneventanum, and other Poſſeſſions more, to the Patrimony of S. Peter, making him the Prince of Rome and Italy. The Pope again to recompence his ſo gentle kindneſs, made him to be intituled Moſt Chriſtian King, and made him Patricium Romanum, moreover, ordained him only to be taken for Emperor of Rome. For theſe and other cauſes more, Carolus bare no little affection to the ſaid Adrian above all other Popes: as may well appear by this Letter of Carolus Magnus ſent to King Offa, what time the ſaid Offa (as is above prefixed) ſent to him Alcuinus for Intreaty of Peace: whereto the foreſaid Carolus anſwereth again to the Meſſage of Offa in a Letter, the Contents whereof be theſe.

Carolus Magnus beneficial to the See of Rome.

Rex Chriſtianiſſimus, intituled to France.

The tenor of a Letter ſent by Carolus Magnus to King Offa, anſwering to his requeſt concerning the treatiſe of peace between them.

A Letter of Charles the Great ſent to King Offa.

CArolus Rex Francorum & Longobardorum, patricius Romanorum, viro venerando, & fratri chariſſimo Offæ Regi Merciorum ſalutem. Primo gratias agimus Omnipotenti Deo, de Catholicæ fidei ſinceritate, quam in veſtris laudabilibus paginis reperimus exaratam. De peregrinis vero, qui pro amore Dei, & ſalute animarum ſuarum, beatorum Apoſtolorum limina deſiderant adire, cum pace ſine omni perturbatione vadant. Sed ſi aliqui religioni non ſervientes, ſed lucra ſectantes inveniantur inter eos, locis opportunis ſtatuta ſolvant telonia. Negotiatores quoque volumus ut ex mandato noſtro patrocinium habeant in regno noſtro legitime, Et ſi in aliquo loco injuſta affligantur oppreſſione, reclament ſe ad nos, vel noſtros judices, & plenam juſtitiam jubemus fieri. Cognoſcat quoque dilectio veſtra, quod aliquam benignitatem de Delmaticis noſtris vel palliis ad ſingulas ſedes Epiſcopales Regni veſtri vel Ethelredi direximus, in Eleemoſynam Domini Apoſtolici Adriani, deprecantes ut pro eo intercedi jubeatis, nullam habentes dubitationem beatam illius animam in requie eſſe, ſed ut fidem & dilectionem oſtendamus in amicum nobis chariſſimum. Sed & de theſauro humanarum rerum, quum Dominus Jeſus gratuita pietate conceſſit aliquid per Metropolitanas civitates; direximus veſtræ quoque dilectioni unum baltheum, & unum gladium, & duo Pallia ſerica, &c.

How the Pope hearkeneth the cry of poor widows and Orphans.

The cauſe why this Carolus writeth ſo favourably of Adrian, partly is touched before; partly alſo was, for that Caroloman his elder Brother being dead, his Wife called Bertha with her two Children came to Adrian, to have them confirmed in their Fathers Kingdom whereunto the Pope to ſhew a pleaſure to Carolus would not agree: but gave the Mother with her two Children, and Deſiderius the Lombard King with his whole Kingdom, his wife and children, into the hands of the ſaid Carolus, who led them with him Captive into France, and there kept them in ſervitude during their life.

The Empire tranſlated from Greece to France.

Thus Carolus Magnus being proclaimed Emperor of Rome, through the preferment of Adrian and Pope Leo the third, which ſucceeded next after him, the Empire was tranſlated from the Grecians about the year of our Lord, 801. unto the Frenchmen, where it continued about one hundred and two years, till the coming of Conradus and his Nephew Otho, which were Germans: and ſo hath continued after them among the Almans unto this preſent time. This Charles builded ſo many Monaſteries as there be letters in the row of A B C, he was beneficial chiefly to the Church-men, alſo merciful to the Poor, in his Acts valiant and triumphant, ſkil'd in all Languages; he held a Council at Frankford (where was condemned the Council of Nice and Irene) for ſetting up and worſhipping Images, &c.

Images written againſt, as contrary to the true Faith.

Concerning which Council of Nice, and things there concluded and enacted (becauſe no man ſhall think the deteſting of Images to be any new thing now begun) thus I find it recorded in an ancient written Hiſtory of Roger Hoveden, called Continuationes Bedæ: his words in Latine be theſe, Anno 792. Carolus Rex Francorum miſit Synodalem librum ad Britanniam, ſibi a Conſtantinopoli directum. In quo lib. Heu proh dolor, multa inconvenientia, & veræ fidei contraria reperiuntur, maxime quod pene omnium orientalium Doctorum non minus quam 300 vel eo amplius Epiſcoporum unanimi aſſertione confirmatum ſit, imagines adorari debere: quod omnino Eccleſia Dei execratur. Contra quod ſcripſit Albinus Epiſtolam ex authoritate divinarum ſcripturarum mirabiliter affirmatam, illamque cum eodem libro ex perſona Epiſcoporum ac Principum noſtrorum, Regi Francorum attulit. Hæc ille: That is, In the year of our Lord, 792. Charles the French King ſent a Book containing the Acts of a certain Synod, unto Britain, directed unto him from Conſtantinople. In the which Book (lamentable to be told) many things inconvenient, and clean contrary unto the true Faith are there to be found: eſpecially for that by the common

This Albinus was Alcuinus above mentioned.

The Biſhops and Prince of England againſt Images.

conſent of almoſt all the learned Biſhops of the Eaſt Church, not ſo few as three Hundred, it was there agreed, that Images ſhould be Worſhipped; which thing the Church of God hath always abhorred. Againſt which Book Albinus wrote an Epiſtle, ſubſtantially grounded out of the Authority of holy Scripture, which Epiſtle with the Book, the ſaid Albinus, in the name and Perſon of one Biſhops and Princes, did preſent to the French King

King Egbert made a Monk.

And thus much by the way of Romiſh matters: Now to return again to the Northumberland Kings, where we left at Egbert, which Egbert (as is before declared) ſucceeded after Celulphus, after he was made Monk. And likewiſe the ſaid Egbert alſo following the devotion of his Uncle Celulphus, and Kenredus before him, was likewiſe ſhorn Monk, after he had Reigned twenty years in Northumberland; leaving his Son Oſulphus, after him to ſucceed. About which time, and in the ſame year, when Celulphus deceaſed in his Monaſtery, which was the year of our Lord, 764. divers Cities were burnt with ſudden fire, as the City of Wenta, the City of London, the City of York, Doncaſter, with divers other Towns beſides: Roger Hoveden, lib. contin. poſt Bedam. Who the firſt year of his Reign, which was the year of our Lord 757. being innocently ſlain, next to him followed Mollo, otherwiſe called Adelwald, who likewiſe being ſlain of Alcredus, after he had Reigned eleven years, departed. After, Alcredus when he had Reigned ten years, was expulſed out of his Kingdom by his people; Then was Ethelbert, otherwiſe named Adelred, the Son of the foreſaid Mollo, received King of Northumberland: Which Ethelbert or Adelred in like ſort, after he had Reigned five years, was expulſed. After whom ſucceeded Alfwold, who likewiſe, when he had Reigned eleven years, was unjuſtly ſlain. So likewiſe after him his Nephew, and the Son of Alcredus, named Oſredus, Reigned one year, and was ſlain. Then the foreſaid Ethelbert, the Son of Mollo, after twelve years Baniſhment, Reigned again in Northumberland the ſpace of four years, and was ſlain. The cauſe whereof (as I find in an Old written ſtory) was, that forſaking his Old Wife, he married a new. Concerning the reſtoring of whom, Alcuinus writeth in this manner. Benedictus Deus qui facit mirabilia ſolus. Nuper Edelredus, filius Edelwaldi de carcere proceſſit in ſolium, & de miſeria in majeſtatem, cujus regni novitate detenti ſumus ne venerimus ad vos, &c. And afterward the ſame Alcuinus again ſpeaking of his death, writeth unto King Offa in theſe Words, Sciat veneranda dilectio veſtra quod dominus Carolus amabiliter & fideliter ſæpe mecum locutus eſt de vobis, & in eo habetis fidelisſimum amicum. Ideo & veſtræ dilectioni digna dirigit munera, & per epiſcopales ſedes regni veſtri, ſimiliter & Edelredo regi, & ad ſuas epiſcoporum ſedes direxit dona. Sed heu pro dolor, donis datis, & epiſtolis in manus miſſorum, ſupervenit triſtis legatio per miſſos qui de Scotia per nos reverſi ſunt, de infidelitate gentis, & nece regis. Ita Carolus retracta donorum largitate in tantum iratus eſt contra gentem illam, ut ait, perfidam & perverſam, & homicidam dominorum ſuorum, pejorem eam paganis æſtimans, ut niſi ego interceſſor eſſem pro ea, quicquid eis boni abſtrahere potuiſſet, & mali machinari, jam feciſſet, &c.

Anno 757. Oſulphus, Mollo, otherwiſe called Adelwald. Alcredus or Alcredus. Ethelbert otherwiſe called Adelred or Eadulph. Alfwold, Oſredus, Adelred again Kings of Northumberland. Anno 764.

The Kingdom of Northumberland ceaſeth.

Northumberland Kingdom ceaſeth.

Thus as you have heard, after the Reign of King Egbert before mentioned, ſuch trouble and perturbation was in the Dominion of Northumberland, with ſlaying, expulſing and depoſing their Kings one after another, that after the murthering of this Edelred above ſpecified, none durſt take the Government upon him, ſeeing the great danger thereupon inſuing. Inſomuch that the foreſaid Kingdom did lie void and waſte, the ſpace of three and thirty years together; after the term of which years, this Kingdom of Northumberland, with the Kingdoms alſo of the other Saxons beſides, came altogether into the hands of Egbert, King of Weſt-Saxons, and his Progeny; which Monarchy began in the year of our Lord 827. and in the eight and twentieth year of the Reign of the ſaid Egbert; whereof more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) hereafter. Of this troubleſome and outragious time of Northumberland peopleſpeaketh alſo the ſaid learned man Alcuinus, otherwiſe called Albinus, in the ſame Country born, writing out of France into England, and complaining of the ſame in divers his letters, as firſt to Offa, where he thus writeth: Ego paratus eram cum muneribus Caroli regis ad vos venire, & in patriam reverti. Sed melius viſum eſt propter pacem gentis meæ in peregrinatione remanere, neſciens quid feciſſem inter eos, ubi nullus ſecurus eſſe, vel in ſalubre conſilio proficere poteſt. Eccleſia ſancta a paganis vaſtata, Altaria perjuriis fœdata, Monaſteria adulteriis violata, terra ſanguine Dominorum & Principum fœdata, &c. Moreover, the ſaid Alcuinus writing to the foreſaid Edelred a little above mentioned, after the ſame Tenor reporteth: Ecce Eccleſia ſancti Cutberti ſacerdotum Dei ſanguine aſperſa (omnibus ſpoliata ornamentis) locus cunctis in Britannia venerabilior paganis gentibus datur ad deprædandum. Et ubi primum, poſt deceſſum S. Cutberti ab Eboraco, Chriſtiana religio in noſtra gente ſumpſit exordium, ibi miſeriæ & calamitatis cœpit initium. &c.

The troubles of the Kingdom of Northumberland deſcribed by Alcuin.

Item, writing to Osbert a Noble Peer of the Mercians, complaining on the ſame matter, ſaith: Regnum Noſtrum Northumbrorum pene periit, propter inteſtinas diſſenſiones, & fallaces conjurationes, &c.

Item, in another place the ſaid Alcuinus writing to Adelard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, complaineth moreover: Hoc dico propter flagellum, quod nuper accidit partibus inſulæ noſtræ, quæ prope trecentis & quadraginta annis a parentibus inhabitata eſt noſtris. Legitur in libro Gildæ ſapientiſſimi Britonum, quod iidem Britones, propter avaritiam & rapinam Principum, propter iniquitatem & injuſtitiam Judicum, propter deſidiam prædicationis Epiſcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidere. Caveamus hæc eadem vitia noſtris temporibus inoleſcere, quatenus benedictio divina nobis patriam conſervet in proſperitate bona quam nobis miſericordiſſima pietate perdonare dignatus eſt, &c.

Over and beſides, the ſame Author Alcuinus, writing unto the foreſaid Edelred King of Northumberland, maketh record of ſtrange ſight which he himſelf did ſee the ſame time in the City of York, it rained Blood: Whereof his words which he wrote, concerning the ſame unto the ſaid King Edelred be theſe: Quid ſignificat pluvia ſanguinis, quam quadrageſimali tempore in Eboraco civitate, quæ caput eſt totius regni, in eccleſia beati principis Apoſtolorum, vidimus de borealibus partibus domus (ſereno aere) de ſummitate minanter cadere? Nonne poteſt putari, a borealibus partibus venire ſanguinem ſuper terram? That is, What ſignifieth the rain Blood which in time of Lent, in the City of York, the chief City of that Dominion, and in the Church of S. Peter the chief of the Apoſtles, we our ſelves did ſee to fall from the Church top (the Element being cleer) out of the North parts of the Temple, &c. This wondrous ſight teſtified by Malmeſburienſis, is thought of Fabian to happen in the ſecond year of the Reign of Brightricus (as with the time doth well agree) which was the year of our Lord, ſeven hundred and eighty, and is thought of ſome Expoſitors to be token the coming of the Danes into this Land, which entred ſhortly after about ſeven years, in the ninth year, of the Reign of Brightricus King of the Weſt-Saxons. Which Brightricus in defence thereof ſent forth his Steward of his houſhold with a ſmall company, which ſhortly was ſlain: But by the ſtrength of the ſaid Brightricus and the other Saxon Kings, they were compelled to void the Land for that time, which was in the year 790. To this Brightricus, King Offa, as is aforeſaid, gave his Daughter Edelburga to Wife, by whom he at length was impoyſoned, beſides certain other of his Nobles, upon whom the ſaid Queen before him had Practiſed the ſame wickedneſs. Who then after that fled over to Charles the Great, into France: Where ſhe being offered for her beauty to marry either to him or his Son, becauſe ſhe choſe rather his Son, married neither the one, nor yet the other; but was thruſt into a Monaſtery, where ſhe, then playing the Harlot with a Monk, was expulſed from thence, and ended her life in Penury and miſery.

In the mean time, while this Edelburga was thus working her Feats in England, Irene Empreſs of the Greeks, was as buſie alſo for her part at Conſtantinople: Who firſt through the means of Pope Adrian took up the body of Conſtantine, Emperor of Conſtantinople, her own Husbands Father. ſame, ſhe cauſed the Aſhes to be caſt into the Sea, becauſe he diſanulled Images. Afterwards reigning with her Son Conſtantine the ſixth, Son to Leo the fourth (whom alſo we declared before to be excommunicated for taking away Images) being at diſſention with him, cauſed him to be taken and laid in Priſon; who afterward through power of Friends being reſtored to his Empire again, at laſt ſhe cauſed the ſame her own Son to be caſt into Priſon, and his eyes to be put out ſo cruelly, that within ſhort ſpace he dyed. After this the ſaid Irene Empreſs, with the Council of Therafius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, held a Council at Nicea, where it was decreed, that Images ſhould again be reſtored unto the Church; which Council after was repealed by another Council holden at Francford by Charles the Great. At length ſhe was depoſed by Nicephorus (who Reigned after) and was expulſed the Empire: Who after the example of Edelburga, above mentioned (condignly puniſhed for her wickedneſs) ended likewiſe her life in much Penury and Miſery.

Images reſtored again by Irene at Conſtantinople.

The ſecond Council at Nicea.

The wickedneſs of Irene condignly rewarded.

About the time when the foreſaid Brightricus was impoiſoned by Edelburga his Wife, died alſo King Offa, which was about the year of our Lord 795. or (as ſome ſay) 802. After which Offa (as is aforeſaid) ſucceeded Egfert, then Kenulphus, after whom ſucceeded Kenelmus his Son, who in his younger age was wickedly murdered by his Siſter Quinreda, and Askebertus, about the year of our Lord 819. and in the Church of Winchcombe was counted for an holy Martyr. After him ſucceeded his Uncle Ceolulphus, whom Bernulphus in the firſt year of his reign expulſed, and reigned in his place. Who likewiſe in the third year of his Reign was overcome, and expulſed by Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons, and afterward ſlain by the Eaſtangles. And the Kingdom of Mercia alſo ceaſed, and came into the hands of the Weſt-Saxons.

Kenulmus King of Mercia innocently ſlain.

Ceolulphus, Bernulphus, King of Mercia.

The Kingdom of Mercia ceaſeth.

Hitherto I have brought (as thou ſeeſt good Reader) the confuſed and turbulent reigns of theſe ſeven Saxon Kings, who after the expulſion of the Britains, ruled and reigned aſunder in ſundry quarters of this Land together, unto this preſent time of Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons, by whom it ſo pleaſed God to begin to reduce and unite all theſe ſcattered Kingdoms, into one Monarchical form of Dominion. Wherefore, as in the aforeſaid Egbert, beginneth a new alteration of the Commonwealth, here in this Land among the Saxons: So my purpoſe is (the Lord willing) with the ſame Egbert, to enter a new beginning of my third Book, after a brief recapitulation firſt made of ſuch things as in this ſecond Book before are to be collected and noted, eſpecially touching the Monaſteries builded, the Kings who have entred the life and profeſſion Monaſtick; alſo Queens and Queens Daughters, which the ſame time profeſſed ſolitary life in Monaſteries, which they or their Anceſtors had Erected.

The concluſion of the ſtory Precedent, concerning the ſeven Kingdoms of the Saxon Kings, above mentioned.

And thus haſt thou (Gentle Reader) concerning the ſeven Kingdom of theſe Saxons, ruling all together in England, the courſe and Order of their doings briefly deſcribed, and diſcourſed unto thee, in ſuch Order, as the matter being ſo intricate, in ſuch confuſion and diverſity of things incident together, would permit: Following eſpecially in this ſtory hitherto the line of the Northumberland Kings, as the other ſtories moſt follow the line of Weſt-Saxon Kings. The which ſeven Kingdoms of theſe ſaid Saxons, after they had untruly expulſed and chaſed out the Britains from their Land, like as they never were in quietneſs among themſelves, Reigning thus together, till the time of this Egbert, ſo alſo after the Reign of Egbert, the whole Realm being reduced into one Regiment, no leſs were they impugned and afflicted by the Danes continually from time to time, till the laſt Conqueſt of William the Norman. Thus it pleaſed God (ever lightly) to revenge with blood bloody violence, and the unjuſt dealings of men with juſt and like retribution. But of this let the Chriſtian Reader conſider, as Gods Grace ſhall work in him. In the mean time we, as much as in us did lie, ſatiſfying the part of an Hiſtorian, have thus hitherto ſet forth and declared concerning theſe ſeven foreſaid Kingdoms: Firſt, the names and lineal deſcent of the Kings ſeverally by themſelves, as by the Table Precedent may appear: Then what were the doings and acts of the ſame, how firſt being Pagans, they were converted to the Chriſtian faith; what things in their time hapned in the Church, how many of them, of Kings were made Monks; how devout they were then to holy Church and to the Churchmen, and eſpecially to the Church of Rome. But the Church-men then were much otherwiſe, in life than afterward they declared themſelves to be. Through which devotion of the ſaid Kings, firſt came in the Peter-pence or Rome-ſchots in this Realm, as by Ive firſt in his Dominion, then by Offa in his Lordſhip, and afterwards by Adelwulph brought in and ratified through the whole Realm: Where alſo is to be noted, that by the foreſaid Kings and Queens of the ſaid Saxons, the moſt part of the greateſt Abbeys and Nunneries, in this Realm, were firſt begun and builded, as partly by the names of ſome here follow to be ſeen.

Unjuſt dealings of men juſtly rewarded.

Paules Church.

First the Church or Miniſter of S. Paul in London, was founded by Ethelbert King of Kent, and Sigebert King of Eſſex, about the year of our Lord, 604.

Ecklinghey. The Abbey of Ecklinghey, by King Alured, An. 891.

Shaftsbury. The Nunery of Shaftsbury by the same Aluredus, the same year.

Thus ye see what Monasteries, and in what time, began to be founded by the Saxon Kings, newly converted to the Christian Faith, within the space of two hundred years; who, as they seemed then to have a certain zeal and devotion to Godward, according to the leading and teaching that then was: so it seemeth again to me, two things to be wished in these foresaid Kings: first, that they which began to erect these Monasteries and Cels of Monks and Nuns, to live solely and singly by themselves out of the holy state of Matrimony, had foreseen what danger, and what absurd Enormities might and also did thereof ensue, both publickly to the Church of Christ, and privately to their own Souls: secondly, that unto this their zeal and devotion had been joyned like Knowledge and Doctrine in Christs Gospel, especially in the Article of our free Justification by the Faith of Jesus Christ; because of the lack whereof, as well the Builders and Founders thereof, as they that were professed in the same, seem both to have run the wrong way, and to have been deceived. For albeit in them there was a devotion and zeal of mind, that thought well in this their doing, which I will not here reprehend: yet the end and cause of their deeds and buildings cannot be excused, being contrary to the rule of Christs Gospel; for so much as they did these things seeking thereby Merits with God, and for remedy of their Souls, and remission of their sins, as may appear testified in their own Records, whereof one here I thought to set forth for probation of the same. Read this Chart (if it please thee gentle Reader) of King Ethelbald his donation, given to Churches and religious persons; which Ethelbald was the builder (as is said) of Peterborough. The words of his Record and Instrument be these.

Two things to be wished in them that first builded monkish Monasteries.

The Article of free justification not known.

The Donations and Priviledges granted and given by King Ethelbald to religious men of the Church.

Ex chronicle Guliel. Malmesb. lib. 1.

PLerumque contingere solet, pro incerta temporum vicissitudine, ut ea quæ multiarum fidelium personarum testimonio consilioque roborata fuerint, fraudulenter per contumaciam plurimorum, & machinamenta simulationis, sine ulla consideratione rationis, periculose dissipentur, nisi authoritate literarum (testamento chirographorum) æternæ memoriæ committantur. Quapropter, ego Ethelbaldus Rex Merciorum pro amore cœlestis patriæ, & remedio animæ meæ, studendum esse prævidi, ut eam pro bona opera liberam efficerem in omni vinculo delictorum. Quoniam enim mihi omnipotens Deus per misericordiam clementiæ suæ, absque ullo antecedente merito, sceptra regiminis largitus est: ideo libenter ei, ex eo quod dedit, retribuo. Hujus rei gratia hanc donationem, me vivente, concedo, ut omnia Monasteria & Ecclesiæ Regni mei, a publicis vectigalibus, & operibus, & oneribus absolvantur; nisi institutionibus arcium, vel pontium, quæ nulli unquam prosunt. Præterea, habeant familiæ Dei propriam libertatem in fructibus sylvarum & agrorum, & in captura piscium, ne munuscula præbeant vel regi, vel principibus, nisi voluntaria; sed liberi Deo serviant, &c.

By the Contents hereof may well be understood (as where he saith, Pro amore cœlestis patriæ, pro remedio animæ, pro liberatione animæ, & absolutione delictorum. &c.) how great the ignorance and blindness of these men was; who, lacking no zeal, only lacking knowledge to rule it withall: seeking their salvation not by Christ only, but by their own deservings and meritorious deeds. Which I recite not here to any infamy or reprehension of them; but rather to put us in mind and memory, how much we et this present are bound to God for the true sincerity of his truth, hidden so long before to our fore-Ancestors, and opened now unto us by the good will of our God, in his Son Christ Jesus. This only lamenting by the way, to see them to have such Works, and to lack our Faith, and us to have the right Faith, and to lack their Works. And this blind ignorance of that Age, thus above pre-noted, was the cause not only why these Kings builded so many Monasteries upon zealous Superstition, but also why so many of them, forsaking their orderly vocation of Princely Regiment, gave themselves over to Monastical profession, or rather wilful Superstition. Concerning the names and number of which Kings that were professed Monks, is sufficiently in the &c. before declared: the names of whom we shewed to be seven or eight, within the space of these two hundred years. Such was then the superstitious devotion of Kings and Princes in that age; and no less also to be noted in Queens and Kings Daughters, with other Noble women of the same age and time; the names of whom it were too long here to recite. As Hilda Daughter to the Nephew of Edwin King of Northumberland, Abbess of Ely. Erchengoda with her Sister Ermenilda, Daughters of Ercombertus King of Kent, which Erchengada was professed in Saint Brigets Order in France. Item, Edelberga Wife and Queen to King Edwin of Northumberland, and Daughter of King Anna, which was also in the same house of Saint Briget made a Nun. Item, Etheldreda, whom we term Saint Eldred, Wife to King Ecfride of Northumberland, who being married to two Husbands, could not be obtained to give her consent to either of them, during the space of twelve years, but would needs live a Virgin, and was professed Nun at Helings. Werburga was the Daughter of Ulferus King of Mercians, and made Nun at Ely. Kenreda Sister of King Ulferus and Kineswida her Sister, were both Nuns professed. Sexburga Daughter of King Anna King of Mercians, and Wife of Ercombert King of Kent, was Abebss at Ely. Elfrida Daughter of Oswy King of Northumberland was Abbess of Whitney: Mildreda, Milburga, and Milguida, all three Daughters of Merwaldus King of West-Mercians, entred the Profession and Vow of Nunish Virginity. Kineburga Wife of Alfride King of Northumberland, and Sister to Osricus King of Mercians, and Daughter of King Penda, was professed Abbess of the Monastery in Glocester. Elfleda Daughter of Oswy King, and Wife of Peda, Son of King Penda, likewise inclosed her self in the same Profession and Vow of Romish Chastity. Likewise Alfritha Wife to King Edgar, and Editha Daughter to the said Edgar, with Wolfride her Mother, &c. All which holy Nuns with divers more, the Romish Catholicks have canonized for Saints, and put the most part of them in their Kalendar, only because of the Vow of their Chastity solemnly professed. Concerning which Chastity, whether they kept it or no, little I have to say against them, and less to swear for them. But whether they so kept it or not; if this Gift of Chastity which they professed, were given them of God, small praise worthy was it in them to keep it. And if it were not given them, I will not say here of them so much, as hath been said of some other, which sufficiently have painted out to the World the Demeanor of these holy Votaries. But this I will say, that although they kept it never so perfectly, yet it is not that which maketh Saints before God, but only the blood of Christ Jesus, and true Faith in him.

Likewise remaineth, that as we have declared the devotion of these Noble women, which professing Monastick life, have cast off all worldly Dignity and Delights: so we should also intreat of such Noblemen, who among the Saxon Kings in like zeal of devotion, have given over themselves from the World (as they thought) unto the contemplative life of Monkish Profession. The Names of whom as in the Catalogue of the Saxon Kings before is described, be these, to the number of Nine.

Of which Kings and their doings, what is to be judged, look (gentle Reader) before.

By theſe Hiſtories it is apparent, what Mutations, what Perturbations, and what Alterations of State hath been in this Realm of Britain, firſt from Britains Kings, to Romans; then to Britains again; afterward to the Saxons. Firſt, to ſeven altogether reigning, then to one, &c. And this alteration not only happened in the Civil Government, but alſo followed in the State Eccleſiaſtical. For as in the Britains time the Metropolitan See was in London, ſo in the Saxons time, after the coming of Auſtin, it was removed to Canterbury: the Catalogue and Order of which Metropolitans, from the time of Auſtin to Egbertus, is thus, as in the Hiſtory of Malmesburienſis is deſcribed.

In his time King Offa tranſlated the Metropolitan See from Canterbury to Litchfield by the Grant of Pope Adrian, being overcome with Apoſtolical Argument, as ſaith Flor. Hiſt. that is, with money.

This Ethelardus by his Epiſtles to Pope Leo, obtained the Metropolitan See again to Canterbury.

During the courſe of theſe ſeventeen Archbiſhops of Canterbury, in Rome paſſed in the mean time four and thirty Popes, of whom partly heretofore we have declared.

And thus much touching the time of the ſeven Kingdoms of the Saxons, ruling together in England, from the Reign of Hengiſt unto Egbert, the firſt King and Monarch of the whole Land, after the Expulſion of the Britains.

NOw remaineth (by the Grace of Chriſt) in the next Book following, to proſecute the Order of ſuch Kings as principally reigning alone had this Realm in their poſſeſſion, from the time of Egbert King of Weſt-Saxons, to the coming of William Conqueror the Norman; comprehending therein the reſt of the next 300 years, with the acts and ſtate of Religion, as in that ſpace was in the Church: wherein may appear the declining time of the Church, and of true Religion, preparing the way to Antichriſt, which not long after followed. For here is to be noted, that during yet this mean time, Satan (as is ſaid) was bound up from his raging and furious violence; counting from the time of Conſtantinus, to the next looſing out of Satan, which was foretold by the Revelation of S. John above mentioned, to be a thouſand years; whereof by the order of the Hiſtory (Chriſt granting) more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

The End of the Second Book.

THE THIRD BOOK,

CONTAINING

The Text three hundred years, from the Reign of King Egbertus unto the time of William Conqueror.

NOw remaineth likewiſe, as before I did in deſcribing the deſent and diverſity of the ſeven Kings, all together reigning and ruling in this Land: ſo to proſecute in like order the lineal Succeſſion of them, which after Egbertus King of the Weſt-Saxons, governed and ruled ſolely, until the Conqueſt of William the Norman; firſt expreſſing their Names, and afterwards importing ſuch Acts, as in their time happened in the Church worthy to be noted. Albeit, as touching the Acts and Doings of theſe Kings, becauſe they are ſufficiently and at large deſcribed, and taken out of Latine Writers into the Engliſh-Tongue by divers and ſundry Authors, and namely in the Hiſtory or Chronicle of Fabian; I ſhall not ſpend much travel thereupon, but rather refer the Reader unto him or to ſome other, where the troubleſome tumults between the Engliſh-men and the Danes at that time may be ſeen, who ſo liſteth to read them. Only the Table of their Names and Reign, and Acts done under their Reign, I have compendiouſly abridged, uſing ſuch brevity as the matter would ſuffer.

A TABLE of the Saxon Kings, which ruled alone from King Egbert unto William Conqueror.

Here

Here is to be noted, that before the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor, the Danes obtained the Crown under their Captain Canutus who reigned years 19
Haraldus Harefoot Son of Canutus 4
Hardeknutus, Son of Canutus 2
Edward the Confeſſor, an Engliſh man, Son of Ethelred 24
Haraldus, Son of Earl Goodwin an Uſurper 1
William Conqueror a Norman.

King Egbertus.

Egbert, King of the Weſt-Saxons, afterward Monarch and King of the whole Realm.

IN the Reign of Brightricus a little before mentioned, about the year of Grace, 795. there was in his Dominion a Noble Perſonage, of ſome called Egbert, of ſome Ethelbert, of ſome Ethelbright: who being feared of the ſame Brightricus, becauſe he was of Kingly blood, and near unto the Crown, was by the force and conſpiracy of the forenamed Brightricus, chaſed and purſued out of the Land of Britain into France, where he indured till the death of the ſaid Brightricus. After the hearing whereof, Egbert ſped him eftſoons out of France, unto his Country of Weſt-Sax, where he in ſuch wiſe behaved himſelf, that he obtained the Regiment and Governance of the above-ſaid Kingdom.

In this time came in the Danes into the North parts and were driven out again.

Anno 807.

Bernulphus, King of Mercia above mentioned, with other Kings, had this Egbert in ſuch deriſion, that they made of him divers ſcoffing Jeſts, and ſcorning Rimes, all which he ſuſtained, for a time. But when he was more eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, and had proved the minds of his Subjects, and eſpecially God working withall, he afterward aſſembled his Knights, and gave to the ſaid Bernulphus a battel in a place called Elinden in the Province of Hampton; and notwithſtanding in that fight was great odds of number, as ſix or eight againſt one, yet Egbert (through the might of the Lord which giveth Victory as pleaſeth him) had the better, and won the field; which done, he ſeized that Lordſhip into his hand; and that alſo done, he made War upon the Kentiſh-Saxons, and at length in likewiſe obtained the Victory. And as it is in Polychronicon teſtified, he alſo ſubdued Northumberland, and cauſed the Kings of theſe three Kingdoms to live under him as Tributaries, or joyned them to his Kingdom: Ex Flor. hiſt. This Egbert alſo won from the Britains or Welſhmen the Town of Cheſter, which they had kept poſſeſſion of till this day. After theſe and other Victories, he peaceably injoying the Land, called a Council of his Lords at Wincheſter, where by their advices he was crowned King, and chief Lord over this Land, which before that day was called Britain: but then he ſent out into all coaſts of the Land his Commandments and Commiſſions, charging ſtraightly, that from that day forward, the Saxons ſhould be called Angles, and the Land Anglia.

Example what it is to deſpiſe others.

Example of patience.

Anno 826.

Of this victory went a proverb. Rivus cruore rubet, ruina reſtitit, ſtatere tabulæ.

This Land firſt called Anglia.

About the thirtieth year of the Reign of Egbert, the Heathenish people of the Danes, which a little before had made horrible deſtruction in Northumberland, and eſpecially in the Iſle of Lindefarne, where they ſpoiled the Churches, and murthered the Miniſters, with Men, Women and Children, after a cruel manner, entred now the ſecond time with a great Hoſt into this Land, and ſpoiled the Iſle of Shepy in Kent, or near to Kent: where Egbert hearing thereof, aſſembled his people, and met with them at Carrum. But in that Conflict he ſped not ſo well as he was wont in times before, but with his Knights was compelled to forſake the field. Notwithſtanding in the next battel, the ſaid Egbert, with a ſmall Power, overthrew a great multitude of them, and ſo drave them back. The next year following, the ſaid Danes preſuming upon their Victory before, made their return again into the Land Weſtward, where joyning with the Britains, by the help and power of them, they aſſailed the Lands of Egbert, and did much harm in many places of his Dominion, and elſewhere; ſo that after this day they were continually abiding in one place of the Realm of England or other, till the time of Hardeknutus laſt King of the Danes blood, ſo that many of them were married to Engliſh women, and many that now be, or in times paſt were called Engliſh-men, are deſcended of them. And albeit that they were many and ſundry times driven out of the Land, and chaſed from one Country to another, yet that notwithſtanding, they ever gathered new ſtrengths and powers, that they abode ſtill within the Land.

Anno 833. Danes now the ſecond time entred in this land.

Anno 834. Fabian. cap. 158. Rog. Hoved. lib. 5. cap. 1.

England five times plagued by other nations.

And thus, as by the ſtories appears, this troubleſome Land of Britain, now called England, hath been hitherto by five ſundry outward Nations plagued. Firſt, by the Romans; then by the Scots and Picts; thirdly, by the Saxons; fourthly, by the Danes, of whoſe outragious cruelty and hoſtility, our Engliſh Hiſtories do moſt exclaim and complain; fifthly, by the Normans, which I pray God be the laſt. Ex Reg. Hoved. lib. 5.

Then it followeth in the ſtory, that the time of this Perſecution of the foreſaid Pagans and Danes continuing, King Egbert, when he had ruled the Weſt-Saxons, and over the more part of England, by the term of ſeven and thirty years, died, and was buried at Wincheſter, leaving to his Son Ethelwolfe his Kingdom, which firſt was Biſhop of Wincheſter (as Hoveden recordeth) and after upon neceſſity made King, leaving withall, and pronouncing this ſaying to his Son, Felicem fore ſi regnum, quod multa rexerat induſtria, ille conſueta genti illi non interrumperet ignavia.

King Ethelwulfus.

ETHelwulfus, the Son of Egbert, in his former age had entred into the Order of Sub-Deacon, as ſome others ſay, was made Biſhop of Wincheſter; but afterwards, being the only Son of Egbert, was made King through the Diſpenſation (as Fabian ſaith) of Pope Paſchalis: but that cannot be, for Paſchalis then was not Biſhop: ſo that by the computation of time, it ſhould rather ſeem to be Gregory the fourth. This Ethelwulfe (as being himſelf once nuzled in that Order) was always good and devout to holy Church and religious Orders, inſomuch that he gave to them the Tythe of all his goods and lands in Weſt-Saxony, with liberty and freedom from all ſervage and civil Charges. Whereof his chart Inſtrument beareth teſtimony after this tenor proceeding, much like to the donation of Ethelbaldus, King of Mercians above mentioned.

Anno 837.

A place in Fabian to be amended.

Guliel. lib. de geſt. Anglor. faith, this Pope was Leo the fourth.

The Priviledges and Donations given by King Ethelwulfus to the Clergy.

REgnante Domino noſtro in perpetuum. Dum in noſtris temporibus per bellorum incendia, & direptiones opum noſtrarum, necnon & vaſtantium crudeleſſimas depræda tiones hoſtium barbarorum, paganarumque gentium, multiplices tribulationes ad affligendum uſque ad internecionem, tempora cernimus incumbere periculoſa. Quamobrem ego Ethelwulfus Rex occidentalium Saxonum, cum conſilio Epiſcoporum & principum meorum, conſilium ſalubre, & uniforme remedium affirmavi: ut aliquam portionem terrarum hereditariam, Deo & ſanctæ Mariæ, & omnibus ſanctis jure perpetuo poſſidendam concedam. ſcilicet partem terræ meæ, ut ſit tuta & immunis ab omnibus ſeculariſus ſervitiis, necnon regalibus tributis majoribus & minoribus ſive taxationibus, quod nos dicimus Witterden: ſitq; libera omnium rerum, pro remiſſione animarum & peccatorum noſtrorum, ad Deo ſoli deſerviendum, ſine expeditione, & pontis conſtructione, & arcis munitione: ut eo diligentius pro nobis ad Deum preces ſine ceſſatione fundant, quo eorum ſervitutem in aliqua parte levigamus, &c.

Anno 844. Priveledges and temporalties granted to the Church by King Ethelwolfe.

Ex Flor. hiſtor.

Pet. remiſſ.

Hereby may it appear, how and when the Churches of England began firſt to be indued with Temporalties and Lands; alſo with Priviledges and Exemptions inlarged: moreover (and that which ſpecially is to be conſidered and lamented) what pernitious Doctrine this was, wherewith they were led, thus to ſet remiſſion of their ſins, and remedy of their ſouls, in this donation, and ſuch other deeds of their donation, contrary to the information of Gods Word, and with no ſmall derogation from the Croſs of Chriſt?

Note the blind ignorance and erroneous teaching in thoſe days.

Theſe things thus done within the Realm, then the ſaid Ethelwolfe the King, taking his Journey to Rome with Alfred his youngeſt Son, committed him to the bringing up of Pope Leo the fourth, where he alſo re-edifieth the Engliſh School at Rome: which being founded by King Offa, or rather by Ive, King of Mercians (as in the Flowers of Hiſtories is affirmed) was lately in the time of King Egbert his Father, conſumed with fire. Further and beſides, this King gave and granted there unto Rome, of every fire-houſe a penny to be paid through his

Peter-pence through the Realm granted to Rome.

Money beſtowed to burn day-light.

his whole Land, as King Ive in his Dominion had done before. Alſo he gave and granted yearly to be paid to Rome 300 Marks; that is, to the maintaining of the light of Saint Peter, 100 Marks, to the light of Saint Paul, 100 Marks, to the uſe of the Pope alſo another hundred. This done, he returning home through France, married there Judith, the Daughter of Carolus Calvus, the French King: whom he reſtored afterward (contrary to the Laws of Weſt-Saxons) to the Title and Throne of a Queen. For before it was decreed among the Weſt-Saxons (by the occaſion of wicked Ethelburga, who poiſoned Brigthricus her own Husband) that after that no Kings wife ſhould have the name or place of a Queen.

And for ſo much as I have here entred into the mention of Judith, Daughter of Carolus Calvus; the occaſion thereof putteth me in memory here to inſert by the way, a matter done, although not in this Realm, yet not impertinent to this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. And firſt to deduct the Narration hereof from the firſt Original; the Father of this Carolus Calvus, whoſe name was Ludovicus, firſt of that name called Pius, King of France, had two wives: whereof by the firſt he had three Sons, Lothary, Pipin, and Lewis: Which three Sons unnaturally and unkindly conſpiring againſt their Father and his ſecond wife, with her Son their youngeſt Brother, perſecuted him ſo, that through a certain Council of Lords Spiritual and Temporal, they depoſed the ſame their natural and right godly Father, diſpoſſeſſing and diſcharging him of all Rule and Dominion. Moreover, cauſed him to renounce his Temporal habit, incloſing him in the Monaſtery of S. Mark, for a Monk, or rather a Priſoner. All which done, they divided his Empire and Kingdom among themſelves.

Note here the holy and wholeſome councils and doings of the ſpiritual Lords.

Thus was Ludovicus Pius, of impious Sons left deſolate. But the power of God which worketh, when as all earthly power ceaſeth, of his divine mercy ſo aided and recovered him out of all his tribulation to this Imperial dignity again; that it was to all his enemies confuſion, and to all good men a miracle. But this by the way. By his ſecond wife, whoſe name was Judith, he had this Charles the Bald here mentioned. Which Judith was thought, and ſo accuſed to the Pope, to be within ſuch degree of alliance, that by the Popes Law, ſhe might not continue his wife without the Popes diſpenſation. It ſo fell out in the mean time, that this Ludovicus the Emperor had promoted a young man named Frederick, to be Biſhop of Utricht; and to him had given ſad and good exhortation, that he remembring and following the conſtancy of his predeceſſors, would maintain right and truth without all exception of any perſon, and puniſh miſdoers, with excommunication, as well the rich as the poor with ſuch like words of godly counſel. Frederick hearing the King thus ſay, ſitting at dinner with him as the manner was, being newly inveſted, in theſe words anſwered the Emperor again: I thank your Majeſty, (ſaith he) which with your ſo wholeſome exhortation put me in mind of my profeſſion. But I beſeech you of your benign favour and patience, that I may freely diſcloſe that which hath long incumbred and pierced my conſcience. To whom leave being given, thus he began, I pray you (Lord Emperor) to ſhew me herein your mind (pointing to the fiſh before him) whether it is more according to attain this fiſh here preſent, beginning firſt at the head or at the tail? What a tale is this (quoth the Emperor) of the taile and of the head? At the head (quoth he.) Then Frederick taking thereof his occaſion, proceedeth, Even ſo let it be Lord Emperor (ſaith he) as you have ſaid. Let Chriſtian Faith and Charity firſt begin with your ſelf, as with the head, admoniſhing you to ceaſe from your Fact and Error, that your Subjects by that example be not boldned to follow your miſdoing. Wherefore firſt forſake you your unlawful Wedlock, which you have made with Judith your near Kinſwoman. Theſe words of the new Biſhop, although they moved Ludovicus the Emperor not a little, yet he with a gentle modeſty, and modeſt ſilence was contented, ſuffering the Biſhop to go home in peace. But the word being uttered in ſuch an audience, could not be ſo concealed, but ſpread and burſt out in much talk in the whole Court, and eſpecially among the Biſhops, conſulting earneſtly with themſelves about the matter. Through whoſe counſel and labour ſo at length it fell, that the Emperor was conſtrained to leave the company of his Wife, till he had purchaſed a Licence of the Biſhop of Rome to retain her again, who then forgave the ſaid Biſhop all that was paſt. But the woman hired two Knights that ſlew him in his Veſtments, when he had ended his Maſs. Ranulphus and Gul. lib. de Pontificib. gave forth this ſtory in his great Commendation, that he died a Martyr. Whereof I have not to judge, nor here to pronounce, but that rather I think him to be commended in his dying, than the woman for her killing.

Ludovicus Pius Emperor, King of France.

Fredrick Biſhop of Utricht.

Biſhop Fredrick openly admoniſheth the Emperor at the table.

Note, there were two Judiths, one the mother of Carolus Calvus, the other, his daughter whom King Ethelwolfe did marry.

Fredrick Biſhop of Utricht judged of ſome a Martyr.

Example of a woman more ready in reſtitution than [illegible].

And for ſo much as mention hath been made of Ludovicus Pius, here is to be noted, that in France then was uſed of Prieſts and Church-men, precious and ſhining Veſtures and golden and rich ſtaring Girdles, with Rings and other Ornaments of gold. Wherefore the ſaid Lewis purchaſed of the Biſhop of Rome a Correction for all ſuch as uſed ſuch diſordinate Apparel, cauſing them to wear brown and ſad colours, according to their ſadneſs. Fab.

Of this Lewis the Papiſts do feign, that becauſe he converted certain of their Church-goods and Patrimony to the wages of his Souldiers, his body (ſay they) was carried out of his Tomb by Devils, and was no more ſeen.

And thus a little having digreſſed out of our courſe, now let us return out of France into England again. King Ethelwolfus, coming now from Rome by the Country of France, was now returned again into his own Dominion, where he continued not long after.

This Ethelwolfus had eſpecially about him two Biſhops, whoſe counſel he was moſt ruled by, Swithinus Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Adelſtanus Biſhop of Shireborne. Of the which two, the one was more ſkilful in temporal and civil Affairs touching the Kings Wars, and filling of his Coffers, and other furniture for the King. The other (which was Swithinus) was of a contrary ſort, wholely diſpoſed and inclined to Spiritual meditation, and to miniſter Spiritual counſel to the King: who had been School-Maſter to the King before. Wherein appeared one good condition of this Kings nature, among his other Vertues, not only in following the Precepts and Advertiſements of his old School-Maſter, but alſo in that he like a kind and thankful Pupil did ſo reverence his Bringer up, and old School-Maſter (as he called him) that he ceaſed not, till he made him Biſhop of Wincheſter, by the conſecration of Celnoch then Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But as concerning the Miracles which are read in the Church of Wincheſter, of this Swithinus, them I leave to be read together with the Iliads of Homer, or Tales of Robinhood.

Swithinus Biſhop of Wincheſter.

Example of a kind Scholar to his School-Maſter.

Monkiſh miracles fained of Swithinus.

This Gregory the Fourth, here in this preſent Chapter above mentioned, was the third Pope which ſucceeded after Paſchalis the firſt, being but four years betwixt them: which Paſchalis ſucceeded after Stephan the Fourth, who followed after Leo the Third, next Pope unto Adrian above in our Hiſtory mentioned, whereas we intreated of Charles the Great. From the time of that Adrian the firſt, unto Pope Adrian the third, the Emperors had ſome ſtroke in the Election (at leaſt in the Confirmation) of the Roman Pope. Notwithſtanding, divers of thoſe foreſaid Popes in the mean time began to work their Practiſes to bring their Purpoſe about. But yet all their devices could take no full effect, before the ſaid Adrain the third, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall be declared. So that the Emperors all this while bare ſome Rule in chooſing the Popes, and in aſſembling general Councils. Wherefore by the Commandment of Ludovicus the Emperor, in the time of this Gregory the fourth, a general Synod was commenced at Aquiſgrane, where it was decreed by the ſaid Gregory and his Aſſiſtants: Firſt that every Church ſhould have ſufficient of his own proper Lands and Revenues to find the Prieſts thereof, that none ſhould need to lack or go about a begging. Item, that none of the Clergy, of what Order or Degree ſoever he be, ſhould uſe any Veſture of any precious or ſcarlet colour. Neither ſhall wear Rings on their Fingers, unleſs it be when Prelates be at Maſs, or give their Conſecrations. Item, that Prelates ſhould not keep too great Ports or Families, nor keep great Horſes, uſe Dice or Harlots: and the Monks ſhould not exceed meaſure in Gluttony or Riot. Item, that none of the Clergy being either anointed or ſhaven, ſhould uſe either gold or ſilver in their Shooes, Slippers, or Girdles, like to Heliogabalus. By this it may be conjectured, what Pomp and Pride in thoſe

The Feast of All Saints firſt ordained.

thoſe days was crept into the Clergy. Moreover, by the ſaid Pope Gregory the fourth, at the Commandment of Ludovicus Emperor, the Feaſt of All Saints was firſt brought into the Church.

Pope Sergius the ſecond.

After this Pope, came Sergius the ſecond, which firſt brought in the altering of the Popes names, becauſe he was named before Os porci, that is Swines-ſnout: which alſo ordained the Agnus thrice to be ſung at the Maſs, and the Hoſt to be divided into three parts.

When the Popes names began firſt to be altered.

Agnus thrice ſung in the Maſs.

The Hoſt divided in three parts.

After him was Pope Leo the fourth, to whom this King Ethelwolfe (as in this preſent Chapter is above ſpecified) did commit the tuition of his Son Alured. By this Pope Leo it came in, and was firſt enacted in a Council of his, that no Biſhop ſhould be condemned under threeſcore and twelve witneſſes, according as ye ſee, in the witneſſes at the condemnation of Stephen Gardiner, orderly practiſed.

Pope Leo the fourth.

No Biſhop by the Popes Law to be condemned under ſeventy and two witneſſes.

The golden Croſs firſt born before the Pope.

Item, contrary to the Law of Gregory the fourth his Predeceſſor, this Pope ordained the Croſs (all ſet with gold and precious ſtones) to be carried before him, like a Pope.

And here next now followeth and cometh in the Whore of Babylon rightly in her true colours, by the permiſſion of God, and manifeſtly without all tergiverſation) to appear to the whole World: and that not only after the ſpiritual ſenſe, but after the very letter, and the right form of an Whore indeed. For after this Leo above mentioned, the Cardinals proceeding to their ordinary Election (after a ſolemn maſs of the Holy Ghoſt, to the perpetual ſhame of them and of that See) in ſtead of a man Pope, elected an Whore indeed to miniſter Sacraments, to ſay Maſſes, to give Orders, to conſtitute Deacons, Prieſts, and Biſhops; to promote Prelates, to make Abbots, to conſecrate Churches and Altars, to have the Reign and Rule of Emperors and Kings: and ſo ſhe did indeed, called by name Joan the eighth. This womans proper name was Gilberta (a Dutch woman of Magunce) who went with an Engliſh Monk out of the Abbey of Fulda in mans Apparel unto Athens, and after through her dexterity of wit and learning was promoted unto the Popedom, where ſhe ſate two years and ſix months. At laſt openly in the face of a general Proceſſion, ſhe fell in labour and travel of child, and ſo died, by reaſon whereof, the Cardinals yet to this day do avoid to come near by that ſtreet where this ſhame was taken. By Benedictus the third, who ſucceeded next in the whoriſh See, was firſt ordained (as moſt Writers do record) the Dirge to be ſaid for the Dead. Albeit before him, Gregory the third had done in that matter worthily for his part already.

Pope Nicholas the firſt.

After him ſate Pope Nicholas the firſt, who inlarged the Popes Decrees with many Conſtitutions, equalling the authority of them with the writings of the Apoſtles. He ordained that no ſecular Prince, nor the Emperor himſelf, ſhould be preſent at their Councils, unleſs in matters concerning the Faith; to the end that ſuch as they judged to be Hereticks, they ſhould execute and murther. Alſo, that no Lay-men ſhould ſit in Judgment upon the Clergy-men, or reaſon upon the Popes Power. Item, that no Chriſtian Magiſtrate ſhould have any Power upon any Prelate, alledging that a Prelate is called God. Item, that all Church-Service ſhould be in Latine, yet notwithſtanding, diſpenſing with the Sclavonians and Polonians to retain ſtill their vulgar Language. Sequences in the Maſs were by him firſt allowed. By this Pope Prieſts began to be reſtrained and debarred from marrying: whereof Huldericke Biſhop of Ausbrough (a learned and an holy man) ſending a Letter unto the Pope, gravely and learnedly refuteth and reclaimeth againſt his undiſcreet proceedings touching that matter. The Copy of which Letter, as I thought it unworthy to be ſuppreſſed, ſo I judged it here worthy and meet for the better inſtruction of the Reader to be inſerted. The words thereof here follow out of Latine into Engliſh tranſlated.

The marriages of Prieſts begun to be forbidden.

A learned Epiſtle of Huldrike Biſhop of Auſburgh, ſent to Pope Nicholas the firſt, proving by Probations ſubſtantial, that Prieſts ought not to be reſtrained from Marriage.

The ſame in Engliſh.

A Letter written to Pope Nicholas concerning Prieſts not to refrain from marriage.

Hulderike Biſhop only by name, unto the reverend Father Nicholas the vigilant Proviſor of the holy Church of Rome, with due commendation ſendeth love as a Son, and fear as a Servant. Underſtanding (reverend Father) your Decrees which you ſent to me concerning the ſingle life of the Clergy, to be far diſcrepant from all diſcretion, I was troubled partly with fear, and partly with heavineſs. With fear for that (as it is ſaid) the Sentence of the Paſtor, whether it be juſt or unjuſt, is to be feared. For I was afraid leſt the weak hearers of the Scripture (which ſcarcely obey the juſt Sentence of their Paſtor, much more deſpiſing this unjuſt decreement) through the onerous and importable tranſgreſſion of their Paſtor, ſhould ſhew themſelves diſobedient. With heavineſs I was troubled, and with compaſſion, for that I doubted how the members of the body ſhould do, their Head being ſo greatly out of frame. For what can be more grievous or more to be lamented, touching the ſtate of the Church, than for you, being the Biſhop of the Principal See, to whom appertaineth the Regiment of the whole Church, to ſwerve never ſo little out of the right way? Certes in this you have not a little erred, in that you have gone about to conſtrain your Clergy to ſingleneſs of life, through your imperious Tyranny: whom rather you ought to ſtir up to the continency of marriage. For is not this to be counted a violence and tyranny to the judgment of all wiſe men, when a man is compelled by your Decrees to do that which is againſt the Inſtitution of the Goſpel and the proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt? Seeing then there be ſo many holy Examples both of the Old and New Teſtament, teaching us (as you know) due Information: I deſire your patience not to think it grievous for me to bring a few here out of many.

Prieſts marriage in the old Law permitted, in the new Law not forbidden.

Firſt, in the old Law, the Lord permitteth marriage unto the Prieſts, which afterward in the new Law we do not read to be reſtrained, but in the Goſpel thus he ſaith, There be ſome Eunuchs which have gelded themſelves for the Kingdom of Heaven, but all men do not take this Word; he that can take it, let him take it. Wherefore, the Apoſtle ſaith, Concerning Virgins, I have no Commandment of the Lord, but only I give counſel. Which counſel alſo all men do not take, as in the Commandment of the Lord before, but many there be falſe Diſſemblers and Flatterers, going about to pleaſe men, and not God, whom we ſee under a falſe pretence of continency to fall into horrible wickedneſs: ſome to lie with their Fathers wives ſome to be Sodomites, and not to abhor to play the beaſts with bruit Beaſts. And therefore leſt through the infection of this wicked Peſtilence, the ſtate of the Church ſhould too much go to ruine: therefore he ſaid, Becauſe of Fornication, let every man have his own wife, Touching which ſaying, our falſe Hypocrites falſly do lye and feign: as though only it pertained to the Laity, and not to them. And yet they themſelves, ſeeming to be ſet in the moſt holy Order, are not afraid to abuſe other mens wives, and as we ſee (with weeping eyes) all they do outrage in the foreſaid wickedneſs.

The inconvenience of ſingle life.

Theſe men have not rightly underſtood the Scripture, whoſe Breaſts while they ſuck ſo hard, inſtead of milk they ſuck out blood. For the ſaying of the Apoſtle, Let every man have his own wife, doth except none in very deed, but him only which hath the gift of Continency, prefixing with himſelf to keep and continue his Virgin in the Lord. Wherefore (O reverend Father) it ſhall be your part to cauſe and overſee, that whoſoever, either with hand or mouth, hath made a Vow of Continency, and afterward would forſake, either ſhould be compelled to keep his Vow, or elſe by lawful Authority ſhould be depoſed from his Order.

The ſaying of the Apoſtle, Let every one have his own wife.

And

And to bring this to paſs, you ſhall not only have me, but alſo all other of my Order, to be helpers unto you. But that you may underſtand, that ſuch which know not what a Vow doth mean, are not to be violently compelled thereunto, hear what the Apoſtle ſaith to Timothy, A Biſhop (ſaith he) muſt be irreprehenſible, the Husband of one Wife. Which ſentence leſt you ſhould turn and apply only to the Church; mark what he inferreth after, He that knoweth not (ſaith he) to rule his own Houſhold and Family, how ſhould he rule the Church of God? And likewiſe the Deacons (ſaith he) let them be the Husband of one Wife, which have knowledge to govern their own Houſe and Children. And this Wife, how ſhe is wont to be bleſt of the Prieſt, you underſtand ſufficiently, I ſuppoſe, by the decrees of holy Sylveſter the Pope.

This Decree is contrary to the Biſhops and Prelates in Queen Maries time.

To theſe and ſuch other holy ſentences of the Scripture agreeth alſo he that is the Writer of the rule of the Clergy, writing after this manner, A Clerk muſt be chaſt and continent, or elſe let him be coupled in the Bands of Matrimony, having one Wife. Whereby it is to be gathered, that the Biſhop and Deacon are noted infamous and reprehenſible, if they be divided in more women than one: otherwiſe, if they do forſake one under the pretence of Religion, both they together, as well the Biſhop as the Deacon be here condemned by the Canonical Sentence, which ſaith, Let no Biſhop or Prieſt forſake his own Wife, under the colour and pretence of Religion. If he do forſake her, let him be Excommunicate. And if he ſo continue, let him be dragged. Saint Auguſtine alſo (a man of diſcreet holineſs) ſaith in theſe words, There is no offence ſo great or grievous, but it is to avoid a greater evil.

Furthermore, we read in the ſecond Book of the Tripartite Hiſtory, that when the Council of Nice, going about to eſtabliſh the ſame Decree, would Enact, that Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons, after their Conſecration, either ſhould abſtain utterly from their own Wives, or elſe ſhould be depoſed; then Paphnutius (one of thoſe holy Martyrs, whom the Emperor Maximus had put out the right eye, and hockt their left legs) riſing up amongſt them, withſtood their purpoſed decreement: confeſſing Marriage to be honourable, and calling the Bed of Matrimony to be Chaſtity, and ſo perſwaded the Council from making that Law, declaring thereby what occaſion might come to themſelves and their wives of Fornication. And thus much did Paphnutius (being unmarried himſelf) declare unto them. And the whole Council commending his Sentence, gave place thereto, and left the matter freely without compulſion, to the will of every man, to do therein as he thought.

Notwithſtanding there be ſome, which take Saint Gregory for their defence in this matter, whoſe temerity I laugh at, and ignorance I lament: for they know not, being ignorantly deceived, how dangerous the decree of this Hereſie was (being made of S. Gregory*) who afterwards well revoked the ſame, with condigne fruit of Repentance.*

More than ſix thouſand heads of Infants found in the Popes Mote through the wicked Decree of the ſingle life of Prieſts. Let Prieſts note well the ſaying of Gregory.

For upon a certain day, as he ſent unto his Fiſh-pond to have fiſh, and did ſee more than ſix thouſand Infants heads brought to him, which were taken out of the ſame Pond or Mote, he did greatly repent in himſelf the Decree made before touching the ſingle life of Prieſts, which he confeſſed to be the cauſe of that ſo lamentable a murther. And ſo purging the ſame with condigne fruit of Repentance, altered again the things which he had decreed before, commending that counſel of the Apoſtle, which ſaith, It is better to marry than to burn; adding moreover of himſelf thereunto, and ſaying, It is better to marry than to give occaſion of death.

Peradventure if theſe men had read with me this which ſo hapned, I think they would not be ſo raſh in their doing and judging; fearing at leaſt the Lords Commandment, Do not judge, that you be not judged. And Saint Paul ſaith, Who art thou that judgeſt another mans Servant? Either he ſtandeth or falleth to his own Maſter; but he ſhall ſtand; for the Lord is mighty and able to make him ſtand. Therefore let your Holineſs ceaſe to compel and inforce thoſe, whom only you ought to admoniſh, leſt through your own private commandment (which God forbid) you be found contrary as well to the Old Teſtament, as to the New. For as Saint Auguſtine ſaith to Donatus, This is only that we do fear in your Juſtice, leſt (not for the conſideration of Chriſtian lenity, but for the grievouſneſs and greatneſs of tranſgreſſions committed) you be thought to uſe violence in executing puniſhment of that, which only we do deſire you (by Chriſt) not to do. For tranſgreſſions are ſo to be puniſhed, that the life of the Tranſgreſſors may repent. Alſo another ſaying of Saint Auguſtine we would have you to remember, which is this, Nil nocendi fiat cupiditate, omnia conſulendi charitate, & nihil fiat immaniter, nihil inhumaniter; that is, Let nothing be done through the greedineſs of hurting, but all things through the charity of profiting; neither let any thing be done cruelly, nothing ungently. Item, of the ſame Auguſtine it is written, In the fear and name of Chriſt I exhort you, which of you ſoever have not the gifts of this world, be not greedy to have them. Such as have them, preſume not too much upon them. For, I ſay, to have them is no damnation, but if you preſume upon them, that is damnation; if for the having of them you ſhall ſeem great in your own ſight, or if you do forget the common condition of man through the excellency of any thing you have. Uſe therefore therein due diſcretion, tempered with moderation, the which Cup of diſcretion is drawn out of the Fountain of the Apoſtolick Preaching, which ſaid, Art thou looſe from thy wife? Do not ſeek a wife. Art thou bound to thy wife? Seek not to be looſed from her. Where alſo it followeth, Such as have wives, let them be as though they had them not, and they that uſe the world, let them be as not uſing it.

Note well the ſaying of Auguſtine.

Item, concerning the Widow, he ſaith, Let her marry to whom ſhe will, only in the Lord. To marry in the Lord, is nothing elſe but to attempt nothing in contractings of Matrimony, which the Lord doth forbid. Jeremy alſo ſaith, Truſt not in the words of lyes, ſaying, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord. The which ſaying of Jeremy, Hierome expounding, ſaith thus, This may agree alſo, and be applied to ſuch Virgins, which brag and vaunt of their Virginity with an impudent face, pretending Chaſtity, when they have another thing in their Conſcience, and know not how the Apoſtle defineth the Virgin, that ſhe ſhould be holy in body, and alſo in ſpirit. For what availeth the chaſtity of the body, if the mind inwardly be deflowred? Or if it have not the other Vertues, which the Prophetical Sermon doth deſcribe? The which Vertues, for ſo much as we ſee partly to be in you; and becauſe we are not ignorant, that this diſcretion, although neglected in this part, yet in the other actions of your life is kept honeſtly of you, we do not deſpair, but you will alſo ſoon amend the little lack which is behind. And therefore with as much gravity as we can, we ceaſe not to call upon you, to correct and amend this your negligence. For although, according to our common calling, a Biſhop is greater than a Prieſt, and Auguſtine was leſs than Hierome; notwithſtanding the good correction proceeding from the leſſer to the greater, was not to be refuſed or diſdained; eſpecially, when he which is corrected is found to ſtrive againſt the truth, to pleaſe men. For as Saint Auguſtine ſaith, writing to Boniface, The Diſputations of all men, be they never ſo Catholick or approved perſons, ought not to be had in ſtead of the Canonical Scriptures. So that we may diſprove or refuſe (ſaving the honour and reverence which is due unto them) any thing that is in their writings, if any thing there be found contrary to truth. And what can be found more contrary to the truth than this? When as the truth it ſelf, ſpeaking of continency, not of one only, but of all together (the number only excepted of them which have profeſſed continency) ſaith, He that can take, let him take: the which ſaying, theſe men (moved, I cannot tell by what occaſion) do turn and ſay, He that cannot take, let him be accurſed. And what can be more fooliſh amongſt men, than when any Biſhop or Archdeacon run themſelves headlong into all kind of luſt, to Adultery and Inceſt, and alſo Sodomitry? Yet ſhame not to ſay, that the chaſt marriage of Prieſts doth ſtink before them: and, as void of all compaſſion and true righteouſneſs, do not deſire or admoniſh their Clerks, as their fellow-ſervants to abſtain, but command them, and enforce them as ſervants, violently to abſtain. Unto the which imperious Commandment of theirs, or Counſel (whether you will call it) they add alſo this fooliſh and filthy ſuggeſtion, ſaying, That it is more honeſt, privily to have to do with many women, than openly in the ſight and conſciences of many men to be bound to one wife. The which truly they would not ſay, if they were either of him, or in him, which ſaith,

What it is to marry in the Lord.

What a Virgin is by the definition of the Apoſtle.

Auguſt. ad Bonifacium.

The abſurd ſaying and contrary doing of Papiſts.

Woe

Woe to you Phariſees, which do all things before men. And ſo the Pſalmiſt, Becauſe they pleaſe men, they are confounded, for the Lord hath deſpiſed them. Theſe be the men, who ought to perſwade us that we ſhould rather ſhame to ſin privily in the ſight of him, to whom all things be open, than ſeem in the ſight of men to be clean. Theſe men therefore, although through their ſinful wickedneſs they deſerve no counſel of godlineſs to be given them: yet we, not forgetting our humanity, ceaſe not to give them counſel by the authority of Gods Word, which ſeeketh all mens ſalvation; deſiring them by the bowels of Charity, & laying with the words of Scripture, Caſt out (thou Hypocrite) firſt the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou ſhalt ſee to caſt the mote out of the eye of thy Brother.

Moreover, this alſo we deſire them to attend, what the Lord ſaith of the adulterous woman, Which of you that is without ſin, let him caſt the firſt ſtone againſt her. As though he would ſay, If Moſes bid you, I alſo bid you. But yet I require you that be the competent Miniſters and Executors of the Law, take hoed what you add thereunto; take heed alſo (I pray you) what you are your ſelves: for if (as the Scripture ſaith) thou ſhalt well conſider thy ſelf, thou will never defame or detract another.

Moreover, it is ſignified unto us alſo, that ſome there be of them, which (when they ought like unto good Shepherds to give their lives for the Lords Flock) yet are they puffed up with ſuch pride, that without all reaſon they preſume to rend and tear the Lords Flock with whippings and beatings, whoſe unreaſonable doings Saint Gregory bewailing, thus ſaith, Quid fiat de ovibus quando Paſtores Lupi fiunt? that is, What ſhall become of the Sheep when the Paſtors themſelves be Wolves? But who is overcome, but he which exerciſeth cruelty? Or who ſhall judge the Perſecutor, but he which gave patiently his back to ſtripes? And this is the fruit which cometh to the Church by ſuch Perſecutors, alſo which cometh to the Clergy by ſuch deſpightful handling of their Biſhops, or rather Infidels. For why may you not call them Infidels, of whom Saint Paul thus ſpeaketh, and writeth to Timothy? That in the later days there ſhall certain depart from the Faith, and give heed to Spirits of Error and Doctrine of Devils: that ſpeak falſe through hypocriſie, having their Conſciences marked with an hot Iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abſtain from meats, &c. And this is (if it be well marked) the whole handful of the Darnel and Cockel growing amongſt the Corn: this is the Covent of all madneſs; that whiles they of the Clergy be compelled to relinquiſh the company of their own lawful Wives, they become afterward Fornicators and Adulterers with other women, and wicked Miniſters of other ſinful filthineſs. Theſe be they which bring into the Church of God this Hereſie (as blind Guides leading the blind) that it might be fulfilled which the Pſalm ſpeaketh of, as fore-ſeeing the Errors of ſuch men, and accuſing them after this manner, Let their eyes be blinded, that they ſee not, and bow down always their back. For ſo much then (O Apoſtolical Sir) as no man which knoweth you, is ignorant, that if you through the light of your diſcretion had underſtood and ſeen what poiſoned peſtilence might have come into the Church through the Sentence of this your Decree, you would never have conſented to the ſuggeſtions of certain wicked perſons. Wherefore we counſel you by the fidelity of our due ſubjection, that with all diligence you would put away ſo great ſlander from the Church of God: and through your diſcreet Diſcipline, you will remove this Phariſaical Doctrine from the Flock of God: ſo that this only Sunamite of the Lords (uſing no more adulterous Husbands) do not ſeparate the holy people, and the Kingly Prieſthood from her Spouſe which is Chriſt, through an unrecoverable Divorcement: ſeeing that no man without Chaſtity (not only in the Virgins ſtate, but alſo in the ſtate of Matrimony) ſhall ſee our Lord, who with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt liveth and reigneth for ever. Amen.

Inveniur hæc epiſtola in veteſtis membranaceis libris (teſtante Illyrico in catalogo) Meminit ejuſdem epiſtolæ Æneas Sylvius, in ſua peregrinatione, & Gemmule deſcriptione.

¶ By this Epiſtle of Biſhop Hulderick (above prefixed) the matter is plain (gentle Reader) to conceive what was then the Sentence of learned men concerning the marriage of Miniſters: but that here by the way, the Reader is to be admoniſhed, that this Epiſtle which by Error of the Writer is referred to Pope Nicholas the firſt, in my mind is rather to be attributed to the name and time of Nicholas the ſecond, or Nicholas the third.

After this Pope Nicholas ſucceeded Adrianus the ſecond, Joannes the ninth, Martinus the ſecond. After theſe came Adrian the third, and Stephan the fifth. By this Adrian it was firſt decreed, That no Emperor after that time ſhould intermeddle or have any thing to do in the Election of the Pope. And thus began the Emperors firſt decay, and the Papacy to ſwell and riſe aloft. And thus much concerning Romiſh matters for this time.

Pope Adrian the ſecond. John the ninth. Martin the ſecond. Adrian the third. Stephan the fifth.

Then to return where we left, touching the ſtory of King Ethelwolfe. About the later end of his Reign, the Danes which before had invaded the Realm, in the time of King Egbert, as is above declared, now made their reentry again, with three and thirty Ships arriving about Hamſhire: through the barbarous tyranny of whom, much bloodſhed and murther happened here among *Engliſh*men, in Dorſetſhire, about Portſmouth, in Kent, in Eaſt-Angle, in Lindſie, at Rocheſter, about London, and in Weſt-Sex, where Ethelwolfe the King was overcome, beſides divers other Kings and Dukes, whom the Danes daily approaching, in great multitudes, in divers Victories had put to flight. At length King Ethelwolfe, with his Son Ethelbaldus, warring againſt them in Southery, at Okley, drave them to the Sea; where they hovering a ſpace, after a while braſt in again with horrible rage and cruelty, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall be declared, ſo much as to our purpoſe ſhall ſerve, profeſſing in this Hiſtory to write of no matters extern and politick, but only pertaining to the Church. The cauſe of this great Affliction ſent of God unto this Realm, thus I found expreſſed and collected in a certain old written ſtory, which hath no name: the words of which Writer, for the ſame cauſe as he thought to recite them, writing (as he ſaith) Ad cautelam futurorum, I thought alſo for the ſame here not to be omitted, albeit in all parts of his Commendation I do not fully with him accord. The words of the Writer be theſe:

Ex vetuſto exemplo hiſtoriæ Cariane. W. C. 1.

In Anglorum quidem Eccleſia primitiva, religio clariſſime reſplenduit: ita ut Reges & Reginæ, & Principes ac Duces, Conſules, & Barones, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

In the Primitive Church (ſaith he) of the Engliſh-men, Religion did moſt clearly ſhine, inſomuch that Kings, Queens, Princes and Dukes, Conſuls, Barons, and Rulers of Churches, incenſed with the deſire of the Kingdom of Heaven, labouring and ſtriving among themſelves to enter into Monkery, into voluntary exile and ſolitary life, forſook all, and followed the Lord. Where, in proceſs of time all vertue ſo much decayed among them, that in fraud and treachery none ſeemed like unto them: neither was to them any thing odious or hateful, but Piety and Juſtice. Neither any thing in price or honour, but civil War and ſhedding of innocent blood. Wherefore Almighty God ſent upon them Pagan and cruel Nations, like ſwarms of Bees, which neither ſpared Women nor Children, as Danes, Norwegians, Gothes, Suevians, Vandals, and Friſians. Who, from the beginning of the Reign of King Ethelwolfe, till the coming of the Normans, by the ſpace near of two hundred and thirty years, deſtroyed their ſinful Land from the one ſide of the Sea to the other, from man alſo to beaſt. For why? They invading England oft-times, of every ſide, went not about to ſubdue and poſſeſs it, but only to ſpoil and deſtroy it. And if it had chanced them at any time to be overcome of Engliſh-men, it availed nothing, when as other Navies ſtill with greater Power in other places were ready upon a ſudden and unawares, to approach upon them, &c. Hiſtoria Cariana.

The cauſe of Gods wrath whereby the Realm of England was ſcourged by the Danes.

Thus far have you the words of mine Author, declaring the cauſe which provoked Gods anger: whereunto may be adjoyned the wickedneſs, not only of them but of their fore-Fathers alſo before them, who falſely breaking the Faith and Promiſe made with the Britains, did cruelly murther their Nobles, wickedly oppreſſed their Commons, impiouſly perſecuted the innocent Chriſtians, injuriouſly poſſeſſed their Land and Habitation: chaſing the Inhabitants out of Houſe and Country, beſides the violent murther of the Monks of Bangor, and divers foul Slaughters among the poor Britains, who ſent for them to be their Helpers. Wherefore Gods juſt recompence falling upon them from that time, never ſuffered them to be quiet from foreign Enemies, till the coming of William the Norman, &c.

to

Another cauſe rendred, why England was ſcourged of the Danes.

Moreover, concerning the outward occaſions given of the Engliſhmens parts, moving the Danes firſt to invade the Realm, I find in certain ſtories two moſt ſpecially aſſigned. The one unjuſtly given, and juſtly taken. The other not given juſtly, and unjuſtly taken. Of the which two, the firſt was given in Northumberland, by the means of Osbright, reigning under-King of Weſt-Saxons, in the North parts. This Osbright upon a time journeying by the way, turned into the houſe of one of his Nobles called Bruer. Who having at home a wife of great beauty (he being abſent abroad) the King after his dinner (allured with the excellency of her beauty) took her to a ſecret Chamber, where he forceably (contrary to her will) did raviſh her: whereupon ſhe being greatly diſmayed, and vexed in her mind, made her moan to her Husband returning, of this violence and injury received. Bruer conſulting with his Friends, firſt went to the King, reſigning into his hands all ſuch ſervice and poſſeſſions which he did hold of him: that done, he took ſhipping and ſailed into Denmark, where he had great Friends, and had his bringing up before. There making his moan to Codrinus the King, deſired his aid in revenging of the great villany of Osbright againſt him and his wife. Codrinus hearing this, and glad to have ſome juſt quarrel to enter that Land, levied an Army with all ſpeed, and preparing all things neceſſary for the ſame, ſendeth forth Inguar and Hubba, two Brethren, his chief Captains, with an innumerable multitude of Danes into England; who firſt arriving at Holderneſs, there burnt up the Country, and killed without mercy, both Men, Women and Children, whom they could lay hands upon. Then marching towards York, entred their battel with the foreſaid Osbright, where he with the moſt part of his Army was ſlain. And ſo the Danes entred the poſſeſſion of the City of York. Some others ſay, and it is by the moſt part of ſtory-writers recorded, that the chief cauſe of the coming of Inguar and Hubba with the Danes, was, to be revenged of King Edmund, reigning under the Weſt-Saxons over the Eaſt-Angles in Norfolk and Suffolk: for the murthering of a certain Dane being Father to Inguar and Hubba, which was falſely imputed to King Edmund. The ſtory is thus told.

The firſt entring of the Danes. Ex hiſtoria Jornalenſis.

Example, what miſchief commeth by Adultery.

Codrinus King of Denmark.

Inguar and Hubba Captains of the Danes.

Another cauſe of the coming of the Danes.

A certain Nobleman of the Danes of the Kings ſtock, called Lothbroke, Father to Inguar and Hubba, entring upon a time with his Hawk into a certain Schiffe or Cockbote alone; by chance through tempeſt was driven with his Hawk to the coaſt of Norfolk named Rodham, where he being found and detained, was preſented to the King. The King underſtanding his Parentage, and ſeeing his caſe, entertained him in his Court accordingly, and every day more and more perceiving his Activities and great Dexterity in hunting and hawking, bare ſpecial favour unto him. Inſomuch that the Kings Falkoner, or Maſter of his Game, bearing privy envy againſt him, ſecretly as they were hunting together in a Wood did murther him, and threw him into a buſh. This Lothbroke, being murthered, within two or three days began to be miſſed in the Kings houſe: of whom no tidings could be heard, but only by a Dog or Spaniel of his, which continuing in the Wood with the corps of his Maſter, at ſundry times came and fawned upon the King: ſo long that at the length they following the trace of the Hound, were brought to the place where Lothbroke lay. Whereupon inquiſition being made, at length by certain circumſtances of words and other evidences, it was known how and by whom he was murthered, that was by the Kings Huntſman named Berike. Who thereupon being convicted, was ſet into the ſame Bote of Lothbroke, alone and without any tackling to drive by Seas, either to be ſaved by the weather, or to be drowned in the deep. And as it chanced, Lothbroke from Denmark to be driven to Norfolk, ſo it happened that from Norfolk he was carried into Denmark, where the Bote of Lothbroke being well known, hands were laid upon him, and inquiſition made of the party. In fine in his torments, to ſave himſelf, he uttered an untruth of King Edmund, ſaying, That the King had put him to death in the Country of Norfolk. Whereupon grudge firſt was conceived, then an Army appointed, and great multitudes ſent into England to revenge that Fact, where firſt they arriving in Northumberland, deſtroyed (as is ſaid) thoſe parts firſt. From thence ſailing into Norfolk they exerciſed the like tyranny there, upon the Inhabitants thereof, eſpecially upon the innocent Prince, and bleſſed Martyr of God, King Edmund. Concerning the farther Declaration whereof hereafter ſhall follow (Chriſt our Lord ſo permitting) more to be ſpoken, as place and obſervation of time and years ſhall require.

Lothbroke Father to Inguar and Hubba.

What miſchief envy worketh.

Murther will out.

In the mean ſeaſon, King Ethelwolfe in this Chapter here preſently touched, when he had chaſed the foreſaid Danes, (as is above rehearſed) from place to place, cauſing them to take the Sea, he in the mean while departeth himſelf both from land and life: leaving behind him four Sons, which reigned every one his order, after the deceaſe of their Father. The names of whom were Ethelbaldus, Ethelbrightus, Ethelredus and Aluredus.

King Ethelwolfe deceaſeth.

King Ethelbald.

KIng Ethelbald the eldeſt Son of Ethelwolfe, ſucceeding his Father in the Province of Weſt-Sax, and Ethelbright in the Province of Kent, reigned both together the term of five years, one with the other. Of the which two, Ethelbald the firſt left this Infamy behind him in ſtories, for marrying and lying with his ſtepmother, wife to his own Father, named Judith. After theſe two ſucceeded Ethelred, the third Son, who in his time was ſo incumbred with the Danes, burning in on every ſide, eſpecially about York (which City they then ſpoiled and burnt up) that he in one year ſtood in nine battels againſt them, with the help of Alured his Brother. In the beginning of this Kings Reign, the Danes landed in Eaſt-England, or Norfolk and Suffolk. But (as Fabian writeth) they were compelled to forſake that Country, and ſo took again ſhipping, and ſailed Northward, and landed in Northumberland: where they were met of the Kings then there reigning, called Osbright and Ella, which gave to them a ſtrong fight. But notwithſtanding, the Danes, with the help of ſuch as inhabited the Country, won the City of York, and held it a certain ſeaſon, as is above foretouched.

King Ethelred. York burned by the Danes.

What diſcord doth in a Commonwealth.

In the Reign of this Ethelred, the Northumberlanders rebelling againſt the King thought to recover again the former ſtate of their Kingdom out of the Weſt-Saxons hand; by reaſon of which diſcord (as happeneth in all Lands where diſſention is) the ſtrength of the Engliſh Nation was thereby not a little weakened, and the Danes the more thereby prevailed.

{Anno 870.}

About the later time of the Reign of this Ethelred, which was about the year of our Lord, 870. certain of the foreſaid Danes being thus poſſeſſed of the North Country (after their cruel Perſecution and murther done there, as partly is touched before) took ſhipping from thence, intending to ſail toward the Eaſt-Angles, who by the way upon the Sea met with a Fleet of Danes; whereof the Captains or Leaders were named, Inguar and Hubba. Who joyning altogether in one Council, made all one courſe, and laſtly landed in Eaſt-England or Northfolk, and in proceſs of time came to Thetford. Thereof hearing Edmund, then under-King of that Province, aſſembled an Hoſt that gave to them battel. But Edmund and his Company was forced to forſake the Field; and the King, with a few perſons fled unto the Caſtle of Framingham, whom the Danes purſued. But he in ſhort while after yielded himſelf to the perſecution of the Danes: anſwering in this manner to the Meſſenger, that told him in the name of Inguar Prince of the Danes, which moſt victoriouſly (ſaith he) was come with innumerable Legions, ſubduing both by Sea and Land many Nations unto him: and ſo now arrived in thoſe parts requireth him likewiſe to ſubmit himſelf, yielding to him his hid Treaſures, and ſuch other goods of his Anceſtors, and ſo to Reign under him: which thing if he would not do, he ſhould (ſaid he) be judged unworthy both of life and reign. Edmund hearing of this proud meſſage of the Pagan, conſulted with certain of his friends; and among others, with one of his Biſhops, being then his Secretary; who ſeeing the preſent danger, of

of the King, gave him counſel to yield to the conditions. The anſwer of King Edmund. Upon this the King pauſing a little with himſelf, at length rendred this anſwer, bidding the meſſenger go tell his Lord in theſe words, That Edmund a Chriſtian King, for the love of temporal life, will not ſubmit himſelf to a Pagan Duke, unleſs he before would be a Chriſtian. Incontinent upon the ſame, the wicked and crafty Dane, approaching in moſt haſty ſpeed upon the King, encountred with him in battel (as ſome ſay) at Thetford; where the King being put to the worſe, and pittying the terrible ſlaughter of his men, thinking with himſelf rather to ſubmit his own perſon to danger, than his people ſhould be ſlain, did flie (as Fabian ſaith) to the Caſtle of Framingham, (or as mine Author writeth) to Haleſdon, now called St. Edmundsbury, where this bleſſed man being on every ſide compaſſed of his cruel enemies, yielded himſelf to their perſecution. And for that he would not reny or deny Chriſt and his Laws, they therefore moſt cruelly bound him unto a Tree, and cauſed him to be ſhot to death; and laſtly, cauſed his head to be ſmitten from his body, and caſt into the thick buſhes. Which head and body at the ſame time by his friends was taken up, and ſolemnly buried at the ſaid Haleſdon, otherwiſe now named St. Edmundsbury. Whoſe Brother named Edwoldus (notwithſtanding of right the Kingdom fell next unto him) ſetting apart the liking and pleaſure of the world, became an Hermite of the Abbey of Cerum in the Country of Dorſet.

The perſecution and death of St. Edmund K. of the Eaſtangles.

K. Edmund Martyr.

After the Martyrdom of this bleſſed Edmund, when the cruel Danes had ſufficiently robbed and ſpoiled that Country, they took again their Ships, and landed in Southery, and continued their journey till they came to the Town of Reading, and there won the Town with the Caſtle, where (as Cambrenſis ſaith) within three days of their thither coming, the foreſaid Inguar and Hubba Captains of the Danes, as they went in purchaſing of their preys or boo-ties, were ſlain at a place called Englefield. Which Princes of the Danes thus ſlain, the reſt of them kept whole together, in ſuch wiſe that the Weſtſaxons might take of them none advantage. But yet within few days after, the Danes were holden ſo ſhort, that they were forced to iſſue out of the Caſtle and to defend themſelves in plain battel. In the which (by the induſtry of King Ethelred, and of Alured his Brother) the Danes were diſcomfited, and many of them ſlain; which diſcomfort made them fly again into the Caſtel, and there he kept them for a certain time. Then King then committing the charge of them to Ethelwold Duke of Baroke, or Barkſhire, ſo departed. But when the Danes knew of the Kings departure, they brake ſuddenly out of their Hold, and took the Duke unprovided, and ſlew him, and much of his people. And ſo adjoyning themſelves with others that were ſcattered in the Country, imbattelled them in ſuch wiſe, that of them was gathered a ſtrong Hoſt.

Reading taken of the Danes.

Inguar and Hubba ſlain.

Duke Ethelwold ſlain.

As the tidings hereof was brought unto King Ethelred, (which put him in great heavineſs) word alſo was brought the ſame time of the landing of Oſrike King of Denmark, who with aſſiſtance of the other Danes had gathered a great Hoſt, and were imbattelled upon Aſhdon. To this battel King Ethelred with his Brother Alured (forced by great need) ſped themſelves to withſtand the Danes. At which time the King a little ſtaying behind, being yet at his ſervice, Alured which was come in before, had entred already into the whole fight with the Danes; who ſtruck together with huge violence. The King being required to make ſpeed (he being then at ſervice and meditations) ſuch was his devotion, that he would not ſtir out one foot before their ſervice was fully compleat. In this mean while, the Danes ſo fiercely invaded Alured and his men, that they won the hill, and the Chriſtian men were in the valley, and in great danger to loſe the whole field. Nevertheleſs through the grace of God, and their godly manhood, the King coming from his ſervice, with his freſh Soldiers recovered the hill of the Infidels, and ſo diſcomfited the Danes that day; that in flying away not only they loſt the victory, but moſt part alſo of them their lives. Inſomuch that their Duke or King Oſrike, or Oſege, and five of their Dukes, with much of their people were ſlain, and the reſt chaſed unto Reading Town.

Oſrike King of Denmark landeth in England.

Ex Guſtel. Malmeſb. Ex Hiſtoris Tornatenſi. Ex Fabiano & aliis.

The Danes overthrown at Aſhdon.

After this the Danes yet reaſſembled their people, and gathered a new Hoſt; ſo that within fifteen days they met at Baſingſtoke, and there gave battel unto the King, and had the better. Then the King again gathered his men, which at that field were diſparkled, and with freſh Soldiers to them accompanied, met the Danes within two months after at the Town of Merton, where he gave them a ſharp Battel, ſo that much people were ſlain as well of the Chriſtians as of the Danes, but in the end the Danes had the honour of the field, and King Ethelred there was wounded, and therefore fain to ſave himſelf.

Another battel fought with the Danes at Merton.

After theſe two fields thus won by the Danes, they obtained great circuit of ground, and deſtroyed man and child that would not yield to them. And Churches and Temples they turned to the uſe of Stables, and other vile occupations.

Thus the King being beſet with enemies on every ſide, ſeeing the land ſo miſerably oppreſſed of the Danes, his Knights and Soldiers conſumed, his own Land of Weſtſaxons in ſuch deſolation, he being alſo wounded himſelf, but ſpecially for that he ſending his Commiſſions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and Eaſtanglia, could have of them but ſmall or little comfort (becauſe they through wicked rebellion were more willing to take the part of the Danes than of their King) was ſore perplexed there withal, as the other Kings were both before him and after him at that time. So that as Malmesbury witneſſeth, Magis optarent honeſtum exitium, quam tam acerbum imperium: that is, They rather wiſhed honeſtly to die, than with ſuch trouble and ſorrow to reign. And thus this King not long after deceaſed, when he had reigned (as Fabian ſaith) eight years, or as Malmesbury writeth, but five years. During which time of his reign, notwithſtanding his ſo great troubles and vexations in Martial affairs (as is in ſome Stories mentioned) he founded the Houſe or Colledg of Canons at Exceſter, and was buried at the Abbey of Winborne or Woborne. After whoſe deceaſe, for lack of iſſue of his body, the rule of the land fell unto his Brother Alured.

King Alured, otherwiſe called Alfred.

AMONG the Saxon Kings hitherto in this Story aforementioned, I find few or none to be preferred (or almoſt to be compared) to this Alured or Alfred, for the great and ſingular qualities in this King, worthy of high renown and commendation; whether we behold in him the valiant acts and manifold travels which he continually from time to time ſuſtained againſt his enemies in wars, during almoſt all the time of his reign, for the publick preſervation of his people; or whether we conſider in him his godly and excellent vertues, joyned with a publick and tender care, and a zealous ſtudy for the common peace and tranquillity of the weal publick; appearing as well in his prudent Laws by him both carefully ſet forth, and with the like care executed; as alſo by his own private Exerciſes touching the vertuous inſtitution of his life. Or whether we reſpect that in him, which with equal praiſe matcheth with both the other before; that is, his notable knowledg of good Letters, with a fervent love and Princely deſire to ſet forth the ſame through all his Realm, before his time both rude and barbarous. All which his Heroical properties, joyned together in one Prince, as it is a thing moſt rare, and ſeldom ſeen in Princes now a days; ſo I thought the ſame the more to be noted and exemplied in this good King. Thereby either to move other Rulers and Princes in theſe our days to his imitation; or elſe to ſhew them what hath been in times paſt in their anceſtors, which ought to be, and yet is not found in them. Wherefore of theſe three parts to diſcourſe either part in order, firſt we will enter to intreat of his acts and painful travels ſuſtained in defence of the Realm publick, againſt the raging tyranny of the Danes, as they be deſcribed in the Latin Hiſtories of Roger Hoveden, and Huntington; whom Fabian alſo ſeemeth in this part ſomewhat to follow. King Alfred therefore the firſt of all the Engliſh Kings, taking his Crown and Unction at Rome of Pope Leo (as Malmesbury and Polychronicon do record) in the beginning of his reign, perceiving his Lords and people much waſted and decayed, by the reaſon of the great wars of Ethelred had againſt the Danes, yet as well as he could, gathered a ſtrength of men unto him, and in the ſecond month that he was made King, he met with the Danes beſide Wilton, where he gave them Battel, {Anno 872.} Alured King of England.

Ex Reg. Hoved. H. Huntig. Polychronic. & Fabian.

Burthred expulſed his Kingdom, went to Rome, and there died in the Engliſh houſe.

But being far over-matched through the multitude of the contrary part, was put there to the worſe; although not without a great ſlaughter of the Pagan Army. Which Army then of the Danes, after that victory, by compaction made with King Alfred to depart out of his Dominion of Weſtſax, removed from Reading to London, where they abode all that Winter. Where Halden their King, truce with Burthred King of Mercians, the next year following voided thoſe parts, and drew to Lindſey, robbing and ſpoiling the Towns and Villages as they went, and holding the common people under their ſervage. From thence after to Repingdon, where they joyning with the three other Kings of the Danes (called Surdrim, Osketell, and Hamond) grew thereby in mighty force and ſtrength. Who then dividing their Army in two parts, the one half remained with Halden in the Country of Northumberland; the reſidue were with the other three Kings, wintring and ſojourning all the next year at Grantbridge, which was the fourth year of King Alfred. In the which year King Alfred his men had a conflict on the Sea with ſix of the Danes Ships, of which one they took, the other fled away.

Rollo a Dane firſt Duke of Normandy.

In this year went Rollo the Dane into Normandy, where he was Duke thirty years, and afterward was Baptized in the Faith of Chriſt, and named Robert. The foreſaid Army of the three Dane Kings above mentioned from Grantbridge returned again to Weſtſaxony, and entred the Caſtle of Warrham; where Alfred with a ſufficient power of men was ready to aſſault them. But the Danes ſeeing his ſtrength, durſt not attempt with him, but ſought delays, whiles more aid might come. In the mean ſeaſon they were conſtrained to entreat for truce; leaving alſo ſufficient pledges in the Kings hand, promiſing moreover upon their Oath to void the Country of the Weſtſaxons. The King upon the ſurety let them go. But they falſely breaking their league, privily in the night brake out, taking their journey toward Exceſter. In which journey they loſt ſix ſcore of their ſmall Ships, by a tempeſt at Sandwich, (as Henry Huntington in his Story recordeth.) Then King Alfred followed after the Horſemen of the Danes, but could not overtake them before they came to Exceſter, where he took of them pledges and fair promiſes of peace, and ſo returned. Notwithſtanding the number of the Pagans did daily more and more increaſe, in ſo much (as one of my Authors ſaith) that if in one day thirty thouſand of them were ſlain, ſhortly after they increaſed double as many again. After this truce taken with King Alfred, the Danes then voided to the Land of Mercia, whereof part of that Kingdom they kept themſelves, part they committed to one Ceolulphus; upon condition that he ſhould be vaſſal to them, and at their commandment, with his people at all times.

{ Anno 879. }

The next year enſuing, which was the ſeventh year of the reign of Alfred, the Danes now having all the rule of the North part of England, from the river of Thames, with Mercia, London, and Eſſex, diſdained that Alfred ſhould bear any Dominion on the other ſide of Thames Southward. Whereupon the foreſaid three Kings, with all the forces and ſtrength they could make, marched toward Chippenham in Weſtſex, with ſuch a multitude, that the King with his people was not able to reſiſt them; inſomuch that the people which inhabited there, ſome fled over the Sea, ſome remained with the King, divers ſubmitted themſelves to the Danes. Thus Alfred being overſet with multitude of enemies, and forſaken of his people, having neither land to hold, nor hope to recover that which he had loſt, withdrew himſelf with a few of his Nobles about him, into a certain Wood-country in Somerſetſhire called Etheling; where he had right ſcant to live with, but ſuch as he and his people might purchaſe by hunting and fiſhing. This Edeling or Etheling, or Ethelingſey, ſtandeth in a great mariſh or moor, ſo that there is no acceſs unto it without Ship or Boat, and hath in it a great Wood called Selwood, and in the middle a little Plain about two acres of ground, in which Iſle is Veniſon, and other wild Beaſts, with Fowl and Fiſhes, great plenty. In this Wood King Alfred at his firſt coming eſpied a certain deſert cottage of a poor Swineherd, keeping Swine in the Wood, named Dunwolfus; of whom the King then unknown was entertained and cheriſhed, with ſuch poor fare as he and his wife could make him. For the which King Alfred afterward ſet the poor Swineherd to learning, and made him Biſhop of Wincheſter.

K. Alfred flieth into a deſert Wood.

A Swineherd made Biſhop of Wincheſter.

In the mean ſeaſon, while King Alfred accompanied with a few was thus in the deſert Wood, waiting the event of theſe miſeries, certain Stories record of a poor Beggar, which there came and asked his Alms of the King; and the night following he appeared to the King in his ſleep, ſaying, his name was Cuthbert, promiſing (as ſent from God unto him for his good charity) great victories againſt the Danes. But to let theſe dreaming Fables paſs, although they be teſtified by divers Authors, as both Wilhelmus lib. de Reg. Polychronicon, Rog. Hoveden, Fornalenſis, and others more. Notwithſtanding the King in proceſs of time was ſtrengthened and comforted more, through the Providence of God; reſpecting the miſerable ruin of the Engliſh men. Firſt, the Brother of King Halden the Dane before mentioned, coming in with three and thirty Ships, landed about Devonſhire; where by chance being reſiſted by a Buſhment of King Alfreds men (who for their ſafeguard there lay in Garriſon) were ſlain to the number of 1300 men, and their Enſign called the Raven was taken. Hovedenus in his Book of Continuationes writeth, that in the ſame conflict both Inguar and Hubba were ſlain among the other Danes. After this King Alfred, being better cheared, ſhewed himſelf more at large; ſo that daily reſorted to him men of Wiltſhire, Sommerſetſhire, and Hamſhire, till that he was ſtrongly accompanied.

A bold adventure or attempt of K. Alfred, venturing himſelf into the Tents of the Danes.

Then the King put himſelf in a bold and dangerous venture, as writeth Wilhelmus lib. de Reg. Polychron. and Fabian, which followeth them both. For he apparelling him in the habit of a Minſtrel (as he was very skilful in all Saxon Poems) with his inſtrument of Muſick entred into the Tents of the Danes, lying then at Eddendun; and in ſhewing there his Interludes and Songs, eſpied all their ſloth and idleneſs, and heard much of their counſel; and after returning to his company, declared unto them the whole manner of the Danes. Shortly upon the ſame, the King ſuddenly in the night fell upon the foreſaid Danes, and diſtreſſed and ſlew of them a great multitude, chaſed them from that coaſt. Inſomuch that through his ſtrong and valiant aſſaults upon his enemies out of his Tower of Edeling newly fortified, he ſo incumbred them, that he clearly voided the Country of them, between that and Selwood. His ſubjects eftſoons hearing of theſe his valiant victories and manful deeds, drew to him daily out of all coaſts. Who through the help of God, and their aſſiſtance, held the Danes ſo ſhort, that he won from them Wincheſter, and divers other good Towns. Briefly, at length he forced them to ſeek for peace; the which was concluded upon certain Covenants. Whereof one and the principal was, that the forenamed Gutrum their King ſhould be Chriſtened. The other was, that ſuch as would not be Chriſtened, ſhould depart and void the Country.

Ex Fabian.

Gutrum the Prince of the Danes was chriſtened.

Upon theſe Covenants, firſt the ſaid Gutrum the Daniſh Prince coming to Wincheſter, was there Chriſtened with twenty of his greateſt Dukes or Nobles. To the which Gutrum King Alfred being his Godfather at his Baptiſm, named him Athelſtan. Who after a certain ſeaſon that he had feaſted the ſaid Danes, he according to his promiſe before made, gave unto their King the Country of Eaſtanglia, containing Northfolk and Suffolk, and part of Cambridgeſhire. Moreover (as ſaith Polychronicon) he granted to the Danes that were Chriſtened, the Country of Northumberland. So the reſidue that would not be Chriſtened, departed the land, and ſailed into France; where what vexation and harm they wrought, the Chronicles of France do partly comprehend.

K. Gutrum named Athelſtan.

Northfolk and Suffolk given to K. Gutrum.

King Athelſtan thus having the poſſeſſion of theſe Countries, had all Eaſtangles under his obedience. And albeit that he held the ſame Province as in fee of the King, and promiſed to dwell there as his liege man, yet that notwithſtanding, he continued more like a Tyrant by the term of eleven years, and died in the twelfth year. During the which ſpace, King Alfred having ſome more reſt and peace, repaired certain Towns and ſtrong Holds afore by the Danes impaired. Alſo he builded divers Houſes of Religion, as the Houſe of Nuns at Shaftsbury; another Religious Houſe at Etheling, he founded. Item, another in Wincheſter, named the New Monaſtery. Item, he endued richly the Church of St. Cuthbert in Dirham. He ſent alſo to India to pay and perform his Vows to St. Thomas of Inde, which he made during the time of his diſtreſs againſt the Danes.

About

About the fifteenth year of the reign of Alfred, the Danes returning from France to England, landed in Kent, and ſo came to Rocheſter and beſieged that City; and there lay ſo long, that they builded a Tower of timber againſt the Gates of the City. But by ſtrength of the Citizens that Tower was deſtroyed, and the City defended, till King Alfred came and reſcued them. Whereby the Danes were ſo diſtreſſed, and ſo neer trapped, that for fear they left their Horſes behind them, and fled to their Ships by night. But the King when he was thereof aware, ſent after them and took ſixteen of their Ships, and ſlew many of the ſaid Danes. This done, the King returned to London, and repaired the ſame honourably (as ſaith Hovedenus) and made it habitable, which before was ſore decayed and feebled by the Danes.

{Anno 892.} The third year after this, which was the nineteenth year of the reign of King Alfred, the foreſaid Athelſtan the Daniſh King of Northfolk (which by Alfred was Chriſtened before) deceaſed. Not long after this, about the one and twentieth year of this Kings reign, the Danes again landed in four places of this land; which was in Eaſt-England, in the North, and in the Weſt, in two places. Before the landing of theſe Danes it chanced King Alfred, hearing of the death of King Athelſtan, and of other complaints of the Danes, was then in Eaſt-England when theſe tidings came to him.

The Danes driven from Northfolk.

When King Alfred was thereof aſcertained, for ſo much as ſome of the Danes were landed in that Coaſt, thinking with themſelves the ſlither they went in thoſe parts the leſs reſiſtance to have, and the more ſpeed, as they were wont to have before; Alfred therefore ſending meſſengers in all haſt to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, to aſſemble to him an Hoſt to withſtand the Danes which landed in the Weſt, made forth toward his enemies there, where he was in Eaſtanglia, whom he purſued ſo ſharply, that he drove them out from thoſe parts. They then landed in Kent, whither the King with his people ſped him, and in like manner drave the Danes from thence, without any great fight, ſo far as in our Authors we can ſee. After this, again the Danes took ſhipping, and ſailed into Northwales, and there robbed and ſpoiled the Britains, and from thence returned by the Sea into Eaſtanglia, with an hundred Ships, and there reſted them, for ſo much as the King then was gone Weſtward.

The Danes return again to Northwales.

The Danes driven out of Cheſter.

The fourth Hoſt of the Danes the ſame year came to Cheſter, which at length they won; but then the Country adjoyning preſſed ſo ſore upon them, and beſieged them ſo long, keeping themſelves within the City, that at the laſt the Danes wearied with the long ſiege, were compelled to eat their own Horſes for hunger. But by appointment at laſt they gave over the Town, and went about by Northwales to Northumberland, which was about the three and twentieth year of King Alfred. Which Alfred in the mean while with his Hoſt ſped him thitherward. Then the Danes leaving their ſtrong Holds and Caſtles, garniſhed with men and victual, took again ſhipping, and ſet their courſe in ſuch wiſe that they landed in Suſſex, and ſo came to the Port of Lewes, and from thence toward London, and builded a Tower or Caſtle near unto the River of Luy, twenty miles from London. But the Londoners hearing thereof, manned out a certain number of men of Arms, who with the aſſiſtance of them of that Country, put the Danes from that Tower, and after beat it down to the ground. Soon after the King came down thither, and to prevent the dangers that might enſue, commanded the River of Luy to be divided in three ſtreams; ſo that where a Ship might ſail in times before, there a little Boat might ſcantly row. From thence the Danes leaving their Ships and Wives, were forced to flie that Country, and took their way again toward Wales, and came to Quadruge near to the River of Severn; where upon the borders thereof they builded them a Caſtle, there reſting themſelves for a time, whom the King eftſoons with his Army purſued. In the mean time the Londoners at Luy taking the Danes Ships, ſome of them they brought to London, the reſt they fired. During all theſe three years, from the firſt coming of the Danes to Luy, England was afflicted with three manner of ſorrows, with the Danes, with peſtilence of men, and murrain of beaſts. The which troubles notwithſtanding, yet the King manfully reſiſted the malice of his enemies, and thanked God always, what trouble ſoever fell to him, or unto his Realm, and ſuſtained it with great patience and humility. Theſe three years overpaſt, the next following, which was the eight and twentieth of the reign of Alfred, the Danes divided their Hoſt, of whom part went to Northumberland, {Anno 897.} ſome to Northfolk, part ſailed over to France, ſome other came to Weſtſax, where they had divers conflicts with the Engliſh men, both by land, and eſpecially upon the Sea; of whom ſome were ſlain, many by ſhipwrack periſhed, The Danes Ships taken. divers others were taken and hanged, and thirty of their Ships were taken.

Not long after this, King Alfred, when he had reigned nine and twenty years and ſix months, changed this {Anno 899.} mortal life. And thus much (and more peradventure than will ſeem to this our Eccleſiaſtical Story appertaining) touching the painful labours and travels of this good King, which he no leſs valiantly atchieved, than patiently ſuſtained for the neceſſary defence of his Realm and ſubjects.

The vertues and godly life of King Alfred deſcribed.

Now if there be any Prince who liſteth to ſee and follow the vertuous and godly diſpoſition of this King, both touching the inſtitution of his own life, and alſo concerning his careful Government of the Common-weal, thus the Hiſtories of him do record. That at what time he being young, perceiving himſelf ſomewhat diſpoſed to the vice of The inclination of nature corrected in K. Alfred. the fleſh, and thereby letted from many vertuous purpoſes, did not as many young Princes and Kings Sons in the world be now wont to do, that is, to reſolve themſelves into all kind of carnal licenſe, and diſſolute ſenſuality, running and following without bridle whither ſoever their licenſe given doth lead them (as therefore not without cauſe the common Proverb reporteth of them, that Kings Sons learn nothing well elſe but only to ride.) Meaning thereby, that Princes and Kings Sons having about them flatterers, which bolſter them in their faults, only their Horſes give to them no more than to any other; but if they ſit not faſt, they will caſt them. But this young King ſeeing in himſelf the inclination of his fleſhly nature, minding not to give himſelf ſo much as he might take, but rather by reſiſtance to avoid the tentation thereof, The Godly Petition of K. Alfred. beſought God that he would ſend to him ſome continual ſickneſs, in quenching of that vice, whereby he might be more profitable to the publick buſineſs of the Commonwealth; and more apt to ſerve God in his calling. Ceſtren. lib. 5. cap. 1. Fab. cap. 17.

Then at Gods Ordinance he had the Evil called Ficus, till he came to the age of twenty years, whereof at length he was cured (as is ſaid in ſome Stories) by the Virgin called Modwen, an Iriſh woman. After this ſickneſs being Modwen. taken away, to him fell another, which continued with him from the twentieth year of his age to forty and five (according to his own Petition and requeſt made unto God) whereby he was the more reclaimed and attempered from the other more great inconveniencies, and leſs diſpoſed to that which he did moſt abhor.

King Alfred how he divided his Goods in two parts. Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 1. Guliel. lib de Regibus.

Moreover, to behold the bountiful goodneſs joyned with like prudence in this man, in the ordering and diſpoſing his riches and rents, it is not unworthily to be recited, how he divided his goods in two equal parts; the one appertaining to uſes ſecular, the other to uſes ſpiritual or Eccleſiaſtical. Of the which two principal parts, the firſt he divided into three portions, the firſt to the behoof of his The liberal heart of K. Alfred. houſe and family; the ſecond upon the workmen and builders of his new works, whereof he had great delight and cunning; the third upon ſtrangers. Likewiſe the other ſecond half upon Spiritual uſes, he did thus divide in four portions, one to the relieving of the poor, another to the Monaſteries, the third portion to the Schools of Oxford, for the maintaining of good Letters; the fourth he ſent to foreign Churches without the Realm. This alſo is left in Stories written to his commendation for his great tolerance and ſufferance, that when he had builded the new Monaſtery at Wincheſter, and afterward his Son Edward had purchaſed of the Biſhop and the Chapter a ſufficient piece of ground for certain Offices to be adjoyned unto the ſame, and had given for every foot of ground, Marcam auri pleni ponderis, (which was as I think a mark of Gold, or more) yet Alfred therewith was not greatly diſcontented to ſee his Coffers ſo waſted.

Over and beſides, how ſparing and frugal he was of time, (as of a thing in this Earth moſt precious) and how far from all vain paſtims and idleneſs he was, this doth well declare, which in the ſtory of William de Reg. and other Writers is told of him. That he ſo divided the day and night in three parts, if he were not let by wars and other great buſineſs, that eight hours he ſpent in ſtudy and learning, and other eight hours he ſpent in prayer and almeſdeeds, and other eight hours he ſpent in his natural reſt, ſuſtenance of his body, and the needs of the Realm. The which order he kept duly by the burning of waxen Tapers kept in his Cloſet by certain perſons for the ſame purpoſe. Guliel.

How well and godly this King ſpent his time.

The Godly Laws of K. Alfred.

How ſtudious he was and careful of the Commonwealth, and maintenance of publick tranquillity, his Laws moſt godly ſet forth and deviſed by him may declare.

A notable example of thievery and felony baniſhed this Realm.

Wherein eſpecially by him was provided for the extirpating and aboliſhing of all theft and thieves out of the Realm. Whereby the Realm through his vigilant care was brought into ſuch tranquillity, or rather perfection, that in every croſs or turning way he made to be ſet up a golden Brouch, at leaſt of ſilver gilded, through his Dominions, and none ſo hardy neither by day nor night to take it down; for the more credit whereof the words of the Latin ſtory be theſe, Armillas aureas juberet ſuſpendi, quæ viantium aviditatem irritarent, dum non eſſent qui eas abriperent, &c. Guliel. lib. de regibus Angl. And no great marvel therein, if the Realm in thoſe days was brought into ſuch an order, and that juſtice then was ſo well miniſtred, when the King himſelf was ſo vigilant in overſeeing the doings of his Judges and Officers. Whereof thus alſo we read in the ſaid Author teſtified: Judiciorum a ſuis hominibus factorum inquiſitor perperam actorum aſperrimus corrector. i.e. He was (ſaith mine Author, ſpeaking of the King) a vigilant inquiſitor of the doings of his Judges, and a ſtrict puniſher of their miſdoings. Jornalenſis alſo writing upon the ſame, thus ſaith, Facta miniſtrorum ſuorum & potiſſime judicum diligenter inveſtigavit, adeo ut quos ex avaritia aut imperitia errare cognoſceret, ab officio removebat: that is, He did diligently ſearch out the doings of his Officers, and eſpecially of his Judges, ſo that if he knew any of them to err either through covetouſneſs or unskilfulneſs, them he removed from their office.

Ex Hiſtoria Jornalenſi.

And thus much concerning the valiant acts and noble vertues of this worthy Prince; whereunto although there were no other ornaments adjoyning beſides, yet ſufficient were they alone to ſet forth a Prince worthy excellent commendation. Now beſides theſe other qualities and gifts of Gods grace in him above mentioned, remaineth another part of his no little praiſe and commendation, which is his learning and knowledg of good letters, whereof he not only was excellently expert himſelf, but alſo a worthy maintainer of the ſame through all his Dominions; where before no uſe of Grammar or other Sciences was practiſed in this Realm, eſpecially about the Weſt parts of the land, were through the induſtry of the King, Schools began to be erected, and ſtudies to flouriſh. Although among the Britains, in the Town of Cheſter in Southwales, long before that in King Arthurs time, as Galfridus writeth, both Grammar and Philoſophy, with other Tongues was then taught. After that ſome other Writers record that in the time of Egbert King of Kent, this Iland began to flouriſh with Philoſophy. About which time ſome alſo think that the Univerſity of Grantcheſter, near to that which now is called Cambridg, began to be founded by Beda, following this conjecture therein, for that Alcuinus (before mentioned) which after went to Rome, and from thence to France, in the time of Charles the Great, where he firſt began the Univerſity of Paris, was firſt trained up in the exerciſe of ſtudies at the ſame School of Grantcheſter. Beda lib. III. cap. 18. Writing alſo of Sigebert King of Eaſtangles, declareth how the ſaid Sigebert returning out of France into England (according to the examples which he did there ſee) ordered and diſpoſed Schools of Learning through the means of Felix then Biſhop, and placed in them Maſters and Teachers, after the uſe and manner of the Cantuarits. And yet before theſe times, moreover it is thought that there were two Schools or Univerſities within the Realm, the one Greek at the Town of Greglade, which afterward was called Kirkelade; the other for Latin, which place was then called Latinlade, afterward Lethelade near to Oxford.

King Alfred commended for Learning.

But howſoever it chanced that the knowledg and ſtudy of good Letters being once planted in this Realm, afterward went to decay; yet King Alfred deſerveth no little praiſe, for reſtoring or rather increaſing the ſame. After whoſe time they have ever ſince continued, albeit not continually through every age in like perfection. But this we may ſee, what it is to have a Prince learned himſelf, who feeling and taſting the price and value of Science and knowledg, is thereby not only the more apt to rule, but alſo to inſtruct and frame his ſubjects, from a rude barbarity, to a more civil congruency of life, and to a better underſtanding of things, as we ſee in this famous Prince to happen. Concerning whoſe firſt education and bringing up, although it was ſomewhat late before he entered any Letter, yet ſuch was the apt towardneſs and docility of his nature, that being a child, he had the Saxon Poems (ſuch as were uſed then in his own tongue) by heart and memory. Who afterwards with years and time grew up in ſuch perfection of learning and knowledg, in ſo much that (as mine Author ſaith) Nullus Anglorum fuerit vel intelligendo acutior, vel interpretando elegantior. The which thing in him the more was to be marvelled, for that he was twelve years of age before he knew any Letter. Then his Mother, careful and tender over him, having by chance a Book in her hand, which he would fain have, promiſed to give him the ſame, ſo that he would learn it. Whereupon he for greedineſs of the Book, eſtſoons learned the Letters, having to his School-maſter Pleimundus, after Biſhop of Canterbury. And ſo daily grew he more and more in knowledg, that at length, as mine Author ſaith, Plurimam partem Romanæ Bibliothecæ Anglorum auribus dedit, optimam prædam peregrinarum mercium civium uſibus convertens: that is, A great part of the Latin Library he tranſlated into Engliſh, converting to the uſes of his Citizens a notable prey of foreign ware and Merchandize, &c. Of which Books by him and through him tranſlated, was Oroſius, Paſtorale Gregorii, the Hiſtory of Beda, Boetius de conſolatione Philoſophiæ. Alſo a Book of his own making, and in his own tongue, which in the Engliſh ſpeech he called, A Hand-book; in Greek called it, Enchiridion, in Latin, A Manual. Beſides the Hiſtory of Beda tranſlated into the Saxons Tongue, he alſo himſelf compiled a ſtory in the ſame Speech, called, The Story of Alfred, &c. which both Books in the Saxons Tongue I have ſeen, though the Language I do not underſtand. And as he was learned himſelf excellently well, ſo likewiſe did he inflame all his Countrymen to the love of Liberal Letters, as the words of the Story reporteth, Illos præmiis, hos minis hortando, neminem illiteratum ad quamlibet curiæ dignitatem aſpirare permittens: that is, He exhorted and ſtirred his people to the ſtudy of Learning, ſome with gifts, ſome by threats, ſuffering no man to aſpire to any dignity in the Court except he were learned. Moreover another Story thus ſaith, ſpeaking of his Nobles, Optimates quoque ſuos ad literaturam addiſcendam in tantum provocavit, ut ſibi filios ſuos, vel ſaltem ſi filios non haberent, ſervos ſuos, liberis commendarent: that is, Alſo his Nobles ſo much he did allure to the imbracing of good Letters, that they ſet all their Sons to School; or if they had no Sons, yet their ſervants they cauſed to be learned. Whereby the common Proverb may be found not ſo common as true, Such as is the Prince, ſuch be the ſubjects. He began moreover to tranſlate the Pſalter in Engliſh, and had almoſt finiſhed the ſame, had not death prevented him. Guliel. de Regib. Angl. In the Prologue of the Book, Intituled, Paſtorale Grego. thus he writeth, declaring the cauſe why he was ſo earneſt and diligent in tranſlating good Books from Latin into Engliſh, ſhewing the cauſe thereof why he ſo did, as followeth: Quod Eccleſiæ in quibus innumeræ priſcæ Bibliothecæ continebantur, cum libris a Danis incenſæ ſint: quodque in tota inſula ſtudium literarum ita abolitum eſſet, ut quiſque minus timeret capitis periculum, quam ſtudiorum exercitia adire. Quapropter ſe in hoc Anglis ſuis conſulere, &c. that is, The cauſe was for that innumerable ancient Libraries which were kept in Churches, were conſumed with fire by the Danes; and that men had rather ſuffer peril of their life than to follow the exerciſes of ſtudies; and therefore he thought thereby to provide thereby for the people of the Engliſh Nation, &c.

The cauſe why the King turned Latin Books into Engliſh.

It is told of him both in Polychronicon, Malmesbury, Jornalenſis, and other ſtories more, whereof I have no names, that he ſeeing his Country (namely Weſtward) to be ſo ſo deſolate of Schools and Learning, partly to profit himſelf, partly to furniſh his Country and ſubjects with better knowledg, firſt ſent for Grimbaldus a learned Monk out of France to come into England. Alſo he ſent for another learned man out from the parts of Wales, whoſe name was Aſſerion, whom he made Biſhop of Shireborne. Item, out of Mercia he ſent for Werefrithus Biſhop of Worceſter, to whom he put the Dialogues of Gregory to be tranſlated. But chiefly he uſed the counſel of Neotus, who then was counted for an holy man, an Abbot of a certain Monaſtery in Cornwal. By the adviſement of which Neotus, he ſent for theſe learned men above recited; and alſo ordained certain Schools of divers Arts, firſt at Oxford, and alſo franchiſed the ſame with many great liberties. Guliel. Fornalenſ. Fab. c. 171. Whereof perhaps the School, now called the New Colledg (firſt then begun of this Neotus) might take his name; which afterward peradventure the Biſhops of Wincheſter after a larger manner did re-edifie and enlarge with greater poſſeſſions.

Moreover, among other learned men, which were about King Alfred, Hiſtories make mention of Joannes Scotus a godly Divine, and a learned Philoſopher) but not that Scotus whom now we call Duns. For that Johannes Scotus came after this many years. This Johannes is deſcribed to be of a ſharp wit, of great eloquence, and well expert in the Greek Tongue, pleaſant and merry of nature and conditions, as appeareth by divers his doings and anſwers. Firſt, he coming to France out of his own Country of Scotland, by reaſon of the great tumults of war, was there worthily entertained, and for his learning had in great eſtimation of Carolus Calvus the French King; whom he commonly uſed familiarly uſed ever to have about him, both at Table, and in Chamber. Upon a time the King ſitting at meat, and ſeeing ſomething (belike in this John Scot) which ſeemed not very Courtly, caſt forth a merry word, asking of him what difference there was betwixt a Scot and a Sot? Whereunto the Scot ſitting over againſt the King ſomewhat lower, replied again ſuddenly, rather than adviſedly (yet merrily) ſaying, Menſa tantum, that is, the Table only; importing thereby himſelf to be the Scot, and ſo calling the King a Sot by craft. Which word how other Princes would have taken of ſtomach, I know not; but this Charles, for the great reverence he bear to his learning, turned it but to a laughter among his Nobles, and ſo let it paſs.

Johannes Scotus.

The anſwer of Johannes Scotus to the French King.

Another time the ſame King being at dinner was ſerved with a certain diſh of Fiſh, wherein were two great fiſhes and a little one. After the King had taken thereof his repaſt, ſetteth down to Johannes Scotus the foreſaid Fiſh, to diſtribute unto the other two Clerks ſitting there with him, which were two tall and mighty perſons, he himſelf being but a little man. Johannes taketh the Fiſh of the which the two great he taketh and carveth to himſelf, the little Fiſh he reacheth to the other two. The King perceiving his diviſion thus made, reprehended the ſame. Then Johannes whoſe manner was ever to find out ſome honeſt matter to delight the King, anſwered to him again, proving his diviſion to ſtand juſt and equal: For here (ſaith he) be two great, and a little, pointing to the two great fiſhes and himſelf; and likewiſe here again is a little one and two great, pointing to the little fiſh, and two great perſons. I pray you (ſaith he) what odds is there, or what diſtribution can be more equal? Whereat the King with his Nobles being much delighted, laughed merrily.

At the requeſt of this Charles, Sirnamed Bald, the French King, this Scotus tranſlated the Book of Dionyſius, intituled, De Hierarchia, from Greek into Latin, word for word, Quo fit (as my Author ſaith) ut vix intelligatur Latina litera, quum nobilitate magis Græca, quam poſitione conſtruitur Latina. He wrote alſo a Book, De corpore & ſanguine Domini, which was afterward condemned by the Pope, in concilio Vercellenſi.

Johannes Scotus tranſlated Hierarchiam Dionyſii from Greek into Latin.

The Book of Johannes Scotus call'd Περὶ φυσικῶν. Johannes Scotus addicted more to the Greek Church than the Latin.

Johannes Scotus accuſed of the Pope for an Heretick.

The ſame Johannes Scotus moreover compiled a Book of his own, giving it a Greek Title, Περὶ φυσικῶν διαιρέσεων, that is, De naturæ diviſione. In which Book (as ſaith my foreſaid Author) is contained the reſolution of many profitable queſtions; but ſo that he is thought to follow the Greek Church rather than the Latin, and for the ſame was counted of ſome to be an Heretick; becauſe in that Book ſome things there be which in all points accord not with the Romiſh Religion. Wherefore the Pope writing to the ſaid King Charles of this Scotus, complaineth, as in his own words here followeth: Relatum eſt Apoſtolatui noſtro, quod opus Dionyſii Areopagitæ, quod de divinis nominibus, & de cæleſtibus ordinibus, Græco deſcripſit eloquio, quidam vir Joannes (genere Scotus) nuper tranſtulit in Latinum. Quod, juxta morem Eccleſiæ, nobis mitti, & noſtro judicio debuit approbari; præſertim quum idem Joannes (licet multæ ſcientiæ eſſe prædicetur) olim non ſane ſapere, in quibuſdam frequenti rumore dicatur, &c. That is, Relation hath been made unto our Apoſtleſhip, that a certain man called Johannes a Scotiſh man, hath tranſlated the Book of Dionyſius the Areopagit, of the names of God, and of the Heavenly Orders, from Greek into Latin. Which Book, according to the Cuſtom of the Church, ought firſt to have been approved by our judgment; namely, ſeeing the ſaid John (albeit he be ſaid to be a man of great learning and ſcience) in time paſt hath been noted by common rumor to have been a Man not of upright or ſound Doctrine, in certain points, &c. For this cauſe, the ſaid Scotus being conſtrained to remove from France, came into England, allured (as ſome teſtifie) by the Letters of Alured or Alfred, of whom he was with great favour entertained and converſant a great ſpace about the King; till at length (whether before or after the death of the King, it is uncertain) he went to Malmesbery, where he taught certain Scholars a few years; by the which Scholars at laſt moſt impiouſly he was murthered and ſlain with their Penknives, and ſo died, as Stories ſay, a Martyr, buried at the ſaid Monaſtery of Malmesbury with this Epitaph.

Johannes Scotus ſlain by his own Scholars.

John Scotus a Martyr.

King Alfred having theſe helps of learned men about him, and no leſs learned alſo himſelf, paſt over his time not only to great utility and profit of his ſubjects, but alſo to a rare and profitable example of other Chriſtian Kings and Princes for them to follow. This foreſaid Alfred had by his wife, called Ethelwitha, two Sons, Edward and Ethelward; and three Daughters, Elfleda, Ethelgora, and Ethelguida: Quas omnes liberalibus fecit artibus eruditi; that is, Whom he ſet all to their Books and ſtudy of Liberal Arts, as my Story teſtifieth. Firſt, Edward his Eldeſt Son ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; the ſecond Son Ethelward died before his Father: Ethelgora his middle Daughter was made a Nun, the other two were married, the one in Merceland, the other to the Earl of Flanders. Thus King Alfred the valiant, vertuous and learned Prince, after he had thus Chriſtianly governed the Realm the term of nine and twenty years, and ſix months, departed this life, 5 Cal. Novemb. and lyeth buried at Wincheſter, Anno Dom. 901. Of whom this I find moreover greatly noted and commended in Hiſtory, and not here to be forgotten, for the rare example thereof touching this Alfred, that whereſoever he was, or whitherſoever he went, he bear always about him in his boſom or pocket a little Book containing the Pſalms of David, and certain other Oriſons of his own collecting. Whereupon he was continually reading or praying whenſoever he was otherwiſe vacant, having leiſure thereunto. Finally, what were the vertues of this famous King, this little Table here under written, which is left in ancient writing in the remembrance of his worthy and memorable life, doth ſufficiently in few lines contain.

Moreover in the Hiſtory of Henricus Huntingtonenſis theſe Verſes I find written in the commendation of the ſame Alfred made (as I ſuppoſe, and by his words appeareth) by the ſaid Author, whereof I thought not to defraud the Reader, the words whereof here follow:

Etheredus, Pleimundus, Athelmus, Vifelmus, Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

In the ſtory of this Alfred, a little above mention was made of Pleimundus Schoolmaſter to the ſaid Alfred, and alſo Biſhop of Canterbury, ſucceeding Etheredus there Biſhop before him. Which Pleimundus governed that See the number of thirty and four years. After Pleimundus ſucceeded Athelmus, and ſat twelve years. After him came Ulfelmus thirteen years. Then followed Odo a Dane born in the ſaid See of Canterbury, and governed the ſame twenty years, being in great favour with King Ethelſtan, King Edmund, and Edwin, as in proceſs hereafter (Chriſt willing) as place and order doth require, ſhall more at large be expreſſed.

Nine Popes in nine years at Rome.

Formoſus firſt Pope.

Ex Chronico Sigeberti.

As touching the courſe and proceedings of the Romiſh Biſhops there, where I laſt entred mention of them, I ended with Pope Stephan the fifth. After his time was much broil in the Election of the Biſhops of Rome, one contending againſt another; inſomuch that within the ſpace of nine years, were nine Biſhops. Of the which, firſt was Formoſus, who ſucceeded next unto the forenamed Stephan the fifth, being made Pope againſt the mind of certain in Rome, that would rather Sergius, than Deacon of the Church of Rome to have been Pope. Notwithſtanding Mars and Money prevailed on Formoſus part. This Formoſus, of whom partly alſo is mentioned in other places of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, being before Biſhop of Pontiniake, had in times paſt (I know not on what cauſes) offended Pope John the eighth of that name, by reaſon whereof, for fear of the Pope, he voided away, and left his Biſhoprick. And becauſe he being ſent for again by the Pope, would not return, therefore was he Excommunicated. At length coming into France to make there his ſatisfaction unto the Pope, he was degraded from a Biſhop into a ſecular mans habit, ſwearing to the Pope that he would no more re-enter into the City of Rome, nor claim his Biſhoprick again, ſubſcribing moreover with his own hand to continue from that time in the ſtate of a ſecular perſon. But then Pope Martin (the next Pope after John) releaſed the ſaid Formoſus of his Oath, and reſtored him again unto his Biſhoprick; whereby Formoſus entred not only into Rome again, but alſo obtained ſhortly after the Papacy. Thus he being placed in the Popedom, aroſe a great doubt or controverſie among the Divines of his Conſecration, whether it was lawful or not; ſome holding againſt him, that forſomuch as he was ſolemnly depoſed, degraded, unprieſted, and alſo ſworn not to reiterate the State Eccleſiaſtical, therefore he ought to be taken no otherwiſe than for a ſecular man. Others alledged again, that whatſoever Formoſus was, yet for the dignity of that Order, and for the credit of them whom he ordered, all his Conſecration ought to ſtand in force, eſpecially ſeeing the ſaid Formoſus was afterward received and abſolved by Pope Martin from that his perjury and degradation, &c. In the mean time (as witneſſeth Sigebertus) this Formoſus ſendeth for King Arnulphus for aid againſt his adverſaries; who then marching toward Rome, was there reſiſted by the Romans from entring. But in the ſiege (ſaith the Author) the Romans within ſo plaid the Lions, that a poor Hare (or ſuch a like thing) coming toward the City, the Hoſt of Arnulphus followed after with ſuch a main cry, that the valiant Romans upon the walls for very fear (where there was no hurt) caſt themſelves deſperately over the walls, ſo that Arnulphus with little labour ſcaled the walls, and got the City. Thus Arnulphus obtaining the City of Rome, reſcueth Pope Formoſus, and beheadeth his adverſaries; whom the Pope to gratifie with like recompence again, bleſſeth and Crowneth him for Emperor. Thus Formoſus ſitting faſt about the ſpace of four or five years, followed his Predeceſſors; after whoſe time (as I ſaid) within the ſpace of nine years were nine Biſhops, as followeth. But in the mean time, concerning the ſtory of this Formoſus declared by Sigebert, and many other Chronicles; this thing would I gladly ask, and more gladly learn of ſome indifferent good Catholick perſon, which not of obſtinacy, but of ſimple error being a Papiſt, would anſwer his conſcience; Whether doth he think the holy Order of Prieſthood, which he taketh for one of the ſaven Sacraments, to be Character indelebilis, or not? If it be not indelebilis, that is, If it be ſuch a thing as may be put off, why then doth the Popes Doctrine ſo call and ſo hold the contrary, pretending it to be Indelebilis, unremoveable? If it be indeed ſo as they teach and affirm, Indelebilis character, why then did Pope John, or could Pope John annihilate and evacuate one of his ſeven Pope-holy-Sacraments, making of a Prieſt, a non-Prieſt, or layman, uncharactering his own Order, which is (as he ſaith) a Character, which in no wiſe may be blotted out, or removed? Again, howſoever Pope John is to be judged in this matter to do either well or not well; this would I know, if he did well in ſo diſprieſting and diſcharactering Formoſus for ſuch private offences? If yea, how then ſtandeth his doing with his own Doctrine which teacheth the contrary? If he did not well, how then ſtandeth his Doctrine with his doings to be true, which teacheth that the Pope with his Synod of Cardinals cannot err? Moreover, if this Pope John did not err in his diſordering Formoſus, how then did Martinus his Succeſſor not err in repealing the ſaid doing of his Predeceſſor? or how did not Pope Formoſus err himſelf, who being unprieſted by Pope John afterward, without reiterating the character or order of Prieſthood, took upon him to be Pope, and made Acts and Laws in the Church? Again, if Formoſus now Pope did not err, how then did Pope Stephan his Succeſſor afterward not err, who did annihilate the Conſecration, and all other Acts of the ſaid Formoſus as erroneous? Or again, if we ſay that this Stephan with his Synod of Cardinals did right, then how could it be that Pope Theodore, and Pope John the tenth, which came after the foreſaid Stephan, did not plainly err, who approving the Conſecration of Formoſus, did condemn and burn the Acts Synodal of Stephan and his Cardinals, which before had condemned Formoſus, according as in ſtory here conſequently may appear?

Character indelebilis.

Whether the Pope with his Cardinals may err.

Bonifacius the ſixth Pope.

Stephan the ſixth Pope.

Ex Chron. Martini pœnitentiarii. Sigeberti. Ex Polych. & aliis.

After Formoſus had governed the See of Rome five years, ſucceeded firſt Bonifacius the ſixth, who continued but five and twenty days. Then came Stephan the ſixth, which ſo envied the name of his Predeceſſor Formoſus, that he abrogated and diſſolved his Decrees, and taking up his body after it was buried, cut two fingers off his right hand, and commanded them to be caſt into Tiber, and then buried the body in a private or lay-mans Sepulchre.

Thus after Stephan had ſat in the Chair of Peſtilence one year, ſucceeded in the ſame Chair Pope Romanus, and ſat three months, repealing the Acts decreed by Stephan his Predeceſſor againſt Formoſus. Next to whom came Theodorus the ſecond, who likewiſe taking part with Formoſus againſt the foreſaid Stephan, reigned but twenty days. Then ſat Pope John the tenth, who did fight and repugn againſt the Romans, and to confirm the cauſe of Formoſus more ſurely, did hold a Synod at Ravenna of 74 Biſhops, with the French King Endo, and his Arch-Biſhops being preſent at the ſame. At the which Council were ratified all the Decrees and doings of Formoſus, and the contrary Acts of the Synod of Stephan the ſixth were burned. This Pope lived not Pope fully two years, years, after whom ſucceeded Benedictus the fourth, who kept the Chair three years. After whom Leo the firſt was next Pope, who within forty days of his Papacy, was with ſtrong hand taken and caſt in Priſon by one Chriſtopher, his own houſhold Chaplain, whom he had long nouriſhed before in his houſe. Which thing (ſaith Platina) could not be done without great conſpiracy and much ſlaughter of men. Which Chriſtopher, being Pope about the ſpace of ſeven Months, was likewiſe himſelf hoyſted from his Papal Throne by Sergius, like as he had done to his Maſter before. And thus within the ſpace of nine years had been nine Popes one after another. Then Sergius after he had thruſt down Pope Chriſtopher, and ſhorn him Monk into a Monaſtery, occupied the room ſeven years. This Sergius a rude man and unlearned, very proud and cruel, had before been put back from the Popedom by Formoſus above mentioned. By reaſon whereof, to revenge Formoſus again being now in his Papacy, he cauſed the body of Formoſus where it was buried, to be taken up; and afterward, ſitting in the Papal See (as in his Pontificalibus) firſt degraded him, then commanded his Head to be ſmitten off, with the other three fingers that were left (as Sigebertus writeth) which done, he made his body to be thrown into Tiber, depoſing likewiſe all ſuch as by the ſaid Formoſus before had been conſecrated and inveſted. This body of Formoſus, thus thrown into Tiber, was afterward (as our Writers ſay) found and taken up by certain Fiſhers, and ſo brought into St. Peter's Temple. At the preſence whereof (as they ſay) certain Images there ſtanding by, bowed down themſelves, and reverenced the ſame, with lie and all. But ſuch deceivable Miracles of Stocks and Images, in Monkiſh and Friery Temples, be to us no news, eſpecially here in England, where we have been ſo inured with the like and ſo many, that ſuch wily practices cannot be to us invitible, though this Crown-ſhorn generation think themſelves to dance in a Net. But the truth is, while they think to deceive the ſimple, theſe wily beguilers moſt of all deceive themſelves, as they will find, except they repent. By this Pope Sergius firſt came up the uſe to bear about Candles on Candlemas day, for the purifying of the Bleſſed Virgin; as though the Sacred Conception of Jeſus the Son of God, were to be purified as a thing impure, and that with Candle light.

After Sergius entred Pope Anaſtaſius, in whoſe time the body of Formoſus aforenamed, is thought to be found of Fiſhermen in the River of Tiber, and ſo brought (as is ſaid) into the Temple to be ſaluted of the Images; which thing may quickly be tainted as a lie. For how is it to be thought, that the body of Formoſus ſo long dead before, and now lying ſeven years in the River, could remain whole all that while, that Fiſhers might take it up, and diſcern it to be the ſame? After Anaſtaſius had ſate two years, followed Pope Lando, the father (as ſome ſtories think) of Pope John, which John is ſaid to be the Paramour of Theodora, a famous Harlot of Rome, and ſet up of the ſame Harlot, either againſt Lando, or after Lando his father to ſucceed in his room. There is a Story-writer called Luithprandus, who writing De Imperatorib. l. 2. cap. 13. maketh there mention of this Theodora and Pope John the Eleventh, and ſaith moreover, that this Theodora had a Daughter named Marozia, which Marozia had by Pope Sergius above mentioned, a Son which afterward was Pope John the twelfth. The ſame Marozia afterwards chanced to marry with Guido Marqueſs of Tuſcia, through the means of which Guido and his friends at Rome, ſhe brought to paſs that this Pope John the Eleventh was ſmothered with a Pillow laid to his mouth, after he had reigned thirteen years, and ſo the foreſaid John the twelfth her ſon that might ſucceed next after him. But becauſe the Clergy and People of Rome did not agree to his Election, therefore was Pope Leo the ſixth in his place ſet up. Thus Pope John the Son of Sergius, and Marozia being dejected, reigned Pope Leo ſeven months. After him Pope Stephan two years, who being poyſoned, then was Pope John the twelfth above rehearſed, the ſon of Sergius and Marozia ſet up again in the Papacy, where he reigned near the ſpace of five years. Of the wickedneſs of this Strumpet Marozia, how ſhe married two brethren, one after the death of the other, and how ſhe governed all Rome, and the whole Church at that time I let it paſs. Although the Latine Verſes wherewith the ſaid Luithprandus doth invey againſt ſuch Women as marry two brethren, were neither worthy here to be recited, and perhaps might be further applied than to that Marozia of Rome; but for ſhortneſs I let them alſo paſs. After John the twelfth, followed Pope Stephan three years, Pope Leo three years and four months. Pope Stephan the eighth three years and four months. Pope Martin three years and ſix months; after him Pope Agapetus eight years and ſix months. About whoſe time, or a little before, began firſt the Order of Monks, called Ordo Cluniacenſis, &c. But now to leave off theſe monſtrous matters of Rome, and to return again to our Country of England, where we laſt left before.

Luithprandus Ticinen. Pope Stephan the 7th. Pope Leo the ſeventh. Pope Stephan the 8th. Pope Martin the 3d. Pope Agapetus the 2d. Ordo Cluniacenſis beginneth.

King Edward the elder.

King Edward the Elder.

AFter the Reign of the famous King Alfred, his Son Edward ſucceeded, ſirnamed the Elder: where firſt is to be noted, that before the Conqueſt of the Normans, there was in England three Edwards; firſt, this Edward the Elder; ſecondly, Edward the Martyr; thirdly, Edward the Confeſſor; whereof hereafter (by the grace of Chriſt) ſhall follow in order as place ſhall give to be declared. This Edward began his Reign the year of our Lord 901. and governed the Land right valiantly and nobly four and twenty years. In knowledge of good letters and learning he was not to be compared to his Father, otherwiſe in Princely Renown, in Civil Government, and ſuch like Marrial Proweſs, he was nothing inferiour, but rather excelled him; through whoſe valiant acts firſt the Princedom of Wales and Kingdom of Scotland, with Conſtantine King thereof, were to him ſubdued. He adjoyned moreover to his dominion, the Country of Eaſtanglia, that is, of Norfolk, Suffolk and Eſſex. All Merceland alſo he recovered, and Northumberland out of the hands of the Danes. In all his Wars he never lightly went without Victory. The Subjects of his Provinces and Dominions were ſo inured and hardened in continual practice and feats of War, that when they heard of any enemies coming (never tarrying for any bidding from the King or from his Dukes) ſtraightways they encountred with them, both in number and knowledge of the order of War excelling always their adverſaries. Guliel. de regi. Ita hoſtes militibus contemptui, regi riſui erant; to mean, So was the coming and aſſaulting of their enemies, to the people and common ſouldiers but a trifle, to the King but a ridicle. Among other adverſaries which were buſie rather than wiſe, in aſſailing this King, was one called Clito Ethelwoldus a young man, King Edwards Uncles ſon, who firſt occupying the Town of Winborn (taking thence a Nun with him, whom then he had married) fled by night to Northumberland, to adjoyn himſelf unto the Danes, who was made chief King and Captain over them. Then chaſed from thence, he fled over into France, but ſhortly returning again into England, he landed in Eaſtengland, where the ſaid Clito with a company of Danes of that Country gathered to him, deſtroyed and pilled much of the Country about Crekinford and Crikeland. And ſo paſſing over Thames, after he had ſpoiled the Land there to Bradenſtock, returned again to Norfolk and Suffolk, where he meeting with an ambuſhment of Kentiſh men, which dragged and tarried after the main Hoſt of Edward, contrary to his commandment, incloſed them in, and ſlew the moſt part of them. Soon after, the two Hoſts meeting together, between the two Ditches of S. Edmunds land, after a long fight, Clito with many of the Danes were ſlain, and the remnant were conſtrained to ſeek for peace, which upon certain conditions, and under a Tribute was to them granted.

In proceſs about the twelfth year of his Reign, the Danes repenting them of their Covenants, and minding to break the ſame, aſſembled an Hoſt, and met with the King in Staffordſhire, at a place called Totenhall, and ſoon after at Wodenfield, at which two places, the King ſlew two Kings, two Earls, and many thouſands of Danes that occupied the Country of Northumberland.

Thus the importunate rage of the Danes being aſſwaged, King Edward having now ſome leiſure given from Wars to other ſtudies, gave his mind to the building or repairing of Cities, Towns and Caſtles, that by the Danes were raced, ſhattered and broken. As firſt of Cheſter, which City he double enlarged to that it was before, compaſſing the Caſtle within the Walls of the ſame, which before ſtood without. That done, the King builded a ſtrong Caſtle at Hereford, in the edge of Wales. Alſo for the ſtrengthning of the Country, he made a Caſtle at the mouth of the water of Aven, and another Caſtle at Buckingham, and the third faſt thereby upon the River of Ouſe. Moreover, he builded or re-edified the Towns of Toceſter and Wigmor, and deſtroyed the Caſtle that the Danes had made at Demesford. Likewiſe upon the River of Trent, againſt the old Town of Notingham, he builded a new Town on the South ſide, and made a Bridge over the River between the ſaid two Towns. Alſo by the River of Merce he builded a City or Town in the North end of Mercia, and named it Thilwal, and after repaired the City of Mancheſter, that ſore was defaced with Wars of the Danes.

Cheſter repaired and enlarged. The Caſtle of Hereford builded upon the River of Aven and Ouſe. The Towns of Tocheſter and Wigmor builded. The new Town of Notingham builded. Thilwal. Mancheſter repaired.

In this renewing and building of Towns and Caſtles, for the more fortifying of his Realm, his Siſter Elfleda, daughter of King Alfred, and married to the Duke of Mercia (as is afore mentioned) was no ſmall helper. Of this Elfleda, it is firmly of Writers affirmed, that ſhe being (as is ſaid) married to Ethelred, Duke of Mercia, after ſhe had once aſſaied the pains of Women in travelling with her child, ſo much ſhe abhorred ever after the embracing of her Husband, that it ſeemed to her (ſhe ſaid) not ſeemly for a Noble Woman to uſe ſuch fleſhly liking, whereof ſo great ſorrow and travel ſhould enſue. And yet notwithſtanding, the ſame Elfleda for all her delicate tenderneſs, in eſchewing the natural paſſion which neceſſity giveth to Women, was ſo hardy in Warlike dangers which nature giveth not to Women, that fighting againſt the Danes (ſo venturous ſhe was of ſtomach) four of her next Knights, which were guardians of her body, were ſlain faſt by her. This Elfleda, among her other noble acts, whereby ſhe deſerved praiſe, was a great helper and ſtirrer up of her brother Edward, who builded and newly repaired many Caſtles and Towns, as Tamworth beſides Lichfield, Stafford, Warwick, Shrewsbury, Watrisbury, Eldsbury, beſides Cheſter in the Foreſt now deſtroyed. Alſo in the North end of Mercia, upon the River of Merce, a Caſtle called Rimcorn; alſo a Bridge over Severn, named Brimmisbury Bridge.

Thilwal. Mancheſter repaired.

The laws of King Alfred and K. Edward.

As touching the Laws and Statutes of this Edward, as alſo of his father Alfred, made before him, I omit here to record them for length of matter and waſte of time: yet notwithſtanding this admonition, by the way I think good to note, that in thoſe days of theſe ancient Kings reigning in England, the authority then both of conferring Biſhopricks and ſpiritual Promotions, and alſo of preſcribing Laws as well to the Churchmen, as to the Laity, and of ordering and intermedling in matters meerly ſpiritual, was then in the hands of Kings ruling in the Land, and not only in the hand of the Pope, as appeareth by theſe Laws of Alfred.

Si quis fornicetur cum uxore aliena, &c.

Si quis in quadrageſima ſanctum velum in publico vel in lecto, &c.

Ut Chriſtiani Deum diligant & paganiſmo renuncient, &c.

Si quis Chriſtianitatem mutet, &c.

Si quis ordinatus ſacris furetur, &c.

Si Presbyter ad rectum terminum ſanctum chriſma, &c.

Si duo fratres vel cognati cum una aliqua fornicentur, &c.

Note how Kings of England in times paſt had authority in ſpiritual cauſes.

By theſe and other ſuch like Conſtitutions of King Alfred it may appear, how the governance and direction of the Church in thoſe days depended not upon Monſieur le Pope of Rome, but upon the King which here in their time (under the Lord) did govern the Land. To this alſo the example of King Edwards time gives teſtimony; which Edward with Pleimundus (above mentioned) Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and with other Biſhops in a Synod aſſembled, aſſigned and elected ſeven Biſhops in ſeven Metropolitan Churches of the Realm. Which were, the firſt Fridelſtan, the ſecond Adelſtan, the third Werſtan, the fourth Adeleme, the fifth Edulfus, the ſixth Dernegus, the ſeventh Kenulphus; in which Election, the Kings Authority ſeemed then alone to be ſufficient, &c.

This Edward (as in the beginning was ſaid) reigned 24 years, who had three Wives, Egwin, Elfled and Ethelwid. Of Egwin he had his eldeſt Son, Adelſtan, who next ſucceeded in the Kingdom, and a Daughter, married after to the Duke of Northumberland. Of Elfled he received two Sons and ſix Daughters, to wit, Ethelwald and Edwin. Ethelwald was excellently well ſeen in all knowledge of learning, much reſembling both in countenance and conditions his Grandfather Alfred, and died ſoon after his father. Of his ſix Daughters, two of them, Elfled and Ethelhida were made Nuns, the other four were married, Edgina to Charles the French King in his Fathers time, Ethilda, by King Ethelſtan was married to Hugo the Son of Duke Robert. Edgitha and Algina, were both ſent to Henricus, Prince of Almains. Of which two ſiſters, the ſecond, the ſaid Henricus married to his Son Otho, who was the firſt Emperor of the Almains. The other ſiſter, which was Edgitha, the foreſaid Henricus married unto a certain Duke, about the border of the Alps in Italy. Of his third Wife Ethelwid, he received two Sons, Edmund and Edred, which both reigned after Adelſtan, and two Daughters, Egburga, whom he made a Nun, and Eadguina, who was married unto Ludovicus, Prince of Aquitania in France. Theſe Sons and Daughters King Edward thus brought up; his Daughters he ſet to ſpinning, and to the Needle: Guliel. de reg. his Sons he ſet to the ſtudy of learning, Ut quaſi Philoſophi ad gubernandam rempublicam non jam rudes procederent: that is, To the end, that they, being at firſt made Philoſophers, ſhould be the more expert thereby to govern the Commonwealth.

King Ethelſtan, or Adelſtan.

King Ethelſtan, or Adelſtan.

Ethelſtan or Adelſtan, after the death of Edward his Father, began his Rein in England, and was crowned at Kingſton. He was a Prince of worthy memory, valiant and wiſe in all his acts, nothing inferiour unto his Father Edward. In like worldly renown of Civil Government, joyned with much proſperous ſucceſs, in reducing this Realm under the ſubjection of one Monarchy. For he both expelled the Danes, ſubdued the Scots, and quieted the Welſhmen, as well in Northwales, as alſo in Cornwal. The firſt enemy againſt this Ethelſtan, was one Elfredus, who, with a faction of ſeditious perſons, conſpiring againſt the ſaid Ethelſtan at Wincheſter, incontinently after the death of his Father, went about to put out his eyes. Notwithſtanding, the King eſcaping that danger, through the help of God, was at that time delivered. Elfred upon the ſame being accuſed, fled to Rome, there before the Pope to purge himſelf by his Oath. Who being brought to the Church of St. Peter, and there ſwearing (or rather forſwearing) himſelf to be clear, which indeed was guilty thereof, ſuddenly upon his Oath fell down, and ſo being brought to the Engliſh houſe in Rome, within three days after departed. The Pope ſending word unto King Ethelſtan, whether he would have the ſaid Elfred buried among Chriſtians or no? at length, through the perſwaſions of his friends and kinſfolks, it was concluded that he ſhould be buried in Chriſtian Burial. This ſtory, although I find it in no other Writers mentioned, but only in the Chronicles of Guliel. lib. de regib. yet for ſo much as it beareth the witneſs and words of the King himſelf, as teſtified in an old deed of gift, given to the Monaſtery of Malmesbury, I thought the ſame the more to be of credit. The words of the King proceed in this tenor as followeth.

{Anno 927.} In the ſecond year of the Reign of King Ethelſtan, for an unity and peace to be had between the King and the Danes of Northumberland, he married to Sithericus their King, his ſiſter, whereof mention is made before; but ſhortly after, within one year, this Sithericus died. After whoſe death, King Ethelſtan ſeized that Province into his own hands, putting out the ſon of the foreſaid Sithericus, called Alanus, who with his brother Godfridus fled, the one into Ireland, the other unto Conſtantine, King of the Scots. And when he had thus accorded with the Danes of Northumberland, he ſhortly made ſubject unto him Conſtantine King of the Scots. But the ſaid Conſtantine meeked himſelf ſo lowly to the King, that he reſtored him to his former Dignity, ſaying, that it was more honour to make a King, than to be a King.

Northumberland ſubdued to King Ethelſtan.

The Scots ſubdued to the King of England. It is more honour to make a King than to be a King.

Not long after, the ſaid Conſtantine, King of Scots did break Covenant with King Ethelſtan; wherefore he aſſembled his Knights, and made towards Scotland, where he ſubduing his enemies, and bringing them again unto due ſubjection, returned into England with Victory. Here by the way, in ſome Story-writers (who, forgetting the office of Hiſtoricians, ſeem to play the Poets) is written and recorded for a marvel, that the ſaid Ethelſtan, returning out of Scotland into England, came to York, and ſo into the Church of Saint John of Beverly, to redeem his Knife, which before he had left there for a Pledge at his going forth. In the which place he praying to God, and to St. John of Beverly, that he might leave there ſome remembrance whereby they that came after might know that the Scots by right ſhould be ſubdued to the Engliſh men, ſmote with a Sword (they ſay) upon a great hard ſtone ſtanding near about the Caſtle of Dunbar, that with the ſtroke thereof the ſtone was cut a large Ell deep, with a lie no leſs deep alſo than was the ſtroke in the ſtone. But of this poetical or fabulous ſtory, albeit Polychronicon, Fabian, Fornalenſis, and others more conſtantly accord in the ſame, yet in Gulielm. and Henricus no mention is made at all. But peradventure, he that was the inventor firſt of this tale of the ſtone, was diſpoſed to lie for the Whetſtone; wherefore in my mind he is worthy to have it.

A fabulous Miracle falſly reported of King Ethelſtan.

Of like truth and credit ſeemeth alſo to be this that followeth, about the ſame year and time under the Reign of King Ethelſtan, being the eighth year of his Reign of one Briſtanus Biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſucceeded Frichſtanus in the ſame See, and governed that Biſhoprick four years. This Briſtanus being a devout Biſhop in prayer and contemplation, uſed much among his ſolitary walks, to frequent late the Church-yard, praying for the ſouls there, and all Chriſtian ſouls departed. Upon a time the ſaid Briſtanus after his wonted manner proceeding in his devotions, when he had done, came to Requieſcant in pace. Whereunto ſuddenly a great multitude of ſouls anſwering together with one voice, ſaid Amen. Of this Miracle albeit I have not much to ſay (haſting to other matters) yet this queſtion would I ask of ſome indifferent Papiſt, which were not wilful, but of ignorance deceived; Whether this multitude which here anſwered, Amen, were the ſouls of them buried in the Church-yard or not? If yea, then how were they in Purgatory, what time they were heard in that place anſwering Amen? Except we ſhould think Purgatory to be in the Church-yard at Wincheſter, where the ſouls were heard then ſo many anſwering and praying, Amen. And yet this ſtory is teſtified by the accord of Writers of that time, Guliel. Polychron. Hovedenus, Fornalenſis, and others more. Much like Miracles and Propheſies alſo we read of Elphegus which ſucceeded him; but becauſe we haſte to other things, let theſe Fables paſs.

{Anno 933.}

Briſtanus Biſhop.

A ridiculous Miracle forged upon Briſtanus Biſhop of Wincheſter.

A Miracle of ſouls anſwering Amen.

Ye heard a little before, how King Ethelſtan after the death of Sithericus King of Northumberland, ſeized that Land or Province into his own hand, and put out his ſon Alanus, who after flying into Scotland, married the daughter of Conſtantine King of Scots. By whoſe ſtirring and exhortation he gathered a company of Danes, Scots, and others, and entred the mouth of Humber with a ſtrong Navy of ſix hundred and fifteen Ships.

Whereof King Ethelſtan, with his brother Edmund, having knowledge, prepared his Army, and at length joyned in fight with him and his people, at a place called Brimambruch or Brimford, where he fighting with them from morning till evening, after a terrible ſlaughter on both ſides (as the like hath not been ſeen lightly in England) had the Victory. In the which Battel were ſlain five ſmall and under-Kings, with Conſtantine King of Scots, and twelve Dukes, with the moſt part of all the ſtrangers which at that time they gathered to them. Here alſo our Writers put in another Miracle in this Battel, how King Ethelſtans Sword miraculouſly fell into his ſheath, through the prayer of Odo then Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

After this Victory thus obtained of the Danes and Scots, King Ethelſtan alſo ſubdued (or at leaſt quieted the North Britains, whom he conventing together at Hereford (or thereabouts) forced them to grant unto him as a yearly tribute, twenty pounds of Gold, three hundred pounds of ſilver, and of heads of Neat five and twenty hundred, with Hawks and Dogs, to a certain number. This done, he went to Exceſter, and there likewiſe ſubduing the South Britains about Exceſter and Cornwal, repaired the Walls of Exceſter with ſufficient ſtrength, and ſo returned.

The North Britains brought to Tribute.

The South Britains ſubdued.

Among theſe victorious and noble acts of this King, one blot there is of him written and noted, wherein he is as much worthy to be reprehended, as in the other before to be commended; (that is) the innocent death and murther of his brother Edwin. The occaſion thereof was this. King Edward aforenamed their Father, in the time of his youth coming by a certain Village or Grange where he had been nurſed and brought up of a Child, thought of courteſie to go to ſee how his Nurſe did, where he entering into the houſe, eſpied a certain young Damſel beautiful and right ſeemly attired, Egwina by name. This Egwina, before, being a poor mans daughter, had a Viſion by night, that of her body ſprang ſuch a bright light of the Moon, that the brightneſs thereof gave light to the Realm of England, by reaſon whereof ſhe was taken into the foreſaid houſe, and daintily brought up inſtead of their own daughter, for hope of ſome commodity to enſue thereby, as afterward it came to paſs. For King Edward (as is declared) coming into the houſe, and raviſhed with the beauty of the Maiden, begat of her the ſame Night this Ethelſtan. Wherefore the ſaid Ethelſtan being thus baſely born of Egwina, the firſt Wife to Edward (as is ſaid) before he was Married to her, and fearing his next Brother Edwin, which was rightly born, eſpecially being ſtirred thereunto through the ſiniſter ſuggeſtion of his Butler) did caſt ſuch diſpleaſure to the foreſaid Edwin his Brother, being yet but young, that (notwithſtanding his innocent ſubmiſſion and purgation made againſt his accuſers) he cauſed him to be ſet in an old rotten Boat in the broad Sea (only with one Eſquire with him) without any tackling or other proviſion to the ſame. Where the young and tender Prince being diſmaid with the rage of Winds and of the Floods, and now weary of his life, caſt himſelf over-board into the Sea, and ſo was drowned. Notwithſtanding the Eſquire ſhifting for himſelf as he could, and recovering the body of his Maſter, brought it to Sandwich, where it was buried. Which done, the King, afterwards coming to the remembrance of himſelf, was ſtricken with great repentance the ſpace of ſeven years together, and at length was revenged of him that was the accuſer of his Brother. This accuſer (as is ſaid) was the Kings Cup-bearer, who (as God the righteous Judge of all things would have it) upon a certain ſolemn Feaſt, bearing the Cup unto the King, chanced in the middle of the Floor to ſtumble with one foot, helping and recovering himſelf with the other, ſaying in theſe words, Thus one brother (as you ſee) helpeth another. Theſe words being thus ſpoken in the hearing of the King, ſo moved his mind, that forthwith he commanded the falſe accuſer of his Brother, to be had out to execution. Whoſe juſt recompence I would wiſh to be a warning to all men, what it is to ſow diſcord between Brother and Brother.

King Ethelſtan ſeeketh the death of his own brother.

A note to learn not to ſow diſcord between brother and brother.

King Ethelſtan (beſides his ſeven years lamentation for this act) builded the two Monaſteries of Midleton and of Michlenes for his Brothers ſake, or (as the ſtories ſay) for his Soul. Whereby it may appear what was the cauſe moſt ſpecial in thoſe days of building Monaſteries, to wit, for releaſing the ſins both of them departed, and them alive: which cauſe, how it ſtandeth with the grace and verity of Chriſts Goſpel, and of his paſſion, let the Chriſtian Reader try and examine with himſelf. This cruel fact of the King towards Edwin, cauſed him afterward to be more tender and careful towards his other Brethren and Siſters left in his hands unmarried. Which Siſters, as is partly in the Chapter before declared, he richly beſtowed in great Marriages; as one to the King of Northumberland, Sithericus; another he gave unto Lewis King of Aquitania; the third to Henricus, Duke of Almain for his Son Otho, who was the firſt Emperor of the Germans. Whereby it is to be underſtood, that the Empire at this time began firſt to be tranſlated from France (where it remained about one hundred years and an half) unto Germany, where it hath ever ſince continued.

The cauſe of building Abbies examined.

Otho firſt Emperor of the Germans.

The fourth of his Siſters being a Virgin of ſingular beauty, Hugo the French King required to be given unto him, ſending to King Ethelſtan precious and ſumptuous Preſents, ſuch as were not before ſeen in England. Among the which Preſents and Gifts, beſides the rare odors of ſundry ſavours, and fine Spices; and beſides the precious and coſtly Gems, namely, of Smaragds of moſt redolent green; beſides, alſo many and great Courſers and Palfries richly trapped; eſpecially of one Jewel (as Writers make mention) which was a certain Veſſel finely and ſubtilly made of the Precious Stone Onychinus, ſo radiantly wrought, that in it appeared the lively Corn growing, and Mens Images walking, &c. Over and beſides was ſent alſo the Sword of Conſtantine the great, with the name of the poſſeſſor, written in Golden Letters, where in the Haft of the ſame all beaten in Gold, was one of the iron Nails wherewith our Saviour on the Croſs was nailed. Of the verity whereof I am not diſpoſed at this preſent much to ſay what I ſuſpect; but that this in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory of Euſebius is evident, that two of the aforeſaid Nails of Chriſt were ſpent on the Bridle of Conſtantine, the third he caſt into the Sea in a raging Tempeſt. Wherefore, if Chriſt were nailed with four Nails, perhaps, this Nail might be one. If he were nailed but with three, I ſee not how this ſtory can ſtand with other ſtories, neither how this fourth Nail can ſtand with the truth. Among the reſt moreover, was the Spear (as is reported) wherewith the ſide of our Saviour was opened, which alſo the ſaid Conſtantine was wont to carry in the field againſt his enemies; with a portion likewiſe of the holy Croſs incloſed in Chriſtal, alſo a part of the Crown of Thorn in like manner incloſed, &c. Of the which Reliques, part was given to Winchester, part to the Church of Malmesbury, where King Ethelſtan was buried. As this King was endued and inlarged by the gift of God (the ſetter up and diſpoſer of all Kings) with great Victories of worldly Renown, having under his ſubjection both Scots and Britains, and the whole Monarchy of the Land: ſo he deviſed divers good and wholſome Laws for the government of the ſame, as well concerning the ſtate of the Orders Eccleſiaſtical, as alſo of the Secular or Lay-people. Whereby it is to be underſtood, that the uſurped power of the Biſhop of Rome, did not then extend it ſelf ſo largely, nor ſo proudly to derogate from the authority of Kings and Princes, but that every one in his own Dominion had (under God, and not under the Pope) the doing of all matters within the ſame his Dominion contained, whether they were cauſes temporal or ſpiritual, as by the Decrees and Conſtitutions of this King (and alſo of other as well before him, as after him) may evidently be teſtified, as where he amongſt other Laws thus ordaineth touching the Biſhop, in words as follow.

King Edmund.

Edmund the ſon of Edward the Elder by his third Wife (as is declared) and brother of Ethelſtan, being of the age of 20 years, entred his Reign, who had by his Queen Elgina two ſons, Edwin and Edgarus, ſirnamed Pacificus, which both reigned after him as followeth. This Edmund continued his Reign ſix years and an half. By him were expelled the Danes, Scots, Normans, and all foreign enemies out of the Land. Such Cities and Towns which before were in the poſſeſſion of ſtrangers, as Lincoln, Notingham, Derby, Stafford, and Leiceſter, he recovered out of their hands. Thus the Realm being cleared of Foreign power for a time; then the King ſet his ſtudy and mind in the redreſſing and maintaining the ſtate of the Church; which all ſtood then in building of Monaſteries, and furniſhing of Churches, either with new poſſeſſions, or with reſtoring the old which were taken away before. In the time of this Edmund, this I find in an old written ſtory borrowed of William Carey, a Citizen of London, a worthy Treaſurer of moſt worthy Monuments of Antiquity. The name of the Author I cannot alledge, becauſe the Book beareth no Title, lacking both the beginning and the later end; but the words thereof faithfully recited be theſe, Hujus Regis tempore facta eſt diſperſio Monachorum Euſhmenſis cœnobii, cum ſubſtitutione canonicorum per Athelmum & Ulricum laicos, & Oſulphum epiſcopum, &c. that is, In the time of this King, there was a ſcattering or diſperſion made of the Monks out of the Monaſtery of Euſham, and Canons ſubſtituted in their place, through the doing of Athelmus and Ulricus Laymen, and of Oſulfus Biſhop, &c.

Monks put out of Euſham, in the year of our Lord 941.

Where, as concerning this matter between Monks and others of the Clergy, firſt it is to be underſtood, that in the Realm of England heretofore, before the time of Dunſtan, the Biſhops Sees and Cathedral Churches were repleniſhed with no Monks, but with Prieſts and Canons, called then Clerks or Men of the Clergy. After this beginneth to riſe a difference or a Sect between theſe two parties in ſtrictneſs of life, and in habit; ſo that they which lived after a ſtrict rule of holineſs were called Monks, and profeſſed Chaſtity, that was, to live from Wives (for ſo was Chaſtity then defined to thoſe blind days) as though holy Matrimony were no Chaſtity, according as Paphnutius did well define it in the Council of Nice. The other ſort which were no Monks but Prieſts or Men of the Clergy ſo called, lived more free from thoſe Monkiſh Rules and Obſervances, and were then commonly (or at leaſt lawfully married) and in their life and habit came neareſt to the ſecular ſtate of other Chriſtians. By reaſon whereof great diſdain and emulation was among them, in ſo much that in many Cathedral Churches, whereas Prieſts were before, there Monks were put in: and contrary, ſometime whereas Monks were intruded, there Prieſts and Canons again were placed, and Monks thruſt out; whereof more ſhall appear hereafter (by the grace of Chriſt) when we come to the life of Dunſtan. In the mean time, ſomething to ſatisfie the cogitation of the Reader, which peradventure either is ignorant, or elſe would know of the firſt coming in of Monks into this Realm and Church of England in the Saxons time; this is to be noted, according as I find in old Chronicles, namely in the Latine Hiſtory of Gulielm. de geſtis Pontificum Anglorum, recorded touching the ſame. About this time of King Edmund, or ſhortly after, when hardneſs and ſtrictneſs of life joyned with ſuperſtition, was had in veneration, and counted for great holineſs; men therefore, either to win publick fame with men, or merits with God, gave themſelves to lead a ſtrict life, thinking thereby (the ſtranger their converſation was, and the further from the common trade of vulgar people) the more perfect to be towards God and Man. There was at that time (and before that) a Monaſtery in France named Floriake, after the order and rule of Benedict: from the which Monaſtery did ſpring a great part of our Engliſh Monks, who being there profeſſed, and afterward returning into England, did congregate men daily to their profeſſion. And ſo, partly for ſtrangeneſs of their rule, partly for outward holineſs of their ſtrict life, partly for the opinion of holineſs that many had of them, were in great admiration, not only with the rude ſort, but with with Kings and Princes, who founded their Houſes, maintained their Rules, and enlarged them with poſſeſſions. Among the which Order of Monks coming from Floriake, eſpecially was one Oſwaldus, firſt a Monk of Floriake, then Biſhop of Worceſter and York, a great Patron and ſetter up of Monkery. Touching the which Oſwaldus, William in his Book De pontific. writing of his Hiſtory, hath theſe words: Familiaris per id temporis Anglis conſuetudo fuit, ut ſi qui boni afflati eſſent deſiderio, in beatiſſimi Benedicti Monaſterio cœnobialem ſuſciperent habitum, a quo Religionis hujuſce manavit exordium, &c. That is, It was a common cuſtom at that time among Engliſhmen, that if any good men were well affected or minded toward Religion, they went to the Monaſtery of bleſſed St. Benedict in France, and there received the Habit of a Monk, whereupon the firſt origine of this Religion began, &c. But of this Oſwald Biſhop of York, and Dunſtan Biſhop of Canterbury, and Ethelwald Biſhop of Wincheſter, how they repleniſhed divers Monaſteries and Cathedral Churches with Monks; and how they diſcharged married Prieſts and Canons out of their Houſes, to plant in Monks in their Cells, more ſhall be ſpoken (by the grace of Chriſt) hereafter. Now let us return again to the matter where we left, of King Edmund; who, beſides his noble Victories againſt his enemies, and recovering the Cities above expreſſed into his own hands, did alſo ſubdue the Province of Cumberland. And after he had put out the eyes of the two Sons of Dunmail King of Cumberland, he committed the government thereof to Malcolmus King of the Scots, upon promiſe of his truſty ſervice and obedience, when the King ſhould ſtand in any need of him. In the time of this King, Dunſtan was not yet Archbiſhop of Canterbury, but only Abbot of Glaſtenbury, of whom many fabulous narrations paſs among the Writers, importing more vanity than verity, whereof this is one of the firſt. What time Edgarus called Pacificus was born, Dunſtan being the ſame time Abbot of Glaſtenbury (as the Monkiſh Fables dream) heard a voice in the Air of certain Angels ſinging after this tenor and ſaying, Now peace cometh to the Church of England in the time of this Child, and of our Dunſtan, &c. This I thought to recite, that the Chriſtian Reader might the better ponder with himſelf the impudent and abominable fictions of this Romiſh Generation. But of the ſame mint alſo they have forged how the ſaid Dunſtan ſhould hear the Angels ſing the Kyrieleſon, uſed to be ſung at Even-ſong in the Church: Guliel. de pontif. lib. 1. Which is as true as that the Harp, hanging in a Womans Houſe played by it ſelf the tune of the Antheme, called Gaudent in cœlis, &c. What would not theſe deceivers feign in matters ſomething likely, which in things ſo abſurd and ſo inconvenient ſhame not to lie and to forge ſo impudently and alſo ſo manifeſtly? Through the motion of this Dunſtan, King Edmund builded and furniſhed the Monaſtery of Glaſtenbury, and made the ſaid Dunſtan Abbot thereof.

Concerning the end and death of this King, ſundry opinions there be. Alfridus and Marianus ſay, that while this King Edmund endeavoured himſelf to ſave his Sewer from the danger of his enemies, which would have ſlain him at Pulcher Church, the King in parting of the fray was wounded, and died ſhortly after. But Gulielmus de regib. lib. 2. ſaith, that the King being at a Feaſt at Pulcher Church upon the day of St. Auguſtine, ſpied a Felon ſitting in the Hall named Leof, whom he before for his Felony had exiled; and leaping over the Table did flie upon him, and plucked the Thief by the hair of the head to the ground. In which doing, the Felon with a Knife wounded the King to the death, and alſo with the ſame Knife wounded many other of the Kings ſervants, and at length was all to behewed, and died forthwith.

By the Laws of King Edmund (ordained and ſet forth, as well for the redreſs of Church matters, as alſo of civil Regiment) it may appear, that the ſtate both of cauſes Temporal and likewiſe Spiritual, appertained then to the Kings Right (the falſe pretended uſurpation of the Biſhop of Rome notwithſtanding) as by theſe Laws is to be ſeen: where he, by the advice of his Lords and Biſhops did enact and determine concerning the chaſtity and pure life of Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters, and ſuch as were in the Orders of the Church, with the penalties alſo for them which tranſgreſſed the ſame.

Item, For deflouring of Women profeſſed, which we call Nuns, &c.

Item, For every Biſhop to ſee his Churches repaired of his own proper Charge; and boldly to admoniſh the King, whether the Houſes of God were well maintained, &c.

All which Conſtitutions declare what intereſt Kings had in thoſe days in matters as well Eccleſiaſtical as others, within their dominion, and that not only in diſpoſing the Ordinances and Rites, ſuch as appertained to the Inſtitution of the Church, but alſo in placing and ſetting Biſhops in their Sees, &c.

In the time of this Edmund, was Ulſtanus Archbiſhop of York, and Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which Odo being a Dane born (as is before touched) was promoted to that See by King Ethelſtan, for that (as they ſay) he being firſt Biſhop of Wilton, and preſent with King Ethelſtan in the Field againſt Analanus before mentioned, what time the ſaid Ethelſtan had loſt his Sword, he through his interceſſion up to Heaven, did ſee a Sword from Heaven come down into the Sheath of the King. Whereof relation being made unto the King by the foreſaid Biſhop, Ethelſtan upon the ſame was ſo affected towards Odo, that not only he counted him for a patron of his life, but alſo made him Primate of Canterbury after the deceaſe of Ulfelmus. This Odo was the firſt from the coming of the Saxons till his time, which was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being no Monk. For all the other before him were of the profeſſion of Monks, of whom a great part had been Italians unto Bertualdus. Notwithſtanding, this Odo, being alſo a ſtranger born, after he was elected into the Biſhoprick, to anſwer to the old cuſtom of others before him, ſailed over into France, and there at Floriake (after the uſual manner above mentioned of Engliſhmen) received the Profeſſion and Habit of Monkiſh Religion, as ſaith my foreſaid Author. And like as the ſaid Odo firſt being no Monk, was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſo alſo Ulſtanus, the ſame time being Biſhop of York and of Worceſter, differed from divers his Predeceſſors before him in Profeſſion and Habit; of whom the forenamed Author thus writeth in his third Book, ſpeaking of Ulſtanus; Qui ſanctitate diſcrepabat & habitu; that is, He differed in ſanctimony and in habit. Whereby it is to be collected, that in thoſe days was a difference in Habit and Garment, not only between Monks and Biſhops, but alſo between one Biſhop and another; albeit what difference it was, yet I do not find. But I return again to Odo, who by the deſcription of his manners might ſeem not to be the worſt that occupied that place, were it not that our lying Hiſtories, feigning falſe Miracles upon him (as they do of others) make him indeed to ſeem worſe than he was. As where they imagine that he ſhould ſee from Heaven a Sword fall into the Scabbard of King Ethelſtan. Item, where he ſhould cover and defend the Church of Canterbury with his Prayers from Rain. And alſo where he ſhould turn the Bread of the Altar (as the Writer termeth it) into lively fleſh, and from fleſh into bread again, to confirm the People which before doubted in the ſame. Where note again (good Reader) that albeit this Miracle were true, as no doubt it is untrue, yet is it to be noted, that in thoſe days was a great doubt amongſt Engliſhmen of the Popiſh Sacrament, and that Tranſubſtantiation was not received into the Chriſtian Creed. The like judgment is to be given alſo of that, where our Engliſh Writers, teſtifying of the ſame Odo, ſay that he ſhould prophecy long before of Dunſtan to be his Succeſſor in the Church of Canterbury. But to let theſe phantaſies and idle ſtories paſs, this which we find of Odo his own writing is certain, that the ſaid Odo, in the Reign of King Edmund, had a Synod commenced of the chief Prelates and men of the Clergy in his time, to whom he directed this Letter here following: the Copy whereof I thought to expreſs, for the Reader to ſee what zealous care reigned in Archbiſhops then toward the Church of the Lord. The words of his Epiſtle proceed in this tenor.

The Letter of Odo Archbiſhop, to the Prelates

Mirabile cuncti-potentis polorum præſulis clementia opitulante, Ego Odo Eccleſiæ ſalvatoris Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti Archiepiſcopus Dovernienſis civitatis Metropolitanus, coepiſcopis fidei Catholicæ compagatoribus, ſpirituali charitatis vigore meis conſortibus, præſentium proſperitatem æthereique decoris beatitudinem, &c.

The ſame in Engliſh.

By the divine grace of God, I Odo of the Church of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, Archbiſhop and Metropolitan of the City of Dover, to my fellow Biſhops and fellow planters of the Catholick Faith, and my fellow brethren in the ſpiritual bond of charity, with greeting, wiſh proſperity in this world preſent, and in the world to come felicity. If it were ſo, or by any means could be, that all the riches of this world were laid before mine eyes, ſo that I being Emperor had all things univerſally under my ſubjection, all thoſe things would I gladly give, yea and my ſelf alſo would offer willingly for the health of your ſouls, as which alſo do deſire and truſt likewiſe my ſelf to be ſtrengthened with the fervency of your holineſs, as appertaining to thoſe things wherein the Lord our God hath ſet us to be workmen, &c.

And after a few other words of like effect, wherein he doth declare the heavy burthen of his office, it followeth after this manner.

Wherefore moſt humbly and one unworthy, but yet a devote fellow brother of yours; I beſeech and exhort your holineſs, that you will not ſhew your ſelves cold and negligent in the cure and regiment of ſouls, ſo that in the time of the fearful judgment, the Lord do not complain of you, ſaying, My Shepherds did not feed my Flock, but they fed themſelves. And again, They were Princes of my Flock, and I knew not of it. But rather let us take heed and be diligent over the Houſhold of the Lord, over which he hath ſet us to be the leaders, to give them meat and true meaſure of Corn in time convenient, that is to ſay, wholeſome Doctrine. And although upon mine own demerits or worthineſs, I do not preſume to comfort or exhort any man; but as one being unworthy and faulty in tranſgreſſions innumerable, am glad, and ſtand in need rather to be ſtrengthened by your brotherly admonitions; yet for the ancient authority of my Predeceſſors, as of Auguſtine of happy memory, and alſo of all other Saints, by whoſe induſtry the rule of Chriſtianity did firſt flouriſh and ſpring from this Metropolitan See unto all quarters of England; therefore I have thought good to direct unto you theſe my Letters to the profit of you all; eſpecially, for that our Renowned and Princely King Edmund, with all his People, doth joy to follow that which he heareth in you and of you; and alſo for ſo much as all his Subjects, which be under his imperial Dominion, do love and delight to follow moſt joyfully the ſame, and report of your ſincere converſation, &c.

This Odo continued Biſhop the ſpace of twenty years. After whom Elſinus was elected and ordained by the King to ſucceed through favour and money; but in going to Rome for the Popes Pall, in his journey through the Alps, he decayed and died for cold. Whereupon ſucceeded Dunſtan, as in time and place (by the leave of Chriſt) followeth to be declared.

Elſinus Archbiſhop of Canterbury elect. S. Edmundsbury.

This Edmund gave to St. Edmund the Martyr before mentioned, the Town of Bredrichcheworth, which is now called S. Edmundsbury, with great Revenues and Lands appertaining to the ſame. But concerning the frivolous Miracles which our Monkiſh ſtory-writers here feign of this good Edmund, by the way (or rather out of the way) I let them paſs.

The children of K. Edmund.

And thus much concerning the Reign of King Edmund, who after he had reigned ſix years and an half, was ſlain, as is ſaid, at Pulcherchurch, and buried at Glaſtenbury of Dunſtan, leaving behind him two Children, Edwin and Edgar, by his Wife Elgiva. But becauſe the foreſaid Children were yet young, and under age, therefore Edred Brother to King Edmund, and Uncle to the Children, governed as Protector about the ſpace of nine years and an half, till Edwin the eldeſt Son came to age. This Edred with great moderation and fidelity to the young Children behaved himſelf, during the time of his Government. In his time Dunſtan was promoted, through the means of Odo the Archbiſhop, from Abbot of Glaſtenbury to be Biſhop of Worceſter, and after of London. By the counſel of this Dunſtan, Edred was much ruled, and too much thereto addicted; inſomuch that the foreſaid Edred is reported in Stories to ſubmit himſelf unto much fond penance and caſtigations, inflicted to him of the ſaid Dunſtan. Such zealous devotion was then in Princes, and more blind ſuperſtition in Biſhops. And here again is another Miracle as fantaſtical as the other before, forged of Dunſtan, that when that Edred being ſick ſent for Dunſtan to be his Confeſſor, by the way Dunſtan ſhould hear a Voice declaring to him before, that Edred was already departed, at the declaring whereof Dunſtan's Horſe fell immediately dead under him, with ly and al'.

Edred Governour of the Realm.

Dunſtan made Biſhop of Worceſter, and after of London.

With lie and all.

King Edwin.

Edwin the eldeſt Son of King Edmund afore mentioned, after his Uncle Edred, began his Reign about the year of our Lord 955. being crowned at Kingſton by Odo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Of this Edwin it is reported of divers Writers, that the firſt day of his Coronation, ſitting with his Lords, he brake ſuddenly from them, and entred a ſecret Chamber, to the company of a certain Woman whom he inordinately retained (being, as ſome ſay, another mans Wife) whoſe Husband he had before ſlain, as others ſay, being of his alliance, to the great miſliking of his Lords, and eſpecially of the Clergy. Dunſtan was yet but Abbot of Glaſtenbury; who, following the King into the Chamber, brought him out by the hand, and accuſed him to Odo the Archbiſhop, cauſing him to be ſeparate from the company of the foreſaid party; by the which Odo the King was for his fact ſuſpended out of the Church. By reaſon whereof the King, being with Dunſtan diſpleaſed, baniſhed him his Land, and forced him for a ſeaſon to flie into Flanders, where he was in the Monaſtery of St. Amandus. About the ſame ſeaſon the Monaſtical Order of Benedict Monks, or black Monks (as they were called) began to multiply and increaſe here in England. Inſomuch that where before time other Prieſts and Canons had been placed, there Monks were in their rooms ſet in; and the Secular Prieſts (as they then were called, or Canons) put out. But King Edwin for that diſpleaſure he bare to Dunſtan, did ſo vex all the Order of the ſaid Monks, that in Malmesbury, Glaſtenbury, and other places more, he thruſt out the Monks, and ſet in Secular Prieſts in their ſtead.

K. Edwin. { Anno 955. }

The King ſuſpended by the Archbiſhop.

Edwin an enemy unto Monks.

Monks put out, and ſecular prieſts placed in their rooms.

Notwithſtanding, it was not long but theſe Prieſts and Canons were again removed, and the ſaid Monks in their ſtead reſtored, both in the foreſaid Houſes, and in divers other Churches Cathedral beſides, as in the next Story of King Edgar (Chriſt willing) ſhall more at large appear.

In fine, King Edwin being hated, by reaſon of certain his demeanors, of all his Subjects (eſpecially the Northumbrians and Mercians) was by them removed from his Kingly Honour, and his Brother Edgar in his ſtead received; ſo that the River of Thames divided both their Kingdoms. Which Edwin, after he had Reigned about the term of four years departed, leaving no heir of his body. Wherefore the rule of the Land fell unto Edgar his younger Brother.

The death of K. Edwin

King Edgar.

Edgar the ſecond Son of Edmund and Brother to Edwin, being of the age of ſixteen years, began his Reign over the Realm of England, in the year of our Lord 959. but was not Crowned till fourteen years after; the cauſes whereof hereunder follow (Chriſt willing) to be declared. In the beginning of his Reign he called home Dunſtan, whom King Edwin before had exiled. Then was Dunſtan, which before was Abbot of Glaſtenbury, made Biſhop of Worceſter, and then of London. Not long long after, this Odo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, after he had governed that Church 24 years. After whom Brithilinus Biſhop of Wincheſter firſt was elected; but becauſe he was thought not ſufficient to furniſh that room, Dunſtan was ordained Archbiſhop, the other ſent home again to his old Church. Where note by the way, how in thoſe days the donation and aſſigning of Eccleſiaſtical Dignities remained in the Kings hand; only they fet their Pall from Rome as a token of the Popes Confirmation. So Dunſtan, being by the King made Archbiſhop, took his journey to Rome for his Pall of Pope John the thirteenth, which was about the beginning of the Kings Reign. Thus Dunſtan obtaining his Pall, ſhortly after his return again from Rome, intreateth King Edgar, that Oſwaldus (who, as is ſaid, was made Monk at Floriake, and was Nephew to Odo late Biſhop of Canterbury) might be promoted to be Biſhop of Worceſter; which thing to him was granted. And not long after, through the means of the ſaid Dunſtan, Ethelwoldus, (whom ſtories do feign to be the great Patron of Monkery) firſt Monk at Glaſtenbury, then Abbot of Abendon, was alſo made Biſhop of Wincheſter. Of this Ethelwoldus, Gulielmus libro de geſtis pontificum recordeth, that what time he was a Monk in the Houſe of Glaſtenbury, the Abbot had a Viſion of him, which was this: How that there appeared to him in his ſleep a certain great Tree, the branches whereof extended through all the four quarters of the Realm, which branches were all covered with many little Monks Cowls, where in the top of the Tree was one great Maſter Cowl, which in ſpreading it ſelf over the other Cowls, incloſed all the reſt; which Maſter Cowl in the Tree top, mine Author in the interpretation applieth to the life of this Ethelwold. Of ſuch prodigious fantaſies our Monkiſh Hiſtories be full; and not only our Hiſtories of England, but alſo of the Heathen Stories of the Gentiles be ſtuffed with ſuch kind of Dreams of much like effect.

Monkiſh dreams.

Of ſuch a like Dream we read of the Mother of Athelſtan, how the Moon did ſpring out of her Womb, and gave light to all England. Alſo of King Charles the Emperor, how he was led by a thred to ſee the torments of Hell. Likewiſe of Furceus the Hermite mentioned in the third Book of Beda, who ſaw the joys of Heaven, and the four fires that ſhould deſtroy the World; the one of lying, for breaking our promiſe made at Baptiſm; the ſecond fire was of the covetous; the third of diſſention; the fourth was of the fire of impiety and wrongful dealing. Item, in like ſort of the dream of Dunſtan, and of the ſame Ethelwold, to whom appeared the three Biſhops, Briſtanus, Birinus, and Swithinus, &c. Of the dream of the Mother of this Ethelwold, who being great with him, did ſee a golden Eagle flie out of her mouth, &c. Of the dream likewiſe, or the Viſion of King Edgar concerning the falling of the two Apples, and of the pots, one being full of water, the other empty, &c. Alſo of King Edward the Confeſſor, touching the ruine of the Land by the conqueror of the Normans. We read alſo in the Hiſtory of Aſtiages, how he dreamed of Cyrus, and likewiſe of many other dreams in the Books of the Monks, and of the Ethnike Writers. For what cannot either the idle vanity of mans head, or the deception of the lying ſpirit work by man, in foreſhewing ſuch earthly events as happen commonly in this preſent world? But here is a difference to be underſtood between theſe earthly dreams, ſpeaking of earthly things and matters of humane ſuperſtition; and between other ſpiritual revelations ſent by God touching ſpiritual matters of the Church pertaining to mans ſalvation. But to our purpoſe, by this dream, and by the event which followed after, it may appear how and by what means the multitude of Monks began firſt to ſwarm in the Churches of England, that is, in the days of this Edgar, by the means of theſe three Biſhops, Dunſtan, Ethelwold and Oſwald. Albeit Dunſtan was the chiefeſt ringleader of this race; yet Ethelwold being now Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, were not much behind for their parts. By the inſtigation and counſel of theſe three foreſaid, King Edgar is recorded in Hiſtories to build either new out of the ground, or to reedifie Monaſteries decaied by the Danes, more than forty. As the Houſe of Ely, Glaſtenbury, Abbington, Burga by Stamford, Thorney, Ramſey, Wilton, Wenton, Winchcomb, Thamſtoke in Devonſhire, with divers more. In the ſetting up and building of the which the foreſaid Ethelwold was a great doer, and a Founder under the King. Moreover through the motion of this Dunſtan and his fellows, King Edgar in divers great Houſes and Cathedral Churches, where Prebendaries and Prieſts were before, diſplaced the Prieſts and ſet in Monks. Whereof we read in the Chronicles of Roger Hoveden, in words and form as followeth, Hic namque Ethelwoldus regem, cujus eximius erat conſiliarius, ad hoc maxime provocavit, ut Clericos a Monaſteriis expelleret, & Monachos ſanctimonialeſque in eis collocaret, &c. that is, Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter, who was then one of the Kings Council, did urge the King chiefly to expel Clerks out of Monaſteries, and in their rooms to beſtow Monks and Nuns, &c. Whereunto accordeth likewiſe Hiſtoria Jornalenſis, containing the like effect in theſe words, Hoc anno Ethelwoldus Wint. & Oſwaldus Wigornienſis, Epiſcopi, juſſu Regis Edgari (Clericis de quibuſdam maſoribus Eccleſiis expulſis) Monachos inſtituerunt, aut de eiſdem Clericis & aliis Monachos in eiſdem fecerunt. Gulielmus alſo writing of the time of Dunſtan, maketh the matter ſomewhat more plain, where he ſaith, Itaque Clerici multarum Eccleſiarum data optione, ut aut amictum mutarent, aut locis valedicerent, melioribus habitacula vacuefacientes: ſurgebant itaque in tota inſula Religioſorum Monaſteria, cumulabantur molè pretioſi metalli ſanctorum Altaria, &c. Thus the Secular Prieſts being put to their choice, whether to change their Habit; or to leave their Rooms, departed out of their Houſes, giving place for other better men to come in. Then the Houſes and Monaſteries of Religious Men through all the Realm went up apace, &c.

How and when Monks firſt began to ſwarm in England. Dunſtan, Ethelwold, Oſwald, three fetters up of Monkiſh Religion.

Forty Monaſteries builded and repaired by King Edgar.

After the Kings mind was thus perſwaded and incited by theſe Biſhops to advance Monkery, then Oſwaldus Biſhop of Worceſter, and alſo made Archbiſhop of York after the deceaſe of Oskitellus, Sui voti compos effectus (as Hoveden writeth) having his See in the Cathedral Church there of Saint Peter, began firſt with fair perſwaſions to aſſay the minds of the Canons and Prieſts, whether they could be content to change their Profeſſion, and to be made Monks, or no. Which when he ſaw it would not take effect, he practiſed this policy with them: Near to the ſaid Church of Saint Peter, within the Church-yard, he erected another Church of our Lady, which when he had repleniſhed with Monks, there he continually frequented, there he kept, there he ſat, and was ever there converſant. By reaſon whereof the other Church was left naked and deſolate, and all the People gathered there where the Biſhop was. The Prieſts ſeeing themſelves ſo to be left and neglected both of the Biſhop and of the People, to whom nothing remained but ſhame and contempt, were driven of ſhame either to relinquiſh the Houſe (ſuch as would not enter the monkiſh Profeſſion) or elſe to become Monks, ſuch as had nothing elſe to ſtay upon. After the like Superſtition (although not after the ſame ſubtilty) did Ethelwold alſo drive out the Canons and Prieſts from the new Monaſtery in Wincheſter, afterward called Hida, and placed his Monks. So in Oxford and in Mildune, with divers other places more, the Secular Prieſts with their Wives were expelled, to give place to Monks. The cauſe whereof is thus pretended in certain Story-writers, whom I ſee alſo Fabian to follow; for that the Prieſts and Clerks were thought ſlack and negligent in their Church Service, and ſet in Vicars in their ſtead, while they lived in pleaſure, and miſ-ſpent the Patrimony of the Church after their own luſt. Then King Edgar gave to the Vicars the ſame Land which before belonged to the Prebendaries; who alſo not long after ſhewed themſelver as negligent as the others. Wherefore King Edgar (as mine Authors write) by the conſent of Pope John the thirteenth voided clearly the Prieſts, and ordained there Monks. Although certain of the Nobles, and ſome of the Prelates were therewith not well contented, as in the Chapter following may partly appear.

But

The difference, order, and inſtitution of Monks examined.

But for ſo much as we have entred into the mention of Monks and Nuns, and of their Profeſſion, which I ſee ſo greatly in our Monkiſh Stories commended: leſt perhaps the ſimple Reader may be deceived thereby, in hearing the name of Monks in all Hiſtories of times to be ſuch an ancient thing in Chriſtian life (even from the Primitive Church after the Apoſtles time) both commonly recited and well received, therefore to help the judgment of the ignorant, and to prevent all error herein, it ſhall not be unprofitable, in following the preſent occaſion here given (by way of a little digreſſion) to intermeddle ſomewhat concerning the original Inſtitution of Monks, what they were in the old time which were called Monachi, wherein the Monks of the primitive time did differ from the Monks of the middle time, and from theſe our Monks now of this later Age; moreover, wherein all theſe three do differ from Prieſts (as we call them) and from men of the Clergy. Wherefore to anſwer to the ſuperſtitious ſcruple of ſuch, which alledge the old antiquity of the name and Title of Monks; Firſt I grant the Name and Order of Monks to be of old continuance, during near from the time of three hundred years after Chriſt. Of whom divers old Authors do record, as Auguſtinus, Hieronimus, Baſilius Magnus, who was alſo himſelf one of the firſt inſtituters and commenders of that ſuperſtition, Chryſoſtomus, Nazianzenus, Evagrius, Sozomenus, Dionyſius, and divers others. In the number of theſe Monks (which then were divided into Hermits or Anchorits, and into Cœnobits) were Antonius, Paulus, Johannes, with divers other recluſes. Among the which was Hierome, Baſil, Macharius, Iſidorus, Pambus, Nilammon, Simeon, with infinite others, both in Paleſtina, Syria, Thebaide, Meſopotamia, in Egypt, in Africa, and in Scythia. In ſo much that Caſſianus Lib.2. Cap.4. De Canon. Noctur. orat. maketh mention of a certain Monaſtery in Thebaide, wherein were above five thouſand Monks, under the government of one Abbot. And here alſo in England mention is made before of Bangor, wherein were two thouſand and two hundred Monks under one mans ruling, in the year of our Lord five hundred ninety ſix. Whereby it appeareth that Monks were then, and two hundred years before, in the primitive time of the Church. But what Monks theſe were is to be conſidered; ſuch as either by tyranny of Perſecution were driven into ſolitary and deſert places; or elſe ſuch as not conſtrained of any, but of their own voluntary devotion (joyned with ſome Superſtition among, for the love they had unto ſpiritual contemplation, and for hatred of the wicked world) withdrew themſelves from all company, either having nothing to themſelves proper, or elſe all things common with others. And all theſe were then nothing elſe but Lay men; of which Lay men, there were two ſundry ſorts, one of the vulgar and common people, which only were partakers of the Sacraments, the other, in following a Monaſtical kind of life, were called Monks, (being nothing but Lay men) leading a more ſevere and ſtricter trade of life than the others, as may ſufficiently appear, Auguſt. lib. de moribus eccleſiæ, cap. 13. Item, lib. de operibus Monachorum. Item, Epiſtola ad Aurelium. Alſo by Hieromè ad Heliodorum, writing theſe words: Alia Monachorum eſt cauſa, alia Clericorum; Clerici paſcunt oves, ego paſcor, &c. that is, One thing pertaineth to Monks, another thing unto them of the Clergy; they of the Clergy feed their Flock, I am fed, &c. Et ex Dionyſio. Alſo the ſame appeareth likewiſe by the fourth Canon of the Council of Chalcedon, where it is provided, Ne Monachi ſe eccleſiaſticis negotiis immiſceant; that is, That Monks ſhould not intermeddle with matters of the Church, &c. Et Leo Epiſtola 62. vetat Monachos & Laicos, etſi ſcientiæ nomine glorientur, admitti ad officium docendi & concionandi.

Monks differing from Prieſts.

Monks in the Primitive time differing from Monks in the ſecond age of the Church. Auguſt. de inſtitute monachorum.

By theſe foreſaid Authors alledged, it is evident, that Monks in the former Age of the Church, albeit they lived a ſolitary life, yet they were then no other but only Lay men, differing from Prieſts, and differing from the other Monks which ſucceeded them afterwards in the middle Age of the Church, and that in three points: Firſt, they were tied and bound to no preſcript form, either of diet or apparel, or any thing elſe, as we may ſee teſtified by the words of Saint Auguſtine, which be theſe: Neque inter hæc nemo urgetur in aſpera, quæ ferre non poteſt: nulli quod recuſat imponitur. Nec ideo contemnitur a cæteris, in quod eis imitandus ſe fatetur invalidum. Meminerunt enim quantopere commendata ſit in ſcripturis charitas. Meminerunt omnia munda mundis, &c. Non quod intrat in os coinquinat hominem, ſed quod exit. Itaque non rejiciendis generibus ciborum quaſi pollutis, ſed concupiſcentiæ perdomandæ & dilectioni fratrum tetinendæ invigilat omnis induſtria. And Sozomen. lib. 3. cap. 16. ſpeaking of the Monks of the ſame time, which in Cities had ſeveral Manſions from others, ſaith, Alii in turba civitatum converſabantur, ſic ſeipſos gerentes, ut nullius momenti viderentur, & a multis nihil differrent, &c. that is, Some live in Cities ſo behaving themſelves, as ſeeming nothing worth, and they differed nothing from the multitude, &c. The ſecond point wherein they were diſcrepant from the later Monks was, in that they remained no other but in the Order of Lay Men (only being of a ſtricter life than the reſt) and had nothing to do in matters and charges Eccleſiaſtical; which was afterward broken by Pope Boniface the fourth, as followeth (the Lord willing) to be ſeen and ſaid. Thirdly, the foreſaid Monks of that Age (albeit the moſt part of them lived ſole and ſingle from Wives) yet ſome of them were married: certes none of them were forbidden or reſtrained from Marriage. Of ſuch as were married, ſpeaketh Athanaſius in Epiſtola ad Dracontium qui ait ſe noviſſe & Monachos & Epiſcopos conjuges & liberorum patres, &c. that is, Which ſaith, that he knew both Monks and Biſhops married Men, and Fathers of Children, &c.

Sozom. li 3. cap. 16.

Monks of the Primitive time were no Clerks, but meer Laymen.

Monks of the old time ſome married, none reſtrained from marriage.

And yet the ſaid Monks of the old time, though they were better than the other which followed them; yet all that notwithſtanding, Superſtition with them, and among them began then to creep into the Church through the crafty ſubtilty of Satan, and all for the ignorance of our free juſtification by faith in Jeſus Chriſt. Examples do declare the vain and prodigious ſuperſtition of theſe Monaſtical ſort of men; which examples do not lack, if leiſure rather, did not lack to bring them in. But two or three ſhall ſuffice for many, which I purpoſe (the Lord willing) here to inſert, to the intent the mind of the godly Reader may the better conſider and underſtand, how ſhortly after the time of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, the Doctrine of Chriſtian Juſtification began to be forgotten, true Religion turned to Superſtition, and the Price of Chriſts Paſſion to be obſcured through the vain Opinion of mens Merits, &c. A certain Abbot named Moſes thus teſtifieth of himſelf in the Collations of Caſſianus, that he ſo afflicted himſelf with much faſting and watching, that ſometimes for two or three days together, not only he felt no appetite to eat, but alſo had no remembrance of any meat at all, and by reaſon thereof was driven alſo from ſleep. In ſo much that he was cauſed to pray to God but for a little refreſhing of ſleep to be given him ſome piece of the Night. In the ſame Author mention is made of a certain old man an Hermit, who becauſe he had conceived in himſelf ſuch a purpoſe never to eat meat, without he had ſome gueſt or ſtranger with him, ſometime was conſtrained to abſtain five days together until Sunday, while he came to the Church, and there brought ſome ſtranger or other home with him.

Superſtition crept in with Monkery.

The ignorance of our free juſtification by Chriſt is the cauſe of all ſuperſtition.

Ex Caſſ. ca. 17. Collat. 2.

Two other Examples yet more will I add out of the ſaid Caſſianus, to declare how the ſubtilty of Satan, through Superſtition, and falſe colour of holineſs, blindeth the miſerable eyes of ſuch, which rather attend mens Traditions than the Word of God. In the fortieth Chapter of the ſaid Author, in his Book De gaſtrimargia, is told of a certain Abbot named Johannes, in the deſert Wilderneſs of Scythia, who ſent two of his Novices with Figs unto one that was ſick in the Wilderneſs, eighteen Miles off from the Church. It chanced theſe two young Novices, miſſing the way, wandred ſo long in the wild Foreſt or Wilderneſs, and could not find the Cell, that for emptineſs and wearineſs they waxed faint and tired; and yet rather would they die than taſte the Figs committed to them to carry, and ſo did: for ſhortly after they were found dead, their figs lying whole by them.

Caſſian. lib. de ſpiritu gaſtrimarg. cap. 40.

Caſſian. l. 6. cap. 2. Another Story he alſo reciteth of two Monaſtical Brethren, who making their Progreſs in the Deſert of Thebaide, purpoſed with themſelves to take no ſuſtenance but ſuch as the Lord himſelf ſhould miniſter unto them. It happened as they were wandring deſolate in the Deſert, and fainting almoſt for penury, certain Mazices, a kind of people by nature fierce and cruel, notwithſtanding being ſuddenly altered into a new nature of Humanity, came forth, and of their own accord offered Bread unto them; which Bread the one thankfully received as ſent of God; the other, as counting it ſent of Man, and not of God, refuſed it, and ſo for lack periſhed.

Hereunto might I alſo annex the ſtory of Mucius, who, to declare his obedience, did not ſtick, at the commandment of his Abbot, to caſt his Son into the water, not knowing whether any were appointed there ready to reſcue him from drowning; ſo far were the Monks in thoſe days drowned in Superſtition. What is this, but for Mans Traditions and Commandments to tranſgreſs the Commandments of God, which ſaith, Thou ſhalt do no murther; Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God? What man is ſo blind, that ſeeth not by theſe and infinite examples more, what pernicious ſuperſtition hath begun by reaſon of this Monkery, almoſt from the beginning, to creep into the Church? Whereas I cannot marvel enough, ſeeing that Age of the Church had in it ſo many Learned Doctors, who not only did approve and follow theſe Monaſtical Sects of life, but alſo certain themſelves were the Authors and Inſtitutors of the ſame, yea, and of Mens Traditions, made the ſervice of God. In number of whom may be reckoned Baſilius Magnus, and Nazianzenus, who with immoderate Auſterity did ſo pluck down themſelves, that when they were called to the Office of Biſhops, they were not able to ſuſtain the labour thereof.

Monkery mother of ſuperſtition and hypocriſie.

Baſilius Magnus. Nazianzen.

After theſe foreſaid Monks of that time above rehearſed, followed other Monks of the middle Age of the Church; who, as in multitude, ſo alſo in Superſtition increaſing, began by little and little from their deſolate Dens in the vaſt Wilderneſs to approach more near to great Towns; where they had ſolemn Monaſteries founded by Kings and Queens, and Kings daughters, and other rich Conſuls, as is partly before touched; and the cauſes alſo touched withal, for the which they were firſt founded, as theſe, Pro remedio animæ meæ, pro remiſſione peccatorum meorum, pro redemptione peccatorum meorum, & pro ſalute regnorum, quique meo ſubjacent regimini populorum, in honoren glorioſæ Virginis, &c. For all theſe impious and erroneous Titles and Cauſes we find alledged in ſtories, as in Malmesburienſis, Jornalenſis, Henricus, and others more. In which Hiſtories I alſo note, that the moſt part of theſe aforeſaid Monaſteries were erected firſt upon ſome great Murther, either by War in the Field, or privately committed at home, as ſhall well appear to them that read their Books whom I have alledged. But to return to our Monks again, who (as I ſaid) firſt began to creep from the cold Field into warm Towns and Cloiſters, from Towns then into Cities, and at length from their cloſe Cels and Cities, into Cathedral Churches (as here appeareth by this Story of King Edgar) where, not only they did abound in Wealth and Riches (eſpecially theſe Monks of our later time) but much more did ſwim in Superſtition and Phariſaical Hypocriſie, being yoked and tied in all their doings, to certain preſcript Rules, and formal Obſervances; in watching, in ſleeping, in eating, in riſing, in praying, in walking, in talking, in looking, in taſting, in touching, in handling, in their geſtures, in their veſtures, every man apparalled not as the proper condition of others would require, nor as the ſeaſon of the year did ſerve, but as the coacted Rules and Order of every Sect did enforce them. The number of which Sects was infinitely divers; ſome after Baſilius Rule went in white; ſome after Benets Rule in black; ſome Cluniacenſes, firſt ſet up by Otho in the time of this King Edgar, wearing after the Rule of Benets Order; ſome after Hierome's Rule, leather girdled, and coped above their white Coat; ſome Gregorians Copper coloured; ſome De valle umbroſa, Grey Monks; ſome Grandimontenſes, wearing a Coat of Mailes upon their bare bodies, with a black Cloak thereupon; ſome Ciſtercians, who had white Rochets on a black Coat; ſome Celeſtines, all in blew, both Cloak, Cowl and Cap; ſome Charter Monks, wearing Haircloth next their bodies; ſome Flagellants, going bare-foot in long white Linen Shirts, with an open place in the back, where they beat themſelves with ſcourges on the bare skin every day before the peoples eyes, till the blood ran down, ſaying, that it was revealed to them by an Angel, that in ſo ſcourging themſelves, within thirty days and twelve hours, they ſhould be made ſo pure from ſin, as they were when they firſt received Baptiſm; ſome ſtarred Monks; ſome Jeſuites, with a white Girdle and ruſſet Cowl. Briefly, who can reckon the innumerable Sects and diſguiſed Orders of their Fraternities? ſome holding of Saint Benet, ſome of Saint Hierome, ſome of Saint Baſil, ſome of Saint Bernard, ſome of Saint Bridget, ſome of Saint Bruno, ſome of Saint Lewis, as though it were not enough for Chriſtians to hold of Chriſt only. So ſubject were they to ſervile rules, that no part of Chriſtian liberty remained among them; ſo drowned and ſunk in Superſtition, that not only they had loſt Chriſts Religion, but alſo almoſt the ſenſe and nature of men. For where men naturally are and ought to be ruled by the diſcreet government of reaſon in all outward doings, wherein one Rule can ſerve for all Men; the circumſtance of time, place, perſon and buſineſs being ſo ſundry and divers; contrary among theſe, no reaſon, but only the knock of a Bell ruled all their doings; their riſing, their ſleeping, their praying, their eating, their coming in, their going out, their talking, their ſilence, and altogether like inſenſible people, either not having reaſon to rule themſelves, or elſe as perſons ungrateful to God, neither injoying the benefit of reaſon created in them, nor yet uſing the grace of Chriſts Liberty, whereunto he redeemed them.

Monachi Flagellantes

Monks are ſubject and ruled by the knock of a Bell.

Thus thou ſeeſt (gentle Reader) ſufficiently declared, what the Monks were in the primitive time of the Church, and what were the Monks of the middle Age, and of theſe our later days of the Church. Whereunto joyn this withal, that where the Monks of elder time (as is ſaid) were meer Lay-men and no Spiritual Miniſters: afterward Bonifacius the Fourth made a Decree, in the year of our Lord ſix hundred and ſix, that Monks might uſe the office of Preaching, of Chriſtening, of hearing Confeſſions, and alſo of abſolving them of their ſins, &c. So then Monks, who in the beginning were but Lay-men, and no Spiritual Miniſters, forbidden by the General Council of Chalcedon (as is above related) to intermeddle with matters Eccleſiaſtical; afterward in proceſs of time, did ſo much incroach upon the office of Spiritual Miniſters, that at length the Prieſts were diſcharged out of their Cathedral Churches, and Monks ſet in their places; becauſe that Monks in thoſe days, leading a ſtricter life, and profeſſing chaſtity, had a greater countenance of holineſs among the People than the Prieſts, who then in the days of King Edgar had Wives (at leaſt ſo many as would) no Law forbidding them to the contrary, till the time of Hildebrand, now called Gregory the ſeventh, whereof more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) in the Book next following.

Monks made ſpiritual Miniſters contrary to the old decrees and cuſtom of the Church.

Prieſts in K. Edgars time had Wives.

And thus much by the way as touching the Order and Profeſſion of Monks. Now to turn in again from whence we digreſſed (that is) to the matter of King Edgar, who following the counſel and leading of Dunſtan, and the foreſaid Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter, was ſomewhat thereby inclined to Superſtition: but otherwiſe of his own nature well given to all vertues and Princely acts worthy of much commendation and famous memory. So excellent was he in juſtice, and ſharp in correction of vices (as well in his Magiſtrates as other ſubjects) that never before his days was leſs Felony by Robbers, nor leſs Extortion or Bribery by falſe Officers. Such Provinces and Lordſhips, as were not yet come under the Kings ſubjection, he united and adjoyned to his Dominion; and ſo made one perfect Monarchy of the whole Realm of England, with all the Iſlands and borders about the ſame.

Such

England reduced into one full and perfect Monarchy.

Such as were wicked, he kept under, he repreſſed them that were Rebels, the godly he maintained, he loved the modeſt, he was devout to God, and beloved of his Subjects, whom he governed in much peace and quietneſs. And as he was a great ſeeker of peace, ſo God did bleſs him with much abundance of peace and reſt from all Wars, ſo that as the Story recordeth of him, Nullas inſidias domeſticorum, nullum exterminium alienorum ſenſerit, for the which he was called Pacificus. He neither taſted of any privy Treaſon among his Subjects, nor of any Invaſion of Foreign Enemies. So ſtudious he was of the publick profit of his Realm, and fruitful in his Government, that as the ſaid ſtory ſaith of him, Nullus fere annus in chronicis præteriit, quo non magnum & neceſſarium patriæ aliquid fecerit: No year paſſed in all the time of his Reign, wherein he did not ſome ſingular and neceſſary commodity for the Common wealth, &c. A great maintainer he was of Religion and Learning, not forgetting herein the foreſteps of King Alfred his Predeceſſor. Among his other Princely virtues this chiefly is to be regarded, that whereas other Princes commonly in much peace and quietneſs are wont to grow into a diſſolute negligence of life, or oblivion of their charge committed unto them; this King in continuance of peace (that notwithſtanding) kept ever with him ſuch a watch, and a vigilant ſeverity joyned with a ſeemly clemency, that I cannot here but recite the witneſs of our Story-writers, teſtifying of his diligent care over the Commonwealth, which was ſo great, Ut nullum cujuſcunque dignitatis hominem leges eludere impune permitteret: that is, That he would ſuffer no man, of what degree of Nobility ſo ever he were, to dally out his laws without condign puniſhment, &c. And followeth more in the ſame Author, Nemo ejus tempore privatus latro, nemo popularis prædo, niſi qui mallet in fortunas alienas graſſari propriæ vitæ diſpendio, &c. In all his time there was neither any privy picker, nor open thief, but he that in ſtealing other Mens goods, would venture and ſuffer (as he was ſure) the loſs of his own life, &c. Guliel. de reg.

Edgarus rex Pacificus. K. Edgar and K. Alfred compared together.

A note for men of Nobility to mark.

A notable example of a Prince, to admoniſh all Princes what to do.

Moreover, as the ſtudious induſtry of this Prince was forward in all other points, ſo his prudent proviſion did not lack in this alſo, in driving out the devouring and ravening Wolves throughout all his Land. Wherein he uſed this policy, in cauſing Ludwallus Prince or King of Wales, to yield to him yearly by way of Tribute three hundred Wolves. By means whereof, within the ſpace of four years after, in England and Wales might ſcantly be found one Wolf alive.

Wolves firſt driven out of England.

This Edgar among other of his politick deeds had in readineſs three thouſand ſix hundred Ships of War to ſcour the Seas in the Summer time, whereof one thouſand two hundred kept the Eaſt Seas; as many defended the Weſt ſide; again, as many were on the South Seas, to repulſe the Invaſion of Foreign Enemies. Moreover, in Winter ſeaſon, the uſe and manner of this vertuous King was this, During all the time of his life, to ride over the Land in progreſs, ſearching and inquiring diligently (to uſe here the words of mine Author) Quomodo legum jura, & ſuorum ſtatuta decretorum obſervarentur; & ne pauperes a potentibus præjudicium paſſi opprimerentur; that is, How his Laws and Statutes by him ordained were kept, and that the poor ſhould ſuffer no prejudice, or be oppreſſed any manner of ways by the mightier, &c. Briefly, as I ſee many things in this worthy Prince to be commended, ſo this one thing in him I cannot but lament, to ſee him like a Phenix to fly alone, that of all his Poſterity ſo few there be that ſeek to keep him company. And although I have ſhewed more already of this King, than I think will well be followed, yet this more is to be added to the worthineſs of his other acts, that whereas by the multitude of the Danes dwelling in diverſ places of England, much exceſſive drinking was uſed, whereupon enſued drunkenneſs and many other vices, to the evil example and hurt of his Subjects; he therefore, to prevent that evil, ordained certain Cups with Pins or Nails ſet in them, adding thereunto a Law, that what perſon drank paſt the mark at one draught, ſhould forfeit a certain peny, whereof one half ſhould fall to the accuſer, and the other half to the Ruler of the Borough or Town where the offence was done.

The proviſion of King Edgar in keeping the Seas.

A notable example in a Prince, for all good Princes to mark and to follow.

The device of K. Edgar to avoid drunkenneſs

It is reported of this Edgar by divers Authors, that about the thirteenth year of his Reign, he being at Cheſter, eight Kings (called in Hiſtories Subreguli) to wit, petty Kings, or under Kings, came and did Homage to him. Of whom the firſt was the King of Scots, called Kinadius, Macolinus of Cumberland, Mackus or Maſcuſinus King of Monia, and of divers other Iſlands, and all the Kings of Wales, the names of whom were Duſnal, or Dunewaldus, Siſreſh, Huwall, Jacob, Ulkell, Juchel. All which Kings, after they had given their fidelity to Edgar, the next day following (for a Pomp or Royalty) he entred with theſe aforeſaid Kings into the River of Dee; where he, ſitting in a Boat, took the rule of the Helm, and cauſed theſe eight Kings, every perſon taking an Ore in his hand, to row him up and down the River, to and from the Church of Saint John, unto his Palace again, in token that he was Maſter and Lord of ſo many Provinces; whereupon he is reported to have ſaid in this manner, Tunc demum poſſe ſucceſſores ſuos gloriari, ſe Reges Angliæ eſſe, cum tanta prærogativa honorum fruerentur. But in my mind, this King had ſaid much better, if he had rather ſaid with Saint Paul, Abſit mihi gloriari, niſi in Cruce Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti.

Eight Kings do Homage to K. Edgar.

The glory of K. Edgar reprehended.

Wherein Kings ought to glory.

And thus ye have heard hitherto, touching the commendation of King Edgar, ſuch reports as the old Monkiſh Writers thought to beſtow upon him, as upon the great Patron of their Monkiſh Religion, who had builded ſo many Monaſteries for them, as were Sundays in the year (as ſome ſay) or as Edmer reporteth, but forty eight.

K. Edgar a ſuperſtitious upholder of Monkery. Ex Edmero.

Now on the other ſide, what Vices in him were reigning, let us likewiſe conſider, according as we find in the ſaid Authors deſcribed, which moſt wrote to his advancement. Whereof, the firſt Vice is noted to be Cruelty, as well upon others, as namely, upon a certain Earl, being of his ſecret Council, called Ethelwold. The ſtory is this; Ordgarus, Duke of Devonſhire, had a certain Daughter named Elfrida, whoſe Beauty being highly commended to the King, he being inflamed therewith, ſent this foreſaid Ethelwold (whom he ſpecially truſted) to the party, to ſee and to bring him word again, and if her Beauty were ſuch as was reported, willing him alſo to make the Match between them. Ethelwold well viewing the party, and ſeeing her Beauty nothing inferiour to her fame, and thinking firſt to ſerve his own turn, told all things contrary unto the King. Whereupon the King withdrawing his mind otherwiſe, in the end it came to paſs, that Ethelwold himſelf did marry her.

Vices noted in K. Edgar.

K. Edgar circumvented by one of his Councill.

Not long after, the King underſtanding further by the complaints and rumors of certain, how he was prevented and beguiled, ſet a fair face upon the matter before Ethelwold; and merrily jeſting with him, told him how he would come and ſee his Wife, and indeed appointed the day when he would be there. Ethelwold the Husband, perceiving this matter to go hardly with him, made haſte to his Wife, declaring to her the coming of the King, and alſo opening the whole order of the matter how he had done; deſiring her of all love, as ſhe would ſave his life, to diſgrace and deform her ſelf with garments and ſuch attire, as the King might take no delighting in her. Elfrida hearing this, what did ſhe, but contrary to the requeſt of her Husband and promiſe of a Wife, againſt the Kings coming trimmed her ſelf at the Glaſs, and decked her in her beſt array. Whom when the King beheld, he was not ſo much enamored with her, as in hatred with her Husband, who had ſo deceived him. Whereupon the King ſhortly after, making as though he would go to hunt in the Foreſt of Harwood, ſent for Ethelwold to come to him under the pretence of Hunting, and there ran him through and ſlew him. After this, the Baſtard Son of Ethelwold coming to him, the King asked him how he liked that hunting? Who anſwered again, that which pleaſeth the King, ought not to diſpleaſe him; for the death of which Ethelwold, Elfrida afterward builded a Monaſtery of Nuns in remiſſion of ſins.

Cruelty in K. Edgar noted.

Great detriment happening in this Realm by King Edgar.

Another fault which Malmesbury noteth in him, was the coming in of Strangers into this Land, as Saxons, Flemings and Danes, whom he with great familiarity retained to the great detriment of the Land, as the foresaid story of Malmesbury recordeth, whose words be these: Unde factum est, ut fama ejus per ora omnium volitante, alienigenæ, Saxones, Flandricæ, ipsi etiam Dani huc frequenter annavigarent, Edgaro familiares effecti. Quorum adventus magnum provincialibus detrimentum peperit. Inde merito jureque reprehendunt eum literæ, &c. That is, Whereby it happened that divers strangers out of foreign Countries allured by his fame came into the Land, as Saxons, Flemings and Danes also, all which he retained with great familiarity. The coming of which strangers bred great damage to the Realm, and therefore is Edgar justly blamed in stories, &c. With the which reprehension the Saxon stories also do agree.

W. Malmib.

The incontinent life of K. Edgar.

The third vice to him objected, was, his incontinent and lascivious lust in deflouring Maids, as first of a Dukes Daughter being a Nun, and a Virgin named Wilfrida, or Wilstrud, of which Wilfrid was born Editha a Bastard Daughter of Edgar. Also of another certain Virgin in the Town of Andevar, who was privily conveyed into his Bed by this means: The lascivious King coming to Andevar, not far from Winchester, and thinking to have his pleasure of a certain Dukes Daughter, of whose beauty he heard much speaking, commanded the Maid to be brought unto him. The Mother of the Virgin, grieving to have her Daughter made a Concubine, secretly by night conveyed to the Kings Bed instead of her Daughter, another Maiden, of Beauty and Favour not uncomely; who in the morning rising to her work, and so being known of the King what she was, had granted unto her of the King such liberty and freedom, that of a servant she was made Mistress both to her Master, and also to her Mistress. Ex Matthæo Paris. lib. de regib.

Editha base Daughter of Wilfrid the Kings lemman.

Edward born in Bastardy of Elfled, King Edwards Concubine.

Another Concubine he had also besides these aforesaid, which was Egelfleda, or Elfleda, called Candida, the white Daughter of Duke Ordmere (as Gulielm. Malmesburiens. recordeth) she being also a professed Nun, of whom he begot Edward in Bastardy; for the which he was injoyned by Dunstan seven years Penance. After which Penance being compleat, then he took to him a lawful Wife (as Malmesb. saith) Elfritha, the Mother of Edmund and Ethelred, or otherwise called Egelred, whereof more shall be said (the Lord willing) hereafter.

King Edgar a great maintainer of Monkery

Over and besides all these Vices noted and objected to King Edgar in our Monkish Story-writers, I also observe another no less, or rather greater Vice than the other afore recited, which was, blind Superstition and idolatrous Monkery brought into the Church of Christ, with the wrongful expulsing of lawful married Priests out of their Houses. Whereupon what inconveniences insued after in this Realm, especially in the House of the Lord, I leave it to the consideration of them which have heard of the detestable enormities of those Religious Votaries: the occasion whereof first and chiefly began in this Edgar, through the instigation of Dunstan and his Fellows, who after they had inveigled the King, and had brought him to their purpose, they caused him to call a Council of the Clergy, where it was Enacted, that the Canons of divers Cathedral Churches, Colleginers, Parsons, Vicars, Priests and Deacons, with their Wives and Children, either should give over that kind of life, or else give room to Monks, &c. For execution of which Decree, two principal Visitors were appointed, Athelwold or Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester, and Oswald Bishop of Worcester, as is partly before touched. Osbernus in vita Dunstani. Malmsbur. de vit. pontif. Rog. Hoved.

King Edgar seduced by Dunstan and Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester. Ex Osberno in vita Dunstani, fol. 27. Malmib. Hovedan. & alibi.

And thus much concerning the History of King Edgar, and of such things as in his time happened in the Church, which Edgar after he had entered into the parts of Britany to subdue the Rebellion of the Welshmen, and there had spoiled the Country of Glamorgan, and wasted the Country of Odo, within ten days after, when he had reigned the space of sixteen years, he died, and was buried at Glastenbury, leaving after him two Bastards, to wit, Editha and Edward, and one Son lawfully begotten, named Ethelred, or otherwise by corruption called Egelred, for Edmund the elder Son died before his Father.

The death of K. Edgar.

You heard before how King Edgar is noted in all Stories to be an incontinent liver in deflouring Maids and Virgins. Of which Virgins, three notoriously are expressed in Authors, to wit, Wilstrude or Wilfrida; the second was the Dukes Maid at Andevar, near to Winchester; the third was Elfled Mother of Edward, for the which Elfled he was staved and kept back from his Coronation by Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, the space of seven years; and so the said King beginning his Reign in the sixteenth year of his Age, being the year of the Lord, nine hundred fifty nine, was Crowned at his Age one and thirty, Anno Domini 974. as is in the Saxon Chronicle of Worcester Church to be proved. For the more evident declaration of which matter, concerning the Coronation of the King restrained, and the presumptuous behaviour of Dunstan against the King, and his Penance by the said Dunstan enjoyned, ye shall hear both Osbern, Malmesbur. and other Authors speak in their own words as followeth. Perpetrato itaque in virginem velatam peccato, &c. After that Dunstan had understanding of the Kings offence perpetrated with the professed Nun, and that the same was blazed amongst the People, with great ire and passion of mind he came to the King, who seeing the Archbishop coming, eftsoons of gentleness arose from his Regal Seat towards him, to take him by the hand, and to give him place. But Dunstan refusing to take him by the hand, and with stern countenance bending his Brows, spake after this effect of words (as Stories import) unto the King, You that have not feared to corrupt a virgin Maid handfast to Christ, presume you to touch the consecrated hands of a Bishop? You have defiled the Spouse of your Maker, and think you by flattering service to pacifie the friend of the Bridegroom? No Sir, his friend will not I be, which hath Christ to his enemy, &c. The King terrified with these thundering words of Dunstan and compuncted with inward repentance of his sin perpetrated, fell down with weeping at the feet of Dunstan; who after he had raised him up from the ground again, began to utter to him the horribleness of his fact; and finding the King ready to receive whatsoever satisfaction he would lay upon him, enjoyned him this Penance for seven years space, as followeth:

The Chronicle Saxonice Ecclesiæ Wigornienses

Ex Osberno in vita Dunstani.

Dunstan refuseth to take the King by the hand. The words of Dunstan to K. Edgar.

That he should wear no Crown all that space; that he should fast twice in the Week; he should distribute his Treasure left to him of his Ancestors liberally unto the poor, he should build a Monastery of Nuns at Shaftsbury, that as he had robbed God of one Virgin through his transgression, so should he restore to him many again in times to come. Moreover he should expel Clerks of evil life (meaning such Priests as had Wives and Children) out of Churches, and place Covents of Monks in their room, &c.

Penance enjoyned to K. Edgar by Dunstan.

It followeth then in the Story of Osbern, that when the seven years of the Kings Penance were expired, Dunstan calling together all the Peers of the Realm, with Bishops, Abbots, and other Ecclesiastical degrees of the Clergy, in the publick sight of all the multitude, set the Crown upon the Kings Head at Bath, which was the one and thirtieth year of his Age, and the thirteenth year of his Reign; so that he reigned only but three years crowned King. All the other years besides Dunstan belike ruled the Land as he listed. Furthermore, as touching the Son of the said Elfled, thus the Story writeth, Puerum quoque ex peccatrice quondam progenitum, sacro fonte regeneratum lavavit, & aptato illi nomine Edwardo in filium sibi adoptavit, Id est, The Child also which was gotten of the Harlot, he baptised in the holy fountain of regeneration, and so giving his Name to be called Edward, did adopt him to be his Son, &c. Ex Osberno.

King Edgar reigned but three years crowned King.

Elfled proved a Nun, and Edward her son proved a Bastard.

By

Errors in Malmsbury, and certain other monks ſtories.

By the which Narration of Osbern, agreeing alſo with the Story of the Saxon Book above mentioned, is convinced a double untruth or error, either negligently overſeen, or of purpoſe diſſembled in our later Monkiſh Story-writers, as in Malmesbury, Matth. Paru, Matth. Weſtm. and others more. Who, to conceal the fault of King Edgar, or to bear with Dunſtan's fact, in ſetting up Edward for the maintenance of their Monkiſh Order, firſt do falſly affirm, that Editha the daughter of Ulfride was born after Edward, and that for her this Penance was injoyned to King Edgar. Which neither is, nor can be ſo, as in proceſs hereafter (the Lord willing) ſhall appear.

The firſt error. The Kings Penance not for Editha, but for Edward.

Secondly, they are deceived in this, that they affirm King Edgar to have two Wives, and that Elfleda the Mother of Edward was not a profeſſed Nun indeed, but diſſembled ſo to be to avoid the violence of the King: whereas indeed the truth of the Story both giveth her to be a Nun, and her Son to be baſe, and ſhe her ſelf never to be married unto the King.

The ſecond error. Elfleda the Mother of Edward, proved to be a profeſſed Nun.

The lying Miracles of Elfled, Dunſtan, and Editha reproved.

Now forſomuch as we have hitherto entered mention of Elfleda and Editha; alſo of Ulfred and Dunſtan, here would not be let paſs to ſpeak ſomething of their lying Miracles, falſly forged, to the great ſeduction of Chriſtian People by ſuperſtitious Monks, who cared not what Fables and Lies they brought into the Church, ſo they might have the vantage of poor mens Purſes and Oblations. And firſt here cometh in the fabulous Miracles wrought at the Tomb of Elfleda the Kings Concubine, which William Malmesbury in theſe Verſes expreſſeth:

Idolatrous worſhipping the Tomb of Elfled.

Nam nonnullis paſſa annis morborum moleſtiam,
Dæfecatam & excoctam Deo dedit animam.
Functas ergo vitæ fato beatas exuvias,
Infinitis clemens ſignis illuſtravit Deitas: Inops viſus & auditus ſi adorant tumulum,
Sanitati reſtituti probant ſanctæ meritum.
Rectum greſſum refert domum, qui acceſſit loripes,
Mente captus redit ſanus, boni ſenſus locupleS.

The Engliſh of which Verſes is needleſs here to be recited. Briefly, the effect is this; That both the blind, deaf, halt, and ſuch as be mad, receive their health again, if they worſhip the Tomb of this Elfleda, &c.

The idle fantaſies and forged Miracles of Dunſtan. A doubt whether Dunſtan was a Sorcerer.

The like feignings and monſtrous Miracles we read alſo in Chronicles of doting Dunſtan, drowned in all ſuperſtition, if he were not alſo a wicked Sorcerer. Firſt, how he being yet a Boy, chaſed away the Divel, ſet about with a great company of Dogs, and how the Angels did open the Church door for him to enter. Then how the Lute or Harp hanging upon the Wall did ſing or play without any finger theſe words, Gaudent in cœlis animæ ſanctorum, qui Chriſti veſtigia ſunt ſequuti, & qui pro ejus amore ſanguinem ſuum fuderunt; ideo cum Chriſto regnabunt in æternum.

Dunſtan's Poſt-ſetter. Dunſtan caught the Devil by the Noſe with an hot pair of Tongs. Our Lady appeared to Dunſtan. What marvel, if certain books and Epiſtles be falſly intituled to the Doctors, when the Papiſts ſhame not to aſcribe other mens Verſes alſo to the Virgin Mary her ſelf?

Item, where a certain great Beam or maſter-poſt was looſed out of the place, he with making the ſign of a Croſs, ſet it in right frame again. Moreover, how the ſaid Dunſtan being tempted upon a time, of the Devil with the cogitation of Women, caught the Devil by the Noſe with a hot pair of Tongs, and held him faſt. Item, How often Heavenly Spirits appeared to him, and uſed to talk with him familiarly. Item, How he propheſied of the Birth of King Edgar, of the death of King Egelred, of the death of Editha, and of Ethelwald Biſhop of Wincheſter. Alſo how our Lady with her fellows appeared viſibly to him, ſinging this Song;

Cantemus domino ſociæ, cantemus honorem;
Dulcis amor Chriſti perſonet ore pio.

Again, how the Angels appeared to him, ſinging the Hymn called Kyrie Rex ſplendens, &c. And yet theſe prodigious Fantaſies with other more are written of him in Chronicles, and have been believed in Churches.

A foul, filthy monkiſh Miracle in the ſtory of Editha.

Among many other falſe and lying Miracles, forged in this corrupt time of Monkery, the fabulous or rather filthy Legend of Editha were not to be overpaſſed, if for ſhame and honeſty it might well be recited. But to caſt the dirt of theſe Pope-holy Monks in their own face, which ſo impudently have abuſed the Church of Chriſt, and ſimplicity of the People, with their ungratious vanities; let us ſee what this Miracle is, and how honeſtly it is told.

Another Dream of Dunſtan.

Certain years after the death of Editha, ſaith William of Malmesbury, which years Capgrave in his new Legend reckoneth to be thirteen, the ſaid Editha, and alſo Saint Dennis holding her by the hand, appeared to Dunſtan in a Viſion, willing and requiring him that the body of Editha in the Church of Wilton, ſhould be taken up and ſhrined, to the intent it might be honoured here in Earth of her Servants, according as it is worſhipped of her Spouſe in Heaven. Dunſtan upon this coming from Salisbury to Wilton, where Editha was interred, commanded her body to be taken up with much Honour and Solemnity. Who there in opening her Tomb (as both Malmesbury and Capgrave with ſhame enough record) found all the whole body of this Editha conſumed to Earth, ſave only her Thumb, her Belly, and the part under the Belly. Whereof the ſaid Editha expounding the meaning, declared that her Thumb remained ſound, for the much croſſing ſhe uſed with the ſame. The other parts were incorrupted for a teſtimony of her Abſtinence and Integrity, &c. Ex Malmesburienſ. & Capgrave. Ex W. Mal. & Capgrave in legenda nova.

What Satan hath ſo envied the true ſincerity of Chriſtian Faith and Doctrine, ſo to contaminate the ſame with ſuch impudent tales, ſuch filthy vanities, and idolatrous fantaſies as this? Such Monks with their deteſtable Houſes, where Chriſts People were ſo abominably abuſed and ſeduced to worſhip dead Carcaſes of Men and Women, whether they deſerved not to be raced and pluckt down to the ground, let all chaſt Readers judge. But of theſe matters enough and too much.

The death of K. Edgar.

King Edward called the Martyr.

AFTER the death of King Edgar no ſmall trouble aroſe among the Lords and Biſhops for ſucceſſion of the Crown; the principal cauſe whereof roſe upon this occaſion, as by the Story of Simon of Durham and Roger Hoveden, is declared. Immediately after the deceaſe of the King, Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles which held with Egelred or Ethelred the only right heir and lawful Son of Edgar, miſliking the placing and intruding of Monks into Churches, and the thruſting out of the Secular Prieſts, with their Wives and Children out of their ancient Poſſeſſions, expelled the Abbots and Monks, and brought in again the foreſaid Prieſts with their Wives.

{Anno 975.} The ſtory of K. Edward. Ex Simone Dunhamo. Contention amongſt the Lords about the putting in of monks.

Wives. Againſt whom certain other there were on the contrary part that made reſiſtance, as Ethelwin Duke of Eaſtangles, Elfwoldus his brother, and the Earl Brithnothus, ſaying in a Council together aſſembled, That they would never ſuffer the Religious Monks to be expelled and driven out of the Realm, which held up all Religion in the Land; and thereupon eſtſoons levied an Army, whereby to defend by force the Monaſteries, ſuch as were within the Precinct of Eaſtanglia.

Contention amongſt the Lords for chooſing the King.

In this hurly-burly amongſt the Lords, about the placing of Monks, and putting out of Prieſts, roſe alſo the contention about the Crown, who ſhould be their King; the Biſhops and ſuch Lords as favoured the Monks, ſeeking to advance ſuch a King as they knew would incline to their ſide; ſo that the Lords thus divided, ſome of them would have Edward, and ſome conſented upon Egelred the lawful Son. Then Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Oſwald Archbiſhop of York, with other their fellow Biſhops, Abbots, and divers other Lords and Dukes aſſembled in a Council together. In the which Council Dunſtan coming in with his Croſs in his hand, and bringing Edward before the Lords, ſo perſwaded them, that in the end Edward by Dunſtan's means was elected, conſecrated and anointed for their King.

Edward the Baſtard made King, and the right heir put back.

And thus haſt thou (good Reader) the very truth of this ſtory, according to the writing of Authors of moſt antiquity which lived neareſt to that Age, as Oſbern and others; which Osbern, living in the days of William the Conqueror, wrote this Story of Dunſtan through the motion of Lanfrancus, and alledgeth, or rather tranſlateth the ſame out of ſuch Saxon Stories as were written before his time. Beſides which Oſbern we have alſo for witneſs hereof, Nicholas Trivet, in his Engliſh Story written in French, and alſo Joannes Paris in his French Story written in the Latine Tongue, where he plainly calleth Edward, Non legitimum filium, that is, No lawful Son. Whereunto add moreover, the teſtimony of Vincentius and Antoninus, who in plain terms likewiſe report the ſame.

Ex Osbern. Nic. Trivet. Joan. Pariſ. Vincentio, Antonino.

Editha proved not to be the child for whom King Edgar was enjoyn d. Penance.

Now having laid the foundation for the truth and ground of this matter, let us come to examine how truly our later Writers do ſay, which write that Editha, and not Edward, was the Child for whom Dunſtan enjoyned to the King ſeven years Penance, and alſo how truly they report Edward to be a lawful Heir, and Elfled to be a lawful Wife to King Edgar.

For firſt touching Editha, this is confeſſed by the ſaid Writers themſelves, that ſhe was of good years at what time Edgar her Father was enjoyned his Penance. After the which ſeven years of his Penance expired, he lived at the moſt but three years and a half, which ſeven years, and three years and a half, do make in all but ten years and a half. But now the ſaid Authors themſelves do grant, that ſhe was made Abbeſs by her Father, he being then alive. And how can this then ſtand with her Legend, which ſaith, that ſhe was not leſs than fifteen years of Age? By which account it muſt needs fall out, that ſhe could not be ſo little as five years old, before the birth of that Child for whom the King did Penance.

The years of Editha & Edward caſt by the ſupputation of legends and ſtories.

And thus much touching Editha. Now in like manner to conſider of the time of Edward. Firſt, this by all Writers is granted, that he was ſlain in the fifteenth year of his Age. Which years do well agree to that Child which King Edgar begat in Baſtardy, and for the which he did his Penance; for the more evidence whereof, let us come to the ſupputation of the years in this ſort.

Firſt the Penance of the King after the birth of this Child, laſted ſeven years. Then the King after the ſame lived three years and a half. After whoſe death Edward reigned other three years and a half, which in all make the full ſum of fourteen years. About the count of which age, the ſaid Edward going on his fifteenth year, by their own reckoning was ſlain.

And thus have ye by manifeſt demonſtration proved by the right caſting of the years, after their own grant and reckoning, that Editha Daughter of Ulfride in no caſe can be the Child which was born after Edward, and for whom the King was enjoyned Penance; but that Edward rather was born after Editha, and was the Child for whom the Penance was injoyned; contrary to the Opinion commonly received in the Church, which for ignorance of the Story hath hitherto holden Edward to be an Holy Martyr, and right Heir unto the Crown. Which Error and Opinion how it firſt ſprang, and by whom, albeit it pertain not to my Story to diſcuſs, yet were it no hard matter to conjecture.

K. Edward, called Martyr, proved to be a Baſtard.

The cauſe perpending this ſtory of K. Edward is ſo fully corrupted in Monkiſh Stories.

Firſt, After that Dunſtan and Oſwald with other Biſhops, Abbots, and certain Lords and Dukes of that Faction, for the maintenance of Monkery, had advanced Edward to be King, againſt Queen Alfrith Mother of Ethelred, and Alferus Duke of Mercia, and certain other Nobles which held the contrary ſide of the Prieſts againſt the Monks; in proceſs of time the Monks that came after to write Stories, perceiving Dunſtan to be reputed in the Church of Rome for an holy Saint, and the ſaid King Edward for an holy Martyr, and partly alſo to bolſter up their own Religion of Monkery ſo much as they could; to the intent therefore that they might ſave both the credit of Dunſtan, and of the King, and eſpecially bearing favour to their own Religion, and partly that the reputation of the Church of Rome ſhould not be diſtained by opening the truth of this matter, either they did not ſee, or would not confeſs herein what they knew; but rather thought beſt to blanch the Story, and colourably to hide the ſimple truth thereof, making the People falſely believe that Elfleda the Mother of Edward, was Wife to King Edgar, and Edward to be lawfully born, and alſo that Editha was born after Edward, and to be the Child for which the King was enjoyned Penance. All which is falſe and contrary both to the order of time above declared, and alſo to the plain words of Malmesbury, which ſpeaking of King Edgar's laſt Concubine, ſaith in plain words, Dilexit unice integram lecto uni differens fidem, quoad legitimam uxorem accepit Elfthridem, Filiam Ordgari: that is, He had a Concubine whom he loved intirely, keeping true faith of his Bed to her alone, until the time he married for his lawful Wife Elfrid the Daughter of Duke Ordgar, &c. Whereby we have to underſtand, that whatſoever Concubine this was which Malmesbury ſpeaketh of, certain it is, that Edgar lived in Whoredom till the time he married his lawful Wife. Furthermore, and finally to conclude, beſide theſe Arguments and Allegations above recited, let this alſo be perpended, how the ſaid Dunſtan with his Complices, after the killing of King Edward, leaving the right Heir of the Crown (which was Ethelred) went about (as Capgrave and their own Legend confeſſeth) to ſet up Editha the other Baſtard to poſſeſs the Crown, but that ſhe, more wiſe than her Brother Edward, refuſed the ſame. Whereby what is to be thought of the doings of Dunſtan, and what ſhould be the cauſe why he preferred both Edward and Editha to the Crown, rather than the lawful Heir, I leave to all indifferent Readers thereof to judge.

Malmsb. in lib. de regib.

Dunſtan ſuborneth Editha the Baſtard, to take the crown from the right Heir.

Capgrav. in vita ſanctæ Editha.

After that Dunſtan and his fellows had thus ſet up Edward for their King, they were now where they would be, ſuppoſing all to be ſure on their ſide, and that they had eſtabliſhed the Kingdom of Monkery for ever, through the help of the young King, and the Duke of Eaſtangles, and certain other Nobles whom they had drawn to their part. Howbeit this matter paſſed not ſo well with them as they hoped. For ſhortly after the Coronation of the young King, Alferus Duke of Mercia, who followed much the deeds of the Queen with other great Men, ſtoutly ſtanding on the other ſide, drove out the Monks from the Cathedral Churches, which King Edgar before had ſet in, and reſtored again the Prieſts (as Ranulphus ſaith) with their Concubines; but in the Hiſtory of the Library of Fornal, I find it plainly expreſſed with their Wives. The words

Duke Alferus.

Hiſtoria Jornalenſis in vita Edgari.

of the very Author be theſe: Alferus princeps Merciorum, cæterique plures, ejectis monachis de magnis monaſteriis, quos Rex Edgarus nuper inſtituerat, Clericos cum uxoribus reduxerunt: that is, Alferus Duke of Mercia, with other great men more, drove out the Monks from the great Monaſteries whom King Edgar had there ſet in before, and reſtored again the Prieſts with their wives.

Biſhops and Prieſts in thoſe days married in England.
